PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE following work presents itself to the public with no claims to attention, but such as are founded upon the interest which may be felt in the lives of Americans. Finding himself, a few years ago, in a literary retirement, with no important duties which pressed immediately upon him, the author conceived the plan of this Dictionary. He was desirous of bringing to the citizens of the United States more information than was generally possessed, respecting the illustrious men of former times, the benefactors and ornaments of this country, who have passed away. He persuaded himself that, if he could collect the fragments of biography, which were buried in the mass of American history, or scattered amidst a multitude of tracts of various kinds, and could fashion these materials into a regular form, so as to place before the eye our great and good men, if not in their full dimensions, yet in their true shape, he should render an acceptable service to his countrymen. This work, with no little labor, he has now completed; and the inexperienced artist, in his first essay, can hope only that his design will be commended. He wishes chiefly, that, as the images of departed excellence are surveyed, the spirit which animated them may be caught by the beholder.

As an apology, however, for the deficiencies and errors of various kinds which may be found in the work, a full exposition of his plan, and some representation of the difficulty of executing it, seem to be necessary.

It was proposed to give some account of the persons who first discovered the new world; of those who had a principal agency in laying the foundations of the several colonies; of those who have held important offices and discharged the duties of them with ability and integrity; of those who have been conspicuous in the learned professions; of those who have been remarkable for genius and knowledge, or who have written anything deserving of remembrance; of the distinguished friends of literature and science; of the statesmen, the patriots, and heroes, who have contended for American liberty, or aided in the establishment of our civil institutions; and of all, whose lives, bright with Christian virtue, might furnish examples which should be worthy of imitation. It was determined to enlarge this wide field by giving as complete a list as could be made of the writings of each person, and by introducing the first ministers of the principal towns, for the purpose of illustrating the history of this country. The design included, also, a very compendious history of the United States, as well as of each separate colony and State, for the satisfaction of the reader who might wish to view the subjects of the biographical sketches in connection with the most prominent facts relating to the country in which they lived. In addition to all this, it was intended to annex such references as would point out the sources from which information should be derived, and as might direct to more copious intelligence than could be contained in this work.

Such were the objects which the author had in view, when he commenced an enterprise, of whose magnitude and difficulty he was not sufficiently sensible, before he had advanced too far to be able to retreat. The modern compilers of similar works in Europe have little else to do but to combine or abridge the labors of their predecessors, and employ the materials previously collected to their hands. But in the compilation of this work a new and untrodden field was to be explored. It became necessary, not only to examine the whole of American history, in order to know who have taken a conspicuous part in the transactions of this country, but to supply, from other sources, the imperfect accounts of general historical writers. By a recurrence to the references, it will be seen that much toil has been encountered. But, although the authorities may seem to be unnecessarily multiplied, there has been some moderation in introducing them, for in many instances they do not, by any means, exhibit the extent of the researches which have been made. It could not be expected, or wished, that newspapers, pamphlets, and other productions should be referred to for undisputed dates and single facts which they have afforded, and which have been embodied with regular accounts. The labor, however, of searching for information has frequently been less than that of comparing different statements, endeavoring to reconcile them when they disagreed, adjusting the chronology, combining the independent facts, and forming a consistent whole of what existed only in disjointed parts. Sometimes the mind has been overwhelmed by the variety and abundance of intelligence; and sometimes the author has prosecuted his inquiries in every direction, and found only a barren waste.

For the large space which is sometimes occupied in describing the last hours of the persons of whom a sketch is given, the following reasons are assigned. In the lives of our fellow-men, there is no period so important to them, and so interesting to us, as the period which immediately precedes their dissolution. To see one of our brethren at a point of his existence, beyond which the next step will either plunge him down a precipice into an abyss from which he will never rise, or will elevate him to everlasting glory, is a spectacle which attracts us, not merely by its sublimity, but because we know that the flight of time is rapidly hastening us to the same crisis. We wish to see men in the terrible situation which inevitably awaits us; to learn what it is that can support them, and can secure them. The gratification of this desire to behold what is great and awful, and the communication of the aids which may be derived from the conduct of dying men, have accordingly been combined in the objects of this work. After recounting the vicissitudes attending the affairs of men, the author was irresistibly inclined to turn from the fluctuations of human life, and to dwell, when his subject would give him an opportunity, upon the calm and firm hopes of the Christian, and the sure prospects of eternity. While he thus soothed his own mind, he also believed that he should afford a resting-place to the minds of others, fatigued with following their brethren amidst their transient occupations, their successes, their disappointments, and their afflictions.

Some terms are used which relate to local circumstances, and which require those circumstances to be pointed out. In several of the New England States, when the annual election of the several branches of the legislature is completed, and the government is organized, it has been an ancient practice to have a sermon preached in the audience of the newly-elected rulers, which is called the election sermon. This phrase would not need an explanation to an inhabitant of New England. The names of pastor and teacher, as distinct officers in the church, frequently occur. Soon after the first settlement of this country, when some societies enjoyed the labors of two ministers, they bore the titles of teacher and pastor, of which it was the duty of the former to attend particularly to doctrine, and of the latter to exhortation; the one was to instruct, and the other to persuade. But the boundary between these two offices was not well defined, and was in fact very little regarded. The distinction of the name itself did not exist long.

Great care has been taken to render the dates accurate, and to avoid the mistakes which have been made from inattention to the former method of reckoning time, when March was the first month of the year. If any one, ignorant of this circumstance, should look into Dr. Mather's Magnalia, or ecclesiastical history of New England, he would sometimes wonder at the absurdity of the writer. He would read, for instance, in the life of President Chauncy, that he died in February, 1671, and will find it previously said that he attended the commencement in the same year, which was in July. Thus, too, Peter Hobart is said to have died in January, and yet to have been infirm in the summer of 1678. When it is remembered that March was the first month, these accounts are easy to be reconciled. There seems not, however, to have been any uniformity in disposing of the days between the first and the twenty-fifth of March, for sometimes they are considered as belonging to the antecedent, and sometimes to the subsequent year. American writers, it is believed, have generally, if not always, applied them to the latter. When the figures for two years are written, as in dates before the adoption of the new style in 1752 is found frequently to be the case, not only for the days above mentioned, but for the days in January and February, it is the latter year which corresponds with our present mode of reckoning. Thus, March 1, 1689, was sometimes written March 1, 1688-9, or with the figures placed one above the other. The months were designated usually by the names of the first, the second, etc.; so that February was the twelfth month.

No apology is necessary for the free use which has been made of the labors of others, for the plan of this book is so essentially different from that of any which has preceded it, that the author has not encroached upon the objects which others had in view. He has had no hesitation in using their very language, whenever it suited him. Compilers seem to be licensed pillagers. Like the youth of Sparta, they may lay their hands upon plunder without a crime, if they will but seize it with adroitness. The list of American literary productions, which has been rendered as complete as possible, is, for the sake of method, placed at the close of each article; and, in giving the titles of them, it will be perceived that there has frequently been an economy of words, as far as was consistent with distinctness of representation.

The author is aware that he lives in times which are like all other times, when the sympathies of parties of different kinds are very strong; and he believes that he has sought less to conciliate them than to follow truth, though she might not lead him into any of the paths along which the many are pressing. Without resolving to be impartial, it would indicate no common destitution of upright and honorable principles to attempt a delineation of the characters of men. He may have misapprehended, and he may have done what is worse. All are liable to errors, and he knows enough of the windings of the heart to remember that errors may proceed from prejudice, or indolence of attention, and be criminal, while they are cherished as honest and well-founded convictions, the result of impartial inquiry. He trusts, however, that nothing will be found in this book to counteract the influence of genuine religion, evincing itself in piety and good works, or to weaken the attachment of Americans to their well-balanced republic, which equally abhors the tyranny of irresponsible authority, the absurdity of hereditary wisdom, and the anarchy of lawless liberty.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

AFTER a long interval since the first edition of this work, the author now offers this second edition to the public. During twenty years past he has been repeatedly urged to accomplish what he has not found leisure to accomplish till the present time. But the delay, as the death-harvest among the eminent men of our country has been gathered in, has swelled the catalogue of those who ought to be commemorated in a biography of "the mighty dead" of America. The first edition was the first general collection of American biography ever published; and it is still the largest work of the kind which has appeared. In the prospectus of this second edition it was proposed to print seven hundred and fifty pages, and it was thought that the separate biographical notices would amount to about twelve hundred, being about five hundred more than are contained in the first edition. But the book has reached the unwieldy size of eight hundred and eight pages, and the biographical articles exceed eighteen hundred, presenting an account of more than one thousand individuals not mentioned in Lord's edition of Lempriere, and of about sixteen hundred not found in the first ten volumes of the Encyclopedia Americana. Yet the author has been obliged to exclude accounts of many persons of whom he would willingly have said something. If he has at times misjudged in his exclusions and admissions,—yet for some omissions an apology will be found in the difficulty of obtaining intelligence, as well as in oversight, which could hardly fail to occur in a work of such extent, embracing such a multitude of facts, and requiring, while in the press, such incessant attention and labor,—he can only promise, should he live to publish an additional volume, or to prepare another edition, an earnest effort to render the work more complete, and more free from error. In the mean time he solicits the communication of intelligence respecting individuals worthy of being remembered, who have escaped, or who are likely to escape, his unassisted researches.

To those gentlemen in different parts of our country, who have favored him with notices of their friends, or of others, he returns his acknowledgments. He has been particularly indebted to the biographical collections of Mr. Samuel Jennison, Jun., of Worcester, Mass., and to the accurate antiquarian researches of Mr. John Farmer, of Concord, N. H., whose New England Genealogical Register will enable most of the sons of the Pilgrims of New England to trace their descent from their worthy ancestry. The authorities referred to, though abridged from the first edition, will show to what books he has been chiefly indebted.

America is reproached in Europe for deficiency in literature and science; but if one will consider that it is not two hundred years since the first press was set up in this country, and will then look at the list of publications annexed to the articles in this Biography, he will be astonished at the multitude of works which have been printed. New England was founded by men of learning, whose first care was to establish schools; and the descendants of the fathers have inherited their love of knowledge and mental energy. No race of men on the face of the earth, it may be safely asserted, are so rational, so intelligent, so enlightened, and of such intellectual power, as the descendants of the New England Pilgrims, and the inhabitants generally of our extensive country.

Although the wide diffusion of knowledge is preferable to its convergence into a few points of splendor, yet America can boast of names of eminence in the arts and in various departments of science, and can speak of her sons of inventive power, of metaphysical acuteness, of philosophical discovery, of profound learning, and thrilling eloquence, and especially of a multitude skilled in the knowledge and the maintenance of the rights of man. Happy will it be for our country, if ancient wisdom, and patriotism, and piety shall not, in a future race, dwindle down into the hunger for office, and the violence of party, and the cheerlessness of infidelity.

This body of American Biography will be found to comprise the first SETTLERS and FATHERS of our country; early NAVIGATORS, and adventurous TRAVELLERS; the STATESMEN, PATRIOTS, and HEROES, who have contended for American liberty, or assisted in laying the foundations of our republican institutions; all the SIGNERS of the Declaration of Independence; brave and skilful MILITARY and NAVAL COMMANDERS; many of the GOVERNORS of the several States, and the deceased PRESIDENTS of our country; profound LAWYERS, and skilful PHYSICIANS; men of GENIUS, LEARNING, and SCIENCE, and the distinguished FRIENDS and PATRONS of LEARNING; THEOLOGIANS and HISTORIANS, POETS and ORATORS; ingenious ARTISTS, and men celebrated for their INVENTIONS; together with many eminent PHILANTHROPISTS and CHRISTIANS, whose examples have diffused a cheering radiance around them.

The author, in conclusion, cannot avoid expressing the wish that, as the reader surveys the lives of such men, the commendable zeal which animated them may come upon his own soul, and that he may help to bear up the honors of a country which has been the abode of a race of enlightened, noble-minded, disinterested, and virtuous men.

BRUNSWICK, MAINE, July 17, 1832.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION.

THE reprint of the Prefaces to the two former editions—the first dated forty-eight years ago, and the second twenty-five years—renders unnecessary any new remarks on the design and importance of such a collection of general American biography, as is furnished by this book; which was, in fact, the first work of the kind ever published, and is now the only general and exclusively American biography to which the inquirer has access. The only change in the plan is the omission of the brief histories of the several States, which histories might have been useful and convenient many years ago, but which, at the present day, with the great increase of the number of the States, and the rapid growth of the various interests of the country, should give way to fuller and more copious and satisfactory historical accounts. This work is therefore now purely biography; and, instead of “An American Biographical and Historical Dictionary,” the title is now “The American Biographical Dictionary.”

This book of American biography has not been superseded nor approached in value by any book of the kind which has been published. Without referring again to such books as were mentioned in the second preface, I may allude to two general biographies which have been recently printed, namely: Appletons' Cyclopædia of Biography, and Blake's General Biography. They each include in one volume both foreign and American, chiefly foreign, and only in small part American, biography. While they may have each ten or twelve thousand foreign names, the former has only about one thousand, and the latter about two thousand, American names; but my book has, of the distinguished men of our country, the great number of six thousand seven hundred seventy-five, exceeding the largest of these two books by about four thousand seven hundred American names. And my whole book of nine hundred pages, in two columns, royal octavo, is made up, not chiefly of foreigners, but of ALL AMERICANS. Moreover, I may be permitted to add, my articles are not shallow abridgments of my second edition, but full and ample accounts, including a list of the writings of each person. If the Appletons' book gives one page of letter type to Washington, my own book gives to our greatest man twelve pages; if that book gives to Rev. Dr. John M. Mason, of New York, eight lines, mine gives to him a page and a half; if that book gives to John Adams half a page, mine gives to him six pages. Such will often be found the proportion in the articles, without referring to such a case as Rev. Dr. Morse, the father of American geography, who has one line, while in my book he has nearly half a page; such the abridgment to which my book has been subjected.

I can truly say of my book, that it is my own labor of half a century, during which period I have been gleaning from the wide field of American history, and from an immense multitude of journals, papers, and memorials of the dead, aided also by the contribution of facts from the friends of the deceased. I have introduced many anecdotes, for they often combine useful and important instruction with amusement. I have attempted truly to describe all characters; and, in following the pathway of truth, I have not invested men with excellencies which do not belong to them, nor regarded with equal favor contradictory systems of faith and irreconcilable principles of conduct. As an honest man, not deprived of intelligence nor void of benevolence, I have, as I think, known how to censure as well as to praise.

The first edition contained an account of more than seven hundred deceased Americans, the second of more than eighteen hundred, which large number, in the present edition, brought down to the present time, is more than trebled; so that in this book may be found an account of nearly seven thousand Americans, of some note and worthiness of being remembered. And how vast must be the number of American citizens, spread over our wide country, who may find here recorded the names of their own ancestors, which, elsewhere, they may not be able to find?

If, as a reviewer regarded this book, when, many years ago, the second edition was published, it was "one of that class of books which may be reckoned as among the necessaries of literary life, the implements of study," and if "this work should be in the hands, or at least within the reach, of every literary and professional man throughout the country;" then, at the present time, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, this greatly enlarged book cannot be less necessary and important.

It must be wanted, if I mistake not, by our statesmen; it must be wanted by every minister of the gospel, of whatever denomination; it must be wanted in every school and town library. That the print is fair and easy to the eye, every reader will perceive; and I rejoice that my publishers present this work to the lovers of American biography in a form which must be satisfactory to their wishes, associating nothing of meanness or narrowness with this memorial of the mighty dead of our country.

Intelligent, patriotic inquirers concerning the lives of their predecessors may here obtain the information which, unaided by this book, it might be impossible for them to procure; and which they certainly will not find in the books, whether called dictionaries or cyclopædias, containing abridgments of my condensed biography. The author of one of them had indeed the grace to ask of me permission to abridge my second edition for his own purposes, — a request which I could not grant. The use which, without my consent, has been actually made of my book, by way of abridgment or abstracts, will, I hope, create a thirst for the more copious biography, to be found in this book. It may be added, that this biographical book will not — like many other works which have only a temporary interest — be liable to become antiquated by years; for the memory of the worthy dead, the memory of the fathers, will ever be cherished and fresh in the American heart. The Pilgrims who landed on the rock of Plymouth were never so revered as they are now.

It is rare that an author is permitted to superintend the publication of a book, the first edition of which he published nearly half a century before. To the kind Providence which has preserved my life, I offer my grateful acknowledgments; and, as my age and my labors in this book of record, which speaks of the dead, have rendered my thoughts familiar with death, I may be allowed, lastly, to utter the prayer for the readers of this work, that God will give us, at the moment of our departure from the earth, the peace and triumph often given, as here recorded, to his Christian servants; and that, when we shall meet in a great company of hundreds of millions of revived men of all countries, He will grant that we may meet as fellow-sharers in the unutterable blessings revealed in the gospel of his Son, whose death has made atonement for our sins, and by whose teaching and resurrection "life and immortality have been brought to light."

NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS, May 1, 1857.

THE AMERICAN BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

ABBOT, HULL, a respectable minister of Charlestown, Mass., was graduated at Harvard College in the year 1720, and ordained Feb. 5, 1724, as colleague with Mr. Bradstreet. After continuing fifty years in the ministry, he died April 19, 1774, aged 80 years. He published the following sermons: on the artillery election, 1735; on the rebellion in Scotland, 1746; against cursing and swearing, 1747.

ABBOT, SAMUEL, one of the founders of the Theological Seminary at Andover, died in that town, of which he was a native, April 30, 1812, aged 80. He had been a merchant in Boston. His donation for establishing the Seminary, August 31, 1807, was 20,000 dollars; he also bequeathed to it more than 100,000 dollars. He was a humble, conscientious, and pious man, remarkable for prudence, sincerity, and uprightness; charitable to the poor, and zealous for the interests of religion. He bestowed several thousands of dollars for the relief of ministers of the gospel and for other charitable objects. It was a maxim with him, "to praise no one in his presence and to dispraise no one in his absence." In his last sickness he enjoyed a peace, which the world cannot give. "I desire to live," he said, "if God has any thing more for me to do or to suffer." When near his end he said, "there is enough in God; I want nothing but God." He left a widow, with whom he had lived more than fifty years, and one son. — Woods' Funeral Sermon; Panoplist, VIII. 337.

ABBOT, ABEL, D. D., a minister in Beverly, Mass., was born at Andover Aug. 17, 1770, and graduated at Harvard College in 1787, having an unstained character and a high rank as a scholar. After being an assistant teacher in the Academy at Andover, and studying theology with Mr. French, he was settled about 1794 as the minister of Haverhill, where he continued eight years. An inadequate support for his family induced him to ask a dismissal, though with great reluctance. He was soon afterwards, about 1802, settled in Beverly, as the successor of Mr. McKeen, who had been chosen president of Bowdoin College. The remainder of his life, about twenty-four years, was passed in Beverly in his ministerial office, except when his labors were interrupted by sickness. He passed the winter of 1827-1828 in and near Charleston, S. C., for the recovery of his health. Early in Feb., 1828, he embarked for Cuba, where he continued three months, exploring different parts of the island, and making a diligent record of his observations in letters to his family and friends. On his return, he sailed from the pestilential city of Havana, with his health almost restored. He preached at Charleston, June 1, and the next day sailed for New York. But, although able to go on deck in the morning, he died at noon, June 7th, just as the vessel came to anchor at the quarantine ground near the city of New York, and was buried on Staten Island. It is probable, that he was a victim to the yellow fever, the contagion of which he received at Havana. — Dr. Abbot was very courteous and interesting in social intercourse, and was eloquent in preaching. His religious sentiments are not particularly explained by his biographer, who says, that he belonged "to no sect but that of good men." Happy are all they, who belong to that sect. He seems to have been, in his last days, extremely solicitous on the subject of religious controversy. In the love of peace all good men will agree with him, and doubtless there has been much controversy concerning unimportant points, conducted too in an unchristian spirit; but, in this world of error, it is not easy to imagine how controversy is to be avoided. If the truth is assailed, it would seem, that those who love it, should engage in its vindication; for men always defend against unjust assault what they deem valuable. Besides, if an intelligent and benevolent man thinks his neighbor has fallen into a dangerous mistake, why should he not, in a friendly debate, endeavor to set him right? Especially ought the preachers of truth to recommend it to others, with meekness indeed and in love, but with all the energy which its relation to human happiness demands. When this is done, the enemies of the truth, by resisting it, will present to the world the form of religious dissension. If infidels endeavor to subvert the foundations of Christianity; if corrupt heretics deny the plain doctrines of the gospel; if bewildered enthusiasts bring forward their whims and fancies as doctrines revealed from heaven; shall the dread of controversy prevent the exposure of their false reasonings, their presumptuous comments, and their delusive and perilous imaginations?—Since the death of Dr. Abbot and the settlement of his Unitarian successor, many of the congregation have withdrawn and connected themselves with the Second Church and Society.—His interesting and valuable letters from Cuba were published after his death, 8vo., Boston, 1829. He published also artillery election sermon, 1802; sermons to mariners, 1812; address on intemperance, 1815; sermon before the Salem Missionary Society, 1816; before the Bible Society of Salem, 1817; convention sermon, 1827.—Flint's Sermon; Sketch in Letters from Cuba.

ABBOT, JOHN, died at Andover, the place of his birth, July 2, 1843, aged 84. He graduated at Harvard in 1754, was the first professor of languages at Bowdoin College, and for many years its librarian and treasurer.

ABBOT, BENJAMIN, LL. D., brother of the preceding, graduated at Harvard in 1788, and died in Exeter Oct. 25, 1849, aged 87. From 1788 to 1838 he was the highly respected principal of Phillips' Exeter Academy. Many eminent men were his pupils; and, on his retirement in 1838, they united in a testimonial to his merits.

ABBOT, JACOB, died at Farmington, Me., Jan. 25, 1847, aged 70—a worthy and useful man, the father of distinguished sons, Jacob, John, Gorham, and Charles. He was a native of Andover: for many years he lived in Brunswick. His sons write the family name, Abbott.

ABBOT, SAMUEL, was born in Wilton, N. H., in 1786, graduated at Harvard in 1808, and died in 1839. He invented the process of extracting and clarifying starch from the potato.

ABBOT, JOHN EMERY, a minister in Salem; died in 1819, aged 26. He was a graduate of Bowdoin in 1810. His sermons, with a memoir by H. Ware, were published in 1829.

ABEEL, JOHN NELSON, D. D., an eloquent preacher, graduated at Princeton College in 1787. He relinquished the study of the law, which he had commenced under Judge Patterson, and pursued the study of divinity with Dr. Livingston. He was licensed to preach in April, 1793. After being for a short time a minister of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, he was in 1795 installed as pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in the city of New York. He died Jan. 20, 1812, in the 43d year of his age, deeply lamented on account of his unassuming, amiable manners, and his eloquence as a preacher of the gospel. With a discriminating mind, and a sweet and melodious voice, and his soul inflamed with pious zeal, he was pre-eminent among extemporaneous orators. In performing his various pastoral duties he was indefatigable.—Gunn's Funeral Sermon.

ABEEL, DAVID, missionary to China, died at Albany, Sept. 4, 1846, aged about 40. He embarked at New York, and arrived at Canton Feb. 19, 1830, and at Bankok in 1831. From 1833 to 1839 he was from ill health in the United States, but returned to Canton in 1839. In 1842 he commenced a mission at Amoy. Ill health compelled his return to America in 1845. He was first a preacher to seamen at Canton; then a useful, respected, and important missionary.

ABERCROMBIE, JAMES, a British major-general, took the command of the troops assembled at Albany in June, 1756, bringing over with him two regiments. It was proposed to attack Crown Point, Niagara, and Fort Du Quesne. But some difficulty as to the rank of the provincial troops occasioned delay, and in August the Earl of Loudoun took the command. The capture of Oswego by Montcalm disarranged the projected campaign. In 1757 Montcalm took Fort William Henry; and thus the French commanded all the lakes. The British spirit was now roused. Mr. Pitt in 1758 placed 50,000 troops under the command of Abercrombie, determined to recover the places which had been captured by the French, and also to capture Louisbourg. Abercrombie, at the head of 15,000 men, proceeded against Ticonderoga, which he assaulted injudiciously and unsuccessfully, July 8th, with the loss of nearly 2,000 men, killed, wounded, and missing. He then retired to his intrenched camp on the south side of Lake George. An expedition which he sent out against Fort Frontenac, under Col. Bradstreet, was successful. He was soon superseded by Amherst, who the next year recovered Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and captured Quebec.—Marshall, I. 322-36; Holmes, II. 82. Mante, 59, 107, 144, 161.

ABERCROMBIE, JAMES, D. D., died at Philadelphia, June 26, 1841, aged 83, the oldest Episcopal minister in the city. He had been a teacher of youth, and was a venerable divine.

ABERNETHY, ROBERT, M. D., died in Woodbury, Conn., Sept. 24, 1851, aged 77. He was the son of Dr. William A., of Harwinton, and practised physic in Woodbury for 25 years. He was a man of distinction, and the delight of his friends; also a man of religion, a worthy professor for 46 years, loving the house of God and the assembly of Christians for conference and prayer. His son, John J. A., is a surgeon in the navy.

ACKLAND, JOHN D., major, a British officer, was at the head of the grenadiers on the left, in the action near Stillwater, Oct. 7, 1777. He bravely sustained the attack; but, overpowered by numbers, the British were obliged to retreat to their camp, which was instantly stormed by Arnold. In this action, Major Ackland was shot through the legs, and taken prisoner. — He was discovered and protected by Wilkinson. His devoted wife, in the utmost distress, sought him in the American camp, favored with a letter from Burgoyne to Gates. — After his return to England, Major Ackland, in a dispute with Lieut. Lloyd, defended the Americans against the charge of cowardice, and gave him the lie direct. A duel followed, in which Ackland was shot through the head. Lady Harriet, his wife, in consequence lost her senses for two years; but she afterwards married Mr. Brudenell, who accompanied her from the camp at Saratoga in her perilous pursuit of her husband. When will there cease to be victims to private combat and public war? It will be, when the meek and benevolent spirit of the gospel shall universally reign in the hearts of men. — Remembrancer for 1777, p. 461, 465; Wilkinson's Memoirs, 269, 376.

ADAIR, JAMES, a trader with the Indians of the Southern States, resided in their country forty years. From 1735, he lived almost exclusively in intercourse with the Indians, cut off from the society of his civilized brethren, chiefly among the Chickasaws, with whom he first traded in 1744. His friends persuaded him to publish a work, which he had prepared with much labor, entitled, "The History of the American Indians; particularly those nations adjoining the Mississippi, East and West; Florida, Georgia, South and North Carolina, and Virginia. London, 4to, 1775." In this book he points out various customs of the Indians, having a striking resemblance to those of the Jews. His arguments to prove them descended from the Jews are founded on their division into tribes; their worship of Jehovah; their festivals, fasts, and religious rites; their daily sacrifice; their prophets and high priests; their cities of refuge; their marriages and divorces; their burial of the dead, and mourning for them; their language and choice of names adapted to circumstances; their manner of reckoning time; and various other particulars. Some distrust seems to have fallen upon his statements, although he says that his account is "neither disfigured by fable nor prejudice." Dr. Boudinot, in his "Star in the West," has adopted the opinions of Adair.

ADAIR, JOHN, general, died May 19, 1840, aged 82, at Harrodsburg, Ky. He was a soldier in the early north-western wars, and commanded the Kentucky troops at New Orleans in 1814. He was a senator in 1805, and a representative in congress in 1831.

ADAMS, WILLIAM, the second minister of Dedham, was the son of W. A., and born in 1650, at Ipswich; he died Aug. 17, 1685, aged 35. He graduated in 1671, and was ordained as Mr. Allen's successor, Dec. 3, 1673. By his first wife, Mary Manning of Cambridge, he had three children, one of whom was Rev. Eliphalet A. His second wife was Alice Bradford, daughter of William B., and grand-daughter of Gov. Bradford, of Plymouth; by her he had Elizabeth, who married, at the age of fifteen, Rev. S. Whiting, of Windham, afterwards Rev. S. Niles; Alice, who married Rev. N. Collins, of Enfield; William; and Abial, born after his death, who married Rev. J. Metcalf, of Falmouth. His widow married James Fitch. He published a fast sermon, 1679; an election sermon, 1685.

ADAMS, ELIPHALET, son of the preceding, an eminent minister of New London, Conn., was graduated at Harvard College in 1694. He was ordained Feb. 9, 1709, and died Oct. 4, 1753, aged 76. Dr. Chauncey speaks of him as a great Hebraician. — His son William, graduated at Yale in 1730, and died in 1798, having been a preacher sixty years, but never settled nor married; he published a thanksgiving sermon, 1760. — He published a sermon, 1706, on the death of Rev. James Noyes of Stonington; election sermons, 1710 and 1783; a discourse occasioned by a storm, March 3, 1717; a thanksgiving sermon, 1721; a sermon on the death of Gov. Saltonstall, 1724; at the ordination of William Gager, Lebanon, May 27, 1725; of Thomas Clap, Windham, 1726; and a discourse before young men, 1727.

ADAMS, JOHN, a poet, was the only son of John Adams, of Nova Scotia, and was graduated at Harvard College in 1721. He was settled in the ministry at Newport, R. I., April 11, 1728, in opposition to the wishes of Mr. Clap, who was pastor. Mr. Clap's friends formed a new society, and Mr. Adams was dismissed in about two years. He died at Cambridge in Jan., 1740, at the age of 36, deeply lamented by his acquaintance. He was much distinguished for his learning, genius, and piety. As a preacher he was much esteemed. His uncle, Matthew Adams, describes him as "master of nine languages," and conversant with the most famous Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish authors, as well as with the noblest English writers. He also speaks of his "great and undissembled piety, which ran, like a vein of gold, through all his life and performances." — He published a sermon on his ordination, 1728, and a poem on the love of money. A small volume of his poems was published at Boston, in 1745, which contains imitations and paraphrases of several portions of Scripture, translations from Horace, and the whole book of Revelation in heroic verse, together with original pieces. The versification is remarkably harmonious for the period and the country. Mr. Adams' productions evince a lively fancy, and breathe a pious strain. The following is an extract from his poem on Cotton Mather:

"What numerous volumes scattered from his hand,
Lightened his own, and warmed each foreign land?
What pious breathings of a glowing soul
Live in each page, and animate the whole?
The breath of heaven the savory pages show,
As we Arabia from its spices know.
Ambitious, active, towering was his soul,
But flaming piety inspired the whole."

ADAMS, MATTHEW, a distinguished writer in Boston, though a mechanic or "tradesman," yet had a handsome collection of books, and cultivated literature. Dr. Franklin acknowledges his obligations for access to his library. He was one of the writers of the Essays in the New England Journal. He died poor, but with a reputation more durable than an estate, in 1753. — His son, Rev. John Adams, a graduate of 1745, was the minister of Durham, N. H., from 1748 to 1778. By a grant of 400 acres of land, he was induced to remove to the small plantation of Washington, or Newfield, county of York, Me., having only five families, in Feb., 1781. Here he passed the remainder of his life, preaching and practising physic in Newfield, Limington, Parsonfield, and Limerick, till his death, June 4, 1792, aged 60. He was subject, occasionally, to a deep depression of feeling; and, at other times, was borne away by a sudden excitement, which gave animation to his preaching. A fine letter from Durham to the town of Boston in 1774, with a donation, was written by him. — Elliot: Greenleaf's Ecclesiastical History of Maine, 113.

ADAMS, AMOS, minister of Roxbury, Mass., was graduated at Harvard College, in 1752. He was ordained as successor to Mr. Peabody, Sept. 12, 1753, and died at Dorchester, Oct. 5, 1775, aged 47, of the dysentery, which prevailed in the camp at Cambridge and Roxbury. His son, Thomas Adams, was ordained in Boston as minister for Camden, S. C., where, after a residence of eight years, he died Aug. 16, 1797.

Mr. Adams, in early life, devoted himself to the service of his Redeemer; and he continued his benevolent labors as a preacher of the gospel with unabated vigor till his death. He was fervent in devotion; and his discourses, always animated by a lively and expressive action, were remarkably calculated to warm the heart. He was steadfast in his principles, and unwearied in industry.

He published the following sermons: On the death of Lucy Dudley, 1756; at the artillery election, 1759; on a thanksgiving for the reduction of Quebec, 1759; at the ordination of S.

Kingsbury, Edgartown, Nov. 25, 1761; at the ordination of John Wyeth, Gloucester, Feb. 5, 1766; the only hope and refuge of sinners, 1767; two discourses on religious liberty, 1767; a view of New England, in two discourses on the fast, April 6, 1769; sermons at the ordination of Jonathan Moore, Rochester, Sept. 25, 1768, and of Caleb Prentice, Reading, Oct. 25, 1769. He preached the Dudleian lecture of Harvard College in 1770, entitled, "Diocesan Episcopacy, as founded on the supposed Episcopacy of Timothy and Titus, subverted." This work is a specimen of the learning of the writer. It is lodged in manuscript in the library of the college.

ADAMS, JOSEPH, minister of Newington, N. H., was graduated at Harvard College in 1710, was ordained in 1715, and died in 1783, aged almost 95, — a descendant of Henry A., of Quincy. He preached till just before his death. He published a sermon on the death of John Fabian, 1757; and a sermon on the necessity of rulers exerting themselves against the growth of impiety, 1760.

ADAMS, ZABDIEL, minister of Lunenburg, Mass., was born in Braintree, now Quincy, Nov. 5, 1739. His father was the uncle of John Adams. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1759, having made while in that seminary great proficiency in learning, and much improved the vigorous powers of mind with which he was endued. He was ordained Sept. 5, 1764, and died March 1, 1801, in the 62d year of his age, and 37th of his ministry.

Mr. Adams was eminent as a preacher of the gospel, often explaining the most important doctrines in a rational and scriptural manner, and enforcing them with plainness and pungency. His language was nervous; and, while in his public performances he gave instruction, he also imparted pleasure. In his addresses to the throne of grace he was remarkable for pertinency of thought and readiness of utterance. Though by bodily constitution he was liable to irritation, yet he treasured no ill will in his bosom. His heart was easily touched by the afflictions of others, and his sympathy and benevolence prompted him to administer relief, when in his power. About the year 1774 he wrote a pamphlet, maintaining, without authority from the platform of 1648, that a pastor has a negative upon the proceedings of the Church. Some ministers, who embraced his principles, lost by consequence their parishes. He preached the Dudleian lecture on Presbyterian ordination in 1794. — He published a sermon on church music, 1771; on Christian unity, 1772; the election sermon, 1782; on the 19th of April, 1783; at the ordination of Enoch Whipple, 1788. — Whitney's Funeral Sermon.

ADAMS, ANDREW, LL. D., chief justice of Connecticut, was appointed to that place in 1793, having been upon the bench with reputation as a judge from 1789. He was a native of Stratford, a graduate of Yale College in 1760, and a member of Congress about the year 1782. He resided at Litchfield, and died Nov. 26, 1797, aged 61 years.

ADAMS, SAMUEL, governor of Massachusetts, and a most distinguished patriot in the American Revolution, was born in Boston Sept. 16, O. S., 1722. His father, Samuel, the son of John and Hannah A., was born in 1689, and died in 1747, whose wife was Mary Fifield. Mr. S. A. married in 1749 Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. S. Checkley; and his second wife in 1764, Elizabeth, daughter of Francis Wells. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1740. When he commenced master of arts in 1743, he proposed the following question for discussion: "Whether it be lawful to resist the supreme magistrate, if the Commonwealth cannot otherwise be preserved?" He maintained the affirmative, and thus early showed his attachment to the liberties of the people.

Early distinguished by talents as a writer, his first attempts were proofs of his filial piety. By his efforts he preserved the estate of his father, which had been attached on account of an engagement in the land bank bubble. He was known as a political writer during the administration of Shirley, to which he was opposed, as he thought the union of so much civil and military power in one man was dangerous. His ingenuity, wit, and profound argument are spoken of with the highest respect by those, who were contemporary with him. At this early period he laid the foundation of public confidence and esteem. His first office of tax-gatherer made him acquainted with every shipwright and mechanic in Boston, and over their minds he ever retained a powerful influence. From this employment the enemies of liberty styled him Samuel, the Publican.

In 1765 he was elected a member of the General Assembly of Massachusetts, in the place of Oxenbridge Thacher, deceased. He was soon chosen clerk, and he gradually acquired influence in the Legislature. This was an eventful time. But Mr. Adams possessed a courage, which no dangers could shake. He was undismayed by the prospect, which struck terror into the hearts of many. He was a member of the Legislature nearly ten years, and he was the soul, which animated it to the most important resolutions. No man did so much. He pressed his measures with ardor; yet he was prudent; he knew how to bend the passions of others to his purpose. Gov. Hutchinson relates that, at a town meeting in 1769, an objection having been made to a motion because it implied an independency of parliament, Mr. Adams, then a representative, concluded his speech with these words: "Independent we are, and independent we will be." He represents, too, that Mr. Adams, by a defalcation as collector, had injured his character; but he adds: "The benefit to the town from his defence of their liberties he supposed an equivalent to his arrears as their collector." As a political writer he deemed him the most artful and insinuating of all men, whom he ever knew, and the most successful in "robbing men of their characters," or "calumniating governors, and other servants of the crown."

When the charter was dissolved, he was chosen a member of the Provincial Convention. In 1774 he was elected a member of the General Congress. In this station, in which he remained a number of years, he rendered the most important services to his country. His eloquence was adapted to the times, in which he lived. The energy of his language corresponded with the firmness and vigor of his mind. His heart glowed with the feelings of a patriot, and his eloquence was simple, majestic, and persuasive. He was one of the most efficient members of Congress. He possessed keen penetration, unshaken fortitude, and permanent decision. Gordon speaks of him in 1774 as having for a long time whispered to his confidential friends, that this country must be independent. Walking in the fields, the day after the battle of Lexington, he said to a friend: "It is a fine day,—I mean, this day is a glorious day for America." He deemed the blow to be struck, which would lead to independence. In the last official act of the British government in Massachusetts he was proscribed with John Hancock, when a general pardon was offered to all who had rebelled. This act was dated June 12, 1775, and it teaches Americans what they owe to the denounced patriot.

In 1776 he united with Franklin, J. Adams, Hancock, Jefferson, and a host of worthies in declaring the United States no longer an appendage to a monarchy, but free and independent.

When the constitution of Massachusetts was adopted, he was chosen a member of the Senate, of which body he was elected president. He was soon sent to the western counties to quiet a disturbance, which was rising, and he was successful in his mission. He was a member of the convention for examining the constitution of the United States. He made objections to several of its provisions; but his principal objection was to that article, which rendered the several States amenable to the courts of the nation. He thought this reduced them to mere corporations; that the sovereignty of each would be dissolved; and that a consolidated government, supported by an army, would be the consequence. The constitution was afterwards altered in this point, and in most other respects according to his wishes.

In 1789 he was chosen lieutenant-governor, and was continued in this office till 1794, when he was elected governor, as successor to Mr. Hancock. He was annually replaced in the chair of the first magistrate of Massachusetts till 1797, when his age and infirmities induced him to retire from public life. He died Oct. 2, 1803, in the 82d year of his age. His only son, of the same name, was born in 1751, graduated at Harvard College in 1770, and, after studying under Dr. Joseph Warren, served his country as a surgeon during the war. Returning home with a broken constitution, he at length died Jan. 17, 1788. The avails of his claims for services in the army gave his father a competency in his declining years.

The leading traits in the character of Mr. Adams were an unconquerable love of liberty, integrity, firmness, and decision. Some acts of his administration as chief magistrate were censured, though all allowed, that his motives were pure. A division in political sentiments at that time existed, and afterwards increased. When he differed from the majority, he acted with great independence. At the close of the war he opposed peace with Great Britain, unless the Northern States retained their full privileges in the fisheries. In 1787 he advised the execution of the condign punishment, to which the leaders of the rebellion in 1786 had been sentenced. It was his settled judgment, that in a republic, depending for its existence upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, the law should be rigidly enforced. Attached to the old confederation, he often gave as a toast — "The States united, and the States separated." He was opposed to the treaty with Great Britain, made by Mr. Jay in 1794, and he put his election to hazard by avowing his dislike of it. The three topics, on which he delighted to dwell, were British thralldom, the manners, laws, and customs of New England, and the importance of common schools.

Mr. Adams was a man of incorruptible integrity. Gov. Hutchinson, in answer to the inquiry "Why Mr. Adams was not taken off from his opposition by an office?" writes to a friend in England, "Such is the obstinacy and inflexible disposition of the man, that he never can be conciliated by any office or gift whatever."

He was poor. While occupied abroad in the most important and responsible public duties, the partner of his cares supported the family at home by her industry. Though his resources were very small, yet, such were the economy and dignity of his house, that those, who visited him, found nothing mean or unbecoming his station. His country, to whose interests he devoted his life, permitted him to remain poor; but there were not wanting a few friends, who showed him their regard. In this honorable poverty he continued to a very late period of his life; and had not a decent competency fallen into his hands by the very afflicting event of the death of an only son, he must have depended for subsistence upon the kindness of his friends, or the charity of the public.

To a majestic countenance and dignified manners there was added a suavity of temper, which conciliated the affection of his acquaintance. Some, who disapproved of his political conduct, loved and revered him as a neighbor and friend. He could readily relax from severer cares and studies to enjoy the pleasures of private conversation. Though somewhat reserved among strangers, yet with his friends he was cheerful and companionable, a lover of chaste wit, and remarkably fond of anecdote. He faithfully discharged the duties arising from the relations of social life. His house was the seat of domestic peace, regularity, and method.

Mr. Adams was a Christian. His mind was early imbued with piety, as well as cultivated by science. He early approached the table of the Lord Jesus, and the purity of his life witnessed the sincerity of his profession. On the Christian Sabbath he constantly went to the temple; and the morning and evening devotions in his family proved, that his religion attended him in his seasons of retirement from the world. His sentiments were strictly Calvinistic. The platform of the New England churches he deemed an ample guide in all matters of ecclesiastical discipline and order. The last production of his pen was in favor of Christian truth. He died in the faith of the gospel.

He was a sage and a patriot. The independence of the United States of America is perhaps to be attributed as much to his exertions, as to the exertions of any one man. Though he was called to struggle with adversity, he was never discouraged. He was consistent and firm under the cruel neglect of a friend and the malignant rancor of an enemy; comforting himself in the darkest seasons with reflections upon the wisdom and goodness of God.

Mr. John Adams speaks of him in the following terms: "The talents and virtues of that great man were of the most exalted, though not of the most showy kind. His love of his country, his exertions in her service through a long course of years, through the administrations of the governors Shirley, Pownall, Bernard, Hutchinson, and Gage, under the royal government and through the whole of the subsequent revolution, and always in support of the same principles; his inflexible integrity, his disinterestedness, his invariable resolution, his sagacity, his patience, perseverance, and pure public virtue were not exceeded by any man's in America. A collection of his writings would be as curious as voluminous. It would throw light upon American history for

His writings exist only in the perishable columns of a newspaper or pamphlet. In his more advanced life, in the year 1790, a few letters passed between him and John Adams, in which the principles of government are discussed; and there seems to have been some difference of sentiment between those eminent patriots and statesmen, who had toiled together through the Revolution. This correspondence was published in 1800. An oration, which Mr. Adams delivered at the State House in Philadelphia Aug. 1, 1776, was published. The object is to support American Independence, the declaration of which by Congress had been made a short time before. He opposes kingly government and hereditary succession with warmth and energy. Not long before his death he addressed a letter to Paine, expressing his disapprobation of that unbeliever's attempts to injure the cause of Christianity. — Thacher's Sermon; Sullivan's character of him in public papers; Polyanthos, III. 73–82; Gordon, I. 347, 410; *Brissot, Nouv. ADAMS, JOHN, president of the United States, was born at Braintree, Mass., Oct. 19, 1735, O.S., or Oct. 30th, present style. His father, John, was a deacon of the church, a farmer, and a mechanic, and died May 25, 1761, aged 69; his grandfather, Joseph, died Feb. 12, 1737, aged 82; his great-grandfather, Joseph, was born in England, and died at Braintree Dec. 6, 1697, aged 63; the father of this ancestor was Henry, who, as the inscription on his monument, erected by John Adams, says, "took his flight from the Dragon Persecution, in Devonshire, England, and alighted with eight sons near Mount Wollaston." Of these sons four removed to Medfield and the neighboring towns, and two to Chelmsford. The year of Henry's arrival at Braintree, now Quincy, is not known, but is supposed to be 1632; he died Oct. 8, 1646. His ancestry has been traced up six or seven hundred years to John Ap Adam, of the Marches of Wales.

John Adams, while a member of Harvard College, where he was graduated in 1755, was distinguished by diligence in his studies, by boldness of thought, and by the powers of his mind. While he studied law at Worcester with Col. James Putnam, an able lawyer in extensive practice, from 1755 to 1758, he instructed pupils in Latin and Greek, as a means of subsistence. At this early period he had imbibed a prejudice against the prevailing religious opinions of New England, and became attached to speculations hostile to those opinions. Nor were his views afterwards changed. Perhaps the religious sentiments of most men become settled at as early a period of their lives. If therefore the cherished views of Christianity have any relation to practice and to one's destiny hereafter; with what sobriety, candor, and diligence, and with what earnestness of prayer for light and guidance from above ought every young man to investigate revealed truth? In April, 1756, he was deliberating as to his profession. Some friends advised him to study theology. In a few months afterwards he fixed upon the profession of law. He had not "the highest opinion of what is called Orthodoxy." He had known a young man, worthy of the best parish, despised for being suspected of Arminianism. He was more desirous of being an eminent, honorable lawyer, than of "heading the whole army of Orthodox preachers." In a letter to Dr. Morse in 1815 he says: "Sixty-five years ago my own minister, Rev. Lemuel Bryant; Dr. Mayhew, of the West Church in Boston; Rev. Mr. Shute, of Hingham; Rev. John Brown, of Cohasset; and perhaps equal to all, if not above all, Rev. Mr. Gay, of Hingham, were Unitarians. Among the laity how many could I name, lawyers, physicians, tradesmen, and farmers? More than sixty-six years ago I read Dr. S. Clarke, Emlyn, etc."

In Oct., 1758, Mr. Adams presented himself — a stranger, poor and friendless — to Jeremy Gridley, of Boston, attorney-general of the crown, to ask of him the favor to offer him to the Superior Court of the province, then sitting, for admission to the bar. Mr. Gridley examined him in his office, and recommended him to the court; and at the same time gave him excellent paternal advice. For his kindness Mr. Adams was ever grateful, and was afterwards his intimate personal and professional friend. As Mr. Gridley was grand master of the Massachusetts Grand Lodge of Free Masons, Mr. Adams once asked his advice, whether it was worth his while to become a member of the society; the reply of the grand master was, "No"; adding, that he did not need the artificial support of the society, and that there was "nothing in the Masonic Institution worthy of his seeking to be associated with it." In consequence of this advice he never sought admission to the lodge.

Mr. Adams commenced the practice of the law at Quincy, then in the county of Suffolk, and soon had a sufficiency of lucrative business. In 1761 he was admitted to the degree of barrister-at-law. In this year a small estate became his by the decease of his father. At this period his zeal for the rights of his country was inflamed by the attempt of the British cabinet to introduce in Massachusetts writs of assistance — a kind of general search-warrant for the discovery of goods not discharged from the parliamentary taxes.

The affair was argued in Boston by Mr. Otis. Mr. Adams says, "Every man of an immense, crowded audience appeared to me to go away, as I did, ready to take arms against writs of assistance."—"Then and there the child Independence was born."

In 1764, he married Abigail Smith, daughter of Rev. William Smith of Weymouth, and granddaughter of Colonel Quincy, a lady of uncommon endowments and excellent education.—In the next year he published an essay on Canon and Feudal Law, reprinted at London in 1768, and at Philadelphia in 1783. His object was to show the conspiracy between Church and State for the purpose of oppressing the people. He wished to enlighten his fellow-citizens, that they might prize their liberty, and be ready, if necessary, to assert their rights by force.

He removed to Boston in 1765, and there had extensive legal practice. In 1768 Gov. Bernard offered him, through his friend Mr. Sewall, the place of advocate-general in the Court of Admiralty, a lucrative post; but he decidedly declined the offer. He was not a man thus to be bribed to desert the cause of his country. The office was the same which Mr. Otis had resigned, in 1761 in order to oppose the writs of assistance. Yet Mr. Hutchinson states, that he was at a loss which side to take, and that the neglect of Bernard to make him a justice of the peace roused his patriotism! He adds: "His ambition was without bounds; and he has acknowledged to his acquaintance, that he could not look with complacency upon any man, who was in possession of more wealth, more honor, or more knowledge than himself." In 1769, he was chairman of the committee of the town of Boston for drawing up instructions to their representatives to resist the British encroachments. His colleagues were R. Dana and Joseph Warren. These instructions were important links in the chain of revolutionary events.—In consequence of the affray with the British garrison March 5, 1770, in which several of the people of Boston were killed, the soldiers were arraigned before the civil authority. Notwithstanding the strong excitement against them, Mr. Adams, with J. Quincy and S. S. Blowers, defended them, and procured the acquittal of all except two, who were convicted of manslaughter, and branded in punishment. This triumph of justice, for the soldiers were first attacked, was honorable to the cause of America. In May, 1770, he was chosen a member of the Legislature, in which he took a prominent part.

In 1773 he wrote ably in the Boston Gazette against the regulation, making judges dependent for their salaries upon the crown. In 1773 and 1774 he was chosen into the council by the assembly, but negatived by the governor. To the struggle, at this period, between the house and the governor in respect to the council, his friend Sewall, pleasantly alludes thus: "We have sometimes seen half-a-dozen sail of tory navigation unable, on an election day, to pass the bar, formed by the flux and reflux of the tides at the entrance of the harbor, and as many whiggish ones stranded the next morning on Governor's Island."—June 17, 1774, he was chosen by the assembly, together with T. Cushing, S. Adams, and R. T. Paine, to the first Continental Congress. To Sewall, who, while they were attending the court at Portland, endeavored to dissuade him, in a morning walk on "the great hill," from accepting this appointment, he said: "The die is now cast; I have passed the Rubicon; swim or sink, live or die, survive or perish with my country is my unalterable determination." Thus he parted with his tory friend, nor did he converse with him again till 1788.

He took his seat in Congress Sept. 5, 1774, and was on the committee, which drew up the statement of the rights of the colonies, and on that, which prepared the address to the king. At this period the members of Congress generally were not determined on independence. It was thought, the British would relinquish their claims.—He returned to Boston in November, and soon wrote the papers, with the signature of Novanglus, in answer to those of his friend Sewall, with the signature of Massachusettensis. The latter are dated from Dec. 12, 1774, to April 3, 1775; the former from Jan. 23 to April 17, 1775. These papers were reprinted in 1819, with a preface by Mr. Adams, with the addition of letters to W. Tudor.

A short review of them may be interesting, as they relate to a period immediately preceding the commencement of hostilities. In this controversy Mr. Sewall said: "I saw the small seed of sedition, when it was implanted; it was as a grain of mustard. I have watched the plant, until it has become a great tree; the vilest reptiles, that crawl upon the earth, are concealed at the root; the foulest birds of the air rest on its branches. I now would induce you to go to work immediately with axes and hatchets, and cut it down, for a twofold reason—because it is a pest to society, and lest it be felled suddenly by a stronger arm, and crush its thousands in the fall." In the first place, he maintained, that resistance to Great Britain would be unavailing. The militia he considered undisciplined and ungovernable, each man being a politician, puffed up with his own opinion. "An experienced British officer would rather take his chance with five thousand British troops, than fifty thousand such militia." The sea coast he regarded as totally unprotected. Our trade, fishery, navigation, and maritime towns were liable to be lost in a moment. The back settlements would fall a prey to the Canadians and Indians. The British army would sweep all before it like a whirlwind. Besides, New England would probably be alone, unsupported by the other States. Rebellion, therefore, would be the height of madness. In considering the reasons for resistance he maintained, that the parliament had a right to pass a stamp act, in order that the colonies should bear a part of the national burden. Similar acts had been before passed. We had paid postage agreeably to act of parliament, duties imposed for regulating trade, and even for raising a revenue to the crown, without questioning the right. This right, he says, was first denied by the resolves of the house of burgesses in Virginia. "We read them with wonder; they savored of independence." The three-penny duty on tea, he thought, should not be regarded as burdensome; for the duty of a shilling, laid upon it for regulating trade, and therefore allowed to be constitutional, was taken off; so that we were gainers ninepence in the pound by the new regulation, which was designed to prevent smuggling, and not to raise a revenue. The act declaratory of the right to tax was of no consequence, so long as there was no grievous exercise of it, especially as we had protested against it, and our assemblies had ten times resolved, that no such right existed. But demagogues were interested in inflaming the minds of the people. The pulpit also was a powerful engine in promoting discontent. — Though the small duty of three pence was to be paid by the East India company, or their factors, on landing the tea, for the purpose of selling it at auction, and no one was obliged to purchase; yet the mob of Boston, in disguise, forcibly entered the three ships of tea, split open the chests, and emptied the whole, 10,000 pounds sterling in value, into the dock, "and perfumed the town with its fragrance." Yet zealous rebel merchants were every day importing teas, subject to the same duty. The act interfered with their interest, not with the welfare of the people. The blockade act against Boston was a just retaliatory measure, because the body-meeting, contrived merely as a screen to the town, consisting of thousands, had resolved, that the tea should not pay the duty. Now sprung up from the brain of a partizan the "committee of correspondence" — "the foulest, subtlest, and most venomous serpent, that ever issued from the eggs of sedition." A new doctrine had been advanced, that, as the Americans are not represented in parliament, they are exempt from acts of parliament. But, if the colonies are not subject to the authority of parliament, Great Britain and the colonies must be distinct States. Two independent authorities cannot co-exist. The colonies have only power to regulate their internal police, but are necessarily subject to the control of the supreme power of the State. Had any person denied, fifteen years ago, that the colonies were subject to the authority of parliament, he would have been deemed a fool or a madman. It was curious to trace the history of rebellion. When the stamp act was passed, the right of parliament to impose internal taxes was denied; but the right to impose external ones, to lay duties on goods and merchandize, was admitted. On the passage of the tea act a new distinction was set up; duties could be laid for the regulation of trade, but not for raising a revenue; parliament could lay the former duty of a shilling a pound, but not the present duty of three pence. There was but one more step to independence — the denial of the right in parliament to make any laws whatever, which should bind the colonies; and this step the pretended patriots had taken. Mr. Otis, the oracle of the whigs, in 1764 never thought of this. On the contrary, he maintained in respect to the colonies, that "the parliament has an undoubted power and lawful authority to make acts for the general good." Obedience, in his view, was a solemn duty. The original charter of the colony exempted it from taxes for a definite period, implying the right to tax afterwards. The grant of all the liberties of natural subjects within the realm of England affords no immunity from taxes. If a person, born in England, should remove to Ireland, or to Jersey, or Guernsey, whence no member is sent to parliament, he would be in the same predicament with an emigrant to America, all having the rights of natural born subjects. In the charter by King William the powers of legislation were restricted, so that nothing should be done contrary to the laws of the realm of England. Even Dr. Franklin in 1765 admitted, that the British had "a natural and equitable right to some toll or duty upon merchandizes," carried through the American seas. Mr. Otis also, in the same year, admitted the same equitable right of parliament "to impose taxes on the colonies, internal and external, on lands as well as on trade." Indeed, for more than a century parliament had exercised the now controverted right of legislation and taxation.

On the whole, Mr. Sewall was convinced, that the avarice and ambition of the leading whigs were the causes of the troubles of America: "they call themselves the people; and, when their own measures are censured, cry out — 'the people, the people are abused and insulted!'" He deplored the condition of the dupes of the republican party — the men who, every morning, "swallowed a chimera for breakfast." By the infamous methods resorted to, "many of the ancient, trusty, and skilful pilots, who had steered the community safely in the most perilous times, were driven from the helm, and their places occupied by different persons, some of whom, bankrupts in fortune, business, and fame, are now striving to run the ship on the rocks, that they may have an opportunity of plundering the wreck!"

To this Mr. Adams replied, that parliament had authority over America by no law: not by the law of nature and nations; nor by common law, which never extended beyond the four seas; nor by statute law, for none existed before the settlement of the colonies; and that we were under no religious, moral, or political obligations to submit to parliament as a supreme executive. He asked, "Is the three pence upon tea our only grievance? Are we not deprived of the privilege of paying our governors, judges, etc.? Are not trials by jury taken from us? Are we not sent to England for trial? Is not a military government put over us? Is not our constitution demolished to the foundation?"—"Nip the shoots of arbitrary power in the bud is the only maxim, which can ever preserve the liberties of any people." He maintained, that the pretence to tax for revenue, and not merely for the regulation of trade, had never been advanced till recently; that, in 1754, Dr. Franklin denied such a right; that, more than a century before, both Massachusetts and Virginia had protested against the act of navigation, and refused obedience, because not represented in parliament. He denied, that there was a whig in the province, who wished to set up an independent republic. But resistance to lawless violence, he said, is not rebellion by the law of God or of the land. And, as to inability to cope with Great Britain, he maintained, that, "in a land war this continent might defend itself against all the world." As to old charters, that of Virginia in 1609 exempted the company forever from taxes on goods and merchandizes. The same exemption was given to Maryland in 1633. The Plymouth colony was settled without a charter, on the simple principle of nature, and thus continued an independent government sixty-eight years. The same was the case with the colonies in Connecticut. In Massachusetts, the general court in 1677 declared, that the laws of England were bounded within the four seas, and did not reach America. The only power of parliament, which he would allow, was that arising from our voluntary cession of regulating trade. The first charter erected a corporation within the realm of England; there the governor and company were to reside, and their agents only were to come to America. But they came themselves, and brought their charter with them, and thus, being out of the realm, were not subject to parliament. The king of England could by law grant nothing out of England, or the realm. The great seal had no authority out of the realm, except to mandatory or preceptory writs; and such was not the charter. In case of the forfeiture of a charter, the people born here could be under no allegiance to the king. — Such briefly were the opposite views of these distinguished men. These writings of Mr. Adams, with those of Otis, Thacher, and others, contributed much to the emancipation of America from British thralldom.

Mr. Adams attended the next Congress in 1775. On hearing of the battle of Lexington, war was determined on. At his suggestion, Gov. Johnstone nominated Washington as commander-in-chief, and he was unanimously chosen. When he returned to Massachusetts, he declined the office of chief justice, to which he had been invited. In Congress he was among the foremost, who were in favor of independence. He moved, May 6, 1776, to recommend to the colonies "to adopt such a government, as would, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents and of America." This passed, after earnest debate, on the 15th. R. H. Lee moved, on the 7th June, and the motion was seconded by Mr. Adams, "that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." The debate continued to the 10th, and was then postponed to the 1st of July. A committee of five, consisting of Jefferson, Adams, Franklin, Sherman, and R. R. Livingston, was appointed to draw up a declaration of independence. The two first were the sub-committee. The instrument, at the request of Mr. Adams, was written by Jefferson. The resolution of Lee was debated again July 1st, and adopted on the 2d. Then the Declaration was considered and passed, with a few omissions and changes, July 4th; but not without vigorous opposition, particularly from John Dickinson, one of the ablest men and finest writers in Congress. The opposing arguments were met by Mr. Adams in a speech of unrivalled power. Of him Mr. Jefferson said,—"the great pillar of support to the declaration of independence and its ablest advocate and champion on the floor of the house was John Adams."—"He was the colossus of that Congress: not graceful, not eloquent, not always fluent in his public addresses, he yet came out with a power both of thought and expression, which moved his hearers from their seats."

On the next day Mr. Adams wrote the following letter to his wife, dated Philadelphia, July 5, 1776:

"Yesterday the greatest question was decided, which was ever debated in America, and a greater, perhaps, never was, or will be, decided among men. A resolution has passed without one dissenting colony, 'That these colonies are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States.'

"The day is passed. The fourth day of July, 1776, will be a memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe, it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated, as the day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to Almighty God. It ought to be solemnized with pomp, shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations from one end of the continent to the other, from this time forward, forever. You will think me transported with enthusiasm; but I am not. I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure, that it will cost us to maintain this declaration, and support and defend these States; yet through all the gloom I can see the rays of light and glory. I can see, that the end is more than worth all the means, and that posterity will triumph, although you and I may rue, which I hope we shall not."

Mr. Silas Deane, commissioner with Franklin and A. Lee at the French court, having been recalled, Mr. Adams was appointed in his place Nov. 28, 1777. — He was thus released from his duties as chairman of the board of war, in which he had been engaged since June 13, 1776. It is said, that he had been a member of ninety committees, and chairman of twenty-five. — Embarking in about two months in the Boston frigate, he arrived safely; but the treaties of commerce and alliance had been signed before his arrival. — Soon after his return he assisted, in the autumn of 1779, as a member of the convention, and as one of the sub-committee in preparing a form of government for the State of Massachusetts. He wrote the clause in regard to the patronage of literature. Sept. 29, 1779, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to negotiate a peace, and had authority to form a commercial treaty with Great Britain. He sailed in the French frigate Sensible, Nov. 17, landed at Ferrol, and after a toilsome journey arrived at Paris in Feb., 1780. He was accompanied by Francis Dana as secretary of legation, and by John Thaxter as private secretary. Deeming a residence in Holland more favorable to his country than in Paris, he determined to proceed to Amsterdam as soon as permission could be obtained from the French minister, Count de Vergennes, who was displeased by the refusal of Mr. Adams to communicate to him his instructions in regard to the treaty of commerce. In August he repaired to Amsterdam, having previously been instructed to procure loans in Holland, and soon afterwards receiving power to negotiate a treaty of amity and commerce. Amidst great difficulties, arising from the hostility of England and the intrigues of France herself, he toiled incessantly for the interest of his country. In a series of twenty-six letters to Mr. Kalkoen, he gave an account of the controversy with Great Britain, and of the resources, determination, and prospects of America. These papers were reprinted in the Boston Patriot, and in a pamphlet form in 1809. They had much effect in enlightening the people of Holland. Yet he could not persuade the States General to acknowledge him as ambassador of the United States until April, 1782. Associated with Franklin, Jay, and Laurens, he formed the definitive treaty of peace, which was ratified Jan. 14, 1784. — After assisting in other treaties, Mr. Adams was in 1785 appointed the first minister to London. In that city he published his "Defence of the American constitutions" in 1787. — At this time the constitution of the United States had not been formed. The object of the work was to oppose the theories of Turgot, the Abbe de Mably, and Dr. Price in favor of a single legislative assembly and the consolidation into one tribunal of the powers of government. He maintained the necessity of keeping distinct the legislative, executive, and judicial departments; and, to prevent encroachment by the legislative branch, he proposed a division of it into two chambers, each as a check upon the other. He carried his views into effect in drafting the constitution of Massachusetts, — which form has been copied in its chief features by most of the other States. — After an absence of nine years, he returned to America, and landed at Boston June 17, 1788. Congress had passed a resolution of thanks for his able and faithful discharge of various important commissions. His "Discourses on Davila" were written in 1790.

After his return he was elected the first vice-president of the United States under the new constitution, which went into operation in March, 1789. Having been re-elected to that office, he held it, and of course presided in the Senate during the whole of the administration of Washington, whose confidence he enjoyed in an eminent degree. The Senate being nearly balanced between the two parties of the day, his casting vote decided some important questions; in this way Clarke's resolution to prohibit all intercourse with Great Britain on account of the capture of several American vessels was rejected. — On the resignation of Washington Mr. Adams became president of the United States March 4, 1797. He was succeeded by Mr. Jefferson in 1801, who was elected by a majority of one vote.

After March, 1801, Mr. Adams lived in retirement at Quincy, occupied in agricultural pursuits, though occasionally addressing various communications to the public. — In a letter to the founder of the peace society of Massachusetts in 1816 he says: "I have read, almost all the days of my life, the solemn reasonings and pathetic declamations of Erasmus, of Fenelon, of St. Pierre, and many others, against war and in favor of peace. My understanding and my heart accorded with them at first blush. But, alas! a longer and more extensive experience has convinced me, that wars are necessary, and as inevitable in our system as hurricanes, earthquakes, and volcanoes. Universal and perpetual peace appears to me no more nor less than everlasting passive obedience and non-resistance. The human flock would soon be fleeced and butchered by one or a few. I cannot therefore, sir, be a subscriber or a member of your society. — I do, sir, most humbly supplicate the theologians, the philosophers, and the politicians to let me die in peace. I seek only repose." Mr. Jefferson expressed his opinions more calmly on the subject.

In 1816 he was chosen a member of the electoral college, which voted for Mr. Monroe as president. In 1818 he sustained his severest affliction in the loss, in October, of his wife, with whom he had lived more than half a century. His only daughter, Mrs. Smith, died in 1813. In 1820, at the age of eighty-five, he was a member of the convention for revising the constitution of Massachusetts. In the last years of his life he had a friendly correspondence with Mr. Jefferson. He enjoyed the singular happiness in 1825 of seeing his son, John Quincy Adams, elevated to the office of president of the United States. In this year he was the only survivor of the first Congress. He died July 4, 1826.

On the morning of the jubilee he was roused by the ringing of bells and the firing of cannon, and, when asked by his servant if he knew what day it was, he replied, "O yes! it is the glorious 4th of July—God bless it—God bless you all." In the forenoon the orator of the day, his parish minister, called to see him, and found him seated in an arm-chair, and asked him for a sentiment, to be given at the public table. He replied, "I will give you—Independence forever!" In the course of the day he said, "It is a great and glorious day;" and just before he expired, exclaimed, "Jefferson survives," shewing that his thoughts were dwelling on the scenes of 1776. But Jefferson was then dead, having expired at one o'clock. He himself died at twenty minutes before six P. M.

That two such men as Jefferson and Adams, both of whom had been presidents of the United States, the two last survivors of those, who had voted for the Declaration of Independence, the former having drawn it up, and the latter having been its most powerful advocate on the floor of Congress, should have died on the 4th of July, just fifty years after the "glorious day" of the Declaration of American Independence, presented such an extraordinary concurrence of events as to overwhelm the mind with astonishment. Some of the eulogists of these illustrious men seemed to regard the circumstances of their removal from the earth as a signal proof of the favor of God, and spoke of their spirits as beyond doubt thus wonderfully, on the day of their glory, translated to heaven. But surely these circumstances ought not to be regarded as indications of the eternal destiny of these men of political eminence. Like others, they must appear at the bar of Jesus Christ, to be judged agreeably to the settled principles of the Divine government, according to their works and characters. If they believed in the name of the Son of God and were his followers, they will doubtless, if the Scriptures are true, be saved; otherwise they will be lost. It is not always easy to ascertain the design of Providence. If some imagine, that the extraordinary deaths of these men indicate the Divine approbation of their patriotism; others may imagine, that their deaths on the day, in which a kind of idolatry had often been offered them, and in which the American people had been often elated with the emotions of vanity and pride, instead of rendering due thanksgivings to the Almighty, were designed to frown upon the erring people and to teach them, that their boasted patriots and statesmen, their incensed demi-gods, were but frail worms of the dust. A new and similar wonder occurred in the decease of another president, Monroe, on the 4th day of July, 1830.

Mr. Adams was somewhat irritable in his temper, and at times was frank in the utterance of his indignant feelings. In reply to a birth-day address in 1802, the year after the termination of his presidency, he said: "Under the continual provocations, breaking and pouring in upon me, from unexpected as well as expected quarters, during the last two years of my administration, he must have been more of a modern epicurian philosopher, than ever I was or ever will be, to have borne them all without some incautious expressions, at times, of an unutterable indignation. I have no other apology to make to individuals or the public."—This confession may teach the ambitious, that the high station of president may be a bed of thorns. Mr. Adams added the sentiment, which is worthy of perpetual remembrance by our statesmen and citizens: "The union is our rock of safety, as well as our pledge of grandeur."—Mr. Adams, it is believed, was a professor of religion in the church at Quincy. In his views he accorded with Dr. Bancroft, an Unitarian minister of Worcester, of whose printed sermons he expressed his high approbation.

In his person, Mr. Adams was of middling stature. With passions somewhat impetuous, his manners were courteous. Industry carried him honorably through his immense public labors; temperance procured him the blessing of a healthful old age. He lived to see but one name before his unstarred in the catalogue of Harvard College: excepting the venerable Dr. Holyoke, all before him were numbered with the dead. He was a scholar, versed in the ancient languages. In his writings he was perspicuous and energetic.

To his native town he gave his whole library, and made bequests for the endowment of an academy and the building of a stone church.

His chief writings are—History of the dispute with America, 1774; twenty-six letters on the American Revolution, written in Holland in 1780; memorial to the States general, 1782; essay on canon and feudal law, 1783; defence of the American Constitution, 3 vols., 1788; answers to patriotic addresses, 1798; letters on government, to Sam. Adams, 1802; discourses on Davila, 1805; correspondence, 1809; Novanglus, re-published, 1819; correspondence with W. Cunningham, 1823; letters to Jefferson. — Encyclopædia Amer.; Amer. Ann. Reg. i. 225-240; Boston Weekly Messenger, vi. 366; J. Q. Adams' letters in Boston Patriot, Sept. 3, 1831; Holmes, ii. 499.

ADAMS, JOHN QUINCY, president of the United States, died at Washington Feb. 23, 1848, aged 80 years, being born, the son of John A., July 11, 1767. At the age of ten he accompanied his father to France; at the age of fifteen he was private secretary of Mr. Dana, minister to Russia. At Harvard college he was graduated in 1787, and then studied law with Mr. Parsons at Newburyport. Living in Boston, he published in 1791 the papers, signed Publicola, remarking on Paine's Rights of Man, distrusting the issue of the French Revolution. From 1794 to 1801 he was minister in Holland, England, and Prussia. From 1803 to 1808 he was a senator of the U. S.; but resigned from disagreement with his own State Legislature. He was a professor of rhetoric at Harvard from 1806 to 1809. He assisted in negotiating the treaty of Ghent in Dec., 1814, and afterwards assisted in the convention of commerce with Great Britain. In 1817 he was secretary of state in the cabinet of Monroe. In 1825 he was chosen president of the U. S. The electoral votes were 99 for Jackson, 84 for Adams, 41 for Crawford, 37 for Clay. The votes of thirteen States, represented in the house, elected him president. He served for four years. In December, 1831, he became a member of Congress, and was continued in that post till his death. While in his seat in the House of Representatives, Feb. 21st, he fell over on one side, and was removed to Mr. Speaker Winthrop's apartment, in which he died. He was only able to say: "This is the last of earth; I am content." His wife, Louisa, daughter of Joshua Johnson of Maryland, whom he married in 1797, survived him; but died at Washington May 15, 1852, aged 76.

As a member of Congress he in his old age gained imperishable honor by watching the movements and withstanding the progress of the slaveholding power, which threatened to gain the ascendancy in our general government over all the interests of justice and human freedom, and to render this land of liberty the scorn of the despotisms of Europe. At the present day the battle between slavery and freedom rages with increased vehemence; and, had "the old man eloquent" lived to see the border-ruffianism of Missouri tolerated by our rulers, and allowed to create a government and bear sway in the Territory of Kansas, and also to see a Southern ruffian striking down a Massachusetts senator in his seat, and supported in the act by the whole South, his voice would have rung like a clarion through the hall of Congress and through our land.

He published letters on Silesia, 1804; lectures on rhetoric and oratory, 2 vols., 1810; Dermot MacMorrough, a poetic historical tale, 1832; poems of religion and society, and various occasional addresses.

ADAMS, HANNAH, died Dec. 15, 1831, aged 74, and was the first tenant of the burying-ground at Mount Auburn. She was born in Medfield, Mass.; her father kept a store; her mother died when she was ten years old. She was perhaps the first American lady who devoted her life to literature; but the profits of her labors were inconsiderable. She was under the middle stature, very deaf, a great rappee snuff-taker, and very fond of strong tea. A few noble-minded friends bestowed upon her the comforts of life. A journey to Chelmsford was the farthest she had been by land, and a trip from Boston to Nahant, only ten miles, her only voyage by water. She published a history of New England, 1799; a view of religions, 1801; history of the Jews, 1812; controversy with Dr. Morse, 1814; letters on the Gospels, 2d ed., 1826. A memoir, written by herself, with additions by a friend, 1832.

ADAMS, EBENEZER, professor of languages and of mathematics at Dartmouth college, died Aug. 15, 1841, aged 77. He was born at New Ipswich, and graduated in 1791 at Dartmouth. His daughter married Professor Young of the same college.

ADAMS, BENJAMIN, died at Uxbridge March 28, 1837, aged 72. A graduate of Brown university in 1788, he was a lawyer, and a member of Congress from 1816 to 1821; a man of integrity and worth, and much respected.

ADAMS, JOHN W., presbyterian minister, died at Syracuse March 4, 1850, aged 54. He was the son of Rev. Roger A., of Conn., and was settled over the first church Dec. 14, 1824. The church members were three hundred and sixty-five in number.

ADAMS, NEWTON, M. D., missionary among the Zulus in S. Africa, died Sept. 16, 1851, aged 47. Born in East Bloomfield, N. Y., he decided to become a missionary in 1834, and went out as a physician; but was ordained in 1844. He was one of the six men, who with their wives sailed from Boston in Dec., 1834, to lay the foundation of the Zulu mission.

ADAMS, CHARLES BAKER, died at St. Thomas of the fever Jan. 19, 1853, aged 38. He was professor at Amherst college of zoology and astronomy from 1847, and had been professor of chemistry and natural history at Middlebury. He published Reports as State geologist of Vermont, and a work with Prof. Gray on geology. Some of his writings on zoology are in the annals of the Lyceum of Natural History of New York.

ADAMS, ZABDIEL BOYLSTON, M. D., died in Boston Jan. 25, 1855, aged 62. Born in Roxbury, he graduated in 1813, and was a skilful and beloved physician.

ADDINGTON, ISAAC, secretary of the province of Massachusetts, died at Boston March 19, 1715, aged 70 years. His father was Isaac; his mother was Anne, daughter of elder Thomas Leverett, sister of Gov. L.; his sister Rebecca married Capt. E. Davenport; his sister Sarah married Col. Penn Townsend. He sustained a high character for talents and learning, and for integrity and diligence in his public services. He was secretary more than twenty years, and for many years a magistrate and member of the council, elected by the people; and was also sometimes "useful in practising physic and chirurgery." He was singularly meek and humble and disinterested. In his family he was a daily worshipper of God. The religion, which he professed, gave him peace, as he went down to the dead. — Wadsworth's Funeral Sermon; Hutchinson, i. 414; ii. 212.

ADDIS, ASA, chief justice of Vt., died at St. Albans Oct. 15, 1847, aged 77. He was a graduate of Brown university.

ADDISON, ALEXANDER, a distinguished lawyer, died at Pittsburg, Penn., Nov. 24, 1807, aged 48. In the office of a judge for twelve years he was a luminous expounder of the law, prompt and impartial, and never was there an appeal from his judgment. His various powerful talents and extensive learning were displayed in numerous writings, which evinced not only a cogency in reasoning, but a classic purity of style, and a uniform regard to the interests of virtue. He was disinterested, generous, beneficent. He published observations on Gallatin's speech, 1798; analysis of report of committee of Virginia Assembly, 1800; reports in Penns. 1800.

ADRAIN, ROBERT, LL. D., died at New Brunswick, N. J., Aug. 10, 1843, aged 68. A native of Ireland, he came to this country with Emmet. He was professor of mathematics at Rutgers college, also at Columbia college.

AGATE, FREDERICK S., died at New York in May, 1844, aged 37; an historical painter of considerable reputation among American artists.

AIKEN, DANIEL, died at Wexford, Canada

West, in Jan., 1847, aged 120. He was seven times married: his grandchildren were 370 boys and 200 girls.

AITKEN, ROBERT, a printer in Philadelphia, came to this country in 1769, and died July, 1802, aged 68. For his attachment to American liberty, he was thrown into prison by the British. Among his publications were a magazine, an edition of the Bible, and the transactions of the Amer. Phil. Soc. He was the author, it is believed, of an inquiry concerning the principles of a commercial system for the United States, 1787. Jane Aitken, his daughter, continued the business; she printed Thompson's Septuagint. — Thomas, ii. 77.

AKERLY, SAMUEL, M. D., died at Staten Island July 6, 1845, aged 60. He studied with his brother-in-law, Mitchell, and contributed largely to medical and scientific journals. He was one of the founders of the institutions for the deaf and dumb, and the blind.

ALBERT, PIERRE ANTONIE, rector of the French Protestant Episcopal Church in New York, was the descendant of a highly respectable family in Lausanne, Switzerland. Being invited to take the charge of the church in the city of New York, which was founded by the persecuted Huguenots after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he commenced his labors July 26, 1797, and died July 12, 1806, aged 40. He was an accomplished gentleman, an erudite scholar, a profound theologian, and a most eloquent preacher. A stranger of unobtrusive manners and invincible modesty, he led a very retired life. His worth, however, could not be concealed. He was esteemed and beloved by all his acquaintance. — Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, iv. 78.

ALDEN, JOHN, a magistrate of Plymouth colony, was one of the first company which settled New England. He arrived in 1620, and his life was prolonged till Sept. 12, 1687, when he died, aged about 89 years. When sent by his friend, Capt. Standish, to make for him proposals of marriage to Priscilla Mullins, the lady said to him, — "Prithee, John, why do you not speak for yourself?" This intimation of preference from the lips of one of the Pilgrim beauties was not to be overlooked. Priscilla became his wife. He was a very worthy and useful man, of great humility and eminent piety. He was an assistant in the administration of every governor for many years. A professed disciple of Jesus Christ, he lived in accordance with his profession. In his last illness he was patient and resigned, fully believing that God, who had imparted to him the love of excellence, would perfect the work, which he had begun, and would render him completely holy in heaven.

ALDEN, JOHN, died at Middleborough, in 1821, aged 102; the great grandson of J. A., of the Mayflower.

ALDEN, JUDAH, died at Duxbury March 2, 1845, aged 94. He was a patriot and officer of the Revolution, and president of the Cincinnati.

ALDEN, SEYMOUR, died at Titicut Feb. 22, 1855, aged 83; a descendant of John Alden, the youngest of nineteen children.

ALDEN, TIMOTHY, a descendant of John Alden, was graduated at Harvard college in 1762, and settled Dec. 13, 1769, at Yarmouth, Mass., where he died Nov. 13, 1828, aged 91 years. For more than half a century he was a faithful laborer in the cause of religion. His people, in their affection to him, gave him a comfortable support for years after he had ceased to teach them. He published a dedication sermon, 1795.

ALDEN, TIMOTHY, D. D., son of the preceding, died at Pittsburg July 5, 1839, aged 68. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1794, a minister in Portsmouth, and president of Alleghany college at Meadville. He published a sermon on the death of Washington, 1800; account of societies in Portsmouth, 1808; a century sermon, 1811; New Jersey Register, 1811; collection of epitaphs, 5 vols., 1814; Alleghany Magazine, 1816.

ALDEN, ICHABOD, colonel, was killed by the Indians at Cherry Valley in Nov., 1778. He commanded a Massachusetts regiment in the war. He was the descendant of John Alden; and a son of Samuel, of Duxbury, who died in 1780, aged 93.

ALDEN, ROGER, major, an officer of the Revolution, died at West Point Nov. 5, 1836, aged 88.

ALEXANDER, an Indian, was the son and successor of Massassoit, and brother of King Philip. His Indian name was Wamsutta. He received his English name in 1656. Being suspected of conspiring with the Narragansetts against the English, he was captured by surprise, by Major Winslow in 1662, and carried to Marshfield. The indignant sachem fell sick of a fever, and was allowed to return, under a pledge of appearing at the next court; but he died on his way. Judge Davis gives a minute account of this affair. Dr. Holmes places the occurrence in 1657. — Davis' Morton, 287; Holmes, i. 308.

ALEXANDER, JAMES, secretary of the province of New York, and many years one of the council, arrived in the colony in 1715. He was a Scotch gentleman, who was bred to the law. Gov. Burnett was particularly attached to him. Though not distinguished for his talents as a public speaker, he was at the head of his profession for sagacity and penetration. Eminent for his knowledge, he was also communicative and easy of access. By honest practice and unwearied application to business, he acquired a great estate. He died in the beginning of 1756. — Smith's New York, 152.

son of the secretary, James Alexander, but spent a considerable part of his life in New Jersey. He was considered by many as the rightful heir to the title and estate of an earldom in Scotland, of which country his father was a native; and although, when he went to North Britain in pursuit of this inheritance, he failed of obtaining an acknowledgment of his claim by government, yet among his friends and acquaintances he received by courtesy the title of Lord Stirling. — He discovered an early fondness for the study of mathematics and astronomy, and attained great eminence in these sciences.

In the battle on Long Island Aug. 27, 1776, he was taken prisoner, after having secured to a large part of the detachment an opportunity to escape by a bold attack with four hundred men upon a corps under Lord Cornwallis. His attachment to Washington was proved in the latter part of 1777, by transmitting to him an account of the disaffection of Gen. Conway to the commander-in-chief. In the letter he said: "Such wicked duplicity of conduct I shall always think it my duty to detect." He died at Albany Jan. 15, 1783, aged 57 years. He was a brave, discerning, and intrepid officer. — He married Sarah, daughter of Philip Livingston. His eldest daughter, Mary, married John Watts, of a wealthy family in New York. He published a pamphlet, "The conduct of Maj.-Gen. Shirley briefly stated." — Miller, ii. 390; Holmes, ii. 247; Marshall, iii. Note No v.

ALEXANDER, NATHANIEL, governor of North Carolina, was graduated at Princeton in 1776, and after studying medicine entered the army. At the close of the war he resided at the High Hills of Santee, pursuing his profession, and afterwards at Mecklenburg. While he held a seat in Congress, the Legislature elected him governor in 1806. He died at Salisbury March 8, 1808, aged 52. In all his public stations he discharged his duty with ability and firmness. — Charleston Courier, March 23.

ALEXANDER, CALEB, D. D., a native of Northfield, Mass., and a graduate of Yale in 1777, was ordained at New Marlborough, Mass., in 1781, and dismissed in 1782. He was again settled at Mendon, and dismissed in 1803. After an ineffectual attempt to establish a college at Fairfield, State of New York, he took the charge of the academy at Onondaga Hollow, where he died in April, 1828. He published an essay on the deity of Jesus Christ, with strictures on Emlin, 1791; a Latin grammar, 1794; an English grammar, and grammar elements. — History of Berkshire, 293.

ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD, D. D., professor of theology at Princeton, was the descendant of a Scotch-Irish family, which came over about 1736 and settled in the great valley of Virginia; and was the son of William A. He died Oct. 22, 1851, aged 79. About 1801 he was president of Hampden Sidney college, and married Janetta, daughter of Rev. Dr. Waddel, of Louisa county, Va. In 1806 he succeeded Dr. Milledoler in Pine street church in Phila. In 1812 he became the professor of theology in the new seminary at Princeton. Dr. Miller came in Dec., 1813. He remained with honor in this important station until his death. He left six sons and a daughter; three were ministers, two lawyers, one a physician. His brother, Maj. John A., who served in the war of 1812, died at Lexington in 1853.

He published a sermon at Philadelphia, 1808; on the burning of the theatre, 1811; missionary, 1813; inaugural; Christian evidences, 1825; canon of Bible; to young men, 1826; on Sunday schools, 1829; growth in grace; before Amer. Board, 1829; hymns, selected, 1831; on pastoral office; lives of patriarchs; history of Israel; house of God; the people of God led, 1842; at Washington college, 1843; sketches in regard to the log college, 1845; history of colonization; outlines of moral science; introd. to Henry, Bates, Jay, and Waterbury; practical sermons; letters to the aged; counsels to the young; against Universalism; compend of Bible truth; on experience; life of Baxter; of Melville; of Knox; way of salvation, with various other tracts, as on justification by faith; the day of judgment; and the misery of the lost. His life by his son, Dr. J. W. A., was published in 1854 by C. Scribner, N. York.

ALFORD, ABIGAIL, died at Northampton Aug. 26, 1756, aged 102.

ALICE, a slave, died in Bristol, Penn., in 1802, aged 116. She was born in Philadelphia, which place she remembered as chiefly a wilderness inhabited by Indians. For forty years she was employed in ferrying. She retained her hearing, but was blind at the age of one hundred; though her sight was gradually restored. Her hair became white. Unable to read, she loved to have the Bible read to her. A worthy member of the Episcopal church, she anticipated the happiness of dwelling in the presence of her Saviour.

ALFORD, JOHN, founder of the professorship of natural religion, moral philosophy, and civility in Harvard college, died at Charlestown Sept. 29, 1761, aged 75. He had been a member of the council. His executors determined the particular objects, to which his bequest for charitable uses should be applied, and divided it equally between Harvard college, Princeton college, and the society for the propagation of the Gospel among the Indians. To the latter 10,675 dollars were paid in 1787. Levi Frisbie was the first Alford professor.

ALLEN, JOHN, first minister of Dedham, Mass., was born in England in 1596, and was driven from his native land during the persecution of the Puritans. He had been for a number of years a faithful preacher of the Gospel. Soon after he arrived in New England, he was settled pastor of the church in Dedham April 24, 1639. Here he continued till his death Aug. 26, 1671, aged 74. He was a man of great meekness and humility, and of considerable distinction in his day. Mr. Cotton speaks of him with respect in his preface to Norton's answer to Apollonius. He published a defence of the nine positions, in which, with Mr. Shepard of Cambridge, he discusses the points of church discipline; and a defence of the Synod of 1662, against Mr. Chauncy, under the title of Animadversions upon the Antisynodalia, 4to, 1664. This work is preserved in the New England library. The last two sermons, which he preached, were printed after his death.—Magnalia, III. 132; Prentiss' Funeral Sermon on Haven.

ALLEN, THOMAS, minister of Charlestown, was born at Norwich in England, in 1608, and was educated at Cambridge. He was afterwards minister of St. Edmond's in Norwich, but was silenced by bishop Wren, about the year 1636, for refusing to read the book of sports and conform to other impositions. In 1638 he fled to New England, and was the same year installed in Charlestown, where he was a faithful preacher of the Gospel till about 1651, when he returned to Norwich, and continued the exercise of his ministry till 1662. He afterwards preached to his church on all occasions, that offered, till his death, Sept. 21, 1673, aged 65. He was a very pious man, greatly beloved, and an able, practical preacher.

He published an invitation to thirsty sinners to come to their Saviour; the way of the Spirit in bringing souls to Christ; the glory of Christ set forth, with the necessity of faith, in several sermons; a chain of Scripture chronology from the creation to the death of Christ, in seven periods. This was printed in 1658, and was regarded as a very learned and useful work. It is preserved in the New England library, established by Mr. Prince, by whom the authors quoted in the book are written in the beginning of it in his own hand. Mr. Allen wrote also, with Mr. Shepard, in 1645, a preface to a treatise on liturgies, &c. composed by the latter. He contends, that only visible saints and believers should be received to communion.—Magnal. III. 215; Nonconformists' Memorial, I. 254; III. 11, 12.

ALLEN, MATTHEW, one of the first settlers of Connecticut, came to this country with Mr. Hooker in 1632, and became a landholder in Cambridge, in the records of which town his lands and houses are described. He accompanied Mr. Hooker to Hartford in 1636, and was a magistrate. In the charter of 1662 he is named as one of the company. His public services were various. In 1664 he is called Mr. Allen, senior. He might have been the father of John. There was, however, a Mr. Matthew Allen, a magistrate, in 1710; another of the same name in Windsor, in 1732. Trumbell gives the name Allen; but Mather wrote Allyn.

ALLEN, JOHN, secretary of the colony of Connecticut, was chosen a magistrate under the charter in 1662 and treasurer in 1663. He was on the committee, with Matthew Allen and John Talcott, respecting the union with New Haven in 1663. He appears to have been secretary as early as Dec., 1664; Joseph Allen had been secretary before him. He was also secretary in 1683 and on the committee respecting the boundary of New York. The time of his death is not known. One of his name was magistrate as late as 1709. The history of the Pequot war, given by Increase Mather in his Relation in 1677, was not written by Mr. Allen, as Judge Davis erroneously supposes, but merely communicated by him to Mr. Mather. — Davis' Morton, 196; Prince's Introd. to Mason's Hist.

ALLEN, JAMES, minister in Boston, came to this country in 1662, recommended by Mr. Goodwin. He had been a fellow of New college, Oxford. He was at this time a young man, and possessed considerable talents. He was very pleasing to many of the church in Boston, and an attempt was made to settle him as assistant to Mr. Wilson and Mr. Norton. He was ordained teacher of the first church Dec. 9, 1668, as colleague with Mr. Davenport, who was at the same time ordained pastor. After the death of Mr. Davenport, he had for his colleague Mr. Oxenbridge, and after his decease Mr. Wadsworth.

In 1669 seventeen ministers published their testimony against the conduct of Mr. Allen and Mr. Davenport in relation to the settlement of the latter. They were charged with communicating parts only of letters from the church of New Haven to the church of Boston, by which means, it was said, the church was deceived; but they in defence asserted, that the letters retained did not represent things differently from what had been stated. The whole colony was interested in the controversy between the first and the new, or third church. At length the General Court, in 1670, declared the conduct of those churches and elders, who assisted in establishing the third church, to be illegal and disorderly. At the next session, however, as there was a change of the members of the General Court, the censure was taken off. It seems, the act of censure was expressed in language very intemperate, and invasion of the rights of churches and assumption of prelatical power were declared in it to be among the prevailing evils of the day. The charge was so general, and it threatened to operate so unfavorably on religion, that a number of the very ministers, who had published their testimony against the elders of the first church, wrote an address to the court, representing the intemperate nature of the vote; and it was in consequence revoked, and the new church was exculpated. Mr. Allen died Sept. 22, 1710, aged 78 years. His sons were James, John, and Jeremiah, born in 1670, 1672, and 1673. The last was chosen treasurer of the province in 1715.

He published healthful diet, a sermon; New England's choicest blessings, an election sermon, 1679; serious advice to delivered ones; man's self-reflection a means to further his recovery from his apostasy from God; and two practical discourses. — Hutchinson's Hist. of Mass. I. 173, 222, 225, 270; Collections of the Hist. Society, IX. 173; Calamy.

ALLEN, SAMUEL, a merchant of London, proprietor of a part of New Hampshire, made the purchase of the heirs of Mason in 1691. The territory included Portsmouth and Dover, and extended sixty miles from the sea. The settlers resisting his claims, a perplexing litigation followed. In the midst of it Mr. Allen died at Newcastle May 5, 1705, aged 69. He sustained an excellent character. Though attached to the church of England, he attended the Congregational meeting. His son, Thomas Allen of London, continued the suit. The final verdict was against him, in 1707, in the case, Allen vs. Waldron; — he appealed, yet his death in 1715, before the appeal was heard, put an end to the suit. The principal reliance of the defendant was on the Indian deed to Wheelright of 1629. This Mr. Savage has satisfactorily shown to be a forgery of a later date. If so, it would seem, that the Allens were wrongfully dispossessed of a valuable province. — Belknap's N. H. I.; Savage's Winthrop, I. 405; N. H. Coll. II. 137.

ALLEN, JAMES, first minister of Brookline, Mass., was a native of Roxbury, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1710. He was ordained Nov. 5, 1718, and after a ministry of twenty-eight years died of a lingering consumption Feb. 18, 1747, aged 55 years, with the reputation of a pious and judicious divine. His successors were Cotton Brown from 1748 to 1751; Nathaniel Potter from 1755 to 1759; Joseph Jackson from 1760 to 1796; and John Pierce from 1797 to 1849. In July, 1743, he gave his attestation to the revival of religion, which took place throughout the country, and made known the success, which had attended his own exertions in Brookline. Almost every person in his congregation was impressed in some degree with the important concerns of another world, and he could no more doubt, he said, that there was a remarkable work of God, than he could, that there was a sun in the heavens. Afterwards, from peculiar circumstances, perhaps from the apostasy of some, who had appeared strong in the faith, he was led to speak of this revival "unadvisedly with his lips." This produced an alienation among some of his former friends. In his last hours he had a hope, which he would not part with, as he said, for a thousand worlds.

He published a thanksgiving sermon, 1722; a discourse on Providence, 1727; the doctrine of merit exploded, and humility recommended, 1727; a fast sermon, on the earthquake, 1727; a sermon to young men, 1731; a sermon on the death of S. Aspinwall, 1733; an election sermon, 1744. — Pierce's Cent. Discourse; Christian Hist. I. 394.

ALLEN, JAMES, member of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts a number of years, and a councillor, was graduated at Harvard college in 1717, and died Jan. 8, 1755, aged 57.

In the beginning of 1749 he made a speech in the House, censuring the conduct of the governor, for which he was required to make an acknowledgment. As he declined doing this, the House issued a precept for the choice of a new representative. When re-elected, he was not permitted to take his seat; but next year he took it, and retained it till his death. — Minot's Hist. Mass. I. 104-107.

ALLEN, WILLIAM, the first minister of Greenland, N. H., died in 1760, aged 84. A graduate of Harvard in 1703, and settled in 1707, he had been a minister fifty-three years. Mr. MacClinktock became his colleague in 1756. Before his settlement the people of G., then a part of Portsmouth, were accustomed to walk six or eight miles to P. to meeting.

ALLEN, WILLIAM, chief justice of Pennsylvania, was the son of William Allen, an eminent merchant of Philadelphia, who died in 1725. On the approach of the Revolution he retired to England, where he died Sept., 1786. His wife was a daughter of Andrew Hamilton, whom he succeeded as recorder of Philadelphia in 1741. He was much distinguished as a friend to literature. He patronized Sir Benjamin West, the painter. By his counsels and exertions Dr. Franklin was much assisted in establishing the college in Philadelphia. He published the American crisis, London, 1774, in which he suggests a plan "for restoring the dependence of America to a state of perfection." His principles seem to have been not a little arbitrary. On his resignation of the office of chief justice, to which he had been appointed in 1750, he was succeeded, till the Revolution, by Mr. Chew, attorney-general, and Mr. Chew by his son, Andrew Allen. This son died in London March 7, 1825, aged 85. At the close of 1776 he put himself under the protection of Gen. Howe at Trenton, with his brothers John and William. He had been a member of Congress and of the Committee of Safety; and William a lieutenant-colonel in the continental service, but in 1778 he attempted to raise a regiment of Tories. — Miller's Retrospect, II. 352; Proud's Hist. of Pennsylvania, II. 188; Amer. Remembrance, 1777, p. 56.

ALLEN, HENRY, a preacher in Nova Scotia, was born at Newport, R. I., June 14, 1748, and began to propagate some very singular sentiments, about the year 1778. He was a man of good capacity, though his mind had not been much cultivated, and though he possessed a warm imagination. He believed, that the souls of all men are emanations or parts of the one great Spirit, and that they were present with our first parents in Eden and participated in the first transgression; that our first parents in innocency were pure spirits without material bodies; that the body will not be raised from the grave; and that the ordinances of the Gospel are matters of indifference. The Scriptures, he contended, have a spiritual meaning, and are not to be understood in a literal sense. He died at the house of Rev. D. McClure, Northampton, N. H., Feb. 2, 1784, and since his death his party has much declined. He published a volume of hymns; and several treatises and sermons. — Adams' View of Religions, Benedict, I. 282.

ALLEN, ETILAN, brigadier-general, was born in 1738, in Woodbury, Conn. His ancestor, Nehemiah, was a brother of Samuel, of Northampton. His parents removed to Salisbury; at an early age he himself emigrated to Vermont. At the commencement of the disturbances in this territory about the year 1770 he took a most active part in favor of the "Green Mountain Boys," as the settlers were then called, in opposition to the government of New York. An act of outlawry against him was passed by this State, and 50 pounds were offered for his apprehension; but his party was too numerous and faithful to permit him to be disturbed by any apprehensions for his safety; in all the struggles of the day he was successful; and he not only proved a valuable friend to those, whose cause he had espoused, but he was humane and generous towards those, with whom he had to contend. When called to take the field, he showed himself an able leader and an intrepid soldier.

The news of the battle of Lexington determined Col. Allen to engage on the side of his country, and inspired him with the desire of demonstrating his attachment to liberty by some bold exploit. While his mind was in this state, a plan for taking Ticonderoga and Crown Point by surprise was formed by Capts. Edward Mott and Noah Phelps, of Hartford, Conn. They marched privately April 29th, with sixteen unarmed men. Arriving at Pittsfield, the residence of Col. James Easton and John Brown, Esq., they communicated the project to them and to Col. Ethan Allen, then at Pittsfield. These gentlemen immediately engaged to co-operate and to raise men for the purpose. Of the Berkshire men and the "Green Mountain Boys" two hundred and thirty were collected, under the command of Allen, and proceeded to Castleton. Here he was unexpectedly joined by Col. Arnold, who had been commissioned by the Massachusetts committee to raise four hundred men and effect the same object, which was now about to be accomplished. As he had not raised the men, he was admitted to act as an assistant to Col. Allen. They reached the lake opposite Ticonderoga Tuesday evening, May 9, 1775. With the utmost difficulty boats were procured, and eighty-three men were landed near the garrison. The approach of day rendering it dangerous to wait for the rear, it was determined immediately to proceed. The commander-in-chief now addressed his men, representing, that they had been for a number of years a scourge to arbitrary power, and famed for their valor, and concluded with saying, "I now propose to advance before you, and in person conduct you through the wicket gate, and you, that will go with me voluntarily in this desperate attempt, poise your firelocks." At the head of the centre file he marched instantly to the gate, where a sentry snapped his gun at him and retreated through the covered way; he pressed forward into the fort, and formed his men on the parade in such a manner as to face two opposite barracks. Three huzzas awoke the garrison. A sentry, who asked quarter, pointed out the apartments of the commanding officer; and Allen, with a drawn sword over the head of Capt. De la Place, who was undressed, demanded the surrender of the fort. "By what authority do you demand it?" inquired the astonished commander. "I demand it," said Allen, "in the name of the great Jehovah and of the Continental Congress." The summons could not be disobeyed, and the fort, with its very valuable stores and forty-nine prisoners, was immediately surrendered on May 10th. There were from 112 to 120 iron cannon from 6 to 24 pounders, 2 brass cannon, 50 swivels, 2 mortars, 10 tons of musket balls, 3 cartloads of flints, 10 casks of powder, 30 new carriages, 100 stand of small arms, 30 barrels of flour, and 18 barrels of pork. Crown Point was taken the same day, and the capture of a sloop of war soon afterwards made Allen and his brave party complete masters of Lake Champlain. May 18th, Arnold with thirty-five men surprised the fort of St. John's in Canada, taking fourteen prisoners, a sloop, and two brass cannon. Allen, arriving the same day with ninety men, resolved, against the advice of Arnold, to attempt to hold the place. But he was attacked the next day by a larger force from Montreal, and compelled to retreat. In the fall of 1775 he was sent twice into Canada, to observe the dispositions of the people, and attach them, if possible, to the American cause. During this last tour Col. Brown met him, and proposed an attack on Montreal in concert. The proposal was eagerly embraced, and Col. Allen, with one hundred and ten men, nearly eighty of whom were Canadians, crossed the river in the night of Sept. 24. In the morning he waited with impatience for the signal from Col. Brown, who agreed to co-operate with him; but he waited in vain. He made a resolute defence against an attack of five hundred men, and it was not till his own party was reduced by desertions to the number of thirty-one, and he had retreated near a mile, that he surrendered. A moment afterwards a furious savage rushed towards him, and presented his firelock with the intent of killing him. It was only by making use of the body of the officer, to whom he had given his sword, as a shield, that he escaped destruction. This rash attempt was made without authority from Gen. Schuyler. He was kept for some time in irons, and then sent to England as a prisoner, being assured that the halter would be the reward of his rebellion, when he arrived there. On his passage, handcuffed and fettered, he was shut up with his fellow prisoners in the cable tier, a space twelve feet by ten. After his arrival, about the middle of December, he was lodged for a short time in Pendennis castle, near Falmouth. On the 8th of Jan., 1776, he was put on board a frigate and by a circuitous route carried to Halifax. Here he remained confined in the gaol from June to October, when he was removed to New York. During the passage to this place, Capt. Burke, a daring prisoner, proposed to kill the British captain and seize the frigate; but Col. Allen refused to engage in the plot, and was probably the means of preserving the life of Capt. Smith, who had treated him very politely. He was kept at New York about a year and a half, sometimes imprisoned, and sometimes permitted to be on parole. While here, he had an opportunity to observe the inhuman manner, in which the American prisoners were treated. In one of the churches, in which they were crowded, he saw seven lying dead at one time, and others biting pieces of chips from hunger. He calculated, that of the prisoners, taken at Long Island and Fort Washington, near two thousand perished by hunger and cold, or in consequence of diseases occasioned by the impurity of their prisons.

Col. Allen was exchanged for Col. Campbell May 6, 1778, and after having repaired to headquarters and offered his services to Gen. Washington in case his health should be restored, he returned to Vermont. His arrival, on the evening of the last of May, gave his friends great joy, and it was announced by the discharge of cannon.

As an expression of confidence in his patriotism and military talents, he was very soon appointed to the command of the State militia. It does not appear, however, that his intrepidity was ever again brought to the test, though his patriotism was tried by an unsuccessful attempt of the British to bribe him to effect a union of Vermont with Canada. Sir H. Clinton wrote to Lord Germaine, Feb., 1781, "There is every reason to suppose, that Ethan Allen has quitted the rebel cause." He died of apoplexy at his estate in Colchester Feb. 13, 1789, aged 51. His first wife was Mary Brownson of Roxbury; his second wife was Frances, daughter of Col. Brush of the British army, whom he met in Boston on his return from his captivity in England. Her mother was the daughter of James Calcraft, a soldier and a schoolmaster, whose name is now changed to Schoolcraft. After his death she married Dr. Penniman of Colchester. The names of the other children of Joseph, Ethan's father, were Heman, Lydia, Heber, Levi, Luey, Zimri, and Ira; their mother's name was Remembrance Baker. His daughter Pamela married E. W. Keyes, Esq., in 1803. Another daughter entered a nunnery in Canada. He had lived for a time in Sunderland. It was his project to make a city, Vergennes, a mile square. His son, Capt. Ethan A. Allen, formerly of the army, died at Norfolk Jan. 6, 1855; his grandson, Col. Hitchcock of the army, is said to resemble him. From this likeness Kinney's statue of him was framed.

Gen. Allen possessed strong powers of mind, but they never felt the influence of education. Though he was brave, humane, and generous, yet his conduct does not seem to have been much influenced by considerations respecting that holy and merciful Being, whose character and whose commands are disclosed to us in the Scriptures. His notions with regard to religion were such, as to prove that they, who rather confide in their own wisdom than seek instruction from heaven, may embrace absurdities, which would disgrace the understanding of a child. He believed, with Pythagoras, that men after death would transmigrate into beasts, birds, fishes, reptiles, etc., and often informed his friends, that he himself expected to live again in the form of a large white horse.

Besides a number of pamphlets in the controversy with New York, he published in 1779 a narrative of his observations during his captivity, which was afterwards reprinted; a vindication of the opposition of the inhabitants of Vermont to the government of New York, and their right to form an independent State, 1779; and Allen's theology, or the oracles of reason, 1786. This last work was intended to ridicule the doctrine of Moses and the prophets. It would be unjust to bring against it the charge of having effected great mischief in the world, for few have had the patience to read it. — Allen's Narrative; Boston Weekly Magazine, II.; Holmes' Annals, II. 207; Williams' Vermont; Chronicle, March 5, 1789; Marshall's Wash., II. 203; III. 24; Gordon, II. 13, 160; Graham's Vermont; *Encyc. ALLEN, IRA, first secretary of Vermont, the brother of Ethan, was born at Cornwall, Conn. about 1752, and in early life co-operated with his brother in the controversy between Vermont and New York, being a lieutenant under him. He also took an active part on the lakes in the war of 1775. Being a member of the Legislature in 1776 and 1777, he was zealous in asserting the independence of Vermont. In Dec., 1777, he assisted in forming the constitution of Vermont; and soon afterwards was nominated surveyor-general and treasurer. He and Bradley and Fay were commissioners to Congress for Vermont in 1780 and 1781. In the politic negotiations with Canada in 1781, designed to protect the people of the "New Hampshire grants" from invasion, Mr. Allen and Jonas Fay were the principal agents. In 1789 he drew up a memorial in favor of the establishment of a college at Burlington. Having risen to the rank of eldest major-general of the militia, he proceeded to Europe in Dec., 1795, to purchase arms, by the advice of the governor, for the supply of the State, but as a private speculation by the sale of his lands, of which he asserted, that he and the heirs of Ethan held nearly three hundred thousand acres. He went to France and purchased of the French republic twenty-four brass cannon and twenty thousand muskets at twenty-five livres, expecting to sell them at fifty, a part of which he shipped at Ostend in the Olive Branch; but he was captured Nov. 9, 1796, and carried into England. A litigation of eight years in the court of admiralty followed. He was charged with the purpose of supplying the Irish rebels with arms. In 1798 he was imprisoned in France. He returned to America in 1801. At length he procured a decision in his favor. His residence, when in Vermont, was at Colchester; but he died at Philadelphia Jan. 7, 1814, aged 62, leaving several children. He published the natural and political history of Vermont, 1798, and statements applicable to the Olive Branch, Phila. 1807. — Pub. Char., 1802, p. 234–248; Holmes, II. 472; Amer. Rememb., 1782, p. 351, Part II. 74.

ALLEN, TIMOTHY, died at Chesterfield Jan. 12, 1806, aged 91. He was a minister of note in his day. A graduate of Yale in 1736, he was ordained at West Haven in 1738, and dismissed in 1742. In the time of Mr. Whitfield he was a zealous preacher, as mentioned by Trumbull. His second settlement was at Ashford; his last at Chesterfield. He published a sermon at his installation, Ashford, 1761; answer to Pilate's question; the main point, 1765.

ALLEN, MOSES, minister of Midway, Ga., and a distinguished friend of his country, was born in Northampton, Mass., Sept. 14, 1748. He was educated at the college in New Jersey, where he was graduated in 1772; and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick Feb. 1, 1774, and recommended by them as an ingenious, prudent, pious man. In his journal of this year he speaks of passing a few days in December, at his earnest request, with his friend, James Madison, in Virginia, at the house of his father, Col. Madison, and of preaching repeatedly at the court house, and of being solicited to pass the winter there. In March following he preached first at Christ's church parish, about twenty miles from Charleston, in South Carolina. Here he was ordained March 16, 1775, by Mr. Zubly, Mr. Edmonds, and William Tennent. He preached his farewell sermon in this place June 8, 1777, and was soon afterwards established at Midway, to which place he had been earnestly solicited to remove.

The British army from Florida under Gen. Prevost dispersed his society in 1778, and burned the meeting house, almost every dwelling house, and the crops of rice then in stacks. In December, when Savannah was reduced by the British troops, he was taken prisoner. The continental officers were sent to Sunbury on parole, but Mr. Allen, who was chaplain to the Georgia brigade, was denied that privilege. His warm exhortations from the pulpit and his animated exertions in the field exposed him to the particular resentment of the British. They sent him on board the prison ships. Wearied with a confinement of a number of weeks in a loathsome place, and seeing no prospect of relief, he determined to attempt the recovery of his liberty by throwing himself into the river and swimming to an adjacent point; but he was drowned in the attempt on the evening of Feb. 8, 1779, aged 30. His body was washed on a neighboring island, and was found by some of his friends. They requested of the captain of a British vessel some boards to make a coffin, but could not procure them.

Mr. Allen, notwithstanding his clerical function, appeared among the foremost in the day of battle, and on all occasions sought the post of danger as the post of honor. The friends of independence admired him for his popular talents, his courage, and his many virtues. The enemies of independence could accuse him of nothing more, than a vigorous exertion of all his powers in defending the rights of his injured country. He was eminently a pious man.—Ramsay, II. 6; Hist. Coll. IX. 157; Allen's Ser. on M. Allen; Hart.

ALLEN, THOMAS, brother of the preceding and first minister of Pittsfield, Mass., was born Jan. 17, 1743, at Northampton, of which town his great-grandfather, Samuel, was one of the first settlers, receiving a grant of land from the town Dec. 17, 1657. In the records of the town the name is written variously, Allen, Allin, Allyn, and Alyn. His grandfather, Samuel, who died in 1739, was a deacon of the church, of which Jonathan Edwards was pastor. His father, Joseph, who died Dec. 30, 1779, and his mother, Elizabeth Parsons, who died Jan. 10, 1800, both eminent for piety, were the steady friends of Mr. Edwards during the popular commotion, which caused the removal of that excellent minister. The church records commend her character, and say, she assisted at the birth of three thousand children.

Through the bequest of an uncle of his father, —Mr. Thomas Allen, who died in 1754, —Mr. Allen was educated at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1762, being ranked among the best classical scholars of the day.

After studying theology under the direction of Mr. Hooker of Northampton, Mr. Allen was ordained April 18, 1764, the first minister of Pittsfield, so named in honor of William Pitt, —then a frontier town, in which a garrison had been kept during the French war. The Indian name of the place was Pontoosuc. At the time of his settlement there were in Pittsfield but half a dozen houses not made of logs. He lived to see it a rich and beautiful town, containing nearly three thousand inhabitants. During a ministry of forty-six years he was unwearied in dispensing the glorious Gospel. Besides his stated labors on the Sabbath, he frequently delivered lectures, and in the course of his life preached six or seven hundred funeral sermons. In the early part of his ministry he also occasionally preached in the neighboring towns, not then supplied with settled ministers.

The same benevolence, which awakened his zeal in guiding men in the way to heaven, made him desirous of rendering them happy also in this world. His charities to the poor excited their gratitude and rendered his religious instructions the more effectual. His house was the seat of hospitality. Towards other denominations of Christians, though strict in his own principles, he was yet exemplarily candid, neither believing that true piety was confined to his own sect, nor that gentleness and forbearance were useless in the attempt to reclaim men from error. At the commencement of the American Revolution, like most of his brethren, he engaged warmly in the support of the rights and independence of his country, for he believed, that the security and permanence of the best of earthly enjoyments, as well as the progress of genuine religion, were intimately connected with public liberty. Twice he went out as a volunteer chaplain for a short time;—from Oct. 3 to Nov. 23, 1776, he was absent from home, with the army at White Plains, near New York, and in June and July, 1777, he was at Ticonderoga. On the retreat of St. Clair before Burgoyne he returned home. But the next month, when a detachment from Burgoyne's troops under the command of Col. Baum had penetrated to the neighborhood of Bennington, and threatened to desolate the country, he accompanied the volunteer militia of Pittsfield, who marched to repel the invasion. Previously to the assault of a particular intrenchment, which was filled with refugees, he deemed it his duty to advance towards the enemy and exhort them to surrender, assuring them of good treatment, in a voice distinctly heard by them; but being fired upon, he rejoined the militia, and was among the foremost, who entered the breastwork. His exertions and example contributed somewhat to the triumph of that day, August 16th, which checked the progress of the British and led to the capture of Burgoyne. After the battle he found a Hessian surgeon's horse, loaded with panniers of bottles of wine. The wine he administered to the wounded and the weary; but two large square white glass bottles he carried home with him, as trophies of his campaign of three or four days. During the rebellion of Shays, which extended to the county of Berkshire, Mr. Allen supported the authority of the established government of Massachusetts. The insurgents at one period threatened to seize him and carry him as a hostage into the State of New York. But in his intrepidity he was not to be shaken from his purpose and his duty. He slept with arms in his bedroom, ready to defend himself against the violence of lawless men. In the new political controversy, which sprung up after the adoption of the federal constitution, Mr. Allen's principles attached him to what was called the Democratic or Republican party. Among his parishioners were some, who were Tories in the revolutionary war and who remembered with no good will the zeal of their Whig minister; others were furious politicians, partaking fully of the malevolent spirit of the times, intent on accomplishing their object, though with the weapons of obloquy and outrage. "During the presidency of Mr. Jefferson," says the history of Berkshire, "that spirit of political rancor, that infected every class of citizens in this country, arraying fathers, brothers, sons, and neighbors against each other, entered even the sanctuary of the church. A number of Mr. Allen's church and congregation withdrew, and were incorporated by the legislature into a separate parish in 1808; thus presenting to the world the ridiculous spectacle of a church divided on party politics and known by the party names of the day." This division was, however, healed in a few years; though not until after the death of him, whose last days were thus embittered, as well as by domestic afflictions in the loss of his eldest son and daughter.

In Mr. Allen the strength of those affections, which constitute the charm of domestic and social life, was remarkable; giving indeed peculiar poignancy to the arrows of affliction, but also swelling in a high degree the amount of good, found in the pilgrimage of the earth.

After the death of his brother Moses Allen in 1779, he took a journey on horseback to Savannah, out of regard to the welfare of the widow and her infant son, whom, while the war was raging at the south, he placed for a time in a happy refuge at his house. Mr. Allen's first-born daughter, who married William P. White of Boston, died in London, leaving an infant, unprotected by any relatives, her husband being then in the East Indies. Though the child was left under the care of a very respectable gentleman, who was connected with its father in large mercantile business, yet such was his solicitude for its welfare, that in the year 1799 he encountered the dangers of a voyage across the Atlantic and brought his grandchild home to his own family.

He sailed in the ship Argo, Capt. Rich.—On the voyage many fears were awakened by a vessel of force, which pursued the Argo, and was supposed to be a French ship. The idea of a prison in France was by no means welcome. In the expectation of a fight Mr. Allen obtained the captain's consent to offer a prayer with the men and to make an encouraging speech to them before the action. The frigate proved to be British; and the deliverance was acknowledged in a thanksgiving prayer. On his arrival at London he was received with great kindness by his friends, Mr. Robert Cowie and Mr. Robert Steel, and was made acquainted with several of the distinguished evangelical ministers of England; with Newton, and Haweis, and Rowland Hill, and Bogue, and others, from whom he caught a pious zeal for the promotion of foreign missions, which on his return he diffused around him. He regarded the London missionary society as the most wonderful work of Divine Providence in modern times. It appears from his journal, that he was absent from Pittsfield from July 3d to Dec. 30, 1799. His return passage was boisterous and extended to the great length of eighty-five days. Among other objects of curiosity, which attracted his attention in London, he went to see the king, as he passed from St. James' to the parliament house in a coach, drawn by six cream-colored horses. On this sight he recorded the following reflections: "This is he, who desolated my country; who ravaged the American coasts; annihilated our trade; burned our towns; plundered our cities; sent forth his Indian allies to scalp our wives and children; starved our youth in his prison ships; and caused the expenditure of a hundred millions of money and a hundred thousand of precious lives. Instead of being the father of his people, he has been their destroyer. May God forgive him so great guilt! And yet he is the idol of the people, who think, they cannot live without him." In this journal he also recorded with much confidence the following prediction: "This country will work the subversion and ruin of the freedom and government of my country, or my country will work the melioration if not the renovation of this country." Late events seem to prove, that the example of American liberty has not been without a beneficial effect in Great Britain.

His health had been declining for several years before his death, and more than once he was brought to the brink of the grave. For several months he was unable to preach. He was fully aware of his approaching dissolution, and the prospects of eternity brightened, as he drew near the close of life. Those precious promises, which with peculiar tenderness he had often announced to the sick and dying, were now his support. The all-sufficient Saviour was his only hope; and he rested on him with perfect confidence. He was desirous of departing, and was chiefly anxious, lest he should be impatient.

Knowing his dependence upon God, he continually besought those, who were around his bed, to pray for him. He took an affecting leave of his family, repeating his pious counsels and bestowing upon each one his valedictory blessing. When he was reminded by a friend of his great labors in the ministry, he disclaimed all merit for what he had done, though he expressed his belief, that he had plainly and faithfully preached the Gospel. He forgave and prayed for his enemies. When one of his children, a day or two before his death, pressed him to take some nourishment, or it would be impossible for him to live, he replied, "Live? I am going to live forever!" He frequently exclaimed, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly." In the morning of the Lord's day, Feb. 11, 1810, he fell asleep in Jesus, in the 68th year of his age and the 46th of his ministry. Among his children, who have deceased since his departure, was one son, who was a captain in service during the war of 1812. Another, Dr. Elisha Lee Allen, officiated as surgeon in the same war on the Niagara frontier, and was retained on the peace establishment May, 1815. His account of the battle of Chippewa was published in the Boston Centinel Aug. 10, 1814. He died of the yellow fever at Pas Christian, near New Orleans, Sept. 5, 1817. Another son, Prof. Solomon M. Allen, died a few days afterwards, Sept. 23, 1817. And Mrs. Ripley, the wife of Maj.-Gen. Ripley, died at the Bay of St. Louis of the yellow fever Sept. 11, 1820. Mr. Allen's widow, Elizabeth, died March 31, 1830, aged 82 years. She was the daughter of Rev. J. Lee of Salisbury, and a descendant from Gov. Bradford.

He published a sermon on the death of his daughter, Elizabeth White, 1798; on the death of Moses Allen, son of Rev. Moses Allen, 1801; on the death of Anna Collins, 1803; on the death of his son Thomas Allen, Jr., 1806; election sermon, 1808. Several of his letters on the sickness and death of his daughter were published in the Edinburgh Missionary Magazine for Oct. Nov. and Dec., 1799.—Panoplist, March, 1810; Hist. of Berkshire, 377; Pittsfield Sun, Feb. 21.

ALLEN, SOLOMON, a useful minister of the Gospel, brother of the preceding, was born at Northampton Feb. 23, 1751. He and four of his brothers entered the army in the Revolutionary war. Of these, two, Moses and Thomas, whose lives are here recorded, were chaplains. Another, Maj. Jonathan Allen, after escaping the perils of the service, was shot by his companion, Mr. Seth Lyman, while hunting deer in a deep snow in the neighborhood of Northampton, in January, 1780, aged 42 years. To such families of daring, self-denying, zealous patriots and soldiers America is indebted, through the blessing of God on their sacrifices and toils, for her freedom and independence.

Mr. Solomon Allen, in the course of the war, rose to the rank of major. At the time of the capture of Andre he was a lieutenant and adjutant, on service near the lines not far from New York. His account of the removal of Andre to West Point, received from his own lips, will correct the errors of the other accounts, which have been given to the world. When the British spy was brought to the American post, Col. Jameson ordered Lieut. Allen to select a guard of nine men out of three hundred, who were detached from West Point as a covering party to Col. Weld's (or Sheldon's) light horse on the lines sixty miles from West Point, and to carry the prisoner to Gen. Arnold, the commanding officer at West Point, with a letter from Jameson to Arnold. Just at night, Sept. 23, 1780, he set out with his prisoner, who wore an old, torn crimson coat, nankeen vest, and small clothes, old boots and flapped hat. Andre's arms being bound behind him, one of the soldiers held the strap, which was around his arm, and the guard on each side as well as before and behind were ordered to run him through, if he attempted to escape. Lieut. Allen, riding behind, assured Andre of good treatment, and offered, if he should be tired, to dismount and give him his horse. Having thus proceeded seven miles, with much cheerfulness on the part of the prisoner, an express overtook them with a letter from Jameson of this import, that as the enemy might have parties landed between them and West Point, Lieut. Allen was ordered to leave the river road and take the prisoner immediately over east to lower Salem and deliver him to Capt. Hoogland, commanding there a company of light horse; then to take one of the guard and proceed with Jameson's letter to Arnold at West Point, sending the eight men back under the command of the sergeant. The guard were unwilling to comply, for they wished to get back to West Point. They said, there was no danger, and it would be best to proceed; and Andre seconded the proposal. He thought, the fear of a rescue was very idle. But Lieut. Allen replied, like a soldier, I must obey orders. From this moment Andre appeared downcast. The same night Allen delivered him to Hoogland, having travelled twenty miles. In the morning of Sept. 24th he proceeded with one of the guard to West Point, it being arranged, that Andre should soon follow him; but the man being on foot, and the distance forty or fifty miles, they did not arrive till the forenoon of the 25th, at Robinson's house, the east side of the river, opposite West Point,—the residence of Arnold and the quarters of the general officers. Arnold was in the buttery eating, it being 10 or 11 o'clock; on receiving the letter from Jameson he was thrown into great confusion; he, however, in a short time asked Lieut. Allen up stairs to sit with Mrs. Arnold, probably to keep him from an interview with the other officers, and precipitately left the house and fled. Such was Mr. Allen's statement. Washington soon arrived, at 12 o'clock on the same day, from Hartford, and in the afternoon the treason was discovered by the arrival of the packet from Jameson for Washington; Andre was brought to head-quarters the next day. On the same day Adj. Allen was invited to dine at head-quarters; and at dinner he heard Gen. Knox remark, "What a very fortunate discovery this was! Without it we should all have been cut up." To which Gen. Washington very gravely and emphatically replied, "I do not call this a fortunate occurrence; but a remarkable Providence!"

After the war Maj. Allen was a conspicuous officer in quelling the insurrection of Shays. At the age of forty his soul was conquered by the power of the Gospel, which till then he had resisted; in a few years afterwards he was chosen a deacon of the church of Northampton. As his personal piety increased, he became solicitous to preach the Gospel to his perishing brethren. But, at the age of fifty, with no advantages of education, there were formidable obstacles in his way. The ministers around him suggested discouragements, as he could hardly acquire the necessary qualifications. But his pious zeal was irrepressible. There were various branches of learning, which he could not hope to gain; but "one thing he could do;—he could bend all the force of a naturally robust intellect to the work of searching the Scriptures. This he did, and while in this way he enriched his understanding from their abundant treasures, his faith was strengthened, his hope brightened, and all the Christian graces were refreshed from that fountain of living waters." He read also Howe's and Baxter's works. The former was in his view the greatest of uninspired writers. From these sources he drew his theology. He wrote out a few sermons, and thus commenced the labor of preaching, at first in a few small towns in Hampshire county, but for the last years of his life in the western part of the State of New York, in Middletown at the head of Canandaigua Lake, in Riga, Pittsford, Brighton, and other towns near the Genesee River. Without property himself, he preached the Gospel to the poor, and was perfectly content with food and clothing, demanding and receiving no other compensation for his services. He rejoiced in fatigues and privations in the service of his blessed Master. Sometimes in his journeys he reposed himself with nothing but a blanket to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. But, though poor, he was the means of enriching many with the inestimable riches of religion. Four churches were established by him, and he numbered about two hundred souls, as by his preaching reclaimed from perdition. Though poor himself, there were those connected with him, who were rich, and by whose liberality he was enabled to accomplish his benevolent purposes. When one of his sons presented him with a hundred dollars, he begged him to receive again the money, as he had no unsupplied wants and knew not what to do with it; but, as he was not allowed to return it, he purchased with it books for the children of his flock, and gave every child a book. From such sources he expended about a thousand dollars in books and clothing for the people in the wilderness, while at the same time he toiled incessantly in teaching them the way to heaven. Such an example of disinterestedness drew forth from an enemy of the Gospel the following remark: "This is a thing I cannot get along with: this old gentleman, who can be as rich as he pleases, comes here and does all these things for nothing; there must be something in his religion."

In the autumn of 1820, after having been nearly twenty years a preacher in the new settlements of the west, his declining health induced him to bid adieu to his people, in order to visit once more, before his death, his children and friends in Massachusetts and in the cities of New York and Philadelphia. His parting with his church at Brighton was like the parting of Paul with the elders of the church of Ephesus. Many of the members of the church accompanied him to the boat, and tears were shed and prayers offered on the shore of Lake Ontario, as on the seacoast of Asia Minor. Even the passengers in the boat could not refrain from weeping at the solemnity and tenderness of the scene. It was, as it was apprehended to be, the last interview between the beloved pastor and his people, until they meet again in the morning of the resurrection of the just. The attachment of children to Mr. Allen was indeed remarkable. Wherever he went, children, while they venerated his white locks, would cling around his knees to listen to the interesting anecdotes, which he would relate, and to his warnings and instructions.

Mr. Allen revisited his friends, with a presentiment, that it was his last visit. He had come, he said, "to set his house in order," alluding to his numerous children and grandchildren, living in different places. It was his custom to address them first individually, then collectively, and while a heavenly serenity beamed upon his countenance, he pressed upon them the concerns of another world with plainness and simplicity, with pathos and energy. He had the happiness to be persuaded, that all his children, excepting one, were truly pious; and concerning that one he had the strongest faith, that God would have mercy upon him. After ten years that son espoused a cause, which he never before loved, and manifested much pious zeal.

At Pittsfield, where some of his relatives lived and where his brother had been the minister, Mr. Allen went through the streets, and, entering each house, read a chapter in the Bible, exhorting all the members of the family to serve God, and praying fervently for their salvation. In like manner he visited other towns. He felt, that the time was short, and he was constrained to do all the good in his power. With his white locks and the strong impressive tones of his voice, and having a known character of sanctity, all were awed at the presence of the man of God. He went about with the holy zeal and authority of an apostle. In prayer Mr. Allen displayed a sublimity and pathos, which good judges have considered as unequalled by any ministers, whom they have known. It was the energy of true faith and strong feeling. In November he arrived at New York, and there, after a few weeks, he expired in the arms of his children Jan. 20, 1821, aged 70 years. At his funeral his pall was borne by eight clergymen of the city.

As he went down to the grave he enjoyed an unbroken serenity of soul, and rejoiced and exulted in the assured hope of eternal life in the presence of his Redeemer in heaven. Some of his last memorable sayings have been preserved by Rev. Mr. Danforth in his sketch of his last hours. If there are any worldly-minded ministers, who neglect the sheep and lambs of the flock, — any, who repose themselves in learned indolence, — any, who are not bold to reprove and diligent to instruct, — any, who are not burning with holy zeal, nor strong in faith, nor fervent and mighty in prayer; to them the history of the ministry and faithfulness of Mr. Allen might show to what a height of excellence and honor they might reach, did they but possess his spirit.

Mr. Allen published no writings to keep alive his name on earth. He did not, like some learned men, spend his life in laboriously doing nothing. But he has a record on high; and his benevolent, pious, zealous toils have doubtless gained for him that honor, which cometh from God, and which will be green and flourishing, when the honors of science and of heroic exploits and all the honors of earth shall wither away. In his life there is presented to the world a memorable example of the power in doing good, which may be wielded by one mind, even under the most unfavorable circumstances, when its energies are wholly controlled by a spirit of piety. Though found in deep poverty, such a pious zeal may mould the characters of those, who by their industry and enterprise acquire great wealth; and thus may be the remote cause of all their extensive charities. One lesson especially should come home to the hearts of parents; teaching them to hope that by their faithfulness and the constancy and importunity of prayer all their offspring and a multitude of their descendants will be rendered through the faithfulness and mercy of God rich in faith, and be made wise unto salvation. — Sketch of his last hours, by J. N. Danforth; Sparks' Letters of Washington, VII.

ALLEN, JONATHAN, minister of Bradford, died in 1827, aged 77. He published a sermon at the ordination of B. Thurston, 1786.

ALLEN, JAMES, a poet, was born at Boston July 24, 1739. It was his misfortune to be the son of a merchant of considerable wealth. From youth he was averse to study. He early adopted free notions on religion. After remaining three years at college, he afterwards lived at his ease in Boston, without business and without a family, displaying much eccentricity, till his death Oct., 1808, aged 69 years. Had he been without property, he might have been impelled to some useful exertion of his powers. He wrote a few pieces of poetry — lines on the Boston massacre, at the request of Dr. Warren, the Retrospect, &c. — Spec. of Amer. Poetry, I. 160.

ALLEN, WILLIAM HENRY, a naval officer, was born at Providence, R. I., Oct. 21, 1784. His father, William Allen, was a major in the Revolutionary army, and in 1799 appointed brigadier-general of the militia of the State. His mother was the sister of Gov. Jones. Notwithstanding the remonstrances of his father, who wished him to cultivate the arts of peace, he entered the navy as a midshipman in 1800 and sailed under Bainbridge to Algiers. After his return he again sailed for the Mediterranean under Barron in the Philadelphia; the third time, in 1802, under Rodgers in the frigate John Adams; and the fourth time, in 1804, as sailing master of the Congress. In his voyage, while the ship was lying to in a gale, he fell from the fore yard into the sea, and must have been lost, had he not risen close by the mizzen chains, on which he caught hold. Thus was he by a kind Providence preserved. As lieutenant he repaired on board the Constitution, commanded by Rodgers, in Oct., 1805. During the cruise he visited the mountains Ætna and Vesuvius and the cities Herculaneum and Pompeii. Returning in 1806, he was the next year on board the Chesapeake, when, without fighting, she struck her colors to the British frigate Leopard, — an event, which filled him with indignation. He, in consequence, drew up the letter of the officers to the secretary of the navy, urging the arrest and trial of Com. Barron for neglect of duty. During the embargo of 1808 he cruised off Block Island for the enforcement of the law, but in his delicacy got excused from boarding in person any vessel from his native State. In 1809 he joined the frigate United States as first lieutenant under Decatur. Soon after the declaration of war in 1812 he was distinguished in the action, Oct. 25th, which issued in the capture of the Macedonian. The superior skill of the United States in gunnery was ascribed to the diligent training and discipline of Lieut. Allen. He carried the prize safely into the harbor of New York amidst the gratulations of thousands. Promoted to be master commandant, in 1813 he conveyed Mr. Crawford, the minister, to France, in the brig Argus, and afterwards proceeded to the Irish Channel, agreeably to orders, for the purpose of destroying the English commerce. His success was so great, that the injury inflicted by him upon the enemy in the capture of twenty vessels was estimated at 2,000,000 dollars. In his generosity he never allowed the baggage of passengers to be molested. On the 14th of Aug. he fell in with the British brig Pelican, cruising in the channel for the purpose of capturing the Argus. Soon after the action commenced, Capt. Allen was mortally wounded, and carried below; Lieut. Watson being also wounded, the command for a time devolved on Lieut. W. H. Allen, Jr. After a vigorous resistance of nearly an hour, the Argus was captured, with the loss of six killed and seventeen wounded. Capt. Allen was carried into Plymouth the next day, his leg having been amputated at sea. He died Aug. 15, 1813, aged 28 years, and was buried with military honors. Capt. Allen was highly respected and esteemed in private life, exhibiting a uniform courtesy and amenity of manners. With great care he abstained from all irritating and insulting language. He united the milder graces with the stern and masculine character of the sailor. The eager desire of fame, called "the last infirmity of noble minds," seemed to reign in his heart. Against the wishes of all his friends he entered the naval service, thirsting for honor and distinction, of which he had his share; but in early manhood he died a prisoner in a foreign land. If there must be victims to war, we could wish the defenders of their country's rights a higher reward than fame. Bailey's Naval Biography, 205-226.

ALLEN, SOLOMON METCALF, professor of languages in Middlebury college, Vermont, was the son of Rev. T. Allen of Pittsfield, and was born Feb. 18, 1789. He received his second name on account of his being a descendant on his mother's side of Rev. Joseph Metcalf, first minister of Falmouth. His father destined him to be a farmer, as he was athletic and fond of active life; but, after he became pious, his friends being desirous that he should receive a collegial education, he commenced the study of Latin at the age of twenty. In 1813 he graduated at Middlebury with high reputation as a scholar. During a year spent at Andover, besides attending to the customary studies, he read a part of the New Testament in the Syriac language. After officiating for two years as a tutor, he was chosen in 1816 professor of the ancient languages, having risen to this honor in seven years after commencing the study of Latin. He lived to accomplish but little, but long enough to show what the energy of pious zeal is capable of accomplishing. Respected and beloved by all his associates and acquaintance, his sudden and awful death overwhelmed them with sorrow. Being induced, on account of a defect in the chimney, to go imprudently upon the roof of the college building, he fell from it Sept. 23, 1817, and in consequence died the same evening, aged 28 years. In his last hours his numerous friends crowded around him, "watching with trembling anxiety the flight of his immortal soul to the kindred spirits of a better world." Under the extreme anguish of his dying moments, resigning the loveliness, which he had hoped would be shortly his own, and all the fair prospects of this world, he exclaimed: "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice! O Father, thy will be done! So seemeth it good in thy sight, O Lord." Professor Frederic Hall has described his frank and noble character and his many virtues, the tenderness of his heart and his energy of mind. Another writer speaks of his unwearied perseverance and unconquerable resolution, and says: "His march to eminence was steady, rapid, and sure. Whether he turned his attention to the abstruse and profound branches of mathematical science or to the stores of ancient classical learning, he solved every problem and overcame every obstacle with equal facility and triumph." Mr. Allen was at Andover one of "the group of stars," the friends of Carlos Wilcox, alluded to by him in the following lines. The others were Sylvester Larned, Alexander M. Fisher, Levi Parsons, Pliny Fisk, and Joseph R. Andrus; all recorded in this volume. These, with Mr. Allen and Mr. Wilcox, all young men, no longer shine on the earth; but, it is believed, they make a constellation of seven stars, like the Pleiades, resplendent in heaven. May there be in future many such groups in our theological schools.

"Ye were a group of stars collected here,
Some mildly glowing, others sparkling bright;
Here, rising in a region calm and clear,
Ye shone awhile with intermingled light;
Then, parting, each pursuing his own flight
O'er the wide hemisphere, ye singly shone;
But, ere ye climbed to half your promised height,
Ye sunk again with brightening glory round you thrown,
Each left a brilliant track, as each expired alone."

ALLEN, PAUL, a poet, was born at Providence, R. I., Feb. 15, 1775; his father, Paul Allen, being a representative in the legislature, and his mother the daughter of Gov. Cook. He was graduated at Brown university in 1796 and afterwards studied, but never practised, law. Devoted to literature, he removed to Philadelphia and was engaged as a writer in the Port-Folio and in the United States Gazette, and was also employed to prepare for the press the travels of Lewis and Clark. After this he was for some time one of the editors of the Federal Republican at Baltimore; but on quitting this employment he found himself in impaired health and extreme indigence, with a widowed mother dependent on him for support. In his mental disorder, he believed that he was to be waylaid and murdered. To the disgrace of our laws he was thrown into jail for a debt of 30 dollars. About this time he wrote for the Portico, a magazine, associated with Pierpont and Neal. His friends procured for him the establishment of the Journal of the Times, and afterwards of the Morning Chronicle, which was widely circulated. Having long and frequently advertised a history of the American Revolution, of which he had written nothing, it was now determined to publish it, an unequalled subscription having been obtained. The work appeared in two vols. in his name, but was written by Mr. John Neal and Mr. Watkins; Neal writing the first vol., beginning with the Declaration of Independence. His principal poem, called Noah, which has simplicity and feeling, was also submitted to Mr. Neal, and reduced to one-fifth of its original size. He died at Baltimore in Aug., 1826, aged 51 years. He published original poems, serious and entertaining, 1801. A long extract from Noah is in Specimens of American Poetry. — Spec. American Poetry, II. 185.

ALLEN, RICHARD, first bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal church, died at Philadelphia March 26, 1831, aged 71.

ALLEN, BENJAMIN, Rector of St. Paul's church, Philadelphia, died at sea in the brig Edward on his return from Europe Jan. 27, 1829. He had been the editor of the Christian Magazine, and was a disinterested, zealous servant of God.

ALLEN, JENNINGS, died in Fairfield district, S. C., Jan., 1835, aged 114; a soldier of the revolutionary army.

ALLEN, EPHRAIM, died in Salem, N. Y., in 1816; a graduate of Harvard in 1789, and respected as a physician. His wife was a daughter of Gen. Newhall.

ALLEN, HARRISON, missionary among the Choctaws, died at Eliot Aug. 19, 1831, aged 39. Born in Chilmark, he graduated at Bowdoin in 1824, at Andover seminary in 1828. He arrived at Eliot Jan., 1830.

ALLEN, BENJAMIN, LL. D., died at Hyde Park, N. Y., July 22, 1836, aged 65; once professor of mathematics at Union College, and long the eminent head of a classical school at Hyde Park.

ALLEN, MYRA, wife of D. O. Allen, missionary at Bombay, died suddenly, Feb. 5, 1831, aged 30. She was the daughter of Col. Abel Wood of Westminister, Mass.; a devoted and useful missionary for the short period of three years. Her character is described in the Miss. Herald for 1831 and 1832.

ALLEN, ORPAH, missionary, wife of D. O. Allen, died at Bombay June 5, 1842. Her name was Graves, of Rupert, Vt. She went to Bombay in 1834 and was married in 1838.

ALLEN, AZUBA, wife of D. O. Allen, missionary at Bombay, died June 11, 1843. Her name was Condit. She left New York with her sister, Mrs. Nevins, in 1836, and lived some time in Batavia and Borneo before her marriage in Dec., 1842. She died in peace and triumph.

ALLEN, SARAH JOHNSON, wife of William Allen, died at Northampton Feb. 25, 1848, aged 57; a daughter of John M. Breed, a merchant of Norwich, Conn. — While unmarried, she and Sarah L. Huntington, afterwards married to Dr. Eli Smith, established and conducted a Sabbath school among the Mohegan Indians near Norwich. In the result a church was built at their residence in Montville, at which Gen. William Williams was accustomed, last year, to visit them every Sabbath as their teacher.

ALLEN, JOSEPH, died at Worcester Sept. 2, 1827, aged 78. Born in Boston, his mother was a sister of Samuel Adams. He was a merchant in Leicester, a benefactor and treasurer of the academy. In 1776 he removed to Worcester, and sustained various public offices, — was clerk of the courts, a councillor, a member of congress, twice one of the electors of president. His sons were Charles and George Allen.

ALLEN, HEMAN, died in Burlington, Vt., Dec. 11, 1844, a brother of Ethan A., and a member of congress. He was also minister to Chili.

ALLEN, JONATHAN, died at Pittsfield, May 26, 1845, aged 72. He was the son of Rev. T. Allen, and had been a senator of Massachusetts. He greatly promoted the interests of agriculture by introducing into Berkshire an excellent flock of Spanish merino sheep, for which sole object he crossed the ocean.

ALLEN, SAMUEL C., died at Northfield Feb. 8, 1845. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1794, he was the minister of N. in 1795; but withdrew from the pulpit and studied law. For twelve years he was a member of congress. He published an oration July 4, 1806; eulogy on President John Wheelock, delivered at Hanover Aug. 17, 1817.

ALLERTON, ISAAC, one of the first settlers of Plymouth, came over in the first ship, the Mayflower. His name appears the fifth in the agreement of the company, signed at Cape Cod, Nov. 11, 1620. There were six persons in his family. Mary, his wife, died Feb. 25, 1621. His daughter, Mary, married Elder T. Cushman, son of Robert C., and died in 1699, aged about 90, the last survivor of those, who came over in the Mayflower. — Sarah married Moses Maverick of Marblehead. In the summer or autumn of 1626 he went to England as agent for the colony; and he returned in the spring of 1627, having conditionally purchased for his associates the rights of the adventurers for 1800 pounds, the agreement being signed Nov. 15, 1626, and also hired for them 200 pounds, at 30 per cent. interest, and expended it in goods. He took a second voyage as agent in 1627 and concluded the bargain with the company at London Nov. 6, accomplishing also other objects, particularly obtaining a patent for a trading place in the Kennebec. Judge Davis erroneously represents, that Mr. Prince dates the departure of Mr. Allerton in the autumn; but Mr. Prince speaks only of his going "with the return of the ships," probably June or July. The voyage of the preceding year he regards as made "in the fall;" also the third voyage in 1628, for the purpose of enlarging the Kennebec patent. After his return in August, 1629, he proceeded again to England and with great difficulty obtained the patent Jan. 29, 1630. A fifth voyage was made in 1630, and he returned the following year in the ship White Angel. He was an enterprising trader at Penobscot and elsewhere. In 1633 he was engaged in "a trading wigwam," which was lost at Machias. A bark of his was lost on Cape Ann in 1635, and twenty-one persons perished, among whom were John Avery, a minister, his wife, and six children. The rock is called "Avery's fall." From 1643 to 1659 he lived at New Haven, and probably traded with the Dutch at New York. In 1653 he received mackerel from Boston to sell for half profits, and is called J. Allerton, senior. — Point Alderton in Boston harbor is supposed to be named before him. — His second wife, whom he married before 1627, and who died of "the pestilent fever" in 1634, was Fear Brewster, daughter of Elder Brewster, who had another daughter, Love, and a son, Wrestling. It seems, that he was married again; for coming from New Haven in 1644, he was cast away with his wife Johanna at Scituate, but was saved. He died in 1659; his widow in 1684. His son Isaac was graduated in 1650: — Elizabeth, his daughter, married B. Starr and S. Eyre. Davis' Morton, 38, 221, 389, 391; *Mass. His. ALLISON, FRANCIS, D. D., assistant minister of the first Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, was born in Ireland in 1705. After an early classical education at an academy he completed his studies at the university of Glasgow. He came to this country in 1735, and was soon appointed pastor of a Presbyterian church at New London in Chester county, Penn. Here, about the year 1741, his solicitude for the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom and his desire of engaging young men in the work of the ministry and of promoting public happiness by the diffusion of religious liberty and learning induced him to open a public school. There was at this time scarcely a particle of learning in the middle States, and he generally instructed all, that came to him, without fee or reward. — About the year 1747 he was invited to take the charge of an academy in Philadelphia; in 1755 he was elected vice provost of the college, which had just been established, and professor of moral philosophy. He was also minister in the first Presbyterian church. In the discharge of the laborious duties, which devolved upon him, he continued till his death Nov. 28, 1777, aged 72.

Besides an unusually accurate and profound acquaintance with the Latin and Greek classics, he was well informed in moral philosophy, history, and general literature. To his zeal for the diffusion of knowledge Pennsylvania owes much of that taste for solid learning and classical literature, for which many of her principal characters have been so distinguished. The private virtues of Dr. Allison conciliated the esteem of all that knew him, and his public usefulness has erected a lasting monument to his praise. For more than forty years he supported the ministerial character with dignity and reputation. In his public services he was plain, practical, and argumentative; warm, animated, and pathetic. He was greatly honored by the gracious Redeemer in being made instrumental, as it is believed, in the salvation of many, who heard him. He was frank and ingenuous in his natural temper; warm and zealous in his friendships; catholic in his sentiments; a friend to civil and religious liberty. His benevolence led him to spare no pains nor trouble in assisting the poor and distressed by his advice and influence, or by his own private liberality. It was he, who planned and was the means of establishing the widows' fund, which was remarkably useful. He often expressed his hopes in the mercy of God unto eternal life, and but a few days before his death said to Dr. Ewing, that he had no doubt, but that according to the gospel covenant he should obtain the pardon of his sins through the great Redeemer of mankind, and enjoy an eternity of rest and glory in the presence of God. — He published a sermon delivered before the synods of New York and Pennsylvania May 24, 1758, entitled, peace and unity recommended. — Assembly's Miss. Mag. I. 457—361; Miller's Retrospect, II. 342; Holmes' Life of Stiles, 98, 99.

ALLISON, PATRICK, D. D., first minister of the Presbyterian church in Baltimore, was born in Lancaster county in 1740, educated at the college of Philadelphia, and installed in 1762 at Baltimore, where he remained in eminent usefulness till his death Aug. 21, 1802, aged 61. His few publications were in favor of civil and religious liberty.

ALLSTON, JOSEPH, general, was elected governor of South Carolina in 1812. He died at Charleston Sept. 10, 1816, aged 38. His wife, the daughter of Col. Aaron Burr, was lost at sea on her passage from Charleston to New York in 1812.

ALLSTON, WILLIAM, colonel, senator in the first congress, died at Charleston June 26, 1839, aged 82. One of the largest owners of his fellow men in the State, his slaves cultivated his paternal estate near Georgetown. He was an officer under Marion; and the father of Gov. A.

ALLSTON, WASHINGTON, a very distinguished painter, died at Cambridge July 9, 1843, aged 63. He was born of a respected family in Charleston, S. C., Nov. 5, 1779. After being in the school of R. Rogers, Newport, he graduated at Harvard in 1800. He was early fond of music, painting, and poetry. In order to cultivate his taste for painting he sold his patrimonial estate, and entered in 1801 the Royal Academy in London, of which Benjamin West, an American, was the president. In 1804 he passed over to Paris and thence to Italy. Thus he was eight years in Europe, studying the works of the great masters, and enjoying the friendship of poets and painters in England and Italy. Among his friends were the poets Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge; and among the painters Reynolds, West, and Fuseli.

In 1809 he returned to America, and the next year delivered a poem at Cambridge at the annual meeting of the Phi Beta Kappa society, when the writer of this had the honor of being his literary associate, and of delivering the prose address on that occasion; and after the lapse of forty-six years I remember well his ample locks, and fine, interesting, animated, spiritual countenance. At this period he married the sister of Dr. Channing. The years from 1811 to 1818 he also spent in England, where he published in 1813 the sylphs of the seasons and other poems. God afflicted him by bereaving him of his wife; but led him to seek earnestly the permanent consolations of religion. His faith was strong in the incarnation of the Son of God; and he had recourse to the sacraments of the church.

On his return in 1818 he made Boston his home; but soon built him a house and studio in Cambridge, where he married a daughter of Judge Dana in 1830. His principal works as a painter were, "the dead man restored to life by Elijah," "the angel liberating Peter from prison," "Jacob's dream," "Elijah in the desert," "the angel Uriel in the sun," "Saul and the witch of Endor," "Spalatro's vision of the bloody hand," "Gabriel setting the guard of the heavenly host," "Anna Page and Slender," "Beatrice," and "Belshazzar's Feast,"—his last work. He died suddenly. He possessed a powerful and brilliant imagination; and as a colorist he was called the American Titian. His brother, William Moore A., died at Newport in 1844, aged 62. Receiving by the will of his father a young slave, named Diana, he emancipated her, and she became the mother of freemen in Charleston. His faith in the atonement and his Christian character were commended in a sermon by Mr. Albro of Cambridge. Besides his poems, he also published Monaldi, a prose tale; lectures on art and poems, with a preface by Mr. Dana, N. Y., 1850.

ALLYN, MATTHEW, judge, died at Windsor, Conn., in 1758, aged 97. He was a colonel, a councillor, a judge of the supreme court.

ALLYN, JOHN, D. D., the minister of Duxbury, died July 19, 1833, aged 66. He was born in Barnstable, and was a graduate of 1785; ordained in 1788. Benj. Kent was his colleague in 1826. A memoir by C. Francis, his son-in-law, is in Hist. Coll. III., vol. 5.

He published a sermon at the ordination of A. Bradford, 1793; at thanksgiving, 1798; at Hanover, 1799; at Plymouth, 1801; at election, 1805; at New Year's, 1806; Christian Monitor, 1806, being prayers, &c.; at Sandwich, 1808; also two charges, and obituary notices of Drs. West and Barnes.

ALSOP, GEORGE, published "a character of the province of Maryland," describing the laws, customs, commodities, usage of slaves, &c.; also "a small treatise of the wild and native Indians, &c." London, 1666, pp. 118.

ALSOP, RICHARD, a poet, the son of Richard A. and Mary Wright, was born in Middletown, Conn., in 1759, and was a merchant, as was his father. He died at Flatbush, L. I., Aug. 20, 1815, aged 56 years, with a character of correct morality. Several of his poetical compositions are preserved in the volume entitled "American Poetry." In 1800 he published a monody, in heroic verse, on the death of Washington, and in 1808 a translation from the Italian of a part of Berni's Orlando Inamorato, under the title of the Fairy of the Enchanted Lake. He published also several prose translations from the French and Italian, among which is Molini's history of Chili, with notes, 4 vols. 8 vo., 1808. This was republished in London without acknowledgment of its being an American translation. In 1815 he published the narrative of the captivity of J. R. Jewitt at Nootka Sound. The Universal Receipt Book was compiled also by him. Among numerous unpublished works, left by him, is the poem called The Charms of Fancy. He wrote for amusement, and made but little effort for literary distinction; yet his powers were above the common level. With a luxuriant fancy he had a facility of expression. In 1791 the Echo was commenced at Hartford, being a series of burlesque, poetic pieces, designed at first to ridicule the inflated style of Boston editors. The plan was soon extended, so as to include politics. The writers were Alsop, Theodore Dwight, Hopkins, Trumbull, and others, called the "Hartford wits." This was republished with other poems in 1807. Alsop wrote more of the Echo than any other contributor; also the Political Greenhouse in the same volume. His mother, who had been a widow about fifty years, died in Oct., 1829, aged 90. Mr. A.'s widow married Samuel W. Dana, a member of Congress; one sister married Theodore Dwight, and another married Mr. Riley of New York. — Spec. Amer. Poet. II.

AMERICUS VESPUCCIUS, or more properly Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine gentleman, from whom America derives its name, was born March 9, 1451, of an ancient family. His father, who was an Italian merchant, brought him up in this business, and his profession led him to visit Spain and other countries. Being eminently skilful in all the sciences subservient to navigation, and possessing an enterprising spirit, he became desirous of seeing the new world, which Columbus had discovered in 1492. He accordingly entered as a merchant on board the small fleet of four ships, equipped by the merchants of Seville and sent out under the command of Ojeda. The enterprise was sanctioned by a royal license.

According to Amerigo's own account he sailed from Cadiz May 20, 1497, and returned to the same port October 15, 1498, having discovered the coast of Paria and passed as far as the Gulf of Mexico. If this statement is correct, he saw the continent before Columbus; but its correctness has been disproved; and the voyage of Ojeda was not made until 1499, which Amerigo calls his second voyage, falsely representing that he himself had the command of six vessels. He sailed May 20, 1499, under the command of Ojeda, and proceeded to the Antilla Islands, and thence to the coast of Guiana and Venezuela, and returned to Cadiz in Nov., 1500. After his return Emanuel, king of Portugal, who was jealous of the success and glory of Spain, invited him to his kingdom, and gave him the command of three ships to make a third voyage of discovery. He sailed from Lisbon May 10, 1501, and ran down the coasts of Africa as far as Sierra Leone and the coast of Angola, and then passed over to Brazil in South America, and continued his discoveries to the south as far as Patagonia. He then returned to Sierra Leone and the coast of Guinea, and entered again the port of Lisbon Sept. 7, 1502.

King Emanuel, highly gratified by his success, equipped for him six ships, with which he sailed on his fourth and last voyage May 10, 1503. It was his object to discover a western passage to the Molucca Islands. He passed the coasts of Africa, and entered the Bay of All Saints in Brazil. Having provision for only twenty months, and being detained on the coast of Brazil by bad weather and contrary winds five months, he formed the resolution of returning to Portugal, where he arrived June 14, 1504. As he carried home with him considerable quantities of the Brazil wood, and other articles of value, he was received with joy. It was soon after this period, that he wrote an account of his four voyages. The work was dedicated to Rene II., duke of Lorraine, who took the title of king of Sicily, and who died Dec. 10, 1508. It was probably published about the year 1507, for in that year he went from Lisbon to Seville, and King Ferdinand appointed him to draw sea charts, with the title of chief pilot. He died at the island of Tercera in 1514, aged about 63 years, or, agreeably to another account, at Seville, in 1512.

As he published the first book and chart describing the new world, and as he claimed the honor of first discovering the continent, the new world has received from him the name of America. His pretensions, however, to this first discovery do not seem to be well supported against the claims of Columbus, to whom the honor is uniformly ascribed by the Spanish historians, and who first saw the continent in 1498. Herrera, who compiled his general history of America from the most authentic records, says, that Amerigo never made but two voyages, and those were with Ojeda in 1499 and 1501, and that his relation of his other voyages was proved to be a mere imposition. This charge needs to be confirmed by strong proof, for Amerigo's book was published within ten years of the period assigned for his first voyage, when the facts must have been fresh in the memories of thousands. Besides the improbability of his being guilty of falsifying dates, as he was accused, which arises from this circumstance, it is very possible, that the Spanish writers might have felt a national resentment against him for having deserted the service of Spain. But the evidence against the honesty of Amerigo is very convincing. Neither Martyr nor Benzoni, who were Italians, natives of the same country, and the former of whom was a contemporary, attribute to him the first discovery of the continent. Martyr published the first general history of the new world, and his epistles contain an account of all the remarkable events of his time. All the Spanish historians are against Amerigo. Herrera brings against him the testimony of Ojeda as given in a judicial inquiry. Fonseca, who gave Ojeda the license for his voyage, was not reinstated in the direction of Indian affairs until after the time, which Amerigo assigns for the commencement of his first voyage. Other circumstances might be mentioned; and the whole mass of evidence it is difficult to resist. The book of Amerigo was probably published about a year after the death of Columbus, when his pretensions could be advanced without the fear of refutation from that illustrious navigator. But however this controversy may be decided, it is well known, that the honor of first discovering the continent belongs neither to Columbus nor to Vespucci, even admitting the relation of the latter; but to the Cabots, who sailed from England. A life of Vespucci was published at Florence by Bandini, 1745, in which an attempt is made to support his pretensions.

The relation of his four voyages, which was first published about the year 1507, was republished in the Novus Orbis, fol. 1555. His letters were published after his death at Florence. — Moreri, Dict. Historique; New and Gen. Biog. Dict.; Robertson's S. America I. AMES, NATHANIEL, a physician, died at Dedham, Mass., in 1765, aged 57. He had published for about forty years an almanac, which was in high repute. His taste for astronomy he acquired from his father, Nathaniel Ames, of Bridgewater, who died in 1736, and who was not, as Dr. Eliot supposed, a descendant of the famous William Ames. He married two wives, each of the name of Fisher. His most distinguished son bore that name. His son, Dr. Nathaniel Ames, a graduate of 1761, died at Dedham in 1822, aged 82; another son, Dr. Seth Ames, a graduate of 1764, settled at Amherst, N. H., but removed to Dedham, where he died in 1776. His widow, who married Mr. Woodward, died in 1818, aged 95. Mass. Hist. Coll. N. S. VII. 154; Hist. Coll. N. H. II. 79.

AMES, FISHER, LL. D., a distinguished statesman and eloquent orator, was the son of the preceding, and was born at Dedham April 9, 1758. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1774, and after a few years commenced the study of the law in Boston. He began the practice of his profession in his native village; but his expansive mind could not be confined to the investigation of the law. Rising into life about the period of the American Revolution, and taking a most affectionate interest in the concerns of his country, he felt himself strongly attracted to politics. His researches into the sciences of government were extensive and profound, and he began to be known by political discussions, published in the newspapers. A theatre soon presented for the display of his extraordinary talents. He was elected a member of the convention of his native state, which considered and ratified the federal constitution; and his speeches in this convention were indications of his future eminence. The splendor of his talents burst forth at once upon his country.

When the general government of the United States commenced its operations in 1789, he appeared in the national legislature as the first representative of his district, and for eight successive years he took a distinguished part in the national councils. He was a principal speaker in the debates on every important question. Towards the close of this period his health began to fail, but his indisposition could not prevent him from engaging in the discussion relating to the appropriations necessary for carrying into effect the British treaty. Such was the effect of his speech of April 28, 1796, that one of the members of the legislature, who was opposed to Mr. Ames, rose and objected to taking a vote at that time, as they had been carried away by the impulse of oratory. After his return to his family, frail in health and fond of retirement, he remained a private citizen. For a few years however he was persuaded to become a member of the council. But, though he continued chiefly in retirement, he operated far around him by his writings in the public papers. A few years before his death he was chosen president of Harvard college, but the infirm state of his health induced him to decline the appointment. He died on the morning of July 4, 1808. His wife, Frances Worthington, was the daughter of John Worthington, of Springfield. He left seven children; his only daughter died in 1829.

Mr. Ames possessed a mind of a great and extraordinary character. He reasoned, but he did not reason in the form of logic. By striking allusions, more than by regular deductions, he compelled assent. The richness of his fancy, the fertility of his invention, and the abundance of his thoughts were as remarkable as the justness and strength of his understanding. His political character may be known from his writings, and speeches, and measures. He was not only a man of distinguished talents, whose public career was splendid, but he was amiable in private life and endeared to his acquaintance. To a few friends he unveiled himself without reserve. They found him modest and unassuming, untainted with ambition, simple in manners, correct in morals, and a model of every social and personal virtue. The charms of his conversation were unequalled.

He entertained a firm belief in Christianity, and his belief was founded upon a thorough investigation of the subject. He read most of the best writings in defence of the Christian religion, but he was satisfied by a view rather of its internal than its external evidences. He thought it impossible, that any man of a fair mind could read the Old Testament and meditate on its contents without a conviction of its truth and inspiration. The sublime and correct ideas, which the Jewish scriptures convey of God, connected with the fact that all other nations, many of whom were superior to the Jews in civilization and general improvement, remained in darkness and error on this great subject, formed in his view a conclusive argument. After reading the book of Deuteronomy he expressed his astonishment, that any man versed in antiquities could have the hardihood to say, that it was the production of human ingenuity. Marks of Divinity, he said, were stamped upon it. His views of the doctrines of religion were generally Calvinistic. An enemy to the metaphysical and controversial theology, he disliked the use of technical and sectarian phrases. The term trinity however he frequently used with reverence, and in a manner, which implied his belief of the doctrine. His persuasion of the divinity of Christ he often declared, and his belief of this truth seems to have resulted from a particular investigation of the subject, for he remarked to a friend, that he once read the evangelists with the sole purpose of learning what Christ had said of himself.

He was an admirer of the common translation of the Bible. He said it was a specimen of pure English; and though he acknowledged, that a few phrases had grown obsolete, and that a few passages might be obscurely translated, yet he should consider the adoption of any new translation as an incalculable evil. He lamented the prevailing disuse of the Bible in our schools. He thought, that children should early be made acquainted with the important truths, which it contains, and he considered it as a principal instrument of making them acquainted with their own language in its purity. He said, "I will hazard the assertion, that no man ever did or ever will become truly eloquent, without being a constant reader of the Bible, and an admirer of the purity and sublimity of its language." He recommended the teaching of the Assembly's Catechism; not perhaps because he was perfectly satisfied with every expression, but because, as he remarked, it was a good thing on the whole, because it had become venerable by age, because our pious ancestors taught it to their children with happy effect, and because he was opposed to innovation, unwilling to leave an old, experienced path for one new and uncertain. On the same ground he approved the use of Watts' version of the Psalms and Hymns. No uninspired man, in his judgment, had succeeded so well as Watts in uniting with the sentiments of piety the embellishments of poetry.

Mr. Ames made a public profession of religion in the first congregational church in Dedham. With this church he regularly communed, till precluded by indisposition from attending public worship. His practice corresponded with his profession. His life was regular and irreproachable. Few, who have been placed in similar circumstances, have been less contaminated by intercourse with the world. It is doubted, whether any one ever heard him utter an expression calculated to excite an impious or impure idea. The most scrutinizing eye discovered in him no disguise or hypocrisy. His views of himself however were humble and abased. He was often observed to shed tears, while speaking of his closet devotions and experiences. He lamented the coldness of his heart and the wanderings of his thoughts while addressing his Maker, or meditating on the precious truths, which he had revealed. In his last sickness, when near his end, and when he had just expressed his belief of his approaching dissolution, he exhibited submission to the Divine will and the hope of the Divine favor. "I have peace of mind," said he. "It may arise from stupidity; but I think it is founded on a belief of the Gospel." At the same time he disclaimed every idea of meriting salvation. "My hope," said he, "is in the mercy of God, through Jesus Christ."

Mr. Ames' speech in relation to the British treaty, which was delivered April 28, 1796, is a fine specimen of eloquence. He published an oration on the death of Washington in 1800, and he wrote much for the newspapers. His political writings were published in 1809, in one volume, 8vo., with a notice of his life and character by President Kirkland. — Panoplist, July, 1800; Dexter's Funeral Eulogy; Marshall's Washington, v. 203; Ames' Works.

AMES, NATHANIEL, son of Fisher Ames, died Jan. 18, 1835; author of mariner's sketches; nautical reminiscences; and old sailors' yarns.

AMES, N. P., died at Cabotville April 23, 1847, aged 44; a large manufacturer of firearms, and a man of sound judgment and practical skill.

AMHERST, JEFFREY, lord, commander-in-chief of the British army at the conquest of Canada in 1760, was born in Kent, England, Jan. 29, 1717. Having early discovered a predilection for the military life, he received his first commission in the army in 1731, and was aid-de-camp to Gen. Ligonier in 1741, in which character he was present at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux. He was afterward aid-de-camp to his royal highness, the duke of Cumberland, at the battle of Laffeldt. In 1758 he received orders to return to England, being appointed for the American service. He sailed from Portsmouth March 16th as major-general, having the command of the troops destined for the siege of Louisbourg. On the 26th of July following he captured that place, and without farther difficulty took entire possession of the island of Cape Breton. After this event he succeeded Abercrombie in the command of the army in North America. In 1759 the vast design of the entire conquest of Canada was formed. Three armies were to attack at nearly the same time all the strongholds of the French in that country. They were commanded by Wolfe, Amherst, and Prideaux. Gen. Amherst in the spring transferred his head-quarters from New York to Albany; but it was not till the 22d of July, that he reached Ticonderoga, against which place he was to act. On the 27th this place fell into his hands, the enemy having deserted it. He next took Crown Point, and put his troops in winter quarters about the last of October. In the year 1760 he advanced against Canada, embarking on lake Ontario and proceeding down the St. Lawrence. On the 8th of September M. de Vaudreuil capitulated, surrendering Montreal and all other places within the government of Canada.

He continued in the command in America till the latter end of 1763, when he returned to England. The author of the letters of Junius was his friend, and in Sept., 1768, wrote in his favor. In 1771 he was made governor of Guernsey, and in 1776 he was created Baron Amherst of Holmesdale in the county of Kent. In 1778 he commanded the army in England. At this period Lord Sackville, to whom the letters of Junius have been ascribed, was one of the king's ministers; and he had been intimate with Amherst from early life. In 1782 he received the gold stick from the king; but on the change of the administration the command of the army and the lieutenant-generalship of the ordnance were put into other hands. In 1787 he received another patent of peerage, as Baron Amherst of Montreal. In January, 1793, he was again appointed to the command of the army in Great Britain; but in 1795 this veteran and very deserving officer was superseded by his royal highness, the Duke of York, the second son of the king, who was only in the thirty-first year of his age, and had never seen any actual service. The government upon this occasion, with a view to soothe the feelings of the old general, offered him an earldom and the rank of field marshal, both of which he at that time rejected. The office of field marshal however he accepted in July, 1796. He died without children at his seat in Kent August 3, 1797, aged eighty years. — Watkins; Holmes' Annals, II. 226-246, 498; Marshall, I. 442-470; Minot, II. 36.

AMY, a slave, died at Charleston in 1826, said to be aged 140, and that she came to C. when there were but six small buildings there.

ANDERSON, RUFUS, minister of Wenham, Mass., was born in Londonderry March 5, 1765, and graduated at Dartmouth college in 1791. In consequence of a religious education his mind was early imbued with the truths of the gospel. He was ordained pastor of the second church in North Yarmouth Oct. 22, 1794. After a ministry of ten years he was dismissed, and installed July 10, 1805, at Wenham, where he died Feb., 1814. Dr. Worcester has described his excellent character, and spoken of his useful labors and peaceful death. He published two discourses on the fast, 1802; and seven letters against the close communion of the Baptists, 1805. — Worcester's Funeral Sermon; Panoplist, x. 307.

ANDERSON, JAMES, the first Presbyterian minister in the city of New York, began his labors in Oct., 1717. He was born in Scotland in 1678; came to Philadelphia in 1710, and became the pastor of Newcastle. His high notions of church authority occasioned a division of his church in N. Y. To the seceders Jonathan Edwards was the preacher for some months. Mr. A. accepted in 1727 a call to Donegal, in Penn., and was succeeded in N. Y. by Mr. Pemberton.

ANDERSON, JAMES, M. D., an eminent physician of Maryland, died at his seat near Chestertown Dec. 8, 1820, in the 69th year of his age. He studied at Philadelphia and at Edinburgh. His father was a physician from Scotland. Dr. Anderson was learned and skilful, and highly respected in all the relations of life. As a Christian he was distinguished, — in his peculiar views being a disciple of Wesley. With exemplary patience and meekness he submitted to painful illness, and died in peace. — Thacher's Med. Biography.

ANDERSON, RICHARD, minister of the United States to Colombia, was a native of Kentucky, and for some years a member of Congress. Being appointed envoy extraordinary to the assembly of American nations at Panama, while on his way to that place he died at Carthagena July 24, 1826. On his former visit to Colombia he lost his excellent wife. His father, Richard C. Anderson, died Nov. 6. — Mr. Anderson was a very amiable man, of a discriminating mind, and very discreet and conciliatory as a politician.

ANDERSON, JOHN WALLACE, M. D., physician to the colony in Liberia, was the son of Col. Richard Anderson, and born in Hagerstown, Maryland, in 1802. His medical education was at Philadelphia, where he took his degree in 1828, and afterwards settled as a physician at Hagerstown. Here, at his home, amidst all the happiness of the family circle and of religious institutions, he formed the purpose of devoting his life to the colonists of Liberia. He hoped to benefit them by his medical skill, and was particularly anxious to promote the cause of temperance in Africa. He sailed Jan. 17, 1830, and arrived at the colony Feb. 17. Dr. Mechlin, the agent, now returning, the affairs of the colony were committed to Dr. Anderson; but he died of the African fever April 12, aged 27 years. In his illness he was resigned and joyful in the hope of salvation. He requested, that the following sentence might be inscribed on his tombstone: — "Jesus, for thee I live, for thee I die!" — Afric. Repos. vi. 189—191.

ANDRE, JOHN, aid-de-camp to Sir Henry Clinton, and adjutant-general of the British army in the Revolutionary war, was born in England in 1749. His father was a native of Geneva, and a considerable merchant in the Levant trade; he died in 1769. Young Andre was destined to mercantile business, and attended his father's counting-house, after having spent some years for his education at Geneva. He first entered the army in Jan., 1771. At this time he had a strong attachment to Honoria Sneyd, who afterwards married Mr. Edgeworth. In 1772 he visited the courts of Germany, and returned to England in 1773. He landed at Philadelphia in Sept., 1774, as lieutenant of the Royal English Fusileers; and soon proceeded, by way of Boston, to Canada, to join his regiment. In 1775 he was taken prisoner by Montgomery at St. John's; but was afterwards exchanged, and appointed captain. In the summer of 1777 he was appointed aid to Gen. Grey and was present at the engagements in New Jersey and Pennsylvania in 1777 and 1778. On the return of Gen. Grey, he was appointed aid to Gen. Clinton. In 1780 he was promoted to the rank of major, and made adjutant-general of the British army.

After Arnold had intimated to the British in 1780 his intention of delivering up West Point to them, Maj. Andre was selected as the person, to whom the maturing of Arnold's treason and the arrangements for its execution should be committed. A correspondence was for some time carried on between them under a mercantile disguise and the feigned names of Gustavus and Anderson; and at length to facilitate their communications the Vulture sloop-of-war moved up the North river and took a station convenient for the purpose, but not so near as to excite suspicion. An interview was agreed on, and in the night of September 21, 1780, he was taken in a boat, which was dispatched for the purpose, and carried to the beach, without the posts of both armies, under a pass for John Anderson. He met Gen. Arnold at the house of a Mr. Smith. While the conference was yet unfinished, daylight approached; and to avoid the danger of discovery it was proposed, that he should remain concealed till the succeeding night. He is understood to have refused to be carried within the American posts, but the promise made him by Arnold to respect this objection was not observed. He was carried within them contrary to his wishes and against his knowledge. He continued with Arnold the succeeding day, and when on the following night he proposed to return to the Vulture, the boatman refused to carry him, because she had during the day shifted her station, in consequence of a gun having been moved to the shore and brought to bear upon her. This embarrassing circumstance reduced him to the necessity of endeavoring to reach New York by land. Yielding with reluctance to the urgent representations of Arnold, he laid aside his regimentals, which he had hitherto worn under a surtout, and put on a plain suit of clothes; and receiving a pass from the American general, authorizing him, under the feigned name of John Anderson, to proceed on the public service to the White Plains, or lower if he thought proper, he set out on his return in the evening of the 22d, accompanied by Joshua Smith, and passed the night at Crompond. The next morning he crossed the Hudson to King's ferry on the east side. A little beyond the Croton, Smith, deeming him safe, bid him adieu. He had passed all the guards and posts on the road without suspicion, and was proceeding to New York in perfect security, when, September 23d, one of the three militia-men, who were employed with others in scouting parties between the lines of the two armies, springing suddenly from his covert into the road, seized the reins of his bridle and stopped his horse. Instead of producing his pass, Andre, with a want of self-possession, which can be attributed only to a kind Providence, asked the man hastily where he belonged, and being answered, "to below," replied immediately, "and so do I." He then declared himself to be a British officer, on urgent business, and begged that he might not be detained. The other two militia men coming up at this moment, he discovered his mistake; but it was too late to repair it. He offered them his purse and a valuable watch, to which he added the most tempting promises of ample reward and permanent provision from the government, if they would permit him to escape; but his offers were rejected without hesitation.

The militia-men, whose names were John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Wart, proceeded to search him. They found concealed in his boots exact returns, in Arnold's handwriting, of the state of the forces, ordnance, and defences at West Point and its dependencies, critical remarks on the works, and an estimate of the men ordinarily employed in them, with other interesting papers. Andre was carried before Lieut.-Col. Jameson, the officer commanding the scouting parties on the lines, and regardless of himself and only anxious for the safety of Arnold, he still maintained the character, which he had assumed, and requested Jameson to inform his commanding officer, that Anderson was taken. A letter was accordingly sent to Arnold, and the traitor, thus becoming acquainted with his danger, escaped. The narrative of the bearer of this letter, Solomon Allen, is given in the sketch of his life: it differs in several respects from the account of the affair in the Encyclopædia Americana, and throws light upon circumstances, which have been heretofore obscure.

A board of general officers, of which Maj. Gen. Greene was president, and the two foreign generals, Lafayette and Steuben, were members, was called to report a precise state of the case of Andre, who had acknowledged himself Adjutant-General of the British army, and to determine in what character he was to be considered, and to what punishment he was liable. He received from the board every mark of indulgent attention; and from a sense of justice, as well as of delicacy, he was informed on the first opening of the examination, that he was at perfect liberty not to answer any interrogatory, which might embarrass his own feelings. But he disdained every evasion, and frankly acknowledged every thing, which was material to his condemnation. The board, which met Sept. 29th, did not examine a single witness, but, founding their report entirely upon his own confession, reported that he came within the description of a spy and ought to suffer death. The execution of this sentence was ordered on the day succeeding that on which it was rendered.

The greatest exertions were made by Sir Henry Clinton, to whom Andre was particularly dear, to rescue him from his fate. It was first represented, that he came on shore under the sanction of a flag; but Washington returned an answer to Clinton, in which he stated, that Andre had himself disclaimed the pretext. An interview was next proposed between Lieut.-Gen. Robertson and Gen. Greene; but no facts, which had not before been considered, were made known. When every other exertion failed, a letter from Arnold, filled with threats, was presented.

Andre was deeply affected by the mode of dying, which the laws of war had decreed to persons in his situation. He wished to die as a soldier, and not as a criminal. To obtain a mitigation of his sentence in this respect he addressed a letter to Gen. Washington, replete with all the feelings of a man of sentiment and honor. The commander-in-chief consulted his officers on the subject; but as Andre unquestionably came under the description of a spy, it was thought, that the public good required his punishment to be in the usual way. The decision, however, from tenderness to Andre, was not divulged. He encountered his fate, Oct. 2d, at Tappan, with a composure and fortitude, which excited the admiration and interested the feelings of all who were present. He exhibited some emotion, when he first beheld the preparations at the fatal spot, and inquired, "must I die in this manner?" He soon afterwards added, "it will be but a momentary pang;" and being asked, if he had any request to make before he left the world, he answered, "none but that you will witness to the world, that I die like a brave man." While one weeps at the ignominious death of a man so much esteemed and beloved, it would have given some relief to the pained mind, if he had died more like a Christian and less like a soldier. The sympathy, excited among the American officers by his fate, was as universal, as it is unusual on such occasions; and proclaims the merit of him, who suffered, and the humanity of those, who inflicted the punishment. In 1821 the bones of Andre were dug up and carried to his native land by royal mandate. Major Andre wrote the Cow Chase, in three cantos, 1781. This poem was originally published in Rivington's Royal Gazette, New York, in the morning of the day, on which Andre was taken prisoner. The last stanza, intended to ridicule Gen. Wayne for his failure in an attempt to collect cattle for the army, is this:

"And now I've closed my epic strain,
I tremble, as I show it,
Lest this same Warrior-Drover, Wayne,
Should ever catch the Poet!"

He wrote also letters to Miss Seward, New York, 1772. Miss Seward wrote a monody on Andre, in which she predicted, that Washington would die miserably for executing the spy. — Annual Register for 1781, 39–46; Marshall, iv. 277–286; Gordon, iii. 481–490; Stedman, ii. 249–253; Ramsay, ii. 196–201; Political Mag. ii. 171; Amer. Rememb. 1781, i., p. 101; Smith's Narrative; Thacker's Military Journal.

ANDREW, SAMUEL, the second rector of Yale college, was the son of Samuel Andrew, of Cambridge, Mass., born 1656, graduated 1675, and ordained the minister of Milford, Conn., Nov. 18, 1685. Being appointed, after the death of Mr. Pierson, temporary rector of the college in 1707, he officiated till 1719, occasionally repairing to the college at Saybrook and New Haven, but residing at Milford. He died Jan. 24, 1738, aged 82, leaving an excellent reputation. His predecessors in the ministry were Prudden and Newton; Whittlesey succeeded him.

ANDREWS, ROBERT, professor of mathematics in William and Mary college, Virginia, died in Jan., 1804, at Williamsburg. In 1779 he was a commissioner with Dr. Madison to settle the boundary line with Pennsylvania, — Bryan, Ewing, and Rittenhouse being the commissioners of Penn. The talents of Mr. Andrews were actively employed and regulated by reason and religion. His wife and children were taught by him those divine principles, which bear the afflicted above the evils of life.

ANDREWS, JOHN, D. D., provost of the university of Penn., was born in Cecil county, Md., April 4, 1746, and educated at Philadelphia. After receiving Episcopal ordination in London Feb., 1767, he was three years a missionary at Lewiston, Md., and then a missionary at Yorktown, and a rector in Queen Ann's county, Md. Not partaking of the patriotic spirit of the times, he was induced to quit Maryland for many years. In 1785 he was placed at the head of the Episcopal academy in Philadelphia, and in 1789 appointed professor of moral philosophy in the college. In 1810 he succeeded Dr. McDowell as provost. He died March 29, 1813, aged 67. As a scholar he was very distinguished. He published a sermon on the parable of the unjust steward, 1789; and elements of logic.

ANDREWS, LORING, a distinguished editor, died at Charleston Oct. 19, 1805. He was the brother of Rev. John Andrews, of Newburyport. He first published, in Boston, the Herald of Freedom; then, at Stockbridge, the Western Star; and in 1803 he established the Charleston Courier, a political paper of high reputation.

ANDREWS, JOHN, D. D., died in Newburyport in Aug., 1845, aged 81. A graduate of 1786, he was settled as a colleague with Mr. Cary in 1788. He published a thanksgiving sermon, 1795; at a dedication, 1801; on the death of T. Cary, 1808; before a humane society, 1812.

ANDREWS, PARNELLY, wife of Dr. S. L. Andrews, missionary at the Sandwich Islands, died at Kailua Sept. 29, 1846, aged 39. Her name was Pierce, of Woodbury, Conn. She embarked in 1836.

ANDREWS, JOANNA, Mrs., died at Gloucester Jan. 20, 1847, aged 102.

ANDREWS, EBENEZER T., an extensive printer, died in Boston Oct. 9, 1851, aged 84. He was of the firm of Thomas & Andrews.

ANDREWS, ASA, the survivor of all the preceding graduates of Harvard, died at Ipswich Jan. 13, 1856, aged 93. He was born in Boylston; his mother, whose name was Bradstreet, was a descendant of Gov. B. He graduated in 1783, and studied law with C. Strong, Northampton. From 1796 to 1829 he was collector of the port of Ipswich. He was a man of ability, highly respected.

ANDROS, EDMUND, governor of New England, had some command in New York in 1672, and in 1674 was appointed governor of that province. He continued in this office till 1682, exhibiting in this government but little of that tyrannical disposition, which he afterwards displayed. He arrived at Boston Dec. 20, 1686, with a commission from King James for the government of New England. He made high professions of regard to the public good, directed the judges to administer justice according to the custom of the place, ordered the established rules with respect to rates and taxes to be observed, and declared, that all the colony laws, not inconsistent with his commission, should remain in full force. By these professions he calmed the apprehensions, which had agitated the minds of many; but it was not long before the monster stood forth in his proper shape.

His administration was most oppressive and tyrannical. The press was restrained, exorbitant taxes were levied, and the Congregational ministers were threatened to be deprived of their support for nonconformity. Sir Edmund, knowing that his royal master was making great progress towards despotism in England, was very willing to keep equal pace in his less important government. It was pretended, that all titles to land were destroyed; and the farmers were obliged to take new patents, for which they paid large fees. He prohibited marriage, unless the parties entered into bonds with sureties to be forfeited in case there should afterwards appear to have been any lawful impediment. There was at this time but one Episcopal clergyman in the country; but Andros wrote to the bishop of London, intimating, for the encouragement of those who might be persuaded to come to this country, that in future no marriage should be deemed lawful, unless celebrated by ministers of the church of England. With four or five of his council he laid what taxes he thought proper. The fees of office were raised to a most exorbitant height. In Oct., 1687, he went with troops to Hartford, and demanded the surrender of the charter of Connecticut, which was placed in the evening upon the table of the Assembly, but instantly the lights were extinguished, and the charter disappeared, having been carried off by Capt. Wadsworth and secreted in a hollow oak, near the house of Samuel Wyllys.

In the spring of 1688 Andros proceeded in the Rose frigate to Penobscot and plundered the house and fort of Castine, and thus by his base rapacity excited an Indian war. In November he marched against the eastern Indians at the head of seven or eight hundred men; but not an Indian was seen. They had retired to the woods for hunting. He built two forts, one at Sheepscot, the other at Pegypscot Falls or Brunswick, and left garrisons in them. If the old name of Amarasoggin, on which river he built Pegypscot Fort, received at this time, in honor of him, the name of Androsoggin, he was not worthy of such remembrance. The ancient name is to be preferred.

At length the capricious and arbitrary proceedings of Andros roused the determined spirit of the people.

Having sought in the wilds of America the secure enjoyment of that civil and religious liberty, of which they had been unjustly deprived in England, they were not disposed to see their dearest rights wrested from them without a struggle to retain them. Animated with the love of liberty, they were also resolute and courageous in its defence. They had for several years suffered the impositions of a tyrannical administration, and the dissatisfaction and indignation, which had been gathering during this period, were blown into a flame by the report of an intended massacre by the governor's guards. On the morning of April 18, 1689, the inhabitants of Boston took up arms, the people poured in from the country, and the governor, with such of the council as had been most active, and other obnoxious persons, about fifty in number, were seized and confined. The old magistrates were restored, and the next month the joyful news of the Revolution in England reached this country, and quieted all apprehension of the consequences of what had been done. After having been kept at the castle till February following, Andros was sent to England for trial. The General Court about the same time despatched a committee of several gentlemen to substantiate the charges against him.

The government was reduced to a most perplexing dilemma. If they condemned Andros' administration, the sentence might be drawn into a precedent, and they might seem to encourage insurrection and rebellion in future periods, when circumstances did not render so desperate an expedient necessary. On the other hand, if they should approve of the administration of Andros and censure the proceedings of the colonists, it would imply a reprobation of the very measure, which had been pursued in bringing about the Revolution in England. It was therefore deemed prudent to dismiss the business without coming to a final decision. The people were accordingly left to the full enjoyment of their freedom; and Andros, in public estimation guilty, escaped without censure.

In 1692 he was appointed the governor of Virginia, in which office his conduct was for the most part prudent and unimpeached. He was succeeded by Nicholson in 1698. He died in London Feb. 24, 1714, at a very advanced age. His narrative of his proceedings in New England was published in 1691, and republished in 1773. — Hutchinson, Douglass, II. 247, 272, 369; Holmes, I. 421, 425; Belknap, I. 244; Eliot; Beverly.

ANDROS, THOMAS, minister of Berkley, was born in Norwich, Conn., May 1, 1759, the son of a merchant. His widowed mother removed to Plainfield, where her friends resided. At the age of sixteen he joined the army as a soldier at Cambridge in 1775. Afterwards he was in the battles of Long Island and White Plains, and served elsewhere. In 1781 he enlisted in a private armed vessel at New London; but, captured in a prize vessel, he was thrown into prison in the old Jersey prison-ship at New York, in which, it is said, eleven thousand died. In a few months he, by a remarkable Providence, escaped; and his lost health was restored. Having studied theology with Dr. Benedict of Plainfield, he was ordained at Berkley March 19, 1788, on a salary of 80 pounds. He was dismissed at his request June 15, 1834, having labored with his people forty-six years. His last sermon he preached October 5, 1845, walking two miles to church, and speaking with animation and force. He died of apoplexy Dec. 30, 1845, aged 86. His first wife was Abigail Cutter, of Killingly; his second, Sophia Sanford, of Berkley, in 1799. His son, R. S. S. Andros, wrote an account of him for Emery's Ministry of Taunton.

He published a sermon on the death of J. Crane, 1795; of Mrs. Andros, 1798; at thanksgiving, 1808 and 1812; on restraining prayer; Bible news, &c., against N. Worcester's book, 1813; on human creeds, 1814; at the ordination of B. Whittemore, 1815; against philosophical mixtures, 1819; an essay against a positive efficiency in the production of sin, 1820; six discourses; on the death of S. Tobey, 1823; a sermon vindicating the temperance society, 1830; a narrative of his imprisonment and escape from the Jersey prison-ship.

ANDRUS, JOSEPH R., agent of the colonization society, was graduated at Middlebury college in 1812, and after studying theology at New Haven and Andover, and also under Bishop Griswold at Bristol, R. I., received Episcopal ordination. It had been for years his purpose to devote himself to promote the welfare of the degraded and oppressed race of Africans. Being appointed the agent of the colonization society, he sailed early in 1821, and proceeded, with his associate, Ephraim Bacon, in April from Sierra Leone to the Bassa country to negotiate with King Ben for a place of settlement. It was well for the proposed colony, that the attempt was unsuccessful, for a more healthful and eligible territory was afterwards purchased by Dr. Ayres at Montserado. Mr. Andrus died at Sierra Leone, and was buried July 29, 1821. He was the friend of Carlos Wilcox, and by him honored in his lines, "The Group of Stars."—Panoplist, XVIII; 25, 400; Remains of Wilcox, 90.

ANGE, FRANCIS, a planter of Pennsylvania, died in 1767, aged 134 years. He remembered the death of Charles I.; at the age of 130 was in good health; and at the time of his death his memory was strong, his faculties perfect. He had lived on simple food. His residence was between Broad creek and the head of Wicomico river.—Mem. of Historical Society, Philad., I. 320.

ANGIER, SAMUEL, minister of Rehoboth, died in 1719, aged about 66. He was a graduate of 1673, in a class of four, of whom one was John Wise. He was ordained in May, 1679, and dismissed in 1693; after which he was the pastor of Watertown, yet living at Cambridge, where his house was burnt, with the records of Rehoboth. His mother was the daughter of the famous Wm. Ames: his wife was the only child of President Oakes, and he had by her fifteen children.

ANGLIN, HENRY, a soldier of the Revolutionary army in North Carolina, died at Athens in Georgia in 1853, aged 105.

ANTES, JOHN, a Moravian missionary, was born March 4, 1740, and sent from America to Herrnhut in Germany in 1764. In 1769 he proceeded to Cairo on a proposed mission to Abyssinia; but meeting Mr. Bruce, he was induced to abandon the undertaking. He returned to Germany in 1781; and in 1808 visited England, and died at Bristol Dec. 17, 1811. He published a reply to Lord Valencia, vindicating Bruce's veracity; observations on the manners of the Egyptians; and wrote a memoir of his own life.

ANTHONY, SUSANNA, an eminently pious woman of Rhode Island, was born in 1726, and died at Newport June 23, 1791, aged 64 years. Her parents were Quakers. Dr. Hopkins published the memoirs of her life, consisting chiefly of extracts from her writings, of which there was a second edition in 1810. She devoted herself chiefly to prayer.

APPLETON, NATHANIEL, D. D., minister of Cambridge, was born at Ipswich Dec. 9, 1693. His father was John Appleton, one of the king's council and for twenty years judge of probate in the county of Essex, and his mother was the eldest daughter of President Rogers. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1712. After completing his education, an opportunity presented of entering into commercial business on very advantageous terms with an uncle in Boston, who was an opulent merchant; but he resolved to forego every worldly advantage, that he might promote the interest of the Redeemer's kingdom. Soon after he began to preach, he was invited to succeed Mr. Brattle in the ministry at Cambridge, and was ordained Oct. 9, 1717. On this occasion Dr. Increase Mather preached the sermon and gave the charge, and Dr. Cotton Mather gave the right hand of fellowship. He was the same year elected a fellow of Harvard college, which office he sustained above sixty years, faithfully consulting and essentially promoting the interests of the institution. In 1771 the university conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity, an honor, which had been conferred upon but one person, Increase Mather, about eighty years before. Degrees have since become more frequent and less honorable. The usefulness of Dr. Appleton was diminished for a few of his last years through the infirmities of age, but did not entirely cease except with his life. He received Mr. Hilliard as his colleague in 1783. After a ministry of more than sixty-six years, he died Feb. 9, 1784, in the 91st year of his age. This country can furnish few instances of more useful talents, and more exemplary piety, exhibited for so long a time and with such great success. During his ministry two thousand one hundred and thirty-eight persons were baptized, and seven hundred and eighty-four admitted members of the church.

Dr. Appleton was as venerable for his piety as for his years. His whole character was patriarchal. In his dress, in his manners, in his conversation, in his ministry he resembled the Puritan ministers, who first settled New England. He lived from the close of one century to near the close of another, and he brought down with him the habits of former times. His natural temper was cheerful, but his habitual deportment was grave. Early consecrated to God, and having a fixed predilection for the ministry, by the union of good sense with deep seriousness, of enlightened zeal with consummate prudence, he was happily fitted for the pastoral office.

He preached with great plainness and with primitive simplicity. In order to accommodate his discourses to the meanest capacity, he frequently borrowed similitudes from familiar, sometimes from vulgar objects; but his application of them was so pertinent and his utterance so solemn, as to suppress levity and silence criticism. Deeply sensible of the fallen state of man, he admired the wisdom, holiness, and mercy, which are displayed in the plan of redemption through a glorious Saviour. From the abundance of his heart, filled with the love of God, he spake with such fervor, as was fitted to inspire his hearers with pious sentiments and affections.

He possessed the learning of his time. The scriptures he read in the originals. His exposition, preached in course on the Sabbath, comprehended the whole New Testament, the prophecy of Isaiah, and some of the other prophets. It was chiefly designed to promote practical piety; but on the prophetic parts he discovered a continued attention, extent of reading, and a depth of research, which come to the share of but very few. In his preaching he carefully availed himself of special occurrences, and his discourses on such occasions were peculiarly solemn and impressive. With the fidelity and plainness of a Christian minister he administered reproofs and admonitions, and maintained with parental tenderness and pastoral authority the discipline of the church. By his desire a committee was appointed, and continued for many years, for inspecting the manners of professing Christians. So great was the ascendancy, which he gained over his people by his discretion and moderation, by his condescension and benevolence, by his fidelity and piety, that they regarded his counsels as oracular.

In controversial and difficult cases he was often applied to for advice at ecclesiastical councils. Impartial yet pacific, firm yet conciliatory, he was peculiarly qualified for a counsellor, and in that character he materially contributed to the unity, the peace, and order of the churches. With the wisdom of the serpent he happily united the innocence of the dove. In his religious principles he was a Calvinist, as were all his predecessors in the ministry, Hooker, Stone, Shepard, Mitchel, Oakes, Gookin, and Brattle. But towards those of different principles he was candid and catholic.

His own example enforced the duties, which he enjoined upon others. He was humble, meek, and benevolent. He was ready at all times to relieve the distressed, and through life he devoted a tenth part of his whole income to pious and charitable uses. He was ever a firm friend to the civil and religious liberties of mankind, and was happy in living to see the establishment of peace and independence in his native land. He deserves honorable remembrance for his exertions to send the gospel to the Indians. Under his many heavy trials he was submissive and patient. When his infirmities had in a great measure terminated his usefulness, he expressed his desire to depart and be with Christ. He at length calmly resigned his spirit into the hands of its Redeemer. His son, Nathaniel, a merchant in Boston, who died in 1798, wrote, with James Swan and others, against the slave trade and slavery from 1766 to 1770.

His publications are the following: the wisdom of God in the redemption of man, 1728; a sermon at the artillery election, 1733; on evangelical repentance, 1741; discourses on Romans VIII. 14, 1743; funeral sermons on the death of President Leverett, 1724; of Francis Foxcroft, 1728; of President Wadsworth, 1737; of Hancock, 1752; of Spencer Phips, 1757; of Henry Flynt, 1760; of Dr. Wigglesworth, 1765; of President Holyoke, 1769; sermons at the ordination of Josiah Cotton, 1728; of John Sergeant, 1735; of John Sparhawk, 1736; of Matthew Bridge, 1746; of O. Peabody, Jr., 1750; of Stephen Badger, 1753; a sermon at the general election, 1742; at the convention, 1743; two discourses on a fast, 1748; on the difference between a legal and evangelical righteousness, 1749; Duddleian lecture, 1758; at the Boston lecture, 1763; against profane swearing, 1765; a thanksgiving sermon for the conquest of Canada, 1760; for the repeal of the stamp act, 1766; two discourses on a fast, 1770. — Holmes' History of Cambridge; Collections of Historical Society, VII. 37, 9-63; X. 158; American Herald, Feb. 23, 1784.

APPLETON, JESSE, D. D., the second president of Bowdoin college, was born at New Ipswich Nov. 17, 1772. He descended from John Appleton of Great Walsingham, Suffolk, England, who died in 1436. Samuel, a descendant of John, came to this country in 1635, and settled at Ipswich, Mass. Francis, his father, a man of piety and vigorous intellect, died in 1816, aged 83.

President Appleton was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1792. It was during his residence at that seminary, that he experienced deep religious impressions; yet of any precise period, when his heart was regenerated by the Spirit of God, he was not accustomed to speak. The only safe evidence of piety, he believed, was "the perception in himself of those qualities, which the Gospel requires." Having spent two years in the instruction of youth at Dover and Amherst, he studied theology under Dr. Lathrop of West Springfield. In Feb., 1797, he was ordained as the pastor of a church at Hampton. His religious sentiments at this period were Arminian. Much of his time during his ten years' residence in that town was devoted to systematic, earnest study, in consequence of which his sentiments assumed a new form. By his faithful, affectionate services he was very much endeared to his people. At his suggestion the Piscataqua Evangelical Magazine was published, to which he contributed valuable essays, with the signature of Leighton. Such was his public estimation, that in 1803 he was one of the two principal candidates for the professorship of theology at Harvard college; but

Dr. Ware was elected. In 1807 he was chosen president of Bowdoin college, into which office he was inducted Dec. 23. After the toils of ten years in this station, his health became much impaired in consequence of a severe cold, in October, 1817. In May, 1819, his illness became more alarming, his complaints being a cough, hoarseness, and debility. A journey proved of no essential benefit. A profuse hemorrhage in October extinguished all hope of recovery. As the day of his dissolution approached, he remarked, "Of this I am sure, that salvation is all of grace. I would make no mention of anything, which I have ever thought, or said, or done; but only of this, that God so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. The atonement is the only ground of hope." In health he was sometimes anxious, in a high degree, in regard to the college; but in his sickness he said in cheerful confidence, "God has taken care of the college, and God will take care of it." Among his last expressions were heard the words, "Glory to God in the highest; the whole earth shall be filled with his glory." He died Nov. 12, 1819, at the age of 47, having been president nearly twelve years. A discourse was published, which was delivered at his funeral by Benjamin Tappan of Augusta, describing the excellences of his character and his peculiar qualifications for the station, which he occupied. His widow, Elizabeth, died in Boston in 1844.

He published a dedication sermon at Hampton, 1797; sermons at the ordination of Asa Rand of Gorham, 1809, and Jonathan Cogswell of Saco, and Reuben Nason of Freeport, 1810; of Benjamin Tappan of Augusta, 1811; discourse on the death of Frederic Southgate, 1813; Massachusetts election sermon, 1814; a sermon on the perpetuity of the Sabbath, 1814; thanksgiving sermon, 1815; sermon at the ordination of Enos Merrill, of Freeport; sermon before the Bath society for the suppression of public vices; address before the Mass. society for the suppression of intemperance, 1816; sermon before the American commissioners for foreign missions, 1817; sermon at the formation of the Maine education society, 1818; also a sermon on the death of Mrs. Buckminster; a sermon before the Portsmouth female asylum; and a sermon relating to Dr. Emmons on unity.

In 1820 a volume of his addresses was published, containing his inaugural address and eleven annual addresses, with a sketch of his character by Dr. Nichols of Portland. In 1822 his lectures and occasional sermons were published in one volume, with a memoir of his life by Benjamin Tappan of Augusta. The subjects of these lectures, twenty-seven in number, are the necessity of revelation, human depravity, the atonement, regeneration, the eternity of future punishment, the resurrection of the body, and the demoniacs of the New Testament.

The sermons are on the immortality of the soul, the influence of religion on the condition of man, the evils of war and the probability of universal peace, the truth of Christianity from its moral effects, conscience, and consequences of neglecting the great salvation. His works, with a memoir, were published in two vols., 1837.

APPLETON, SAMUEL, a distinguished merchant, died July 12, 1853, aged 87. He was born in New Ipswich, N. H., June 22, 1766, one of a family of twelve brothers and sisters. He early became a country merchant; in 1794 he established himself in business in Boston, in which his career was one of great honor, success, and usefulness. His brother, Nathan, became his partner. He married in 1819 Mrs. Mary Gore. As early as 1823 he determined to spend annually the amount of his income. Having no children, much of his beneficence had respect to the children of his brothers and sisters; and much of his charity went to the poor. He was accustomed to give away 25,000 dollars a year. To all great objects of charity he was a large contributor. He deemed the day lost, in which he had not done some good. To Dartmouth college he gave 10,000 dollars. A print of him is in the Historical Register. His life by E. Peabody may be found in the lives of American merchants.

APPLETON, LYDIA, sister of N. Dane, died in Beverly Aug. 23, 1845, aged 103 years and 8 months. She was married at thirty and was a widow at ninety.

APTHORP, EAST, an Episcopal minister, was the son of Charles Apthorp, a merchant of Boston, who died in 1758, aged 61. He was born in 1733, and studied at Jesus' college, Cambridge, England. Having taken orders, he was appointed in 1761 by the society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts a missionary at Cambridge, in which place he continued four or five years. He engaged in a warm controversy with Dr. Mayhew concerning the design and conduct of the society, of which he was a missionary. The political feelings of the people were mingled with their religious attachments; the cause, which Mr. Apthorp espoused, was unpopular, and he returned to England. He was made vicar of Croydon in 1765, and in 1778 rector of Bow church, London, to which he was presented by his friend and fellow collegian, bishop Porteus. In 1790, having lost his sight, he exchanged these livings for the prebend of Finsbury, and having an adequate income, he retired to spend the evening of his days among the scenes and friends of his youth, at the university, in a house provided for him by his patron, Bishop Watson. He died at Cambridge, England, April 16, 1816, aged 83 years.

His wife was the daughter of Foster Hutchinson, a brother of the governor. His only son was a clergyman; of three daughters, one was married to Dr. Cary and one to Dr. Butler, both heads of colleges; the third married a son of Dr. Paley. Dr. Thomas Bulfinch of Boston married one of his sisters, and Robert Bayard of New York another. He was eminent as a writer. He published a sermon at the opening of the church at Cambridge, 1761; on the peace, 1763; considerations respecting the society for the propagation, etc., 1763; on the death of Ann Wheelwright, 1764; review of Mayhew's remarks on the answer to his observations, etc., 1765; discourses on prophecy, at the Warburton lecture, Lincoln's Inn chapel, 2 vols; and an answer to Gibbon's statement of the causes of the spread of Christianity. — Jennison, MS.; Holmes, II. 120, 481.

APTHORP, GEORGE H., missionary to Ceylon, died June 8, 1844, aged 46. Born in Quiney, he graduated at Yale in 1829, and studied theology at Princeton. He sailed from Boston in 1833. He lived chiefly at Varany. He said in his sickness, "My faith rests firmly on the rock." Among his last words were, "Precious Saviour, come,—come quickly." His last prayers, both in English and Tamul, for all descriptions of men, were most earnest. His wife, Mary Robertson, of Albemarle county, Va., died in peace Sept. 3, 1849, aged 41, and was buried by the side of her husband.

ARBUCKLE, MATTHEW, brigadier-general, died at Fort Smith, Ark., June 11, 1851, aged 75. He commanded at New Orleans, Fort Gibson, and Fort Smith. Thoroughly acquainted with the Indians, he always preserved their confidence.

ARCH, JOHN, a Cherokee Indian and an interpreter, died at Brainerd June 8, 1825, aged 27. When taken sick, he was engaged in translating John's Gospel into Cherokee, using the ingenious alphabet invented by Mr. Guess. He had been a Christian convert several years; and he died in peace, saying, "God is good, and will do right!" He was buried by the side of Dr. Worcester.

ARCHDALE, JOHN, governor of Carolina, was appointed to this office by the proprietors, after Lord Ashley had declined accepting it. He was a Quaker and a proprietor, and arrived in the summer of 1695. The settlers received him with universal joy. The colony had been in much confusion, but order was now restored. The Assembly was called, and the governor by the discreet use of his extensive powers settled almost every public concern to the satisfaction of the people. The price of lands and the form of conveyances were settled by law. Magistrates were appointed for hearing all causes, and determining all differences between the settlers and the Indians. Public roads were ordered to be made and water passages cut. The planting of rice, which has since become the great source of the opulence of Carolina, was introduced. A captain of a vessel from Madagascar on his way to Great Britain anchored off Sullivan's Island and made a present to the governor of a bag of seed rice, which he had brought from the east. This rice the governor divided among some of his friends, who agreed to make an experiment. The success equalled their expectation, and from this small beginning arose the staple commodity of Carolina.

He continued one year in his government. After his return to London, he published a work entitled, a new description of that fertile and pleasant province of Carolina, with a brief account of its discovery, settling, and the government thereof to this time, with several remarkable passages during my time, 1707. — Holmes; Ucivatt, I. 119, 129–131; Ramsay, I. 47–50.

ARCHER, STEVENSON, chief judge of the court of appeals in Maryland, died Jan. 25, 1848.

ARGALL, SAMUEL, deputy governor of Virginia, came to that colony in 1609 to trade and to fish for sturgeon. The trade was in violation of the laws; but as the wine and provisions, which he brought, were much wanted, his conduct was connived at, and he continued to make voyages for his own advantage and in the service of the colony. In 1612 he carried off Pocahontas to James Town. In 1613 he arrived at the Island, now called Mount Desert, in Maine, for the purpose of fishing, and having discovered a settlement of the French, which was made two years before, he immediately attacked it, and took most of the settlers prisoners. Gilbert de Thet, a Jesuit father, was killed in the engagement. This was the commencement of hostilities between the French and English colonists in America. Capt. Argall soon afterwards sailed from Virginia to Acadie and destroyed the French settlements of St. Croix and Port Royal. The pretext for this hostile expedition in time of peace was the encroachment of the French on the rights of the English, which were founded on the prior discovery of the Cabots. Argall on his return subdued the Dutch settlement at Hudson's river. In 1614 he went to England, and returned in 1617 as deputy governor. On his arrival he found the public buildings at James Town fallen to decay, the market place and streets planted with tobacco, and the people of the colony dispersed in places, which they thought best adapted for cultivating that pernicious weed. To restore prosperity to the colony Capt. Argall introduced some severe regulations. He prohibited all trade or familiarity with the Indians. Teaching them the use of arms was a crime to be punished by death. He ordered, that all goods should be sold at an advance of twenty-five per cent., and fixed the price of tobacco at three shillings per pound. None could sell or buy at a different price under the penalty of three years' imprisonment. No man was permitted to fire a gun, before a new supply of ammunition, except in self-defence, on pain of a year's slavery. Absence from church on Sundays or holidays was punished by confinement for the night, and one week's slavery to the colony, and on a repetition of the offence the punishment was increased.

The rigorous execution of these laws rendered him odious in the colony, and the report of his tyranny and his depredations upon the revenues of the company reaching England, it was determined to recall him. Lord Delaware was directed to send him home to answer the charges brought against him; but as his lordship did not reach Virginia, being summoned away from life while on his passage, the letter to him fell into the hands of Argall. Perceiving from it that the fine harvest, which now occupied him, would be soon ended, he redoubled his industry. He multiplied his acts of injustice, and before the arrival of a new governor in 1619 set sail in a vessel, loaded with his effects. He was the partner in trade of the Earl of Warwick, and by this connection was enabled to defraud the company of the restitution, which they had a right to expect. In 1620 he commanded a ship of war in an expedition against the Algerines; in 1623 he was knighted by King James; in 1625 he was engaged in the expedition against the Spaniards under Cecil.

His character, like that of most, who were concerned in the government of Virginia, is differently drawn; by some he is represented as a good mariner, a man of public spirit, active, industrious, careful to provide for the people, and to keep them constantly employed; and by others he is described as negligent of the public business, selfish, rapacious, passionate, arbitrary, and cruel, pushing his unrighteous gains in every way of extortion and oppression. He was, without question, a man of talents and art, for he so foiled and perplexed the company, that they were never able to bring him to any account or punishment. An account of his voyage from James Town, beginning June 19, 1610, in which, missing Bermuda, he "put over towards Sagadahoe and Cape Cod," and his letter respecting his voyage to Virginia in 1613, are preserved in Purchas. — Belknap's Biography, II. 51–63; Holmes, 144, 155; I. Smith: Stith; Marshall, I. 56, 107; Beverly.

ARMISTEAD, Gen. W. K., died at Upper-ville, Va., Oct. 13, 1845, aged about 60. He was in the army forty years, of correct moral deportment: for many years he was chief of the corps of engineers. He commanded in 1840 in the war against the Florida Indians.

ARMSTRONG, WILLIAM J., D. D., secretary of the American Board of Missions, died in the wreck of the steamer Atlantic Nov. 27, 1846, aged 50. He was born in 1796 at Mendham, N. J., where his father, Dr. A. Armstrong, was the minister. He graduated at Princeton in 1816. When he first began to preach, he sought an untried field of labor at Charlottesville, in central Virginia, where there was no church, but where he gathered one. In 1821 he returned to New Jersey, and became for three years the pastor of the church in Trenton. He then was for ten years pastor of a church in Richmond, Va., as the successor of Dr. Rice; and here he faithfully toiled with remarkable success. In 1834 he was chosen a secretary of the American Board of Missions as successor of Dr. Wisner, and removed to Boston; but in 1838 it was thought best, that he should reside in New York, retaining his connection with the Board. Almost every Sabbath he preached, far and wide, on the claims of the heathen.

He made his monthly visit to Boston on Monday Nov. 23, 1846, to attend the meeting of the Prudential Committee of the Board. A storm set in on Wednesday, when he proposed to return to New York: in vain did his associates advise him not to venture upon the water in such a tempest; but he was desirous to reach home, as the next day was thanksgiving. At five o'clock he left Boston by railroad for Norwich, and proceeded from Allyn's Point in the steamer Atlantic to New London; but when about nine miles out of the harbor the steam-pipe burst, leaving the vessel to the north-west wind. The anchors dragged, and during the whole day and night of Thursday the vessel was at the mercy of the storm. As a minister of Christ Dr. A. was busily employed in teaching, in exhortation, and prayer, that he might aid others in preparing to die. About fifty met in the cabin in the afternoon to read the Bible and to pray. He was calm and resigned. After four o'clock in the morning of Friday the 27th the vessel went to pieces, as it struck the reef, and he and many others died. His body was recovered, and his funeral was attended at New York. — N. Y. Observer, Dec. 5.

ARMSTRONG, ROBERT, general, died at Washington in Feb., 1854, aged about 65. Born in East Tennessee, he was a general in the Florida war of 1836; afterwards consul at Liverpool. Gen. Jackson bequeathed to him his sword.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, general, died at Red Hook, N. Y., April 1, 1855, aged 84. He served as an officer with much credit during the Revolutionary war, at the close of which he published the celebrated Newburgh Letters, written with great vigor and eloquence. The prudence of Washington gave triumph to milder counsels. After the war he was adjutant-general of Pennsylvania: he conducted the vigorous movement against the settlers at Wyoming. From New York he was sent to the Senate of the United States: he was also minister in France, after Chancellor Livingston. Mr. Madison placed him at the head of the war department. After the capture of Washington by the British in 1814 he was dismissed from office and afterwards lived in retirement. He published a brief history of the war with England.

ARMSTRONG, SAMUEL T., died in Boston March 26, 1850, aged 66. He was a bookseller, in which profession he made a fortune; mayor of the city; and lieutenant-governor. Among the books he published was a stereotype edition of Scott's family Bible, which was widely circulated. He was a member of the Prudential Committee of the American Board. It is said, that it was his purpose, — as he had a fortune of 100 or 150,000 dollars and no children, — to leave a liberal charitable bequest; but he died suddenly in his chair. His wife, a descendant of Edward Johnson, survived him.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, general, resided in Pennsylvania and was distinguished in the Indian wars. In 1776, being appointed brigadier-general, he assisted in the defence of Fort Moultrie and in the battle of Germantown. He left the army in 1777 through dissatisfaction as to rank, and was afterwards a member of Congress. He died at Carlisle March 9, 1795. He was a professor of religion. — Lempriere.

ARNOLD, BENEDICT, governor of Rhode Island, succeeded Roger Williams in that office in 1657 and continued till 1660; he was also governor from 1662 to 1666, from 1669 to 1672, and from 1677 to 1678, — in which last year he died. He had lived in Providence as early as 1639. Winthrop speaks of him, "as a great friend of Massachusetts, especially in negotiations with the Indians." — In 1657 he and Coddington purchased of the Indian sachems the island of Quenonoquot, afterwards called James Town. — Massachusetts Historical Collections, v. 217; Savage's Winthrop; Farmer.

ARNOLD, BENEDICT, a major-general in the American army, and infamous for deserting the cause of his country, died in England June 14, 1801. He was bred an apothecary with a Dr. Lathrop, who was so pleased with him, as to give him 500 pounds sterling. From 1763 to 1767 he combined the business of a druggist with that of a bookseller, at New Haven, Conn. Being captain of a volunteer company, after hearing of the battle of Lexington he immediately marched with his company for the American head-quarters, and reached Cambridge April 29, 1775. He waited on the Massachusetts committee of safety and informed them of the defenceless state of Ticonderoga. The committee appointed him a colonel, and commissioned him to raise four hundred men, and to take that fortress. He proceeded directly to Vermont, and when he arrived at Castleton was attended by one servant only. Here he joined Col. Allen, and on May 10th the fortress was taken.

In the fall of 1775 he was sent by the commander-in-chief to penetrate through the wilderness of the District of Maine into Canada. He commenced his march Sept. 16, with about one thousand men, consisting of New England infantry, some volunteers, a company of artillery, and three companies of riflemen. One division, that of Col. Enos, was obliged to return from Dead river from the want of provisions; had it proceeded, the whole army might have perished. The greatest hardships were endured and the most appalling difficulties surmounted in this expedition, of which Maj. Meigs kept a journal, and Mr. Henry also published an account. The army was in the wilderness, between Fort Western at Augusta and the first settlements on the Chaudiere in Canada, about five weeks. In the want of provisions Capt. Dearborn's dog was killed, and eaten, even the feet and skin, with good appetite. As the army arrived at the first settlements Nov. 4th, the intelligence necessarily reached Quebec in one or two days; but a week or fortnight before this Gov. Cramahe had been apprized of the approach of this army. Arnold had imprudently sent a letter to Schuyler, enclosed to a friend in Quebec, by an Indian, dated Oct. 13, and he was himself convinced, from the preparations made for his reception, that the Indian had betrayed him. Nov. 5th the troops arrived at St. Mary's, ten or twelve miles from Quebec, and remained there three or four days. Nov. 9th or 10th they advanced to Point Levi, opposite Quebec. Forty birch canoes having been collected, it was still found necessary to delay crossing the river for three nights on account of a high wind. On the 14th the wind moderated; but this delay was very favorable to the city, for on the 13th Col. M'Lean, an active officer, arrived with eighty men to strengthen the garrison, which already consisted of more than a thousand men, so as to render an assault hopeless. Indeed Arnold himself placed his chief dependence on the co-operation of Montgomery.

On the 14th of Nov. he crossed the St. Lawrence in the night; and, ascending the precipice, which Wolfe had climbed before him, formed his small corps on the height near the plains of Abraham. With only about seven hundred men, one third of whose muskets had been rendered useless in the march through the wilderness, success could not be expected. It is surprising, that the garrison, consisting Nov. 14th of one thousand one hundred and twenty-six men, did not march out and destroy the small force of Arnold. After parading some days on the heights near the town, and sending two flags to summon the inhabitants, he retired to Point aux Trembles, twenty miles above Quebec, and there awaited the arrival of Montgomery, who joined him on the first of December. The city was immediately besieged, but the best measures had been taken for its defence. The able Gen. Carleton had entered the city with sixty men Nov. 20th. On the morning of the last day of the year an assault was made on the one side of the lower town by Montgomery, who was killed. At the same time Col. Arnold, at the head of about three hundred and fifty men, made a desperate attack on the opposite side. Advancing with the utmost intrepidity along the St. Charles through a narrow path, exposed to an incessant fire of grape-shot and musketry, as he approached the first barrier he received a musket ball in the left leg, which shattered the bone. He was compelled to retire, on foot, dragging "one leg after him" near a mile to the hospital, having lost sixty men killed and wounded, and three hundred prisoners. Although the attack was unsuccessful, the blockade of Quebec was continued till May, 1776, when the army, which was in no condition to risk an assault, was removed to a more defensible position. Arnold was compelled to relinquish one post after another, till the 18th of June, when he quitted Canada. After this period he exhibited great bravery in the command of the American fleet on Lake Champlain.

In August, 1777, he relieved Fort Schuyler under the command of Col. Gansevoort, which was invested by Col. St. Leger with an army of from fifteen to eighteen hundred men. In the battle near Stillwater, Sept. 19th, he was engaged incessantly for four hours. In the action of Oct. 7th, after the British had been driven into the lines, Arnold pressed forward and under a tremendous fire assaulted the works throughout their whole extent from right to left. The intrenchments were at length forced, and with a few men he actually entered the works; but his horse being killed, and he himself badly wounded in the leg, he found it necessary to withdraw, and, as it was now almost dark, to desist from the attack. Being rendered unfit for active service in consequence of his wound, after the recovery of Philadelphia he was appointed to the command of the American garrison. When he entered the city, he made the house of Gov. Penn. the best house in the city, his head-quarters. This he furnished in a very costly manner, and lived far beyond his income. He had wasted the plunder, which he had seized at Montreal in his retreat from Canada; and at Philadelphia he was determined to make new acquisitions. He laid his hands on every thing in the city, which could be considered as the property of those, who were unfriendly to the cause of his country. He was charged with oppression, extortion, and enormous charges upon the public in his accounts, and with applying the public money and property to his own private use. Such was his conduct, that he drew upon himself the odium of the inhabitants, not only of the city, but of the province in general. He was engaged in trading speculations, and had shares in several privateers, but was unsuccessful. From the judgment of the commissioners appointed to inspect his accounts, who had rejected above half the amount of his demands, he appealed to Congress; and they appointed a committee of their own body to settle the business. The committee confirmed the report of the commissioners, and thought they had allowed him more than he had any right to expect. By these disappointments he became irritated, and he gave full scope to his resentment. His invectives against Congress were not less violent, than those, which he had before thrown out against the commissioners. He was, however, soon obliged to abide the judgment of a court martial upon the charges exhibited against him by the executive of Pennsylvania; and he was subjected to the mortification of receiving a reprimand from Washington. His trial commenced in June, 1778, but such were the delays occasioned by the movements of the army, that it was not concluded until Jan. 26, 1779. The sentence of a reprimand was approved by Congress, and was soon afterwards carried into execution.

Such was the humiliation, to which Gen. Arnold was reduced in consequence of yielding to the temptations of pride and vanity, and indulging himself in the pleasures of a sumptuous table and expensive equipage. From this time his proud spirit revolted from the cause of America. He turned his eyes to West Point as an acquisition, which would give value to treason, while its loss would inflict a mortal wound on his former friends. He addressed himself to the delegation of New York, in which state his reputation was peculiarly high, and a member of Congress from this state recommended him to Washington for the service, which he desired. The same application to the commander-in-chief was made not long afterwards through Gen. Schuyler. Washington observed, that as there was a prospect of an active campaign he should be gratified with the aid of Arnold in the field; but intimated at the same time, that he should receive the appointment requested, if it should be more pleasing to him. Arnold, without discovering much solicitude, repaired to camp in the beginning of August, and renewed in person the solicitations, which had been before indirectly made. He was now offered the command of the left wing of the army, which was advancing against New York; but he declined it under the pretext, that in consequence of his wounds, he was unable to perform the active duties of the field. Without a suspicion of his patriotism he was invested with the command of West Point. Previously to his soliciting this station, he had in a letter to Col. Beverley Robinson signified his change of principles and his wish to restore himself to the favor of his prince by some signal proof of his repentance. This letter opened to him a correspondence with Sir Henry Clinton, the object of which was to concert the means of putting the important post, which he commanded, into the possession of the British general. His plan, it is believed, was to have drawn the greater part of his army without the works under the pretext of fighting the enemy in the defiles, and to have left unguarded a designated pass, through which the assailants might securely approach and surprise the fortress. His troops he intended to place, so that they would be compelled to surrender, or be cut in pieces. But just as his scheme was ripe for execution the wise Disposer of events, who so often and so remarkably interposed in favor of the American cause, blasted his designs.

Maj. Andre, after his detection, apprized Arnold of his danger, and the traitor found opportunity to escape on board the Vulture, Sept. 25, 1780, a few hours before the return of Washington, who had been absent on a journey to Hartford. On the very day of his escape Arnold wrote a letter to Washington, declaring that the love of his country had governed him in his late conduct, and requesting him to protect Mrs. Arnold. She was conveyed to her husband at New York, and his clothes and baggage, for which he had written, were transmitted to him. During the exertions, which were made to rescue Andre from the destruction, which threatened him, Arnold had the hardihood to interpose. He appealed to the humanity of the commander-in-chief, and then sought to intimidate him by stating the situation of many of the principal characters of South Carolina, who had forfeited their lives, but had hitherto been spared through the clemency of the British general. This clemency, he said, could no longer in justice be extended to them, should Maj. Andre suffer.

Arnold was made a brigadier-general in the British service; which rank he preserved throughout the war. Yet he must have been held in contempt and detestation by the generous and honorable. It was impossible for men of this description, even when acting with him, to forget that he was a traitor: first the slave of his rage, then purchased with gold, and finally secured by the blood of one of the most accomplished officers in the British army. One would suppose, that his mind could not have been much at ease; but he had proceeded so far in vice, that perhaps his reflections gave him but little trouble. "I am mistaken," says Washington in a private letter, "if at this time Arnold is not undergoing the torments of a mental hell. He wants feeling. From some traits of his character, which have lately come to my knowledge, he seems to have been so hackneyed in crime, so lost to all sense of honor and shame, that while his faculties still enable him to continue his sordid pursuits, there will be no time for remorse."

Arnold found it necessary to make some exertions to secure the attachment of his new friends. With the hope of alluring many of the discontented to his standard, he published an address to the inhabitants of America, in which he endeavored to justify his conduct. He had encountered the dangers of the field, he said, from apprehension that the rights of his country were in danger. He had acquiesced in the Declaration of Independence, though he thought it precipitate. But the rejection of the overtures made by Great Britain in 1778, and the French alliance, had opened his eyes to the ambitious views of those, who would sacrifice the happiness of their country to their own aggrandizement, and had made him a confirmed loyalist. He artfully mingled assertions, that the principal members of Congress held the people in sovereign contempt. This was followed in about a fortnight by a proclamation, addressed "to the officers and soldiers of the continental army, who have the real interest of their country at heart, and who are determined to be no longer the tools and dupes of Congress or of France." To induce the American officers and soldiers to desert the cause, which they had embraced, he represented, that the corps of cavalry and infantry, which he was authorized to raise, would be upon the same footing with other troops in the British service; that he should with pleasure advance those, whose valor he might witness; that the private men, who joined him, should receive a bounty of three guineas each, besides payment at the full value for horses, arms, and accoutrements. His object was the peace, liberty, and safety of America. "You are promised liberty," he exclaims, "but is there an individual in the enjoyment of it, saving your oppressors? Who among you dare speak or write what he thinks against the tyranny, which has robbed you of your property, imprisons your persons, drags you to the field of battle, and is daily deluging your country with your blood?" "What," he exclaims again, "is America now, but a land of widows, orphans, and beggars? As to you, who have been soldiers in the continental army, can you at this day want evidence, that the funds of your country are exhausted, or that the managers have applied them to their private uses? In either case you surely can no longer continue in their service with honor or advantage. Yet you have hitherto been their supporters in that cruelty, which with equal indifference to yours as well as to the labor and blood of others, is devouring a country, that from the moment you quit their colors will be redeemed from their tyranny." These proclamations did not produce the effect designed; and in all the hardships, sufferings, and irritations of the war Arnold remains the solitary instance of an American officer, who abandoned the side first embraced in the contest, and turned his sword upon his former companions in arms.

He was soon dispatched by Sir Henry Clinton to make a diversion in Virginia. With about seventeen hundred men he arrived in the Chesapeake in Jan., 1781, and being supported by such a naval force as was suited to the nature of the service, he committed extensive ravages on the rivers and along the unprotected coasts. It is said that, while on this expedition Arnold inquired of an American captain, whom he had taken prisoner, what the Americans would do with him, if he should fall into their hands. The officer replied, that they would cut off his lame leg and bury it with the honors of war, and hang the remainder of his body in gibbets. After his recall from Virginia he conducted an expedition against his native state, Connecticut. He took Fort Trumbull Sept. 6th, with inconsiderable loss. On the other side of the harbor Lieut.-Col. Eyre, who commanded another detachment, made an assault on Fort Griswold, and with the greatest difficulty entered the works. An officer of the conquering troops asked, who commanded? "I did," answered Col. Ledyard, "but you do now," and presented him his sword, which was instantly plunged into his own bosom. A merciless slaughter commenced upon the brave garrison, who had ceased to resist, until the greater part were either killed or wounded. After burning the town and the stores, which were in it, and thus thickening the laurels, with which his brow was adorned, Arnold returned to New York in eight days.

From the conclusion of the war till his death Gen. Arnold resided chiefly in England. In 1786 he was at St. John's, New Brunswick, engaged in trade and navigation, and again in 1790. For some cause he became very unpopular in 1792 or 1793, was hung in effigy, and the mayor found it necessary to read the riot act, and a company of troops was called to quell the mob. Repairing to the West Indies in 1794, a French fleet anchored at the same island; he became alarmed lest he should be detained by the American allies, and passed the fleet concealed on a raft of lumber. He died in Gloucester place, London. He married Margaret, the daughter of Edward Shippen of Philadelphia, chief justice, and a loyalist. Gen. Greene, it is said, was his rival. She combined fascinating manners with strength of mind. She died at London Aug. 24, 1804, aged 43. His sons were men of property in Canada in 1829. He fought bravely for his country and he bled in her cause; but his country owed him no returns of gratitude, for his subsequent conduct proved, that he had no honest regard to her interests, but was governed by selfish considerations. His progress from self-indulgence to treason was easy and rapid. He was vain and luxurious, and to gratify his giddy desires he must resort to meanness, dishonesty, and extortion. These vices brought with them disgrace; and the contempt, into which he fell, awakened a spirit of revenge, and left him to the unrestrained influence of his cupidity and passion. Thus from the high fame, to which his bravery had elevated him, he descended into infamy. Thus too he furnished new evidence of the infatuation of the human mind in attaching such value to the reputation of a soldier, which may be obtained, while the heart is unsound and every moral sentiment is entirely depraved. — Marshall's Washington, iv. 271-290; Warren's Hist. War; Holmes; Stedman, I. 138, 336; II. 247; Smith's Narrative of the Death of Andre; Maine Hist. Coll. I.; Amer. Rememb., 1776, part II.; 1778, part II.

ARNOLD, PELEG, chief justice of Rhode Island, was a delegate to Congress under the confederation, and then was appointed judge. He died at Smithfield Feb. 13, 1820, aged 68.

ARNOLD, THOMAS, appointed chief justice in 1809, died at Warwick, R. I., Oct. 8, 1820.

ARNOLD, JOSIAH LYNDON, a poet, was born at Providence and was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1788. After superintending for some time the academy at Plainfield, Conn., he studied law at Providence and was admitted to the bar; but he did not pursue the profession, being appointed a tutor in the college. On the death, March, 1793, of his father, Dr. Jonathan Arnold, formerly a member of Congress, he settled at St. Johnsbury, Vt., the place of his father's residence, where he died June 7, 1796, aged 28 years. His few hasty effusions in verse were published after his death. — Specimens of Amer. Poetry, II. 77.

ARNOLD, SETII, died at Westminster, Vt., Aug. 6, 1849, aged 101 years, 10 months, — a Revolutionary pensioner.

ARNOLD, LEMUEL H., governor, died in Kingston, R. I., June 27, 1852, aged 59. Born in St. Johnsbury, he graduated at Dartmouth in 1811, and left the bar for mercantile pursuits. He was governor of Rhode Island in 1831 and 1832, and afterwards a member of Congress. His father, Jonathan, was of the Continental Congress from Rhode Island.

ASBURY, FRANCIS, senior bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States, came to this country in 1771 as a preacher, at the age of twenty-six. In 1773 the first annual conference of the Methodists was held at Philadelphia, when it consisted of ten preachers and about eleven hundred members. He was consecrated bishop by Dr. Coke in 1784. From this time he travelled yearly through the United States, probably ordaining three thousand preachers and preaching seventeen thousand sermons. He died suddenly while on a journey, at Spotsylvania, Va., March 31, 1816, aged 70 years. A letter from J. W. Bond to Bishop M'Kendree gives an account of his death.

ASH, JOHN, an agent of Carolina, was sent by that colony to England to seek redress of grievances, in 1703. In the same year he published an account of the affairs in Carolina.

ASHE, THOMAS, published in 1682 a description of Carolina.

ASHE, SAMUEL, governor of North Carolina, was appointed chief justice in 1777, and was governor from 1796 to 1799. He died Jan., 1813, aged 88 years.

ASILEY, JONATHAN, minister of Deerfield, Mass., was graduated at Yale college in 1730, and was ordained in 1738. He died in 1780, aged 67. He possessed a strong and discerning mind and lively imagination, and was a pungent and energetic preacher. He proclaimed the doctrines of grace with a pathos, which was the effect, not merely of his assent to their Divine authority, but of a deep sense of their importance and excellency. He published a sermon on visible saints, vindicating Mr. Stoddard's sentiments respecting church membership; a sermon at the ordination of John Norton, Deerfield, 1741; the great duty of charity, 1742; a letter to W. Cooper, 1745.

ASHLEY, JOHN, major-general, was the son of Col. John Ashley, one of the settlers in 1732 of Houssatonnoc, afterwards Sheffield, died Nov. 5, 1799, aged 60. He descended from Robert A. of Springfield, 1630,—and was graduated at Yale college in 1758. In the Shays' insurrection he commanded the force, which dispersed the insurgents at Sheffield Feb. 26, 1787. His daughter Lydia, married to R. R. Hinman, died in 1853, aged 65.—Hist. Berkshire, 213.

ASILEY, EDWARD, died at Groton, Conn., Jan., 1767, aged 108.

ASHLEY, WILLIAM H., general, of St. Louis, died March 26, 1838. Born in Powhatan county, Va., at the age of thirty he emigrated to Missouri, then upper Louisiana, and settled near the lead mines. He was lieutenant-governor of Missouri, and a member of Congress 1831-33. He was respected for his talents, enterprise, and integrity. In 1822 he projected the "mountain expedition," uniting the Indian trade in the Rocky Mountains with hunting and trapping, and enlisted in the scheme three hundred men. After losses by Indian robbery and river disasters he and his associates acquired a handsome fortune.

ASIIMUN, ELI P., died at Northampton May 10, 1819, aged 48. Born in Blandford, he studied law with Judge Sedgwick, and practised in his native town until 1807. In 1816 he was a Senator of the U. S. A man once asked him for a writ against his neighbor, saying, "I will sue him, for he has sued me. I can prove he had the property." But Mr. A. pushed his inquiries, and asked, if the purchaser had paid for the property, and extorted the answer, "There was nobody present, when he paid me, and he can't prove it." The man was sent away from the office with a scorching rebuke.

ASHMUN, JOHN HOOKER, son of the preceding, professor of law in Harvard university, died April 1, 1833, aged 32. He was born July 3, 1800, was graduated at Cambridge in 1818, and appointed professor in 1829. Dying early, "he had gathered about him," said Judge Story, "all the honors, which are usually the harvest of the ripest life."

ASIIMUN, JEHUDI, agent of the American Colonization Society, died Aug. 25, 1828, aged 34. He was born of pious parents in Champlain, on the western shore of the lake of the same name, New York, in April, 1794. In early life he was an unbeliever; but it pleased God to disclose to him the iniquity of his heart and his need of mercy and the value and glory of the Gospel. He graduated at Burlington college in 1816, and after preparing for the ministry was elected a professor in the theological seminary at Bangor, Maine, in which place, however, he continued but a short time. Removing to the District of Columbia, he became a member of the Episcopal church, edited the Theological Repertory and published his memoirs of Samuel Bacon. He also projected a monthly journal for the American Colonization Society, and published one number; but the work failed for want of patronage. Being appointed to take charge of a reinforcement to the colony at Liberia, he embarked for Africa June 19, 1822, and arrived at Cape Montserado Aug. 8. He had authority, in case he should find no agent there, to act as such for the society, and also for the navy department. In the absence of the agents, it was at a period of great difficulty, that he assumed the agency. The settlers were few and surrounded with numerous enemies. It was necessary for him to act as a legislator and also as a soldier and engineer, to lay out the fortifications, superintending the construction, and this too in the time of affliction from the loss of his wife and while suffering himself under a fever, and to animate the emigrants to the resolute purpose of self-defence. About three months after his arrival, just as he was beginning to recover strength, and while his whole force was thirty-five men and boys, he was attacked at the dawn of day, Nov. 11, by eight hundred armed savages; but by the energy and desperate valor of the agent the assailants were repulsed, with the loss of four colonists killed and four wounded, and again in a few days, when they returned with redoubled numbers, were utterly defeated. Here was a memorable display of heroism. The same energy, diligence, and courage were displayed in all his labors for the benefit of the colony. When ill health compelled him to take a voyage to America, he was escorted to the place of embarkation, March 26, 1828, by three companies of the militia, and the men, women, and children of Monrovia parted with him with tears. He left a community of twelve hundred freemen. The vessel touched and landed him at St. Bartholomew's in very ill health. He arrived at New Haven Aug. 10th, a fortnight before his death. In his sickness he was very humble and patient. He said: "I have come here to die. It is hard to be broken down by the slow progress of disease. I wish to be submissive. My sins, my sins; they seem to shut me out from that comfort, which I wish to enjoy. I have been praying for light; and a little light has come, cheering and refreshing beyond expression." An eloquent discourse was preached by Leonard Bacon at his funeral, describing his remarkable character, the important influence on the tribes of Africa of his piety and regard to justice, and his great services for the colonists. He was, as Mrs. Sigourney represents,

"Their leader, when the blast
Of ruthless war swept by; —
Their teacher, when the storm was past,
Their guide to worlds on high."

Mr. Gurley, the editor of the African Repository, is preparing an account of his life. In the Repository various communications, written by Mr. Ashmun, were published; his memoirs of S. Bacon have been already mentioned. — African Repository, iv. 214–224, 286; Christian Spectator, II. 528; N. Y. Mercury, I. 13.

ASPINWALL, WILLIAM, M. D., an eminent physician, was born in Brookline, Mass., in June, 1743, and graduated at Cambridge in 1764. His ancestor, Peter, was the first settler in Brookline in 1650. Dr. Aspinwall studied his profession with Dr. B. Gale of Connecticut, and at Philadelphia, where he received his medical degree in 1768. In the war of the Revolution he acted as a surgeon in the army. In the battle of Lexington he served as a volunteer, and bore from the field the corpse of his townsman, Isaac Gardner, Esq., whose daughter he afterwards married. After the death of Dr. Boylston he engaged in the business of inoculating for the small pox, and erected hospitals for the purpose. Perhaps no man in America ever inoculated so many, or had such reputation for skill in that disease. Yet, when the vaccine inoculation was introduced, after a proper trial he acknowledged its efficacy and relinquished his own profitable establishment. For forty-five years he had extensive practice, frequently riding on horseback forty miles a day. In his youth he lost the use of one eye; in his old age a cataract deprived him of the other. He died April 16, 1823, in his 80th year, in the peace of one, who had long professed the religion of Jesus Christ and practised its duties. At the bed of sickness he was accustomed to give religious counsel. His testimony in favor of the gospel he regarded as his best legacy to his children. In his political views he was decidedly democratic or republican; yet he was not a persecutor, and when in the council, he resisted the measures of the violent. He was anxious, that wise and good men should bear sway, and that all benevolent and religious institutions should be perpetuated. His son of the same name succeeded him in his profession. Another son, Col. Thomas Aspinwall, lost an arm in the war of 1812 and was afterwards appointed consul at London. — Thacher's Medical Biography.

ASPLUND, JOHN, died in Maryland in 1807. Born a Swede, he was a Baptist minister in Carolina in 1782. He was drowned from a canoe in Maryland. With great labor he prepared the Register of the Baptist churches in 1791 and 1794.

ASTOR, JOHN JACOB, died in New York March 29, 1818, aged 84. He was born in Waldrop, near Heidelberg, of humble parents, and came to Baltimore in 1784, commencing business as a fur-trader. He made frequent voyages up the Mohawk to trade with the Indians, and extended his business to the Columbia river, founding Astoria. W. Irving has recorded the over-land journeys projected by him to the Pacific. Previous to the war of 1812 he had ships in the Canton trade: their safe arrival during the war gave him enormous wealth. He purchased American stocks at sixty to seventy cents, which after the war were worth twenty per cent. above par. His chief wealth was from the purchase of real estate.

ATHERTON, HUMPHREY, major-general, came to this country about the year 1636, succeeded Robert Sedgwick in his military office in 1654, and was much employed in negotiations with the Indians. He died in consequence of a fall from his horse Sept. 17, 1661. His residence was at Dorchester. Among his children are the names of Rest, Increase, Thankful, Hope, Consider, Watching, and Patience. — Hope, a graduate of 1665, was the first minister of Hatfield. As chaplain he was at the Indian battle in Montague, May 18, 1676. — Farmer's Genealogical Register; Savage's Winthrop, II. 137.

ATHERTON, CHARLES H., an eminent lawyer, died at Amherst, N. H., Jan. 8, 1853, aged 79, a graduate of Harvard in 1794. He was a member of Congress 1815-1817, and register of probate thirty-nine years.

ATHERTON, CHARLES G., son of the preceding, died in Nashua Nov. 15, 1853, aged 53, a graduate of Harvard in 1822. He was a representative in Congress 1837-1843, and a senator from 1843 till his death. He left a widow, but no children to inherit an estate of 200,000 or 300,000 dollars.

ATKINS, HENRY, a navigator, sailed from Boston in the ship Whale, on a voyage to Davis' Straits, in 1729. In this and in subsequent voyages for the purpose of trade with the Indians, the last of which was made in 1758, he explored much of the coast of Labrador. A short account of his observations was published in the first volume of Mass. Historical Collections.

ATKINS, ELISHA, minister of Killingly, died June 11, 1839, aged 89, formerly a chaplain in the army.

ATKINSON, THEODORE, chief justice of New Hampshire, was born at New Castle, son of Col. Theodore Atkinson, and graduated at Harvard college in 1718. He sustained many public offices, civil and military; was secretary in 1741; a delegate to the congress at Albany in 1754, and chief justice in the same year. The Revolution deprived him of the offices of judge and secretary. He died in 1779, bequeathing 200 pounds to the Episcopal church, the interest to be expended in bread for the poor, distributed on the Sabbath. — Adams' Annals of Portsmouth, 269.

ATKINSON, ISRAEL, an eminent physician, was a native of Harvard, Mass., and graduated at Cambridge in 1762. He settled in 1765, at Lancaster, where he died July 20, 1822, aged 82. For some years he was the only physician in the county of Worcester, who had been well educated. — Thacher's Medical Biography.

ATKINSON, HENRY, brigadier-general, died near St. Louis June 20, 1842, aged 60. He entered the army in 1808.

ATLEE, SAMUEL JOHN, colonel, commanded a Pennsylvania company in the French war and a regiment in the war of the Revolution, and acquired great honor in the battle on Long Island, though taken prisoner and subject to a long captivity. Afterwards he acted as commissioner to treat with the Indians. In 1780 he was elected to Congress and was on the committee concerning the mutiny of the Pennsylvania troops in 1781. His usual residence was at Lancaster. He died at Philadelphia in Nov., 1786, aged 48.

ATLEE, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, a judge of the supreme court and president of the common pleas for Lancaster and other counties, died at his seat on the Susquehanna Sept. 9, 1793. — Jennison.

ATWELL, LUCRETIA, Mrs., died at Montville, Conn., Nov. 1, 1851, aged 102; retaining all her faculties to the day of her death.

ATWELL, ZACHARIAH, captain, died at Lynn in 1847, aged 67. Crossing the Atlantic seventy times, he never lost a man.

ATWOOD, MARY, the mother of Harriet Newell, died in Boston July 4, 1853, aged 84. She was the daughter of Thomas Tenney of East Bradford, of an eminent family, and married in 1788 Moses Atwood, a merchant of Haverhill, who died in 1808. The whole care of her family now rested upon her; but she was diligent, prudent, prayerful. When her daughter asked her consent to quit her country in the cause of Christ, she resigned the beloved one to her work. In the course of her life her home was with her children in Medford, Newton, Pittsburg, Granby, and Philadelphia; and widely apart did she bury most of them, to be gathered together in glory eternal. The Journal of Missions for Sept., 1853, has a beautiful piece of poetry on her death.

AUCHMUTY, ROBERT, an eminent lawyer, died in 1750. He was of Scottish descent, and after his education at Dublin studied law at the Temple. He came to Boston in early life; and on the death of Mr. Menzies was appointed judge of the court of admiralty in 1703, but held the place only a few months. In 1740 he was one of the directors of the Land Bank bubble, or Manufacturing Company, in which the father of Samuel Adams was involved. When sent to England as agent for the colony on the boundary question with Rhode Island, he projected the expedition to Cape Breton, publishing a pamphlet, entitled, "the importance of Cape Breton to the British nation, and a plan for taking the place." On the death of Byfield he was again appointed judge of admiralty in 1733. His daughter married Mr. Pratt. His son Samuel graduated at Harvard college in 1742, was an Episcopal minister in New York, and received the degree of doctor in divinity from Oxford. He died March 3, 1777; and his son, Sir Samuel, lieutenant-general in the British army, died in 1822. — His name is introduced in the versification of Hugh Gaine's petition, Jan. 1, 1783. He is alluded to also in Trumbull's M'Fingal. His other son, Robert, a most interesting, persuasive pleader, defended, with John Adams, Capt. Preston. He had previously been appointed judge of admiralty in 1768. His letters, with Hutchinson's, were sent to America by Franklin in 1773. Like his brother, he was a zealous royalist, and left America in 1776. He died in England. — Jennison, Manuscripts; Thomas, II. 488; Hutchinson's Last History, 401; Eliot.

AUDUBON, JOHN JAMES, died at Minniesland, near New York, Jan. 27, 1851, aged 71. Born of French parents at New Orleans, he was educated at Paris. As early as 1810 he went down the Ohio in an open boat in search of a forest home. His life was a life of adventure and romantic interest, hardly a region of the United States being unvisited by him in his ornithological pursuits. He published a splendid work, — Birds of America, from original drawings, folio; also Ornithological biography, 8vo. 1831.

AUSTIN, BENJAMIN, a political writer, died in Boston May 4, 1820, aged 68. He early espoused the democratic or republican side in the political controversy, which raged during the administration of John Adams. He was bold, unflinching, uncompromising. He assailed others for their political errors; and he was himself traduced with the utmost virulence. Perhaps no man ever met such a tide of obloquy. Yet many, who once detested his party, have since united themselves to it. After the triumph of Mr. Jefferson, he was appointed, without soliciting the place, commissioner of loans for Mass. In 1806 his son, Charles Austin, when attempting to chastise Mr. Selfridge for abuse of his father, was by him shot and killed in the streets of Boston. Mr. S. was tried and acquitted. His political writings, with the signature of "Old South," published in the Chronicle, were collected into a volume, entitled "Constitutional Republicanism," 8vo. 1803.

AUSTIN, JONATHAN LORING, died in Boston May 10, 1826, aged 78. He rendered important services in the Revolution. Born in Boston Jan. 2, 1748, he was graduated in 1766; was a merchant and secretary of the board of war in Massachusetts. He was sent to Paris in 1777 with news to our commissioners of the capture of Burgoyne: presenting a note to Dr. Chauncy's church for a safe voyage, the Doctor, who was somewhat unskilful, prayed, that whatever might become of the young man, the packet might be safe. For two years in Paris he was Franklin's secretary. A large cake was once sent to the apartment of the commissioners, inscribed — "Le digne Franklin," — the worthy Franklin. F. immediately remarked — "The present is for all of us — these French people cannot write English: they mean Lee, Deane, Franklin."

As the agent of Franklin he spent two years in London in the family of the Earl of Shelburne. On his return in May, 1779, he was liberally rewarded by Congress. In 1780 in going to Spain as an agent of the state he was captured and carried to England. He was secretary and treasurer of the state, and an exemplary member of the church. His son, James T. Austin, was attorney-general in 1832.

AUSTIN, MOSES, an enterprising settler in upper Louisiana, was a native of Durham, Conn., and after residing in Philadelphia and Richmond emigrated to the west with his family in 1798, having obtained a considerable grant of land from the Spanish governor. He commenced the business of mining at Mine au Breton, and created there a town; but becoming embarrassed by his speculations, he sold his estate and purchased a large tract near the mouth of the river Colorado, in Mexico. Ere his arrangements for removal were completed, he died in 1821. Believing the gospel, he placed his hopes of future happiness on the atonement of the Saviour. — Schoolcraft's Travels, 1821, p. 239–250.

AUSTIN, SAMUEL, D. D., president of the university of Vermont, was born at New Haven, graduated at Yale college in 1783, and ordained, as the successor of Allyn Mather, at Fairhaven, Conn., Nov. 9, 1786, but was dismissed Jan. 19, 1790. He was afterwards for many years pastor of a church in Worcester, Mass. He was but a few years at the head of the college in Burlington. After his resignation of that place he was not resettled in the ministry. He died at Glastenbury, Conn., Dec. 4, 1830, aged 70 years. His wife was a daughter of Dr. Hopkins of Hadley. He was eminently pious and distinguished as a minister. With three other ministers he was the projector of the Massachusetts missionary society, and was active in originating the Mass. general association. Much might be said of his high intellectual character, of his zeal and eloquence, his charity, influence, and usefulness. But for the last three years it pleased God to cast a thick cloud over his mind, so that he was in a state of despondence and sometimes in paroxysms of horror. His last words in prayer were, "Blessed Jesus! sanctify me wholly."

He published two important works; a view of the church, and theological essays: also letters on baptism, examining Merrill's seven sermons, 1805; reply to Merrill's twelve letters, 1806; and the following sermons, — on disinterested love, 1790; ordination and installation of S. Worcester; on the death of Mrs. Blair, 1792; Mass. missionary, 1803; dedication at Hadley; ordination of W. Fay, J. M. Whiton, N. Nelson, G. S. Olds; at a fast, 1811; at two fasts, 1812; view of the economy of the church.

AUSTIN, DAVID, died in Norwich, Conn., Feb. 5, 1831, aged 71. His father was collector of the customs and a merchant in New Haven. — He graduated in 1779. After travelling abroad he was ordained at Elizabethtown, N. J., in 1788. His wife, Lydia Lathrop of Norwich, was the daughter of a man of wealth. An illness of the scarlet fever in 1795, it is supposed, affected his reason. He predicted the second coming of Christ on the fourth Sunday of May, 1796. As the event did not cure him of his delusion, the presbytery dismissed him in 1797. By building houses for the Jews, who, he thought, were coming to New Haven, he incurred debts, for which he was imprisoned. Recovering his reason, he was the minister of Bozrah from 1815 till his death. He published in four vols. the "American Preacher," by various ministers, and the "Downfall of Babylon."—Observer, Aug. 11, 1844.

AVERY, JOHN, a minister, came to this country in 1635. While sailing from Newbury towards Marblehead, where he proposed to settle, he was shipwrecked in a violent storm Aug. 14, 1635, on a rocky island, called Thacher's woe and Avery's fall, and died with his wife and six children.—Mr. A. Thacher escaped.—His last words were: "I can lay no claim to deliverance from this danger, but through the satisfaction of Christ I can lay claim to heaven: this, Lord, I entreat of thee."—Magnal. III. 77; Savage, i. 165; Eliot.

AVERY, WILLIAM, Dr., died in Dedham about 1687, having lived there as early as 1653. Of his grandchildren, Joseph was the first minister of Norton from 1714 to 1770, and John the first minister of Truro, dying in 1754, aged about 70. Rev. David A. of Holden and Rev. Daniel A. of Wrentham were also his descendants.

AXTELL, HENRY, D. D., minister of Geneva, N. Y., was born at Mendham, N. J., in 1773, and graduated at Princeton in 1796. He went to Geneva soon after the settlement of that part of the state, and was very useful. At the time of his ordination in 1812 his church consisted of seventy members: at the time of his death of about 400. In two revivals his labors had been particularly blessed. He died Feb. 11, 1829, aged 55. His eldest daughter was placed in the same grave.

BACHE, RICHARD, postmaster-general of the United States, was appointed in the place of Dr. Franklin in Nov. 1776, and was succeeded by Mr. Hazard in 1782. A native of England, he came in early life to this country, and was at the beginning of the Revolution chairman of the republican society in Philadelphia. He married in 1767 Sally, the only daughter of Dr. Franklin, who died in Oct., 1808; he died at Settle in the county of Berks, Penn., July 29, 1811, aged 74.

BACHE, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, a printer, died in 1799. He was the son of the preceding, and accompanied Dr. Franklin to Paris, where he completed his education as a printer and founder in the printing house of the celebrated Didot. After his return in 1785 he pursued with honor his studies at the college of Philadelphia. In Oct., 1790, he commenced the publication of the General Advertiser, the name of which was afterwards changed to that of the Aurora,—a paper, which under the direction of Mr. Bache and his successor, Mr. Duane, exerted a powerful influence on the politics of the country in hostility to the two first administrations. His widow married Mr. Duane.—Jennison's Manuscripts.

BACHE, GEORGE M., a lieutenant in the navy, was swept from the deck of his ship off Cape Hatteras in a hurricane Sept. 8, 1846. He had toiled for eight years in a scientific coast-survey, being chief of a hydrographic party. He was a native of Philadelphia.

BACHI, PIETRO, died in Boston Aug. 22, 1853, aged 66. Born in Sicily, he came to this country in 1825 and was teacher of Italian at Harvard from 1826 to 1846.

BACKUS, ISAAC, a distinguished Baptist minister of Massachusetts, died Nov. 20, 1806, aged 82. He was born at Norwich in Connecticut, in 1724. In 1741, a year memorable for the revival of religion through this country, his attention was first arrested by the concerns of another world, and he was brought, as he believed, to the knowledge of the truth, as it is in Jesus. In 1746 he commenced preaching the gospel; and April 13, 1748, he was ordained first minister of a Congregational church in Titicut precinct, in the town of Middleborough, Mass. This society was formed in Feb., 1743, in consequence of disputes with regard to the settlement of a minister. The members of it wished for a minister of different sentiments from the man, who was settled, and, as they could not obtain a dismission from the church by an ecclesiastical council, at the end of five years they withdrew without this sanction, and formed a church by themselves in Feb., 1748. The society, however, was not permitted now to rest in peace, for they were taxed with the other inhabitants of the town for the purpose of building a new meeting-house for the first church.

In 1749 a number of the members of Mr. Backus' church altered their sentiments with regard to baptism, and obtained an exemption from the congregational tax; and he at length united with them in opinion. He was baptized by immersion in August, 1751. For some years afterwards he held communion with those, who were baptized in infancy, but he withdrew from this intercourse with Christians of other denominations. A Baptist church was formed Jan. 16, 1756, and he was installed its pastor June 23 of the same year by ministers from Boston and Rehoboth. In this relation he continued through the remainder of his life. He had been enabled to preach nearly sixty years until the spring before his death, when he experienced a paralytic stroke, which deprived him of speech, and of the use of his limbs.

Mr. Backus was a plain, evangelical preacher, without any pretensions to eloquence. It may be ascribed to his natural diffidence that, when preaching or conversing on important subjects, he was in the habit of shutting his eyes. To his exertions the Baptist churches in America owe not a little of their present flourishing condition. He was ever a zealous friend to the equal rights of Christians. When the Congress met at Philadelphia in 1774, he was sent as an agent from the Baptist churches of the Warren association to support their claims to the same equal liberties, which ought to be given to every denomination. In October he had a conference with the Massachusetts delegation and others, at which he contended only for the same privileges, which were given to the churches in Boston; and he received the promise, that the rights of the Baptists should be regarded. On his return, as a report had preceded him, that he had been attempting to break up the union of the colonies, he addressed himself to the convention of Mass. Dec. 9, and a vote was passed, declaring his conduct to have been correct. When the convention in 1779 took into consideration the constitution of the state, the subject of the extent of the civil power in regard to religion naturally presented itself, and in the course of debate the perfect correctness of the Baptist memorial, which was read at Philadelphia, was called in question. In consequence of which Mr. Backus published in the Chronicle of Dec. 2d a narrative of his proceedings as Baptist agent, and brought arguments against an article in the bill of rights of the constitution of Massachusetts. He believed, that the civil authority had no right to require men to support a teacher of piety, morality, and religion, or to attend public worship; that the church ought to have no connection with the state; that the kingdom of the Lord Jesus was not of this world, and was not dependent on the kingdoms of this world; and that the subject of religion should be left entirely to the consciences of men.

The publications of Mr. Backus are more numerous, than those of any other Baptist writer in America. An abridgement of the whole work was published in one volume, when the author was 80 years of age.

Little can be said in commendation of his three volumes of the history of the Baptists, of which he published an abridgment, brought down to 1804. It contains indeed many facts, for which the public is indebted to the patient industry of the writer, and it must be a very valuable work to the Baptists, as it presents a minute account of almost every church of that denomination in New England. But these facts are combined without much attention to the connection, which ought to subsist between them, and the author shows himself too much under the influence of the zeal of party.—Backus' Church History, III. 139–141; Benedict, II. 267–274.

BACKUS, CHARLES, D. D., an eminent minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1749. He lost his parents in his childhood, but, as he early discovered a love of science, his friends assisted him to a liberal education. He was graduated at Yale college in 1769. His theological education was directed by Dr. Hart of Preston. In 1774

he was ordained to the pastoral charge of the church in Somers, in which town he remained till his death Dec. 30, 1803, after a faithful ministry of more than twenty-nine years. In the last year of his residence at college the mind of Dr. Backus was impressed by Divine truth, and, although his conduct had not been immoral, he was deeply convinced of his sinfulness in the sight of God. He was for a time opposed to the doctrines of the gospel, particularly to the doctrine of the atonement, and of the dependence of man upon the special influences of the Holy Spirit to renew his heart. But at last his pride was humbled, and he was brought to an acquaintance with the way of salvation by a crucified Redeemer. From this time he indulged the hope that he was reconciled unto God. A humble and an exemplary Christian, under the afflictions of life he quietly submitted to the will of his Father in heaven. He was a plain, evangelical, impressive preacher. Knowing the worth of immortal souls, he taught with the greatest clearness the way of salvation through faith in the Redeemer, and enforced upon his hearers that holiness, without which no man can see the Lord. During his ministry there were four seasons of peculiar attention to religion among his people. Dr. Backus was eminent as a theologian. His retired situation and his eminence as an instructor drew around him many, who were designed for the Christian ministry. Nearly fifty young men were members of his theological school, among whom were Drs. Woods, Church, Hyde, Moore, Davis, Lovell, and Cooley. He refused invitations to the theological chair in Dartmouth and Yale. His only child, a son, a member of college, died in 1794. He was a very fervent, eloquent, extemporaneous preacher. In his last sickness he had much of the Divine presence. The last words, which he was heard to whisper, were, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men." He published the following sermons: at the ordination of A. Backus, 1791; of F. Reynolds, 1795; of J. Russell, Princeton, and T. M. Cooley, 1796; of J. H. Church and T. Snell, 1798; of Z. S. Moore and V. Gould; on death of J. Howard, 1785; of M. Chapin, 1794; of Mrs. Prudden; of six young persons, drowned at Wilbraham, 1799; to free masons, 1795; five on the truth of the Bible, 1797; century sermon, 1801; a volume on regeneration.

BACKUS, AZEL, D. D., president of Hamilton college, died Dec. 28, 1816, aged 51. He was the son of Jabez Backus of Norwich, Conn. His father bequeathed to him a farm in Franklin, which, he says, "I wisely exchanged for an education in college." He was graduated at Yale in 1787. While in college he was a deist; but his uncle and friend, Charles Backus of Somers, won him from infidelity through the Divine blessing, and reared him up for the ministry. From the time that he believed the gospel, he gloried in the cross. In early life he was ordained as the successor of Dr. Bellamy at Bethlehem, where he not only labored faithfully in the ministry, but also instituted and conducted a school of considerable celebrity. After the establishment of Hamilton college, near Utica, he was chosen the first president, and was succeeded by President Davis of Middlebury college. He was a man of an original cast of thought, distinguished by susceptibility and ardor of feeling and by vigorous and active piety. Of his benevolence and goodness no one could doubt. In his sermons, though familiar and not perhaps sufficiently correct and elevated in style, he was earnest, affectionate, and faithful. He published a sermon on the death of Gov. Wolcott, 1797; at the election, 1798; at the ordination of John Frost, Whitesborough, 1813. — Relig. Intel. i. 527, 592; Panoplist, XIII. 43.

BACON, NATHANIEL, general, a Virginia rebel, died Oct. 1, 1676. He was educated at the Inns of court in England, and after his arrival in this country was chosen a member of the council. He was a young man of fine accomplishments, of an interesting countenance, and of impressive eloquence. The treachery of the English in the murder of six Weroances or Indian chiefs, who came out of a besieged fort in order to negotiate a treaty, induced the savages to take terrible vengeance, inhumanly slaughtering sixty for the six, for they thought that ten for one was a just atonement for the loss of their great men. Their incursions caused the frontier plantations to be abandoned. Thus did the crime of the Virginians, as is always the case with public crime, draw after it punishment. The governor, Berkeley, resorted to the wretched policy of building a few forts on the frontiers, which could have no effect in preventing the incursions of the savages, who quickly found out, as an old history of the affair expresses it, "where the mouse-traps were set." The people, in their indignation, determined on wiser and more active measures. Having chosen Bacon as their general, he sent to their governor for a commission, but being refused, he marched without one at the head of eighty or ninety men, and in a battle defeated the Indians and destroyed their magazine. In the meantime the governor, at the instigation of men who were envious of the rising popularity of Bacon, proclaimed him a rebel May 29, 1676, and marched a force against him to "the middle plantation," or Williamsburg, but in a few days returned to meet the assembly. Bacon himself soon proceeded in a sloop with thirty men to Jamestown; but was taken by surprise and put in irons. At his trial before the governor and council June 10, he was acquitted and restored to the council, and promised also in two days a commission as general for the Indian war, agreeably to the passionate wishes of the people. Their regard to him will account for his acquittance. As the governor refused to sign the promised commission, Bacon soon appeared at the head of five hundred men and obtained it by force. Thus was he "crowned the darling of the people's hopes and desires." Nor did the people misjudge as to his capacity to serve them. By sending companies under select officers into the different counties to scour the thickets, swamps, and forests, where the Indians might be sheltered, he restored the dispersed people to their plantations. While he was thus honorably employed, the governor again proclaimed him a rebel. This measure induced him to counter-march to Williamsburg, whence he issued, Aug. 6, his declaration against the governor and soon drove him across the bay to Accomac. He also exacted of the people an oath to support him against the forces employed by the governor. He then prosecuted the Indian war. In September he again put the governor to flight and burned Jamestown, consisting of sixteen or eighteen houses and a brick church, the first that was built in Virginia. At this period he adopted a singular expedient to prevent an attack by the governor, besieged by him. He seized the wives of several of the governor's adherents and brought them into camp; then sent word to their husbands, that they would be placed in the fore front of his men. Entirely successful on the western shore, Bacon was about to cross the bay to attack the governor at Accomac, when he was called to surrender up his life "into the hands of that grim and all conquering captain, Death." In his sickness he implored the assistance of Mr. Wading, a minister, in preparing for the future world.

After the death of Bacon one Ingram, a weak man, assumed his commission, but was soon won over by the governor. Among his followers, who were executed, was Col. Hansford, who, with the feelings of Maj. Andre, had no favor to ask, but that "he might be shot like a soldier, and not be hanged like a dog;" also Capt. Carver, and Farlow, and Wilford. Maj. Cheisman died in prison. Drummond also, formerly governor of Carolina, and Col. Richard Lawrence were victims of this civil war, which, besides the loss of valuable lives, cost the colony 100,000 pounds. After reading the history of this rebellion, one is ready to persuade himself, that its existence might have been prevented, had the governor consulted the wishes of the people by giving Bacon the command in the Indian war; had he been faithful to his own promise; had he not yielded to the envious or malignant counsels of others. Had Bacon lived and been triumphant, he would probably have been remembered, not as an insurgent, but as the deliverer of his country. Yet it is very obvious, that under an organized government he did not prove himself a good citizen, but was an artful demagogue, and borne away by a reprehensible and rash ambition.—Death of Bacon; Keith's Hist. of Virginia, 156–162; Chalmers, I. 332–335; Beverly, 105; Wynne, II. 222, 223; Marshall, I. 198–201.

BACON, THOMAS, an Episcopal minister at Fredericktown, Md., died May 24, 1768. He compiled “a complete system of the revenue of Ireland,” published in 1737; also a complete body of the laws of Maryland, fol., 1765. He also wrote other valuable pieces.—Jenn.

BACON, JACOB, first minister of Keene, N. H., died at Rowley in 1787, aged 81. A graduate of Harvard in 1731, he was ordained in 1738. The settlement was broken up by the Indians in April, 1747. He afterwards was settled in Plymouth. His successors at K. were Carpenter, Sumner, Hall, Oliphant, and Barstow. The last was ordained July 1, 1818.

BACON, JOHN, minister, of Boston, died Oct. 25, 1820. He was a native of Canterbury, Conn., and was graduated at the college of New Jersey in 1765. After preaching for a time in Somerset county, Maryland, he and John Hunt were settled as colleague pastors over the old south church in Boston, as successors to Mr. Blair, Sept. 25, 1771. His style of preaching was argumentative; his manner approaching the severe. Difficulties soon sprung up in regard to the doctrines of the atonement and of imputation and the administration of baptism on the half-way covenant, which led to the dismissal of Mr. Bacon Feb. 8, 1775. His views seem to have been such as now prevail in New England, while his church advocated limited atonement and the notion of the actual transference of the sins of believers to Christ and of his obedience to them. Probably the more popular talents of Mr. Hunt had some influence in creating the difficulty. Mr. Bacon removed to Stockbridge, Berkshire county, where he died. He was a magistrate; a representative; associate and presiding judge of the common pleas; a member and president of the state senate; and a member of Congress. In his political views he accorded with the party of Mr. Jefferson. He married the widow of his predecessor, Mr. Cumming. She was the daughter of Ezekiel Goldthwait, register of deeds. His son, Ezekiel Bacon, was a distinguished member of Congress just before the war of 1812. He published a sermon after his installation, 1772; an answer to Huntington on a case of discipline, 1781; a speech on the courts of U. S., 1802; conjectures on the prophecies, 1805.—Wisner's Hist. O. S. Church, 33; Hist. of Berkshire, 104, 201.

BACON, MARY, died at Providence July 3, 1848, aged 108; born June 10, 1740, the daughter of John Matthewson.

ernment for establishing a colony in Africa, was an Episcopal clergyman. He proceeded in the Elizabeth to Sierra Leone with eighty-two colored people, accompanied by Mr. Bankson, also agent, and Dr. Crozer; and arrived March 9, 1820. The Augusta schooner was purchased and the people and stores were transhipped, and carried to Campelar in Sherbro river March 20th. Dr. Crozer and Mr. Bankson died in a few weeks, and Mr. Bacon being taken ill on the 17th April proceeded to Kent, at Cape Shilling, but died two days after his arrival, on the 3d of May. Many others died. The circular of the colonization society, signed by E. B. Caldwell, Oct. 26, describes this disastrous expedition.—Memoirs by Ashmun.

BADGER, STEPHEN, minister of Natick, Mass., was born in Charlestown in 1725 of humble parentage, and graduated at Harvard college in 1747, his name being last in the catalogue, when the names were arranged according to parental dignity. Employed by the commissioners for propagating the Gospel in New England, he was ordained as missionary over the Indians at Natick, as successor of Mr. Peabody, March 27, 1753, and died Aug. 28, 1803, aged 78 years. Mr. Biglow represents him as in reality a Unitarian, although not avowedly such. He published a letter from a pastor against the demand of a confession of particular sins in order to church fellowship; a letter concerning the Indians in the Mass. hist. collections, dated 1797; and two discourses on drunkenness, 1774, recently reprinted. In his letter concerning the Indians he states, that Deacon Ephraim, a good Christian Indian of his church, on being asked how it was to be accounted for, that Indian youths, virtuously educated in English families, were apt, when losing the restraints under which they had been brought up, to become indolent and intemperate like others, replied: “Ducks will be ducks, notwithstanding they are hatched by the hen,”—or in his own imperfect English—“Tucks will be tucks, for all ole hen he hatchum.” Another Indian of Natick once purchased a dram at a shop in Boston, and the next spring, after drinking rum at the same shop, found that the price of the poison was doubled. On inquiring the reason, the dealer replied, that he had kept the cask over winter, and it was as expensive as to keep a horse. “Hah,” replied the Indian, “he no eat so much hay; but I believe he drink as much water!” Of the strength of rum the Naticks were unhappily too good judges. It is deplorable, that in 1797 there were among the Natick Indians, for whom the apostolic Eliot labored, only two or three church-members, and not one who could speak their language, into which he translated the Bible. Among the many causes of their degeneracy may be mentioned the sale of their lands, their intermixture with blacks and whites, leaving only about twenty clear-blooded Indians, their unconquerable indolence and propensity to excess, and perhaps the want of zeal on the part of their religious teachers. In 1670 there were forty or fifty church-members. The number of Indians in 1749 was one hundred and sixty; in 1763 only thirty-seven. The war of 1759 and a putrid fever had destroyed many of them.—Biglow's Hist. Natick, 59–69, 77; Col. Hist. Soc. v. 32–45.

BADGER, WILLIAM, governor of N. H., died at Gilmanton Sept. 21, 1852, aged 73. He was governor in 1834 and 1835 and had sustained many offices.

BADGER, RACHEL, Mrs., died at Lyndeborough, N. H., 1834, aged 100.

BADGER, JOSEPH, died at Perrysburgh May 5, 1846, aged 87, a soldier of the Revolution, and chaplain under Harrison at Fort Meigs; an exemplary Christian.

BADLAM, STEPHEN, brigadier-general of the militia, died in Aug., 1815. He was born in Canton, Mass., and joined the American army in 1775. In the next year, as major of artillery, he took possession, July 4th, of the mount, which from that circumstance was called Mount Independence. He did good service with his fieldpiece in the action at Fort Stanwix, under Willett, in Aug., 1777. His residence was at Dorchester, where he was an eminently useful citizen, acting as a magistrate and a deacon of the church.—Codman's Funeral Sermon; Panoplist, xi. 572.

BAILEY, MOUNTJOY, general, died at Washington March 22, 1836, aged 81; an officer of the Revolution.

BAILEY, EBENEZER, died at Lynn Mineral Springs Aug., 1839, long an eminent teacher of youth in Boston. A lock-jaw was occasioned by running a nail into his foot.

BAILEY, MOSES, died in Andover, Mass., March 14, 1842, aged 98, leaving one hundred and thirty-five descendants.

BAILEY, JACOB, a graduate of Harvard in 1755, died in 1808, an Episcopal preacher in Pownalborough and Nova Scotia. His journal was published in 1853, with a biography by W. J. Bartlet.

BAILY, JOHN, an excellent minister in Boston, died in 1697, aged 53. He was born in 1644 in Lancashire, England. From his earliest years his mind seems to have been impressed by the truths of religion. While he was yet very young, his mother one day persuaded him to lead the devotions of the family. When his father, who was a very dissolute man, heard of it, his heart was touched with a sense of his sin in the neglect of this duty, and he became afterwards an eminent Christian. After having been carefully instructed in classical learning, he commenced preaching the gospel about the age of twenty-two.

He soon went to Ireland, where by frequent labors he much injured his health, which was never perfectly restored. He spent about fourteen years of his life at Limerick, and was exceedingly blessed in his exertions to turn men from darkness to light. Yet while in this place as well as previously, he was persecuted by men, who were contending for form and ceremony in violation of the precepts and the spirit of the gospel. While he was a young man, he often travelled far by night to enjoy the ordinances of the gospel, privately administered in dissenting congregations, and for this presumptuous offence he was sometimes thrown into Lancashire jail. As soon as he began to preach, his fidelity was tried, and he suffered imprisonment because in his conscience he could not conform to the established church. While at Limerick a deanery was offered him, if he would conform, with the promise of a bishopric upon the first vacancy. But disdaining worldly things, when they came in competition with duty to his Saviour and the purity of Divine worship, he rejected the offer in true disinterestedness and elevation of spirit. But neither this proof, that he was intent on higher objects, than this world presents, nor the blamelessness of his life, nor the strong hold, which he had in the affections of his acquaintance, could preserve him from again suffering the hardships of imprisonment, while the papists in the neighborhood enjoyed liberty and countenance. When he was before the judges he said to them, "If I had been drinking, and gaming, and carousing at a tavern with my company, my lords, I presume, that would not have procured my being thus treated as an offender. Must praying to God, and preaching of Christ with a company of Christians, who are peaceable and inoffensive and as serviceable to his majesty and the government as any of his subjects; must this be a greater crime?" The recorder answered, "We will have you to know it is a greater crime." His flock often fasted and prayed for his release; but he was discharged on this condition only, that he should depart from the country within a limited time.

He came to New England in 1684, and was ordained the minister of Watertown, Oct. 6, 1686, with his brother, Thomas Bailey, as his assistant; he removed to Boston in 1692, and became assistant minister of the first church July 17, 1693, succeeding Mr. Moody. In 1696 Mr. Wadsworth was settled. His brother, Thomas, who died in Watertown in Jan., 1689, wrote Latin odes at Lindsay in 1668, which are in manuscript in the library of the Mass. Historical Society.

He was a man eminent for piety, of great sensibility of conscience, and very exemplary in his life. It was his constant desire to be patient and resigned under the calamities, which were appointed him, and to fix his heart more upon things above. — His ministry was very acceptable in different places, and he was a warm and animated preacher. Dunton says, "I heard him upon these words — 'Looking unto Jesus' — and I thought he spake like an angel." But with all his faithfulness he saw many disconsolate hours. He was distressed with doubts respecting himself; but his apprehensions only attached him the more closely to his Redeemer.

In his last sickness he suffered under a complication of disorders; but he did not complain. His mind was soothed in dwelling upon the sufferings of his Saviour. At times he was agitated with fears, though they had not respect, as he said, so much to the end, as to what he might meet in the way. His last words were, speaking of Christ, "O, what shall I say? He is altogether lovely. His glorious angels are come for me!" He then closed his eyes, and his spirit passed into eternity. He published an address to the people of Limerick; and man's chief end to glorify God, a sermon preached at Watertown, 1689. — Middleton's Evang. Biography, IV. 101-105; Nonconformist Memorial, I. 331-335; Mather's Funeral Sermon; Magnalia, III. 224-238; Eliot.

BAINBRIDGE, WILLIAM, commodore, died at Philadelphia July 27, 1833, aged 59. He was born at Princeton, N. J., the son of Dr. Absalom B.: in 1798 he was a lieutenant in the navy; in 1800 he commanded a frigate and sailed for Algiers. In consequence of his vessel's grounding before Tripoli, he was captured in the Philadelphia in 1800. In the Constitution he captured the British frigate Java, Dec. 29, 1812. After the war he had the command at several naval stations: for several years he was commissioner of the navy board.

BAIRD, THOMAS D., editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Herald, died Jan. 7, 1839, aged 65.

BALCH, WILLIAM, minister of Bradford, Mass., was born at Beverly in 1704 and graduated in 1724. He was a descendant of John Balch, who came to this country about 1625 and died at Salem in 1648. Ordained in 1728 over the second church in Bradford, he there passed his days, and died Jan. 12, 1792, aged 87 years.

About the year 1742 or 1743 several members, a minority of his church, dissatisfied with his preaching, applied to a neighboring church to admonish their pastor, agreeably to the Platform. A council was convened, which censured the conduct of the complainants. But in 1746 Mr. Wigglesworth and Mr. Chipman, ministers of Ipswich and Beverly, accused Mr. Balch of propagating Arminian tenets. He wrote a reply, mingling keen satire with solid argument. After this, they, who were dissatisfied with Mr. Balch, built a meeting-house for themselves. In his old age he received a colleague. He lived in retirement, occupied in agriculture, and raising the best apples in Essex. His mental powers retained their vigor in old age. New writings delighted him; and he engaged freely in theological discussion. — He published the following discourses: on reconciliation, 1740; faith and works, 1743; at the election, 1749; at the convention, 1760; account of the proceedings of the 2d church; reply to Wigglesworth and Chipman, 1746. — Eliot; Mass. Historical Collections, IV. s. s. 145.

BALCH, THOMAS, first minister of the 2d parish of Dedham, died in 1774, aged about 60. He graduated in 1733, and was ordained in 1736. He published a sermon at the ordination of J. Newman, Edgartown, 1747; Christ present, 1748; at election, 1749; ordination of W. Patten, 1757; at artillery election, 1763.

BALCH, STEPHEN B., D. D., died at Georgetown, D. C., Sept. 22, 1833, aged 86.

BALCH, JOSEPH, died in Johnstown, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1855, aged 95, a soldier of the Revolution, then of Wethersfield. At the age of about 80 he made a Christian profession. On the day of his death he was attending a public fast: the Bible fell from his hands, and he died.

BALDWIN, EBENEZER, minister of Danbury, Conn., was graduated at Yale college in 1763, and was tutor in that seminary from 1766 to 1770. He was ordained as successor of Mr. Warner and Mr. White, Sept. 19, 1770, and died Oct. 1, 1776, aged 31 years. He was a man of great talents and learning, an unwearied student, grave in manners, and an able supporter of the sound doctrines of the gospel. He left a legacy of about 300 pounds to his society, which is appropriated to the support of religion. — Robbins' Centennial Sermon.

BALDWIN, JONATHAN, died at Brookfield in 1788, aged 57. He was a captain in the French war; and was a prominent member of the Mass. congress in 1774: a colonel in the Revolutionary struggle. A soldier, a patriot, a Christian, he was also a friend of literature, leaving a bequest to Leicester academy.

BALDWIN, ABRAHAM, a distinguished statesman, was born in Connecticut in 1754 and graduated at Yale college in 1772. From 1775 to 1779 he was a tutor in that seminary, being an eminent classical and mathematical scholar. Having studied law, he removed to Savannah and was admitted a counsellor at the Georgia bar, and in three months was elected a member of the state legislature. At the first session he originated the plan of the university of Georgia, drew up the charter, by which it was endowed with forty thousand acres of land, and, vanquishing many prejudices, by the aid of John Milledge persuaded the assembly to adopt the project. The college was located at Athens, and Josiah Meigs was appointed its first president. Being elected a delegate to congress in 1786, he was an active member of the convention, which formed the present constitution of the United States, during its session from May 25 to Sept. 17, 1787. After its adoption he was continued a member of congress until 1799, when he was appointed as colleague with Mr. Milledge a senator, in which station he remained until his death, at Washington city, March 4, 1807, aged 53 years. His remains were placed by the side of his friend and former colleague, Gen. J. Jackson, whom he had followed to the grave just one year before. He was the brother-in-law of Joel Barlow. Having never been married, his economy put it in his power to assist many young men in their education. His father dying in 1787 with little property, six orphan children, his half brothers and sisters, were protected and educated by him, and owed every thing to his care and affection. In public life he was industrious and faithful. Though firm in his own republican principles during the contests of the last ten years of his life, he was yet moderate, and indulgent towards his opponents. Until a week before his death his public services for twenty-two years had been uninterrupted by sickness. — National Intelligencer.

BALDWIN, THOMAS, D. D., a Baptist minister in Boston, was born in Norwich, Conn., Dec. 23, 1753. After he had removed to Canaan, in New Hampshire, he became pious, and joined the Baptist church in 1781. It was with pain, that he thus forsook his connections and early friends, for he had been educated a pedo-Baptist and his venerable minister at Norwich was his grand uncle. Having for some time conducted the religious exercises at public meetings, in Aug., 1782, he ventured for the first time to take a text and preach doctrinally and methodically. His advantages for intellectual culture had been few. At the request of the church he was ordained June 11, 1783, as an evangelist, and he performed the duties of pastor for seven years, besides preaching often during each week in the towns within a circle of fifty miles, "chiefly at his own charges," sometimes receiving small presents, but never having a public contribution. In these journeys he was obliged to climb rocky steep and to pass through dismal swamps; and as the poor people had no silver, and the continental currency was good for nothing, sometimes the travelling preacher was obliged either to beg or to starve. For several years he was chosen a member of the legislature.

In 1790 he was invited to Boston, as the pastor of the second Baptist church. He now successfully pursued a course of study, and by his unweary exertions acquired a high rank as a preacher. His church, though small in 1790, became under his care numerous and flourishing. Of his own denomination in New England he was the head, and to him all his brethren looked for advice. Besides being connected with most of the benevolent institutions of Boston, he was a member of the convention for revising the constitution of the state, and just before his death was fixed upon, by one party among the people, as a candidate for an elector of president of the United States. He died very suddenly at Waterville, Me., whither he had gone to attend the commencement, Aug. 29, 1825, aged 71 years. The following stanza on his death will apply to a multitude of others, recorded in this work.

"*He was a good man. Yet amid our tears
Sweet, grateful thoughts within our bosoms rise ;
We trace his spirit up to brighter spheres,
And think with what pure, rapturous surprise
He found himself translated to the skies :
From night at once awoke to endless noon.
Oh ! with what transport did his eager eyes
Behold his Lord in glory ? 'T was the boon
His heart had longed for ! Why deem we it came to soon ?*"

He published the following discourses: at the thanksgiving, 1795; quarterly sermon; at the concert of prayer; account of revival of religion, 1799; on the death of Lieut-Gov. Phillips; election sermon, 1802; on the eternal purpose of God; at thanksgiving; before a missionary society, 1804; at the ordination of D. Merrill, 1805; installation of J. Winchell, 1814; before the female asylum, 1806; on the death of Dr. Stillman; at the artillery election, 1807; and the baptism of believers only, and particular communion vindicated, 12mo. 1806. Of this work the first and second parts were originally published in 1789 and 1794.

BALDWIN, CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, librarian of the Antiquarian Society at Worcester, was killed by the upsetting of a stage, in which he was travelling, at Norwich, Ohio, Aug. 20, 1835, aged 35. He was riding with the driver, and leaped from the stage for security, but fell back from the bank.

BALDWIN, LOAMMI, died at Charlestown, June 30, 1838, of paralysis. He was graduated in 1800, and educated for the law, but became one of the most distinguished civil engineers of our country. The dry docks at the navy yards at Charlestown and near Norfolk and other public works attested his skill. He was lamented by many friends.

BALDWIN, ELIHU W., D. D., president of Wabash college, Crawfordsville, Ind., died Oct. 15, 1840, aged 50. Born at Durham, N. Y., he graduated at Yale in 1812, studied at Andover, and was a minister in New York from 1820 to 1835. He died in peace and joyful hope.

BALDWIN, ELI, D. D., of the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, N. J., died in 1839.

BALDWIN, ASHBEL, died at Rochester, New York, Feb. 8, 1846, aged 89. A graduate of Yale, he served in the army, and was ordained by Bishop Seabury in 1785—the first Episcopal ordination in the U. S. He was secretary of the general Episcopal convention many years.

BALDWIN, HENRY, Judge, died in Philadelphia Apr. 21, 1844, aged 65. A native of New Haven, he graduated in 1797, and settled in Pennsylvania. He was a member of Congress and judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and was highly respected.

BALDWIN, SIMEON, judge, died in New Haven May 26, 1851, aged 89. He was born in Norwich and graduated 1781. After being a tutor for several years he commenced the practice of the law in 1786. He was in congress from 1803 to 1805; a judge of the superior court in 1806; in 1822 president of the Farmington canal board; and mayor of the city in 1826.

BALDWIN, METHUSEL, minister of Scotchtown, N. Y., died in 1847, aged 84.

BALDWIN, CYRUS, Dr., died in Goodrich, Mich., Aug., 1855, aged 81. Born in Worcester, he assisted as an earnest Christian in founding churches in Baldwinsville, N. Y., and elsewhere. He lived in Hebron, and in Rome, Mich., in Grand Blanc, in Atlas, and Goodrich.

BALFOUR, WALTER, died in Charlestown, Jan. 3, 1852, aged 74; a Scotchman, who came early to this country as a Presbyterian preacher. After ten years he became a Baptist, and in a few years more a Universalist. He published inquiries, essays, reply and letters to Mr. Stuart, and letters to Mr. Hudson. He had also a controversy with Sabine and Whitman.

BALL, HEMAN, D. D., died at Rutland, Vt., Dec. 17, 1821, aged 57, highly respected and of extensive influence. He was a native of West Springfield, and a graduate of Dartmouth in 1791. He published a sermon on the death of Washington.

BALL, LUCY, missionary to China, died June 6, 1844, aged 37. Her name was Mills of New Haven; her husband was Dyer Pall, who embarked in 1838. Her oldest daughter made a profession of religion in the presence of all the missionaries at Hong Kong a few weeks before her mother's death.

BALLANTINE, JOHN, minister of Westfield, was the son of John B. of Boston, clerk of court and register of deeds, and of Mary Winthrop, daughter of Adam W.; was graduated in 1735 and was ordained June 17, 1741. He died Feb. 12, 1776, aged 59. His wife was Mary, daughter of Luther Gay and sister of Dr. Gay of Suffield. His son, Wm. G., a graduate of 1771, died in 1854; he was the minister of Washington, Mass., ancestor of Rev. Henry B., missionary to India. His daughter, Mary, married Gen. Ashley. He published a sermon on the march of a company to Crown Point June 2, 1756.

BALLARD, JOHN B., died in New York Jan. 29, 1856, aged 60. A native of Dudley, Mass., he was the pastor of several Baptist churches, then a dozen years the agent of the Sunday school union in N. C. and Ky.; last a useful tract missionary six years in N. Y.

BALLOU, HOSEA, died June 7, 1851, aged 80. Born in Richmond, N. H., the son of a Baptist minister, he was a member of the Baptist church; but on becoming a Universalist he was excluded from the church. He was settled in Dana, Barnard, Vt., Portsmouth, Salem; and in the School street church in Boston from 1817 till his death. He published two orations; a dedication and ordination sermon; orthodoxy unmasked; reply to T. Merritt; divine benevolence, 1815; strictures on Channing's sermon; series of lecture sermons, 1818; series of letters; on the atonement, 1828.

BANCROFT, AARON, D. D., died at Worcester Aug. 19, 1839, aged 84. Born at Reading in 1735, he graduated at Cambridge in 1778, and was the minister of a Unitarian church from 1786 till his death. He was the father of Mr. Bancroft, the historian.

He published eulogy on Washington, 1800; life of Washington, 1807; election sermon, 1801; on conversion, 1818; convention sermon, 1820; sermons on the doctrines of the gospel, 1822; on the death of John Adams; at the end of fifty years of his ministry; and about twenty-five other single sermons and controversial pieces.

BANISTER, JOHN, an eminent botanist, was a native of England. After passing some time in the West Indies he came to Virginia and settled on James River, near James Town. Rees speaks of him as a clergyman. In 1680 he transmitted to Mr. Ray a catalogue of plants, observed by him in Virginia, which was published by Ray in the second volume of his history of plants, in the preface to the supplement of which work, published in 1704, he speaks of Banister as an illustrious man, who had long resided in Virginia, devoted to botanical pursuits, and as drawing with his own hand the figures of the rarer species. He mentions also, that he had fallen a victim to his favorite pursuit before he had completed a work, in which he was engaged, on the natural history of Virginia. In one of his botanical excursions, while clambering the rocks, Banister fell and was killed. This event occurred after 1687 and probably before the end of the century. Many of his descendants are living in Virginia and are very respectable. In honor of him Dr. Houston named a plant Banisteria, of which twenty-four species are enumerated. Lawson says, he "was the greatest virtuoso we ever had on the continent." Besides his "catalogue of plants," his principal work in the philosophical transactions 1693, other communications on natural history were published; observations on the natural productions of Jamaica; the insects of Virginia, 1700; curiosities in Virginia; observations on the musca lupus; on several sorts of snails; a description of the pistolochia or serpentaria Virginiana, the snake root. — Barton's Med. Jour. II. 134-139; Ray's Sup.; Lawson, 136.

BANNEKER, BENJAMIN, a negro astronomer, died in Baltimore county, Md., in Oct., 1806, aged 70. His parents obtained their freedom, and sent him to a common school, where he acquired a great readiness in calculation. He assisted Ellicott in laying out the city of Washington. Procuring Mayer's tables, Ferguson's astronomy, and some instruments, he made sets of observations for an almanac for the years 1792 and 1793. He published a letter to the secretary of state, 1792.

BANNISTER, WILLIAM B., died at Newburyport July 1, 1853, aged 79. Born in Brookfield, he was a graduate of Dartmouth in 1797; he was a man of wealth, pious, and benevolent. In his age he married Miss Grant, the eminent teacher at Ipswich, who survived him. For some years he was a member of the senate, and a trustee of Amherst college and a visitor of the theological seminary at Andover, and a worthy member of various charitable institutions, to which he bequeathed about 40,000 dollars, most of his property.

BARBOUR, THOMAS, colonel, was a whig of the Revolution and in 1769 was a member of the house of burgesses of Virginia, which made the first protest against the stamp act. He died at Barboursville May 16, 1825, aged 90. For 60 years he had discharged the duties of a civil magistrate, and was many years the sheriff of the county, enjoying in a high degree the confidence of his fellow citizens. He was the father of James Barbour, the secretary of war.

BARBOUR, PHILIP P., a judge of the Supreme court, and a member of congress 1814-25, and speaker, died at Washington Feb. 25, 1841, aged about 60. He was a man of talents and eloquence, and successful. His disease was ossification of the heart.

BARBOUR, JOHN S., died in Culpepper co., Va., Jan. 12, 1855, aged 65; from 1823 to 1833 a member of Congress, a man of ability and influence.

BARCLAY, ROBERT, governor of East Jersey, the author of the "Apology for the Quakers," died in 1690, aged 41. He was born in 1648 in Scotland, and receiving his education at Paris he at first imbibed the Catholic tenets, but afterwards with his father embraced the principles of the Quakers. His book was published in Latin in 1676, and translated by himself. He travelled with William Penn in England and on the continent. In 1682, when East Jersey was transferred to Penn and eleven associates, he was appointed the governor, though he never came to this country; in which office lord Neil Campbell succeeded him in 1685. His brother, John, a useful citizen of Jersey, died at Amboy in 1731, leaving two sons. His grandson, Alexander, was comptroller of the customs in Philadelphia, and died in 1771. — Jennison.

BARCLAY, HENRY, D. D., an Episcopal clergyman in New York, was a native of Albany, and graduated at Yale college in 1734. In England he received orders in the church, and was appointed missionary to the Mohawk Indians. Having served in this capacity for some years with but little success, he was called to the city of New York and appointed rector of Trinity church. In this respectable station he continued till his death, in 1765. The translation of the liturgy into the Mohawk language, made under his direction and that of Rev. W. Andrews and J. Ogilvie, was printed in 1769. Mr. Ogilvie succeeded him both among the Indians and at New York. — Life of Ritten. 245; Miller's Retrospect, II. 356.

BARD, JOHN, a learned physician, died March 30, 1799, aged 83. He was born in Burlington, N. J., Feb. 1, 1716. His father, Peter Bard, an exile from France in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, came to this country in 1703 as a merchant; he soon married the daughter of Dr. Marmion, and was for many years a member of the council and a judge of the supreme court.

Mr. Bard received his early education under the care of Mr. Annan of Philadelphia, a very eminent teacher. About the age of fifteen he was bound an apprentice for seven years to Dr. Kearsly, a surgeon of unhappy temper and rigorous in the treatment of his pupils. Under his thralldom the kindness of Mrs. Kearsly and the friendship of Dr. Franklin beguiled his sorrows. He engaged in business in 1737 and soon acquired a large share of practice and became much respected. In 1743 he was induced by urgent applications from New York to remove to that city to supply the loss of several eminent physicians. Here he continued till within a few months of his death. In the year 1795, when the yellow fever had put to flight a number of physicians, who were in the meridian of life, the veteran Dr. Bard, though verging towards his eightieth year, remained at his post. In May, 1798, he removed to his estate at Hyde Park, near Poughkeepsie. Here he continued in the enjoyment of perfect health, till he felt a paralytic stroke, which in a few days occasioned his death. He was a firm believer in the truth and excellency of the Christian religion. In a letter to his son, Dr. Samuel Bard, he said, "above all things suffer not yourself by any company or example to depart, either in your conversation or practice, from the highest reverence to God and your religion." In his old age he was cheerful and remarkable for his gratitude to his heavenly Father.

Dr. Bard was eminent in his profession, and his practice was very extensive. Soon after the close of the war with Great Britain, on the re-establishment of the medical society of the state of New York, he was elected its president, and he was placed in the chair for six or seven successive years. He possessed a singular ingenuity and quickness in discriminating diseases; yet he did not presumptuously confide in his penetration, but was remarkably particular in his inquiries into the circumstances of the sick. Ever desirous of removing the disorders, to which the human frame is subject, his anxiety and attention were not diminished, when called to visit the indigent, from whom he could not expect compensation. His conduct through his whole life was marked by the strictest honor and integrity. In conversation he was polite, affable, cheerful, and entertaining. To his pupils he was not only an instructor, but a father. In the early part of his life he devoted much attention to polite learning, in which he made great proficiency. He possessed a correct and elegant taste, and wrote with uncommon accuracy and precision. He drew up an essay on the pleurisy of Long Island in 1749, which paper was not published; a paper, inserted in the London Medical Observations; and several papers on the yellow fever and the evidence of its importation, inserted in the American Medical Register. In 1750 he assisted Dr. Middleton in the first recorded dissection in America, that of Hermannus Carroll, executed for murder. — Thacher's Med. Biog. 96-103; M'Vicker's life of S. Bard.

BARD, SAMUEL, M. D., son of the preceding, died May 24, 1821, aged 79. He was born in Philadelphia April 1, 1742. When a boy, in order to screen a servant, who had broken his father's cane, he falsely took the blame to himself. His father praised his generosity, but severely punished his falsehood, thus giving him a lesson on the value of truth, which he was careful to transmit to his children. From his mother he received early impressions in favor of religion. Residing one summer, on account of ill health, in the family of Lieut.-Gov. Colden, his father's friend, he acquired a taste for botany under the teaching of Miss Colden. His skill in painting enabled him to perpetuate the beauty of plants. While a student at Columbia college he formed the habit of early rising, at daylight in summer and an hour previous to it in winter, which he continued through life. In Sept., 1761, he embarked for England in order to obtain a thorough medical education, and was absent, in France, England, and Scotland, five years. His professional studies were pursued with undiminished zeal, and especially under the illustrious teachers in the school of Edinburgh. Such was his skill in botany, that he obtained the annual medal, given by Dr. Hope, the professor, for the best collection of plants. He received his degree at Edinburgh in May, 1765. On his return he found his father in debt for his education, which had cost more than a thousand pounds; he entered into partnership with him and for three years drew nothing beyond his expenses from the profits of the business, amounting to £1500 a year. Having thus honorably discharged this debt, he married his cousin Mary Bard, a lady of beauty and accomplishments, to whom he had long been attached. He formed this connection on a stock of £100, observing, that "his wife's economy would double his earnings."

Dr. Bard formed the plan of the medical school of New York, which was established within a year after his return. He was appointed professor of the practice of physic. Medical degrees were first conferred in 1769. In the same year the hospital was founded by his exertions; but the building was burnt, causing a delay of the establishment until 1791. In 1774 he delivered a course of chemical lectures. In the time of the war he left the city, placing his family in the house of his father at Hyde Park; but, anxious to provide for his wife and children, and to secure his property, he the next year by permission returned to New York, while the enemy had possession of it, and engaged anew in his professional business, after being a considerable time without a call and reduced to his last guinea. After the return of peace Washington selected him as his family physician. At this period he lost four out of his six children by the scarlatina, which prevailed in a virulent form, attended with delirium. In consequence of the illness of Mrs. Bard he withdrew from business for a year, devoting himself to her. A prayer for her recovery was found among his papers. In 1784 he returned to the city. At this period he devoted 5000 guineas to enable his father to free himself from debt. At another time, when he had accumulated 1500 guineas, he sent that sum to England, but lost it by the failure of the banker. On receiving the intelligence, he said to his wife, "We are ruined;" but she replied, "Never mind the loss, we will soon make it up again." Having formed the purpose to retire from business, he in 1795 took Dr. Hosack into partnership, and in 1798 removed to his seat in the neighborhood of his father at Hyde Park. But, when the yellow fever appeared, he resolutely returned to his post. By his fearless exposure of himself he took the disease, but nursed by his faithful wife he recovered. The remaining twenty-three years of his life were spent in happy retirement, surrounded by his children and grandchildren, delighted with their society, and finding much enjoyment also in agricultural improvements, in contemplating the beauties of nature, and in the gratification of his continued thirst for knowledge. For the benefit of those, who with himself had engaged in rearing merino sheep, he published "The Shepherd's Guide." In 1813 he was appointed president of the college of physicians and surgeons. His discourses, on conferring degrees, were very impressive. He died of the pleurisy, and his wife of the same disorder the preceding day; they were buried in one grave. It had long been their wish to be thus united in death, and a remarkable dream of Mrs. Bard to this effect was remembered.

Dr. Bard was attached to the Episcopal mode of religious worship. The church at Hyde Park was chiefly founded by him in 1811, and to provide for the absence of its rector he procured a license to act as lay reader at the age of seventy. He regularly devoted a part of the morning to religious reading and reflection. Of religion he said to his son, William Bard, Esq., "This is our stronghold, our castle and rock of defence, our refuge in times of adversity, our comforter under misfortune, our cheerful companion and friendly monitor in the hours of gladness and prosperity." The following is an extract from the form of daily devotion, used by himself and wife: "O God! enlighten our understanding, that we may comprehend thy will, strengthen our resolution to obey thy commands, endow us with resignation under thy dispensations, and fill our hearts with love and gratitude for all thy benefits. Give unto us, O Lord, whose lives thou hast continued to so late a day, sincere and true repentance, and grant, that as age advances upon us, our minds may be more and more enlightened by the knowledge of thy will, more resigned to thy dispensations, and more invigorated with the resolution to obey thy commands. Calm all our thoughts and fears; give peace and quiet to our latter days; and so support us by thy grace through the weakness and infirmities of age, that we may die in humble hope and confidence of thy merciful pardon through the merits of our Redeemer." He published a treatise de viribus opii, 1765; on angina suffocativa, repub. in vol. I. Amer. Phil. Soc.; on the use of cold in hemorrhage; compendium of midwifery, 1807, and subsequent editions; many occasional addresses to public bodies; and anniversary discourses to medical students. — Life by McVicker; Thacher's Med. Biog. 103-143.

BARKER, JOHN, general, an officer of the Revolution, died at Philadelphia April 3, 1818, aged 72; he was sheriff, mayor, and a popular orator.

BARLOW, JOEL, an eminent statesman and poet, died in Poland Dec. 22, 1812, aged 58. He was born at Reading, Conn., March 24, 1754, and was the youngest of ten children. His father, Samuel, a respectable farmer, died while he was yet at school, leaving him property sufficient only to defray the expenses of his education. In 1775 he was placed at Dartmouth college; but he very soon removed to Yale college, where he was graduated in 1778, being ranked among the first of his class, for talents and learning, and particularly conspicuous for his skill in poetry. During the vacations of the college he more than once seized his musket, and repaired as a volunteer to the camp, where four of his brothers were on duty. He was present at several skirmishes, and is said to have fought bravely in the battle of the White Plains.

After leaving college he engaged for a short time in the study of the law; but, being urged to qualify himself for the office of chaplain, he applied himself diligently to the study of theology, and at the end of six weeks was licensed to preach. He immediately joined the army and discharged the duties of his new station until the return of peace. As a preacher he was much respected. But in the camp he continued to cultivate his taste for poetry, writing patriotic songs, and composing, in part, his Vision of Columbus. He also published in 1780 an elegy on the death of his early friend and patron, Titus Hosmer, and in 1781 a poem entitled "The Prospect of Peace," which he had pronounced at Commencement. About this time he married Ruth Baldwin of New Haven, sister of Abraham Baldwin.

In 1783, after the army was disbanded, he returned to the study of the law at Hartford, where for his immediate support he established a weekly newspaper. The original articles, which he inserted, gave it celebrity and a wide circulation. In 1785 he was admitted to the bar and in the same year published a corrected and enlarged edition of Watts' version of the Psalms with a collection of hymns. It was printed at Hartford by "Barlow & Babcock." This work was undertaken at the request of the General Association of the ministers of Connecticut, and published by their recommendation. Many of the psalms were altered so as to be adapted to the American churches, several were written almost anew, and several, which had been omitted by Dr. Watts, were supplied. Barlow inserted also some original hymns. In 1787 he published the Vision of Columbus, a large poem, with flattering success. It was dedicated to Louis XVI. Some of its interesting passages are said to be imitations or copies of descriptions in the Incas of Marmontel.

About this time he gave up his concern in the weekly paper, and opened a book-shop, chiefly with a view to the sale of his poem and of the new edition of the psalms. Having accomplished these objects, he quitted the business and engaged in the practice of the law. But in this profession he was not successful. He was concerned in several occasional publications at Hartford, particularly in the Anarchiad, a very singular poem, which was projected by Dr. Hopkins, and which had considerable political influence. In an oration July 4, 1787, he earnestly recommended an efficient general government, the new Constitution being then under consideration of the convention at Philadelphia. Urged by the necessity of providing for his subsistence, he went to Europe in 1788 as the agent of the Scioto land company, but ignorant of their fraudulent designs. From England he crossed over to France, where he made sale of some of the lands; but in the result he was left without any resource for his maintenance, excepting his own talents and reputation. At this period his zeal for republicanism induced him to take an active part in the French Revolution, being particularly connected with the Girondists, or the moderate party. In 1791 he went to England, where he published the first part of his "Advice to the Privileged Orders," a work in which he reprobates the feudal system, the national church establishments, the military system, the administration of justice, and the system of revenue and finance, as they exist in the royal and aristocratical governments of Europe. In Feb., 1792, he published the "Conspiracy of Kings," a poem of about four hundred lines, occasioned by the first coalition of the continental sovereigns against France; and in the autumn of the same year a letter to the national convention of France, in which he recommends among other measures the abolition of the connection between the government and the national church. These publications brought him some profit as well as fame. At the close of this year he was deputed by the London constitutional society to present their address to the French national convention, which conferred upon him the rights of a French citizen. Fearful of the resentment of the English government, he now fixed his residence in France. A deputation being soon sent to Savoy to organize it as a department of the Republic, he accompanied it with his friend, Gregoire, to Chamberry, the capital, where he resided several months, and at the request of his legislative friends wrote an address to the people of Piedmont, inciting them to throw off their allegiance to their king. At this time he also composed "Hasty Pudding," a mock didactic poem, the most popular of his poetical productions. After his return to Paris he translated Volney's Ruins, but his time was principally occupied by commercial speculations, in which he acquired a large property. Shocked by the atrocities of the Revolution, he took little part in politics.

About the year 1795 he went to the north of Europe to accomplish some private business, entrusted to him, and on his return was appointed by President Washington as consul at Algiers, with powers to negotiate a treaty of peace with the Dey and redeem the American captives on the coast of Barbary. He immediately left Paris, and passing through Spain crossed over to Algiers. He soon concluded a treaty and negotiated also a treaty with Tripoli, rescuing many American citizens from slavery. His humane exertions were attended with great danger. In 1797 he resigned his consulship and returned to Paris, where he purchased the splendid hotel of the Count Clermont de Tonnerre, in which he lived for some years in a sumptuous manner.

On the occurrence of the rupture between his native country and France, he published a letter to the people of the United States on the measures of Mr. Adams' administration. This was soon followed by a second part, containing speculations on various political subjects. At this period he presented a memoir to the French government, denouncing the whole system of privateering, and contending for the right of neutrals to trade in articles contraband of war.

In the spring of 1805, having sold his real estate in France, he returned to America after an absence of nearly seventeen years. He purchased a beautiful situation and house near Georgetown, but within the limits of the city of Washington. This place he called "Kalorama." He printed in 1806 a prospectus of a national institution at Washington, which should combine a university with a learned society, together with a military and naval academy and a school of fine arts. In compliance with this project a bill was introduced into the Senate, but it was not passed into a law.

In 1808 he published the Columbiad, a poem, which had been the labor of half his life, in the most splendid volume, which had ever issued from the American press. It was adorned by excellent engravings, executed in London, and was inscribed to Robert Fulton, with whom he had long lived in friendship and whom he regarded as his adopted son. This work, though soon published in a cheaper form, has never acquired much popularity. As an epic poem it has great faults both in the plan and the execution. It is justly exposed to severe criticism for some extravagant and absurd flights of fancy and for the many new-coined and uncouth words which it contains. Its sentiments also have been thought hostile to Christianity. Gregoire addressed a letter to the author, reproving him for placing the cross among the symbols of fraud, folly, and error. Mr. Barlow in his reply declared, that he was not an unbeliever, or that he had not renounced Christianity, and justified the description, which had offended Gregoire, on the ground that he had been accustomed to regard the cross not as the emblem of Christianity itself but of its corruptions by popery.

In 1811 he was nominated a minister plenipotentiary to the French government, but in his attempt to negotiate a treaty of commerce and indemnification for spoiliations he was not successful. At length, in October, 1812, he was invited to a conference with the emperor at Wilna. He immediately set off, travelling day and night. Overcome by fatigue, and exposed to sudden changes from extreme cold to the excessive heat of the small cottages of the Jews, which are the only taverns in Poland, he was seized by a violent inflammation of the lungs, which terminated his life at Zarnowica, or Zarnowitch, an obscure village near Craeow. His widow died in Washington May 30, 1818, aged 62.

He was of an amiable disposition and domestic habits, generally silent in mixed company, and often absent in mind. His manners were grave and dignified. If, as there is reason to conclude, though once a preacher of the gospel he had ceased to regard it as of Divine authority, and died without the support of its glorious promises; there is no wise man, who will envy him the possession of his worldly prosperity and distinction acquired at the price of the abandonment of the religion, which he once preached. As a poet Mr. Barlow will hardly live in the memory of future ages. His vision of Columbus, replete with the scenes of the Revolution, acquired, notwithstanding its imperfections, great popularity as a national, patriotic poem. But, when cast anew into an epic form, with the attempt to give, by means of a vision, an epic unity to a long series of unconnected actions, presenting philosophical speculation rather than interesting narrative, the Columbiad sunk into neglect. Besides intellectual power a poet must have a rich fancy, a refined taste, and a heart of feeling. Mr. Barlow had meditated a general history of the United States, and made large collections of the necessary documents.

He published several pieces in American Poems; prospect of peace, 1781; vision of Columbus, 1787; the conspiracy of kings, London, 1796; advice to privileged orders, in two parts; a letter to the national convention; address to the people of Piedmont; hasty pudding, a poem, 12mo. 1796; the Columbiad, 4to. 1808, and 12mo. 1809; oration on the fourth July, 1809. — London Monthly Mag. 1798; Public Characters, 1806, p. 152-180; Monthly Mag. and American Review, I. 465-468; Analectic Mag. IV. 130-158; Specimens of American Poetry, II. 1-13.

BARNARD, JOHN, minister of Marblehead, died Jan. 24, 1770, aged 88 years. He was born in Boston Nov. 6, 1681. His parents were remarkable for their piety, and they took particular care of his education. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1700. In the former part of his collegial course the sudden death of two of his acquaintance impressed his mind and led him to think of his own departure from this world; but the impression was soon effaced. However, before he left that institution he was brought to repentance, and he resolved to yield himself to the commands of God. In 1702 he united himself to the north church in Boston under the pastoral care of the Mathers. In 1705 he was invited to settle at Yarmouth, but he declined accepting the invitation. He was employed for some time as an assistant to Dr. Colman. Being fond of active life, he was appointed by Gov. Dudley one of the chaplains, who accompanied the army to Port Royal in 1707 to reduce that fortress. In an attempt to take a plan of the fort, a cannon ball was fired at him, that covered him with dirt without doing him any injury. At the solicitation of Capt. John Wentworth, he sailed with him to Barbadoes and London. While he was in this city the affair of Dr. Sacheverel took place, of which he would often speak. He became acquainted with some of the famous dissenting ministers, and received some advantageous offers of settlement if he would remain in England. He might have accompanied Lord Wharnton to Ireland as his chaplain, but he refused to conform to the articles of the national church. Soon after this he returned to seek a settlement in his own country. The north church in Boston was built for him and he preached the dedication sermon May 23, 1714, expecting soon to be ordained according to mutual agreement; but a more popular candidate, a Mr. Webb, being invited at the request of Dr. Cotton Mather, the people chose him for their pastor. Of this transaction he could not speak with calmness to the day of his death. He was ordained minister of Marblehead July 18, 1716, as colleague with Mr. Cheever. In 1762 he received Mr. Whitwell as his assistant. The last sermon, which he preached, was delivered Jan. 8, 1769.

Mr. Barnard was eminent for his learning and piety, and was famous among the divines of America. During the latter part of his life, when he retained a vigor of mind and zeal uncommon at so advanced an age, he was regarded as the father of the churches. His form was remarkably erect, and he never bent under the infirmities of years. His countenance was grand, his mien majestic, and there was a dignity in his whole deportment. His presence restrained the imprudence and folly of youth, and when the aged saw him, they arose and stood up. He added a knowledge of the Hebrew to his other theological attainments; he was well acquainted with the mathematics; and he excelled in skill for naval architecture. Several draughts of his, the amusement of leisure hours, were commended by master ship-builders. When he first went to Marblehead and for some years afterwards, there was not one trading vessel belonging to the town. It was through his exertions, that a commercial improvement soon took place. Having taken great pains to learn "the mystery of the fish trade," he directed the people to the best use, which they could make of the advantages of their situation. A young man was first persuaded to send a small cargo to Barbadoes, and his success was so encouraging, that the people were soon able in their own vessels to transport their fish to the West Indies and Europe. In 1767 there were thirty or forty vessels, belonging to the town, employed in the foreign trade. When Mr. Barnard first went to Marblehead, there was not in the place so much as one proper carpenter, nor mason, nor tailor, nor butcher.

By prudence in the management of his affairs he acquired considerable property; but he gave tithes of all he possessed. His charity was of a kind, which is worthy of imitation. He was not disposed to give much encouragement to common beggars, but he sought out those objects of benevolent attention, who modestly hid their wants. The poor were often fed by him, and the widow's heart was gladdened, while they knew not where to return thanks, except to the merciful Father of the wretched. In one kind of charity he was somewhat peculiar. He generally supported at school two boys, whose parents were unable to meet this expense. By his last will he gave 200 pounds to Harvard college. He left no children. In his sickness, which terminated in his death, he said with tears flowing from his eyes, "My very soul bleeds, when I remember my sins; but I trust I have sincerely repented, and that God will accept me for Christ's sake. His righteousness is my only dependence."

The publications of Mr. Barnard are numerous and valuable. They show his theological knowledge, and his talents as a writer. His style is plain, warm, and energetic. The doctrines, which he enforces, are the same, which were embraced by the fathers of New England. His autobiography is in Historical Collections, III. vol. v. He published a sermon on the death of G. Curwin of Salem, 1717; on the death of his colleague, S. Cheever, 1724; history of the strange adventures of Philip Ashton, 1725; two discourses addressed to young persons, with one on the earthquake, 1727; a volume of sermons on the confirmation of the Christian religion, on compelling men to come in, and the saints' victory and rewards, 1727; judgment, mercy, and faith, 1729; on the certainty of the birth of Christ, 1731; election sermon, 1734; call to parents and children, 1737; convention sermon, 1738; zeal for good works, 1742; election sermon, 1746; the imperfection of the creature and the excellency of the divine commandment, in nine sermons, 1747; the mystery of the gospel in the salvation of a sinner, in several discourses, 1750; a version of the psalms, 1752; a proof of Jesus Christ's being the Messiah, a Dudleian lecture, the first that was published, 1756; the true divinity of Jesus Christ, 1761; a discourse at the ordination of Mr. Whitwell, a charge, and an address to the people, annexed to Mr. T. Barnard's ordination sermon, 1762. A letter from Mr. Barnard to President Stiles, written in 1767, giving a sketch of the eminent ministers of New England, is published in the Mass. Hist. Coll. — Whitwell's Funeral Sermon; Collections of Historical Society, VIII. 66–69; X. 157, 167; Holmes, II. 525.

BARNARD, JOHN, minister of Andover, Mass., was the grandson of Francis Barnard of Hadley, and the son of Thomas Barnard, the third minister of Andover, who was ordained colleague with Francis Dane in 1682 and died Oct. 13, 1718. The first minister of Andover was J. Woodbridge. — Mr. Barnard was graduated in 1709 and succeeding his father in the ministry died June 14, 1758, aged 68. During his ministry Mr. Phillips was the minister of the south parish. He was succeeded by Mr. Symmes. His sons were ministers of Salem and Haverhill. He published a discourse on the earthquake; to a society of young men; on sinful mirth, 1728; on death of A. Abbot, 1739; at ordination of T. Walker, 1731; election sermon, 1746.

BARNARD, THOMAS, minister of Salem, the son of the preceding, died Aug. 15, 1776, aged 62. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1732 and ordained at Newbury Jan. 31, 1739. Disturbed by those, who called in question the correctness of his sentiments, he was dismissed at his own request, and afterwards studied law. He was installed Sept. 17, 1755, as the minister of the first church at Salem, and received Asa Dunbar as his colleague in 1772; Dr. Prince succeeded Mr. Dunbar in 1779. A paralytic affection impaired his mental powers. He was regarded as a semi-arian of Dr. Clarke's school, and as rather an Arminian, than a Calvinist. As a preacher he was destitute of animation and he was deficient in perspicuity of style. He published discourses at the ordination of E. Barnard, 1743; of Mr. Bailey of Portsmouth, 1757; of W. Whitwell, 1762; before the society for encouraging industry, 1757; at the artillery election, 1758; at the election, 1763; Dudleian lecture, 1768; at the funeral of P. Clarke, 1768. — Mass. Historical Collections, VI. 273.

BARNARD, EDWARD, minister of Haverhill, the brother of the preceding, was graduated in 1736, and ordained April 27, 1743, as the successor of John Brown. He died Jan. 26, 1774, aged 53, and was succeeded by John Shaw. In his last days a division sprung up in his society. There were those, who accused him of not preaching the gospel. He was regarded as an Arminian. Yet he was accustomed to preach, as he said, "the fallen state of man, which gave rise to the gospel dispensation, the fulness and freeness of divine grace in Christ as the foundation of all our hopes, the influence of the Spirit, the necessity of regeneration, implying repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, the necessity of practical religion, originating from evangelical principles." He was an excellent scholar and a highly esteemed preacher and minister. He published a poem on the death of Abiel Abbot; sermon at the ordination of H. True, 1754; of G. Merrill, 1765; of T. Cary; at the fast, 1764; at the election, 1766; at the convention, 1773. — Saltonstall's Sketch of Haverhill in Historical Collections, n. s. IV. 143-146.

BARNARD, THOMAS, D. D., minister in Salem, the son of T. Barnard, graduated at Harvard college in 1766, and was ordained over the north church Jan. 13, 1773. He died of the apoplexy Oct. 1, 1814, aged 66. He published the following discourses: at the ordination of A. Baneroff, 1786; of I. Nichols, 1809; at the election, 1789; at the convention, 1793; before the humane society, 1794; at the thanksgiving; Dudleian lecture, 1795; at thanksgiving, 1796; before a charitable society, 1803; before the society for propagating the gospel among the Indians, 1806; before the Bible society of Salem, 1814.

BARNES, DAVID, D. D., minister of Scituate, Mass., was born at Marlborough, graduated in 1752, and ordained Dec. 4, 1754. His predecessors in the second society since 1645 were Wetherell, Mighill, Lawson, Eelles, and Dorby. He died April 27, 1811, aged 80 years. His wife was the daughter of Col. G. Leonard. David L. Barnes, a lawyer of Providence, appointed district judge of Rhode Island in 1801, and who died Nov. 3, 1812, was his only son. — Dr. Barnes is represented as remarkable for meekness. A volume of his sermons was published with a biographical sketch. He published an ordination sermon, 1756; on the love of life and fear of death, 1795; on the death of Washington, 1800; on the death of James Hawley, 1801; ordination sermon, 1802; discourse on education, 1803. — Mass. Historical Collections, s. s. IV. 237.

BARNES, DANIEL II., a distinguished conchologist, died in the meridian of life Oct. 27, 1818. He and Dr. Griscom originated and conducted with great reputation the high school of New York. He was also a Baptist preacher. Invited by Gen. Van Rensselaer to attend the first public examination of the school established by him at Troy, he proceeded to New Lebanon and there preached on Sunday, the day before his death, from the text, "Ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life," &c.

On Monday, while riding between Nassau and Troy, the driver being thrown from his seat as the stage was rapidly descending a hill, Mr. Barnes in his alarm jumped from the carriage and fractured his skull. He died in a short time after. Of the New York Lyceum of natural history he was an active member. He was a classical scholar of high attainments, and of a most estimable character as a man. He had presided over several seminaries, and refused the presidency of the college at Washington city. He was probably the first conchologist in the United States. His learned communications on conchology were published in Silliman's journal, with explanatory plates. Of his writings in that journal the following is a catalogue: geological section of the Canaan mountain, v. 8-21; memoir on the genera unio and alasmodontia, with numerous figures, VI. 107-127, 258-280; five species of chiton, with figures, VII. 69-72; memoir on batrachian animals and doubtful reptiles, XI. 269-297, XIII. 66-70; on magnetic polarity, XIII. 70-73; reclamation of unios, XIII. 358-364. — Silliman's Journal, XV. 401.

BARNES, JOHN, died in Dudley in 1843, aged 92, a Revolutionary soldier.

BARNES, LEWIS, a worthy, respected citizen of Portsmouth, died June 27, 1856, aged 79. A native of Gottenburg, with ancestors of rank, his name was Ludwig Baarnhielm. On coming to this country at the age of 14, he lived at Salem under the patronage of Hasket Derby, and changed his name to Barnes. For more than fifty years he lived in Portsmouth. At first he commanded a ship, and then became a merchant; and was intelligent, charitable, and a blessing to the community. His last hours were peaceful, full of faith and hope. — His daughter married C. S. Franklin of New York.

BARNEY, JOSHUA, commodore, a distinguished commander, died Dec. 1, 1818, aged 59. He was born in Baltimore July 6, 1759. In early life he made several voyages. At the beginning of the war he entered as master's mate in the sloop-of-war Hornet, in which vessel he accompanied the fleet of Commodore Hopkins, who in 1775 captured New Providence. Promoted to the rank of lieutenant for his bravery, he was captured in the Sachem, but was soon exchanged. He was twice afterwards captured. But in Oct., 1779, he and his friend Capt. Robinson brought a valuable prize into Philadelphia. In 1780 he married the daughter of Alderman Bedford. In a few weeks afterwards, having all his fortune with him in paper money, he was robbed of it, while going to Baltimore. Without mentioning his loss he soon went to sea, but was captured and sent to Plymouth, England. From the Mill prison he es-escaped, and returning to Pennsylvania, the state in March, 1782, gave him the command of the Hyder Ally, a small ship of sixteen guns. In this vessel, carrying four nine and twelve six pounders, he captured, April 26th, after an action of twenty-six minutes, the Gen. Monk of eighteen guns, nine pounders, with the loss of four killed and eleven wounded. The Gen. Monk lost thirty killed and fifty-three wounded. In Sept., 1782, he sailed in the command of the Gen. Monk, which was bought by the United States, with dispatches for Dr. Franklin at Paris; he brought back a valuable loan from the king of France in chests of gold and barrels of silver. In 1796 he went to France with Mr. Monroe, deputed the bearer of the American flag to the national convention. He was induced to take the command of a squadron in the French service, but resigned in 1800 and returned to America. In 1813 he was appointed to the command of the flotilla for the defence of the Chesapeake. He participated in the battle of Bladensburg Aug. 24, 1814, and was wounded in the thigh by a ball, which was never extracted. In May, 1815, he was sent on a mission to Europe, and returned in Oct., and resided on his farm at Elkridge. He visited the western country in 1817. Having resolved to emigrate to Kentucky, while on his journey he was taken ill at Pittsburg and died there. He had been forty-one years in public service and engaged in twenty-six battles and one duel. He fought with Lemuel Taylor in private combat Sept. 3, 1813,—observing the laws of honor but contemning the laws of his country and of God. The want of moral courage, the courage to do right in disregard of the opinion of those, who judge wrong, the want of fixed virtuous principle, is a great deficiency in any character.—Encyclopædia Americana.

BARON, ALEXANDER, M. D., was born in Scotland in 1745, and received his medical education at Edinburgh. He arrived at Charleston, S. C., and soon obtained extensive practice in partnership successively with Drs. Milligan, Oliphant, and S. and R. Wilson. He died Jan. 9, 1819, aged 74. He had great reputation as a physician. Possessing extensive knowledge and endowed with almost every attribute of genius, he was a most agreeable and instructive companion. His affability and kindness made him a favorite with the younger members of the profession.—Thacher's Med. Biog. 144-146.

BARRES, JOSEPH FREDERIC WALLET, DES, had the title of colonel, and was lieut.-gov. of Cape Breton, and afterwards of Prince Edward Island. He died at Halifax, Nova Scotia, Oct. 22, 1804, aged 102 years. During the revolutionary war he published in 1780, by order of Admiral Howe, for the use of the British navy, valuable charts of the coasts and harbors in the gulf of St. Lawrence, of Nova Scotia, of New England, of New York and southerly, compiled from surveys by Maj. Samuel Holland, surveyor-general. These charts of Des Barres were authentic and useful surveys of these extensive coasts. All the numerous islands in Casco bay and along the whole coast of Maine are here described. A copy, with the title of Atlantic Neptune, Vol. II., is in the library of Bowdoin college and another in that of the American philosophical society at Philadelphia.

BARRON, SAMUEL, a commodore in the navy, commanded about the year 1798 the brig Augusta, equipped by the citizens of Norfolk in consequence of aggressions by the French. When a fleet was sent to the Mediterranean in 1805 to co-operate with Gen. Eaton in his operations against Tripoli, Com. Barron had the command of it; but ill health induced him to transfer the command to Capt. Rodgers. Eaton was indignant at the negotiation for peace commenced by Barron. On his return Barron felt keenly the neglect of the government in not continuing him in service. A few months before his death he was made superintendent of the naval arsenal at Gosport. He died of the apoplexy at Hampton, Va., Oct. 29, 1810. In the private walks of life he was greatly esteemed.—Norfolk Ledger; Life of Eaton, 368.

BARRON, JAMES, commodore, died in Norfolk, Apr. 21, 1851, aged 82. His father was commodore of the vessels of Virginia. He was lieutenant in 1798; in 1799 he went to the Mediterranean under the command of his brother Samuel. In the ship Chesapeake he was compelled to strike to the British frigate Leopard, after which he was not on sea duty.

BARRY, JOHN, first commodore in the American navy, died Sept. 13, 1803, aged 58. He was born in the county of Wexford, Ireland, in 1745. With an education adapted to his proposed active life upon the sea, he came to this country about 1760, and was for years employed by the most respectable merchants in the command of vessels, having their unreserved confidence. In Feb., 1776, congress appointed him to the command of the brig Lexington of sixteen guns, and he sailed on a successful cruise from Philadelphia. From this vessel he was transferred to the Edingham, a large frigate. Shut up by the ice in the winter he joined the army as aid to Gen. Cadwalader in the operations near Trenton. When Philadelphia was in the hands of the enemy and the American frigates were up the river, at Whitehill, Barry formed and executed the project of descending the river in boats to cut off the supplies of the enemy. For this enterprise he received the thanks of Washington. After his vessel was destroyed, he was appointed to the command of the Raleigh of thirty-two guns, which a British squadron compelled him to run on shore at Fox's island in Penobscot bay. He next made several voyages to the West Indies. In Feb., 1781, he sailed in the frigate Alliance of thirty-six guns from Boston for L'Orient, carrying Col. Laurens on an embassy to the French court. On his return, May 29, 1781, he fought the ship of war Atlanta, of between twenty and thirty guns, and her consort the brig Trepassa. After a severe action both struck their colors. Com. Barry was dangerously wounded in the shoulder by a grape-shot. He sailed again from Boston in the Alliance, and carried La Fayette and Count de Noailles to France, and proceeded on a cruise. Returning from Havana he fought a vessel of the enemy of equal size, which escaped only by the aid of her consorts. It is related, that Gen. Howe at one period attempted to bribe him to desert the cause of America by the promise of fifteen thousand guineas and the command of a British frigate, and that the offer was rejected with disdain. Under the administration of Mr. Adams he superintended the building at Philadelphia of the frigate United States, of which he retained the command, until she was laid up in ordinary after the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the executive chair. He died at Philadelphia of an asthmatic affection. His person, above the ordinary stature, was graceful and commanding. His strongly marked countenance expressed the qualities of his mind and virtues of his heart. He possessed all the important qualities, requisite in a naval commander. Though a rigid disciplinarian, his kindness and generosity secured the attachment of his men. There was no desertion from his ship. To the moral deportment of his crew he scrupulously attended, and he enforced on board a strict observance of divine worship. Educated in the habits of religion, he experienced its comforts; and he died in the faith of the gospel. — Portfolio; American Naval Biography, 156-166.

BARRY, WILLIAM T., died at Liverpool, Aug. 30, 1835. A native of Kentucky, he had been a senator, and postmaster-general, and minister to Spain.

BARSTOW, JOHN, deacon, died in Canterbury, Conn., Dec. 9, 1838, aged 85. A soldier, he was present at the surrender of Burgoyne. In the army he kept a journal. His services to the town and church were very great. Many years superintendent of the Sabbath school, in his old age he taught the aged. In his sickness he sent word to his friends to prepare to meet him in heaven. He was the father of Rev. Dr. B. of Keene.

BARTLETT, JOSIAH, M. D., governor of New Hampshire, died suddenly of a paralytic affection, May 19, 1795, aged 65. He was the son of Stephen Bartlett, and born in Amesbury, Mass., in Nov., 1729. After an imperfect medical education he commenced the practice of physic at Kingstons in 1750. During the prevalence of the angina maligna in 1754, his successful antiseptic practice in the use of the Peruvian bark established his fame. He also acted as a magistrate, and Gov. Wentworth gave him the command of a regiment, but at last deprived him of his commissions in Feb., 1775, in consequence of his being a zealous whig. Being appointed a delegate to congress, his name was first called as representing the most easterly province, on the vote of the declaration of independence, and he boldly answered in the affirmative. In 1777, as medical agent, he accompanied Stark to Bennington. In 1778 he withdrew from congress. He was appointed chief justice of the court of common pleas in 1779, a justice of the superior court in 1784, and chief justice in 1788. In 1790 he was President of New Hampshire, chosen by the legislature, though Pickering and Joshua Wentworth received each many more of the votes of the people. In 1791 and 1792 he was chosen by the people. He had nominated his rival, J. Pickering, chief justice. In 1793 he was elected the first governor under the new form of government. Of the medical society, established by his efforts in 1791, he was the president. The duties of his various offices were faithfully discharged. He was a good physician, devoting most of his time to his profession. His patriotism induced him to make great sacrifices for the public good. By the force of his talents, without much education, he rose to his various high offices. His mind was discriminating, his judgment sound, and in all his dealings he was scrupulously just. In his last years his health was impaired and after the loss of his wife in 1789 his spirits greatly depressed. His son, Dr. Ezra B., died at Haverhill, N. H., Dec. 6, 1848, aged 78. — Thacker's Med. Biog., 147-150; Eliot; Goodrich's Lives.

BARTLETT, JOSIAH, M. D., was born in Charlestown in 1759, and studied physic with Dr. I. Foster, who was chief surgeon of the military hospital in the war of 1775, under whom he served as surgeon's mate till 1780. He then went two voyages as surgeon to ships of war. He settled in Charlestown, where for many years he had extensive practice. At length misfortune broke down his spirits and health, and life ceased to be desired. After two years the apoplexy terminated his life March 5, 1820. He had been a representative, senator, and councillor. He delivered many orations, medical, political and literary; and published various papers in the works of the medical society and in the N. E. medical journal; address to free masons, 1797; discourse before the Middlesex medical association; progress of medical science in Mass., 1810; history of Charlestown, 1814; oration on the death of Dr. John Warren, 1815.—Thacher's Med. Biog., 150, 151.

BARTLETT, JOSIAH, M. D., died at Stratham April 14, 1838, aged 70. The son of Governor Josiah B., he was a member of Congress in 1811–13.

BARTLETT, JOHN, died at Marblehead in Feb., 1849, aged 66, having been the pastor of the Unitarian church thirty-seven years. He published two discourses.

BARTLETT, ELISHA, M. D., died in Smithfield, R. I., July 19, 1855, aged about 40. For some years he had been unable to practice. When residing at Lowell, he was its first mayor; afterwards he was at the head of a medical college at the West, whence in failing health he went back to the old homestead in R. I.

BARTLETT, SHUBAEL, minister of Scantic, descended from the little company, which landed at Plymouth in 1620, and his character corresponded with that of his puitan ancestry. At the age of twenty-two he entered Yale college, in which he and one other were the only professors of religion. He graduated in 1800, and having studied theology with Dr. Dwight was ordained at East Windsor Feb. 12, 1804; and there he died June 6, 1854, aged 76. A half-century sermon, which he prepared, was read to his people by his son-in-law, Rev. S. B. Brown, late a missionary to China. He was a faithful preacher, endowed with a spirit of prayer. During his ministry five hundred and twenty-four members were added to his church. His descent was from several of the Pilgrims at Plymouth.

BARTLETT, WILLIAM, a generous benefactor of the theological literature, was born in Newbury Jan. 31, 1748, and died Feb. 8, 1841, aged 93. He was one of the founders of the theological seminary in Andover. He gave 25,000 dollars to endow a professorship of sacred rhetoric; built two professors' houses, one of the large halls, and the chapel; paid the president's salary for five or six years; contributed largely to another professorship; and bequeathed 50,000 dollars in his will.

BARTLETT, ZACCHEUS, M. D., died at Plymouth in Dec., 1835, aged 70. A graduate of Harvard in 1780, he was a member of the state convention in 1820, and president of the pilgrim society.

BARTLETT, ICHABOD, a lawyer of distinction in N. H., died at Portsmouth Oct. 19, 1853, aged 67. Born in Salisbury, he graduated at Dartmouth in 1808, and lived first in Durham, then in P. He was a member of Congress from 1823 to 1829.

BARTLETT, RICHARD, secretary of state of N. H., died at New York Oct. 23, 1837, aged 45.

BARTLETT, ELISHA, died in Georgia, Vt., in 1855, aged 100, a soldier of the Revolution. His father was Moses B., the minister of Chatham, Conn., who graduated in 1730, and died in 1766.

BARTON, THOMAS, an Episcopal minister, was a native of Ireland and educated at the university of Dublin. In 1753 he married at Philadelphia the sister of Mr. Rittenhouse, and the next year was ordained in England. His talents and learning were of great service to his friend Mr. Rittenhouse, who enjoyed few advantages of early education. From 1755 to 1759 he was a missionary of a society in England and resided in Redding township, York county. In 1758 he was a chaplain in the expedition against Fort Du Quesne, and became acquainted with Washington and Mercer and other distinguished officers. He resided in Lancaster as rector nearly twenty years. Adhering to the royal government in the Revolution and refusing to take a required oath, he went in 1778 to New York, where he died May 25, 1780, aged 50 years. His eldest son, William Barton of Lancaster, wrote the memoirs of Rittenhouse and a tract on free commerce; he left seven other children, one of whom was Prof. Barton. His widow passed her last years in the house of her nephew and niece, Dr. Samuel Bard and wife. Within a few days of their decease she also died, aged 90. He published a sermon on Braddock's defeat, 1755.—Mem. of Rittenhouse, 100, 112, 287, 441; Thacher's Med. Biog., 139.

BARTON, BENJAMIN SMITH, M. D., professor in the university of Pennsylvania, died Dec. 19, 1815, aged 49. He was the son of the Rev. Mr. Barton of Lancaster, Penn., and was born Feb. 10, 1766. His mother was the sister of Rittenhouse, whose life was written by his brother, William Barton. After spending several years in study in Philadelphia, he went to Edinburgh and London in 1786 to pursue his medical studies. His medical degree he obtained at Gottingen. In 1789 he returned to Philadelphia and commenced the practice of physic. In the same year he was appointed professor of natural history and botany in the college. He succeeded Dr. Griffiths as professor of materia medica and Dr. Rush as professor of the theory and practice of medicine.

Dr. Barton was distinguished by his talents and professional attainments. He contributed much to the progress of natural science, and his various works evince a closeness of observation, an extent of learning, and a comprehensiveness of mind, honorable to his character. He was the first American who gave to his country an elementary work on botany. His publications are the following: On the fascinating quality ascribed to the rattlesnake, 1796; new views of the origin of the tribes of America, 1797; collections towards a materia medica of the U. S., 1798; remarks on the speech attributed by Jefferson to Logan, 1798; medical physical journal, begun 1804, continued several years; eulogy on Dr. Priestley; elements of botany with thirty plates, 1804; also in two vols. 40 plates, 1812; flora Virginica, 1812; an edition of Cullen's materia medica, 1808; account of the Syren lacertina; observations on the opposum, 1813; collections on extinct animals, &c., 1814; fragments of the natural history of Penn.; remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake; on the honey bee; on the native country of the potato, and other papers in the Am. Philos. Transactions. — W. P. C. Barton's Biog. Sketch; Thacher's Med. Biog., 151-153.

BARTON, WILLIAM, lieutenant-colonel, a patriot of the Revolution, planned the capture of Maj.-Gen. Prescott on Rhode Island, and executed the project July 10, 1777. Information had been received at Providence, that the general was to sleep at Overing's house, four miles from Newport. Barton went with a party of forty men, including Capts. Adams and Phillips, in four whale-boats from Warwick neck ten miles by water, landed about half way from Newport to Bristol ferry, then marched one mile to the general's quarters. On reaching the chamber, at midnight, the sentry was secured; then a negro, called Prince, who accompanied Barton, and who died at Plymouth 1821, aged 78, dashed his head against the door and knocked out a panel, so that Col. Barton rushed in and surprised Prescott in bed, and carried him off with his aid, Maj. William Barrington, who jumped from the window in his shirt. He escaped the guard boats and no alarm was given to the enemy, until the party on their return had nearly reached the main, when the firing of rockets was in vain. For this exploit Congress presented him with a sword and with a grant of land in Vermont. By the transfer of some of this land he became entangled in the toils of the law and was imprisoned in Vermont for years, until the visit to this country in 1825 of La Fayette, who in his munificence liberated his fellow soldier and restored the hoary veteran to his family. Col. Barton was wounded in an action at Bristol ferry in May, 1778. He died at Providence in Oct., 1831, aged 84 years. — Amer. Rememb., 1777, 271, 361; Mass. Hist. Coll., II., 107, 138; Heath, 122.

BARTON, CYRUS, editor of the Concord Reporter, died Feb. 17, 1855. At the close of a political speech near C. he fell and expired. He was an associate with Isaac Hill in business.

BARTON, ROGER, died in Mississippi March 4, 1855, aged about 55; for fifteen years a Senator of the U. S.

BARTRAM, JOHN, an eminent botanist, died in Sept., 1777, aged 75. He was born at Marpole, Chester county, Penn., in the year 1701. His grandfather, Richard, accompanied William Penn to this country in 1682. His father, John, removed to North Carolina and was killed by the Whitoc Indians. He himself inherited the estate of his uncle, Isaac, at Derby, a few miles from Philadelphia.

This self-taught genius early discovered an ardent desire for the acquisition of knowledge, especially of botanical knowledge; but the infant state of the colony placed great obstacles in his way. He however surmounted them by intense application and the resources of his own mind. By the assistance of respectable characters he obtained the rudiments of the learned languages, which he studied with extraordinary success. So earnest was he in the pursuit of learning, that he could hardly spare time to eat; and he might often have been found with his victuals in one hand and his book in the other. He acquired so much knowledge of medicine and surgery, as to administer great assistance to the indigent and distressed in his neighborhood. He cultivated the ground as the means of supporting a large family; but while ploughing or sowing his fields, or mowing his meadows, he was still pushing his inquiries into the operations of nature.

He was the first American who conceived and carried into effect the design of a botanic garden, for the cultivation of American plants, as well as of exotics. He purchased a fine situation on the west bank of the Schuylkill about four miles below Philadelphia, where he laid out with his own hands a garden of five or six acres. He furnished it with a variety of the most curious and beautiful vegetables, collected in his excursions from Canada to Florida. These excursions were made principally in autumn, when his presence at home was least demanded by his agricultural avocations. His ardor in these pursuits was such, that at the age of seventy he made a journey into East Florida to explore its natural productions. His travels among the Indians were frequently attended with danger and difficulty. By his means the gardens of Europe were enriched with elegant flowering shrubs, with plants and trees, collected in different parts of our country from the shore of Lake Ontario to the source of the River St. Juan. He made such proficiency in his favorite pursuit, that Linnæus pronounced him "the greatest natural botanist in the world." His eminence in natural history attracted the esteem of the most distinguished men in America and Europe, and he corresponded with many of them. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. By means of the friendship of Sir Hans Sloane, Mr. Catesby, Dr. Hill, Linnæus, and others, he was furnished with books and apparatus, which he much needed, and which greatly lessened the difficulties of his situation. He in return sent them what was new and curious in the productions of America. He was elected a member of several of the most eminent societies and academies abroad, and was at length appointed American botanist to his

Mr. Bartram was an ingenious mechanic. The stone house in which he lived, he built himself, and several monuments of his skill remain in it. He was often his own mason, carpenter, and blacksmith, and generally made his own farming utensils. His stature was rather above the middle size; his body was erect and slender; his complexion was sandy; his countenance was cheerful, though there was a solemnity in his air. His gentle manners corresponded with his amiable disposition. He was modest and charitable; a friend to social order; and an advocate for the abolition of slavery. He gave freedom to a young African, whom he had brought up; but he in gratitude to his master continued in his service. Though temperate, he kept a plentiful table; and annually on new year's day he made an entertainment, consecrated to friendship and philosophy. Born and educated in the society of Quakers, he professed to be a worshipper of "God alone, the Almighty Lord." He often read the scriptures, particularly on Sundays. Of his children, John, his youngest son, who succeeded him in his botanic garden, died at Philadelphia Nov., 1812. In addition to his other attainments he acquired some knowledge of medicine and surgery, which rendered him useful to his neighbors. In his first efforts to make a collection of American plants he was aided by a liberal subscription of some scientific gentlemen in Philadelphia. In 1737, Mr. Collinson wrote to Col. Custis of Virginia, that Bartram was employed by "a set of noblemen" at his recommendation; and he added, "Be so kind as to give him a little entertainment, and recommendation to a friend or two of yours in the country, for he does not value riding 50 or 100 miles to see a new plant."

Mr. Bartram's communications in the British Philosophical Transactions, vols. 41, 43, 46, 62, are these: on the teeth of a rattlesnake; on the muscles and oyster banks of Penn.; on clay wasp nests; on the great black wasp; on the libella; account of an aurora borealis, observed Nov. 12, 1757. He published also observations on the inhabitants, climate, soil, &c., in his travels to lake Ontario, 4th ed. 4to. Lond. 1751; description of East Florida, with a journal, 4to. 1774. — Miller, i. 515; ii. 367; Life of Rittenhouse, 375; Mem. Penns. Hist. Soc. i. 134; Barton's Med. and Phys. Jour. i. 115-124.

BARTRAM, WILLIAM, a botanist, son of the preceding, died July 22, 1823, aged 84. He was born at the Botanic Garden, Kingsessing, Penns., in 1739. After living with a merchant in Philadelphia six years, he went to North Carolina, engaged in mercantile pursuits; but, attached to the study of botany, he accompanied his father in his journey to E. Florida. After residing for a time on the river St. John's in Florida, he returned to his father's residence in 1771. In April, 1773, at the request of Dr. Fothergill he proceeded to Charleston in order to examine the natural productions of Carolina, Georgia, and the Floridas, and was thus employed nearly five years. His collections and drawings were forwarded to Dr. Fothergill. His account of his travels was published in 1791. It is a delightful specimen of the enthusiasm with which the lover of nature, and particularly the botanist, surveys the beautiful and wonderful productions which are scattered over the face of the earth. Of himself Mr. Bartram said,—"continually impelled by a restless spirit of curiosity in pursuit of new productions of nature, my chief happiness consisted in tracing and admiring the infinite power, majesty, and perfection of the great Almighty Creator, and in the contemplation, that through divine aid and permission I might be instrumental in discovering and introducing into my native country some original productions of nature, which might be useful to society." Reposing in a grove of oranges, palms, live oaks, and magnolias, in the midst of beautiful flowers and singing birds, he cried out,—"ye vigilant and most faithful servants of the Most High; ye, who worship the Creator morning, noon, and eve, in simplicity of heart! I haste to join the universal anthem. My voice and heart unite with yours in sincere homage to the great Creator, the universal sovereign."

In 1782 he was elected professor of botany in the university of Penns., but from ill health declined the appointment. Besides his discoveries in botany, he prepared the most complete table of American ornithology before the appearance of the book of Wilson, whom he assisted in the commencement of that work. Such was his continued love for botany, that he wrote a description of a plant a few minutes before his death, which occurred suddenly by the rupture of a blood-vessel in the lungs. He published Travels through N. and S. Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida, the Cherokee country, with observations on the manners of the Indians, with plates, 8vo. Phil., 1731; the same, London, 1792; and translated into French by Benoist, entitled Voyage, &c.; 2 vols.; Paris, 1801; an account of J. Bartram; anecdotes of a crow; description of Certhia; on the site of Bristol. — Enc. Amer.; Barton's Med. Jour. i. i. 89-95; i. ii. 103.

BASCOM, H. B., D. D., bishop of the Methodist church, died in Louisville on his return from St. Louis to Kentucky Sept. 9, 1850, aged about 56. He was born in Western New York; in 1828 was president of Madison college, the second Methodist college in the U. S. In 1842, he was chosen president of Transylvania university, Ky. In 1849 he was elected bishop. He was a pulpit orator of great power, though not of good taste. He delighted in strong epithets and high flown metaphors. A volume of his sermons was published in 1849. He published inaugural address, 1828.

BASS, EDWARD, D. D., first bishop of Massachusetts, was born at Dorchester Nov. 23, 1726, and graduated at Harvard college in 1744. For several years he was the teacher of a school. From 1747 to 1751 he resided at Cambridge, pursuing his theological studies, and occasionally preaching. In 1752, at the request of the Episcopal society in Newburyport, he went to England for orders, and was ordained May 24, by bishop Sherlock. In 1796 he was elected by the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Massachusetts to the office of bishop, and was consecrated May 7, 1797, by the bishops of Pennsylvania, New York, and Maryland. Afterwards the Episcopal churches in Rhode Island elected him their bishop, and in 1803 a convention of the churches in New Hampshire put themselves under his jurisdiction. He died Sept. 10, 1803, humble and resigned. He was a sound divine, a critical scholar, an accomplished gentleman, and an exemplary Christian. — Mass. Hist. Coll., ix. 188.

BASSETT, RICHARD, governor of Delaware, was a member of the old congress in 1787, and was appointed a senator under the new constitution. He was governor, after Mr. Bedford, from 1798 to 1801, when he was placed by Mr. Adams on the bench of the federal judiciary. The repeal of the act, constituting the courts, displaced him from his office in 1802. He had practised law for many years with reputation and was a gentleman of fortune. His daughter married Mr. Bayard. He died in Sept., 1815.

BASSETT, AMOS, D. D., died in Cornwall in 1828, aged 44. A native of Derby, he graduated in 1784, and was the minister of Hebron from about 1793 to 1820, and was then the head of the Mission school at Cornwall. His voice and manner in preaching were extremely solemn. He was perhaps gloomy and hypochondriacal; sometimes keen and severe. Seeing some men of influence, whom he deemed anti-patriotic and anti-christian, following in the funeral procession of a very wicked man, he said, — "if it had been the devil himself, they would have followed him, only they would have chosen to follow him alive." He published election sermon, 1807; and before a missionary society; he wrote a reply of the consecration to A. Abbot.

BATES, BARNABAS, died at Boston Oct. 11, 1853, aged 66. A native of England, he was a Baptist minister in R. I., then a Unitarian. He was collector of Bristol, and connected with the post office. As a zealous advocate of cheap postage he deserves public remembrance.

BATES, ISAAC C., died in Washington, a senator, March 16, 1843, aged 65. Born in Granville, he graduated at Yale in 1802, and settled as a lawyer in Northampton. For eight years he was a member of the house of representatives, and afterwards of the senate, rendering important public services. At his funeral in Washington, Mr. Tuston delivered an eloquent sermon on the happiness of heaven, described as "light." He delivered an able speech, costing much effort, against the admission of Texas into the Union; and in a few days afterwards died. His printed addresses and speeches are specimens of logical and beautiful writing.

BATES, JOSHUA, D. D., president of Middlebury college, died in Dudley Jan. 14, 1854, aged 77. Born at Cohasset, he graduated at Cambridge in 1800; was settled as a minister in Dedham in 1803; was chosen president in 1818 and continued at Middlebury twenty-one years, till 1840, when he resigned. In 1843 he was settled at Dudley, where he toiled during ten years of a green old age. He was distinguished as a scholar, was open-hearted and of a manly character, highly esteemed and useful. Dr. Sprague preached a sermon on his death.

He published Reminiscences of Rev. John Codman, making a volume with W. Allen's life of J. C.; two sermons on intemperance, 1813; a volume of sermons; on the death of T. Prentiss, 1814; at ordination of J. Thompson, 1804; R. Hurlburt and F. Burt, 1817; Ira Ingraham, 1821; J. Steel, 1828; inaugural address, 1818; two sermons to missionary societies.

BATTELL, SARAH, the widow of Joseph B., died at Norfolk, Conn., Sept. 23, 1854, aged 75, the daughter of Rev. A. Robbins. She was one of the women of excellent Christian character and well-known benevolence, who by their virtues adorn our community.

BAXTER, JOSEPH, minister of Medford, Mass., was the son of Lieut. John Baxter, of Braintree, who died in 1719, aged 80, and grandson of Gregory Baxter, a settler of B. in 1632, who was a relative of Richard Baxter, of England. He was born in 1676, graduated in 1693, and ordained April 21, 1697. When Gov. Shute had a conference with the Indians at Georgetown, on Arrousie Island, in Aug., 1717, he presented to them a Mr. Baxter as a protestant missionary, who was probably Mr. Joseph B.; but through the influence of the jesuit Ralle he was rejected. He had a correspondence in Latin with Ralle, and the jesuit accused him of the want of scholarship. Gov. Shute in his letter replied, that the main qualification in a missionary to the barbarous Indians was not "to be an exact scholar as to the Latin tongue," but to bring them from darkness to the light of the gospel, and, "under the influence of the divine Spirit to translate them from the power of Satan, who has had an usurped possession of these parts of the world for so many ages, to the kingdom of the Son of God." Mr. Baxter died May 2, 1745. His son, Joseph, a physician, died of the small pox. He published the election sermon, 1727; sermons to two societies of young men; and sermons on the danger of security, 1729. — Mass. Hist. Coll. v. 115; Coll. N. H. Hist. Soc. II. 245; Farmer.

BAXTER, GEORGE A., D. D., died in Virginia March 16, 1841, aged 77; professor of theology in Union theological seminary, Prince Edward county. He was previously president of Washington college, Lexington. He was one of the most eminent and respected of the Presbyterian ministers of Virginia.

BAY, ELIHU H., died at Charleston in 1839, aged 85. He published law reports.

BAYARD, JOHN, a friend to his country, and an eminent Christian, was born Aug. 11, 1738, on Bohemia manor in Cecil county, Maryland. His father died without a will, and being the eldest son, he became entitled by the laws of Maryland to the whole real estate. Such, however, was his affection for his twin brother, younger than himself, that no sooner had he reached the age of manhood, than he conveyed to him half the estate. After receiving an academical education under Dr. Finley, he was put into the counting-house of Mr. John Rhea, a merchant of Philadelphia. It was here, that the seeds of grace began first to take root, and to give promise of those fruits of righteousness, which afterwards abounded. He early became a communicant of the Presbyterian church under the charge of Gilbert Tennent. Some years after his marriage he was chosen a ruling elder, and he filled this place with zeal and reputation. Mr. Whitfield, while on his visits to America, became intimately acquainted with Mr. Bayard, and was much attached to him. They made several tours together. In 1770, Mr. Bayard lost his only brother, Dr. James A. Bayard, a man of promising talents, of prudence and skill, of a most amiable disposition and growing reputation. The violence of his sorrow at first produced an illness, which confined him to his bed for several days. By degrees it subsided into a tender melancholy, which for years after would steal across his mind, and tinge his hours of domestic intercourse and solitary devotion with pensive sadness. When his brother's widow died, he adopted the children, and educated them as his own. One of them was an eminent statesman.

At the commencement of the Revolutionary war he took a decided part in favor of his country. At the head of the second battalion of the Philadelphia militia he marched to the assistance of Washington, and was present at the battle of Trenton. He was a member of the council of safety, and for many years speaker of the legislature. In 1777, when there was a report that

Col. Bayard's house had been destroyed by the British army, and that his servant, who had been intrusted with his personal property, had gone off with it to the enemy, Mr. William Bell, who had served his apprenticeship with Col. Bayard, and accumulated several thousand pounds, insisted that his patron should receive one half of his estate. This generous offer was not accepted, as the report was without foundation. Reiterated afflictions induced a deep depression of mind, and for some time he was no longer relieved by the avocations of business. In 1785, however, he was appointed a member of the old congress, then sitting in New York, but in the following year he was left out of the delegation. In 1788 he removed to New Brunswick, where he was mayor of the city, judge of the court of common pleas, and a ruling elder of the church. Here he died Jan. 7, 1807, aged 68.

At his last hour he was not left in darkness. That Redeemer, whom he had served with zeal, was with him to support him and give him the victory. During his last illness he spoke much of his brother, and one night, awaking from sleep, exclaimed, "My dear brother, I shall soon be with you." He addressed his two sons, "My dear children, you see me just at the close of life. Death has no terrors to me. What now is all the world to me? I would not exchange my hope in Christ for ten thousand worlds. I once entertained some doubts of his Divinity; but, blessed be God, these doubts were soon removed by inquiry and reflection. From that time my hope of acceptance with God has rested on his merits and atonement. Out of Christ, God is a consuming fire." As he approached nearer the grave, he said, "I shall soon be at rest; I shall soon be with my God. O glorious hope! Blessed rest! How precious are the promises of the gospel! It is the support of my soul in my last moments." While sitting up, supported by his two daughters, holding one of his sons by the hand, and looking intently in his face, he said, "My Christian brother!" Then turning to his daughters he continued, "You are my Christian sisters. Soon will our present ties be dissolved, but more glorious bonds —" He could say no more, but his looks and arms, directed towards heaven, expressed everything. He frequently commended himself to the blessed Redeemer, confident of his love; and the last words, which escaped from his dying lips, were, "Lord Jesus, Lord Jesus, Lord Jesus!" — Evangel. Intelligencer, I. 1-7, 49-57.

BAYARD, JAMES A., a distinguished statesman, died Aug. 6, 1815, aged 48. He was the son of Dr. J. A. Bayard, and was born in Philadelphia in 1767. On the death of his father he was received into the family of his uncle, John Bayard, and was graduated at Princeton college in 1784. After studying law at Philadelphia with Gen. Reed and Mr. Ingersoll, he commenced the practice in Delaware. In Oct., 1796, he was elected a member of Congress. In the party contests of the day he was a distinguished supporter of the federal administration. In the memorable contest in the house concerning the election of president in 1801, Jefferson and Burr having an equal number of the electoral votes, he directed the course, which issued in the election of Mr. Jefferson. Among the debaters on the repeal of the judiciary bill in March, 1802, he was the ablest advocate of the system, which was overthrown. From the house he was transferred to the senate in 1804, and was again elected for six years from March, 1805, and also from March, 1811. He opposed the declaration of war in 1812. After the commencement of the war, the mediation of Russia being offered, he was selected by Mr. Madison as a commissioner with Mr. Gallatin to negotiate a peace with Great Britain, and sailed from Philadelphia for St. Petersburg May 9, 1813. The absence of the emperor preventing the transaction of any business, he proceeded to Holland by land in Jan., 1814. He lent his able assistance in the negotiation of the peace at Ghent in this year, and afterwards made a journey to Paris, where he was apprized of his appointment as envoy to the court of St. Petersburg. This he declined, stating, "that he had no wish to serve the administration, except when his services were necessary for the good of his country." Yet he proposed to co-operate in forming a commercial treaty with Great Britain. An alarming illness, however, constrained him to return to the United States. He arrived in June and died at Wilmington. His wife, the daughter of Gov. Basset, and several children, survived him. Mr. Bayard was an ingenious reasoner and an accomplished orator. His fine countenance and manly person recommended his eloquent words. There were few of his contemporaries of higher political distinction. But his race of worldly eminence was soon run.—His speech on the foreign intercourse bill was published 1798; and his speech on the repeal of the judiciary in a vol. of the speeches, 1802.—Biog. Amer. 50; Encyc. Amer.

BAYARD, SAMUEL, judge, died at Princeton N. J., May 12, 1840, aged 75. He was a judge of the common pleas, a most upright, respected, and esteemed man.

BAYLEY, MATTHIAS, died about the year 1789 at Jones' creek, a branch of the Pedee, in North Carolina, aged 136 years. He was baptized at the age of 134. His eyesight remained good, and his strength was very remarkable, till his death.—American Museum, vii. 206.

BAYLEY, RICHARD, an eminent physician of New York, died Aug. 17, 1801, aged 56. He was born at Fairfield, Conn., in the year 1745.

From his mother's being of French descent and his parents' residence among the French Protestant emigrants at New Rochelle, N. Y., he became early familiar with the French language. He studied physic with Dr. Charlton, whose sister he married. In 1769 or 1770 he attended the London lectures and hospitals. Returning in 1772 he commenced practice with Dr. Charlton in New York. His attention in 1774 was drawn to the croup, which prevailed, and which men of high character, as Dr. Bard, had fatally treated as the putrid sore throat. He had seen a child perish in thirty-six hours under the use of stimulants and antiseptics. His dissections confirmed him in his views; and they were adopted afterwards by his friend, Michaelis, the chief of the Hessian medical staff in New York, the author of a treatise "De angina polyposa."

In the autumn of 1775 he revisited England in order to make further improvement under Hunter, and spent the winter in dissections and study. In the spring of 1776 he returned in the capacity of surgeon in the English army under Howe. This was a measure of mistaken prudence, in order to provide for his wife and children. In the fall he proceeded with the fleet to Newport; but incapable of enduring this separation from his wife, he resigned and returned to New York in the spring of 1777 just before her death. His influence was now beneficially exerted in saving the property of his absent fellow-citizens. In 1781 his letter to Hunter on the croup was published, in which he recommended bleeding, blisters to the throat, antimony, calomel, and enemata. He said, there was no fear of putrescency, unless there were ulcers. To Bayley the public is indebted for the present active treatment of the croup. In 1787 he delivered lectures on surgery, and his son-in-law, Dr. Wright Post, lectured on anatomy, in the edifice since converted into the New York hospital. In 1788 "the doctors' mob," in consequence of the imprudence of some students, broke into the building and destroyed Bayley's valuable anatomical cabinet. In 1792 he was elected professor of anatomy at Columbia college; but in 1793 he took the department of surgery, in which he was very skilful. About 1795 he was appointed health officer to the port. During the prevalence of the yellow fever he fearlessly attended upon the sick and investigated the disease. In 1797 he published his essay on that fever, maintaining that it had a local origin and was not contagious. He also published in 1798 a series of letters on the subject. By contagion he meant a specific poison, as in small pox. He allowed, that the fever in certain circumstances was infectious. No nurse or attendant in the hospitals had taken the disease, yet it might be conveyed in clothing and in other ways. Hence the importance of cleanliness and ventilation. The state quarantine laws originated with him; the total interdiction of commerce with the West Indies had by some been contemplated. In Aug., 1821, an Irish emigrant ship, with ship fever, arrived. He found the crew and passengers and baggage huddled in one unventilated apartment, contrary to his orders. Entering it only a moment, a deadly sickness at the stomach and intense pain in the head seized him, and on the seventh day he expired. He is represented as in temper fiery, invincible in his dislikes, inflexible in attachment, of perfect integrity, gentlemanly, and chivalrously honorable. He married in 1778 Charlotte Amelia, daughter of Andrew Barclay, a merchant of New York. His writings have been mentioned: on the croup, 1781; essay on the yellow fever, 1797; letters on the same, 1798.—Thacher's Med. Biog., 156-168.

BAYLIES, WILLIAM, M. D., died at Dighton, Mass., June 17, 1826, aged 82. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1760, and was a member of the provincial congress in 1775, and often a member of the council of the State.

BAYLIES, HODJAH, judge, died at Dighton April 26, 1843, aged 86. A graduate of Harvard in 1777, he was aid to Gen. Lincoln, also to Washington. He was collector of customs, and judge of probate from 1810 until he was 81. He possessed a Christian character, and shared largely in the public confidence.

BAYLIES, FREDERIC, died in Edgartown Oct., 1836, for twenty years a useful teacher of the Indians on Martha's Vineyard and in R. I.; an exemplary, worthy man, doing much for Sunday schools and the cause of temperance.

BAYLIES, NICHOLAS, judge, died at Lyndon, Vt., Aug. 17, 1847, aged 75. He was a graduate of Dartmouth in 1794, and practised law in Woodstock and Montpelier. His wife was Mary Ripley, daughter of Prof. Ripley and granddaughter of President E. Wheelock. He published some law books.

BAYLIES, FRANCIS, died at Taunton, Oct. 28, 1852, aged 68. For several terms he was a member of congress. The only electoral vote for Jackson as president, from New England, was given by him. Soon afterwards he was appointed minister to Brazil, but was quickly recalled. He published a history of the old colony of Plymouth in 2 vols., 1828.

BAYNAM, WILLIAM, a surgeon, the son of Dr. John Baynam of Caroline county, Va., was born in 1749, and after studying with Dr. Walker was sent to London in 1769, where he made great proficiency in anatomy and surgery. He was for years an assistant demonstrator to Mr. Else, professor in St. Thomas' hospital. After residing sixteen years in England, he returned to this country, and settled in Essex about 1785. He died Dec. 8, 1814, aged 66 years. He performed many remarkable surgical operations. As an anatomist he had no superior. The best preparations in the museum of Cline and Cooper at London were made by him. Various papers by Mr. B. were published in the medical journals.—Thacher's Med. Biog., 168-173; N. Y. Med. Journal, I.; Phil. Journal, iv.

BEACH, JOHN, an Episcopal clergyman and writer, was probably a descendant of Richard Beach, who lived in New Haven and had a son, John, born in 1639. He was graduated at Yale college in 1721, and was for several years a Congregational minister at Newtown. Through his acquaintance with Dr. Johnson, he was induced to embrace the Episcopal form of worship. In 1732 he went to England for orders, and on his return was employed as an Episcopalian missionary at Reading and Newtown. After the Declaration of Independence, Congress ordered the ministers to pray for the commonwealth and not for the king. Mr. Beach, who retained his loyalty, chose to pray as usual for his majesty, and was in consequence handled roughly by the whigs. He died March 19, 1782.

He published an appeal to the unprejudiced, in answer to a sermon of Dickinson, 1737; also, about the year 1745, a sermon on Romans 6: 23, entitled, a sermon shewing that eternal life is God's free gift, bestowed upon men according to their moral behavior. In this he opposed with much zeal some of the Calvinistic doctrines, contained in the articles of the church which he had joined. Jonathan Dickinson wrote remarks upon it the following year, in his vindication of God's sovereignty and His universal love to the souls of men reconciled, in the form of a dialogue, 1747. He wrote also a reply to Dickinson's second vindication. Mr. Beach was a bold and distinguished advocate of those doctrines, which are denominated Arminian. Whatever may be said of his argument in his dispute with Dickinson, he evidently yields to his antagonist in gentleness and civility of manner. Another controversy, in which he engaged, had respect to Episcopacy. He published in 1749, in answer to Hobart's first address, a calm and dispassionate vindication of the professors of the church of England, to which Dr. Johnson wrote a preface and Mr. Caner an appendix. He seems to have had high notions of the necessity of Episcopal ordination. His other publications are, the duty of loving our enemies, 1738; an inquiry into the state of the dead, 1753; a continuation of the vindication of the professors, &c., 1756; the inquiry of the young man in the gospel; a sermon on the death of Dr. Johnson, 1772.—Chandler's Life of Johnson, 62, 126.

BEACH, ABRAHAM, D. D., an Episcopal minister, was born at Cheshire, Conn., Sept. 9, 1740, and graduated at Yale college in 1757. The bishop of London ordained him in June, 1767, as a priest for New Jersey. During seventeen years, including the period of the Revolution, he tranquilly discharged the duties of his office at New Brunswick. After the peace, he was called to New York as an assistant minister of Trinity church, where he remained about thirty years, and then retired in 1813 to his farm on the Raritan to pass the evening of his life. He died Sept. 11, 1828, aged 88 years. His daughter, Maria, and his son-in-law, Abiel Carter, an Episcopal minister, died at Savannah, Oct. 28, and Nov. 1, 1827. His dignified person, expressive countenance, and lively feelings rendered his old age interesting to his acquaintance. He was respected and honored in his failing years. A sermon of his, on the hearing of the word, is in American Preacher, III. He published a funeral sermon on Dr. Chandler, 1790.—Episcopal Watchman.

BEACH, EBENEZER S., died at Rochester, N. Y., March 14, 1850, aged 65. He was educated and very successful in business. In furnishing stores for the army he made much money; for his flour milling operations he was extensively known.

BEACH, SAMUEL, M. D., of Bridgeport, died, killed by the railroad disaster at Norwalk bridge May 6, 1853. He was among the forty-five persons killed. He received his medical degree at Yale in 1826;—besides being an eminent physician he was an excellent Christian.

BEADLE, WILLIAM, a deist, was born near London, and came to this country with a small quantity of goods. After residing at New York, Stratford, and Derby, he removed to Fairfield, where he married a Miss Lathrop of Plymouth, Mass. In 1772 he transplanted himself to Wethersfield, where he sustained the character of a fair dealer. In the depreciation of the paper currency, he, through some error of judgment, thought he was still bound to sell his goods at the old prices, as though the continental money had retained its nominal value. In the decay of his property he became melancholy. For years he meditated the destruction of his family. At last, Dec. 11, 1782, he murdered with an axe and a knife his wife and children and then shot himself with a pistol. He was aged 52; his wife 32; and the eldest child 15 years. The jury of inquest pronounced him to be of a sound mind; and the indignant inhabitants dragged his body, uncoffined, with the bloody knife tied to it, on a sled to the river, and "buried it, as they would have buried the carcase of a beast," and as the masonic oaths speak of burying a mason, murdered for his faithlessness to masonry, "between high and low water mark." He was a man of good sense, of gentlemanly conduct, and a hospitable disposition. His wife was very pleasing in person, mind, and manners.—It appears from his writings, that he was a deist, and that pride was the cause of his crimes. He was unwilling to submit to the evils of poverty or to receive aid from others, and unwilling to leave his family without the means of distinction. Yet was he worth 300 pounds sterling. He endeavored to convince himself, that he had a right to kill his children, because they were his; as for his wife, he relied on the authority of a dream for a right to murder her. His wife, in consequence of his carrying the implements of death into his bed-chamber, had dreamed, that she and the children were exposed in coffins in the street. This solved his doubts. As to killing himself he had no qualms. From such horrible crimes what is there to restrain that class of men, who reject the scriptures, or who, while professing to believe them, deny that there will be a future judgment, and maintain, that death will translate the blood-stained wretch to heaven?—Dwight's Travels, I. 229.

BEAN, JOSEPH, minister of Wrentham, died Dec. 12, 1784, aged 66. He was born in Boston March 7, 1718, of pious parents, who devoted him to God. Having learned a trade, he commenced business at Cambridge; but in 1741 the preaching of Whitefield and Tennent and of his own minister, Appleton, was the means of subduing his love of the world and of rendering him wise unto salvation. He now made a profession of religion and commenced a consistent course of piety and beneficence, in which he continued through life. He joined a religious society of young men, who met once a week; and seized every opportunity for conversing with others, especially with the young on their spiritual concerns. In 1742 he deemed it his duty to abandon his trade and to seek an education, that he might preach the gospel. The study of the languages was wearisome; but he persevered, and was graduated at Harvard College in 1748, and ordained the third minister of Wrentham Nov. 24, 1750. Mr. Bean was an eminently pious and faithful minister, and is worthy of honorable remembrance. From his diary it appears, that he usually spent one or two hours, morning and evening, in reading the Bible and secret devotion; also the afternoons of Saturday, when his discourses were prepared for the Sabbath; and the days of the birth of himself and children, as well as other days. He was truly humble, and watchful against all the excitements of pride. His conscience was peculiarly susceptible. His heart was tender and benevolent. Such was his constant intercourse with heaven, that hundreds of times, when riding in the performance of parochial duty, he had dismounted in a retired place to pour out his heart to God. When he had prepared a sermon, he would take it in his hand and kneel down to implore a blessing on it. Nothing was permitted to divert him from preaching faithfully the solemn truths of the gospel. He loved his work and his people, and they loved and honored him. Such a life will doubtless obtain the honor, which cometh from God; and in the day of judgment many such obscure men, whom the world knew not, will be exalted far above a multitude of learned doctors in divinity, and celebrated orators, and lofty dignitaries, whose names once resounded through the earth. He published a century sermon Oct. 26, 1773. — Panoplist, v. 481-488.

BEASLEY, NATHANIEL, general, died in Knox co., Ohio, in 1835, aged 84. He was an early settler, intelligent and useful.

BEASLEY, FREDERICK, D. D., died in Elizabethtown, N. J., Nov. 2, 1845, aged 68, formerly provost of the university of Pennsylvania. He wrote on Episcopacy and on moral and metaphysical subjects.

BEATTY, CHARLES, a missionary for many years at Neshaminy, Penns., was appointed about 1761 an agent to procure contributions to a fund for the benefit of the Presbyterian clergy, their widows, and children. He died at Barbadoes, whither he had gone to obtain benefactions for the college of New Jersey, Aug. 13, 1772. He was highly respected for his private virtues and for his public toils in the cause of learning, charity, and religion. He was a missionary from the Presbyterian church to the Indians, from about 1740 to 1765. In one of his tours Mr. Duffield accompanied him. He published a journal of a tour of two months to promote religion among the frontier inhabitants of Pennsylvania, 8vo. London, 1768. — Jennison; Brainerd's Life, 149-155.

BEATTY, JOHN, M. D., general, the son of the preceding, was a native of Bucks county, Penn., and was graduated at Princeton in 1769. After studying medicine with Dr. Rush, he entered the army as a soldier. Reaching the rank of Lieut.-Col. he in 1776 fell into the hands of the enemy at the capture of fort Washington, and suffered a long and rigorous imprisonment. In 1779 he succeeded Elias Boudinot as commissary general of prisoners. After the war he settled at Princeton as a physician, and was also a member of the State legislature, and in 1793 of congress. For ten years he was secretary of the state of New Jersey, succeeding in 1795 Samuel W. Stockton. For eleven years he was president of the bank of Trenton, where he died April 30, 1826, aged 77. For many years he was a ruling elder in the church. — Thacher's Med. Biog. 173, 174.

BEAUMONT, WILLIAM, doctor, died in St. Louis April 25, 1853, aged 57. His account of experiments with St. Martin, the Canadian, were published in 1833 and 1847.

BECK, GEORGE, a painter, was a native of England, and appointed professor of mathematics in the royal academy at Woolwich in 1776, but missed the office by his neglect. After coming to this country in 1795, he was employed in painting by Mr. Hamilton of the Woodlands, near Philadelphia. His last days were spent in Lexington, Ky., where he died Dec. 14, 1812, aged 63. Besides his skill in mathematics and painting, he had a taste for poetry, and wrote original pieces, besides translating Anacreon, and much of Homer, Virgil, and Horace. He published observations on the comet, 1812. — Jennison.

BECK, JOHN BRODHEAD, M. D., died at Rhinebeck, April 9, 1851, aged 57. He was eminent as a physician in New York; professor of materia medica and botany in 1826, and then of medical jurisprudence.

BECK, T. ROMEYN, M. D., died at Albany Nov., 1855, aged 64. He was born at Schenectady Aug. 11, 1791, the grandson of Rev. Derick Romeyn, a professor of theology in the Dutch church; graduated at Union in 1807, and received the degree of M. D. from the New York college of physicians in 1811, delivering a dissertation on insanity, which was published. He practised physic in Albany; in 1815 he was professor of the institutes and lecturer on medical jurisprudence in the western district. In 1817 he was appointed principal of the Albany academy; in 1829 president of the medical society, his addresses in which station were published in the society's transactions. In 1854 he was president of the lunatic asylum. For many years he edited the American journal of insanity. He published in 1853 his medical jurisprudence, a work unequalled in that branch.

BECK, LEWIS C., professor, died in Albany April 21, 1853, aged 53. He was born and educated at Schenectady. For many years he was the professor of chemistry and natural science at Rutgers college, and subsequently professor of chemistry in the Albany medical college. He published an account of the salt springs at Salina, 1826; manual of chemistry, 1831.

BEDELL, GREGORY T., D. D., an Episcopal minister, died at Philadelphia Aug. 30, 1834; a man of learning. He published Cause of the Greeks, 1827.

BEDFORD, GUNNING, governor of Delaware, was a patriot of the Revolution. He was chosen governor in 1796. He was afterwards appointed the district judge of the court of the United States; and died at Wilmington, in March, 1812.

BEECHER, PHILEMON, general, an early settler of Ohio, emigrated from Litchfield, Conn., and died at Lancaster, Ohio, Nov. 30, 1839, aged 63. He was a member of congress in 1817-1821 and in 1823-1829; in his politics a federalist. He was an able lawyer and advocate, respected for his talents and his exemplary Christian virtues.

BEECHER, GEORGE, died July 1, 1843, aged about 35, a graduate of Yale in 1828. He was a son of Dr. L. Beecher, and a minister, first at Batavia, and then three years at Chilloicthe. He went into his garden with a double-barrelled gun to shoot birds: after one shot he put his mouth to the barrel, to blow into it, as was supposed, and the gun went off and killed him.

BEEKMAN, CORNELIA, an admirable woman, a patriot of the Revolution, died in Christian peace near Tarrytown March 14, 1847, aged 94: her husband, Gerard G. B., died in 1822, aged 76. She was the daughter of Pierre Van Cortlandt and Joanna Livingston. Married at 17, she lived in Beekman street, N. Y.; then, during the war, at Peekskill; afterwards at the manor house of Philipsburgh, or castle Philipse, near Tarrytown, watered by the Pocanteco or Mill river. Her brother, Gen. P. Van Cortlandt, and her sister, Mrs. Van Rensselaer, survived her; also her daughter, Mrs. De Peyster, and her son, Dr. S. D. Beekman.

BEERS, NATHAN, died at New Haven Feb. 10, 1849, aged 96. After serving in the Revolutionary war, he engaged in mercantile business, and was long the steward of Yale college. He was a deacon of the north church, distinguished for courtesy, integrity, and piety.

BELCHER, SAMUEL, first minister of that parish in Newbury, Mass., which is called Newbury Newtown, was graduated at Harvard college in 1659. After preaching some time at the Isle of Shoals, he was ordained at Newbury Nov. 30, 1698; and died at Ipswich, in 1714, aged 74. He was a good scholar, a judicious divine, and a holy and humble man. He published an election sermon, 1707.—Coll. Hist. Soc. x. 168; Farmer.

BELCHER, JONATHAN, governor of Massachusetts and New Jersey, was the son of Andrew Belcher of Cambridge, one of the council of the province, and a gentleman of large estate, who died in 1717, and grandson of Andrew B., who lived in Cambridge in 1646, and who received in 1652 a license for an inn, granting him liberty "to sell beer and bread for entertainment of strangers and the good of the town." He was born in Jan., 1681. As the hopes of the family rested on him, his father carefully superintended his education. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1699. While a member of this institution his open and pleasant conversation, joined with his manly and generous conduct, conciliated the esteem of all his acquaintance. Not long after the termination of his collegiate course he visited Europe, that he might enrich his mind by his observations upon the various manners and characters of men, and might return, furnished with that useful knowledge, which is gained by intercourse with the world.

During an absence of six years from his native country, he was preserved from those follies into which inexperienced youth are frequently drawn, and he even maintained a constant regard to that holy religion, of which he had early made a profession. He was every where treated with the greatest respect. The acquaintance, which he formed with the princess Sophia and her son, afterwards king George II., laid the foundation of his future honors. After his return from his travels, he lived in Boston as a mérechant with great reputation. He was chosen a member of the council, and the general assembly sent him as an agent of the province to the British court in the year 1729. Hutchinson relates, that just before he obtained this appointment, he suddenly abandoned the party of Gov. Shute and his measures, to which he had been attached, and went over to the other side. This sudden change of sides is no rare occurrence among politicians.

After the death of Gov. Burnet, he was appointed by his majesty to the government of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, in 1730. In this station he continued eleven years. His style of living was elegant and splendid, and he was distinguished for hospitality. By the depreciation of the currency his salary was much diminished in value, but he disdained any unwarrantable means of enriching himself, though apparently just and sanctioned by his predecessors in office. He had been one of the principal merchants of New England; but he quitted his business on his accession to the chair of the first magistrate. Having a high sense of the dignity of his commission, he was determined to support it even at the expense of his private fortune. Frank and sincere, he was extremely liberal in his censures, both in conversation and letters. This imprudence in a public officer gained him enemies, who were determined on revenge. He also assumed some authority, which had not been exercised before, though he did not exceed his commission. These causes of complaint, together with a controversy respecting a fixed salary, which had been transmitted to him from his predecessors, and his opposition to the land bank company, finally occasioned his removal. His enemies were so inveterate, and so regardless of justice and truth, that, as they were unable to find real grounds for impeaching his integrity, they forged letters for the purpose of his ruin. They accused him of being a friend of the land bank, when he was its determined enemy. The leading men of New Hampshire, who wished for a distinct government, were hostile to him; and his resistance to a proposed new emission of paper bills also created him enemies. On being superseded, he repaired to court, where he vindicated his character and conduct, and exposed the base designs of his enemies. He was restored to the royal favor, and was promised the first vacant government in America. This vacancy occurred in the province of New Jersey, where he arrived in 1747, and where he spent the remaining years of his life. In this province his memory has been held in deserved respect.

When he first arrived in this province, he found it in the utmost confusion by tumults and riotous disorders, which had for some time prevailed. This circumstance, joined to the unhappy controversy between the two branches of the legislature, rendered the first part of his administration peculiarly difficult; but by his firm and prudent measures he surmounted the difficulties of his situation. He steadily pursued the interest of the province, endeavoring to distinguish and promote men of worth without partiality. He enlarged the charter of Princeton college, and was its chief patron and benefactor. Even under the growing infirmities of age, he applied himself with his accustomed assiduity and diligence to the high duties of his office. He died at Elizabethtown, Aug. 31, 1757, aged 76 years; His body was brought to Cambridge, Mass., where it was entombed. His eldest son, Andrew, a member of the council, died at Milton before the Revolution. In the opinion of Dr. Elliot he did not inherit the spirit of his father.

Gov. Belcher possessed uncommon gracefulness of person and dignity of deportment. He obeyed the royal instructions on the one hand and exhibited a real regard to the liberties and happiness of the people on the other. He was distinguished by his unshaken integrity, by his zeal for justice, and care to have it equally distributed. Neither the claims of interest nor the solicitations of friends could move him from what appeared to be his duty. He seems to have possessed, in addition to his other accomplishments, that piety, whose lustre is eternal. His religion was not a mere formal thing, which he received from tradition, or professed in conformity to the custom of the country, in which he lived; but it impressed his heart, and governed his life. He had such views of the majesty and holiness of God, of the strictness and purity of the divine law, and of his own unworthiness and iniquity, as made him disclaim all dependence on his own righteousness, and led him to place his whole hope for salvation on the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ, who appeared to him an all-sufficient and glorious Saviour. He expressed the humblest sense of his own character and the most exalted views of the rich, free, and glorious grace offered in the gospel to sinners. His faith worked by love, and produced the genuine fruits of obedience. It exhibited itself in a life of piety and devotion, of meekness and humility, of justice, truth, and benevolence. He searched the holy scriptures with the greatest diligence and delight. In his family he maintained the worship of God, himself reading the volume of truth, and addressing in prayer the Majesty of heaven and of earth, as long as his health and strength would possibly admit. In the hours of retirement he held intercourse with heaven, carefully redeeming time from the business of this world to attend to the more important concerns of another. Though there was nothing ostentatious in his religion, yet he was not ashamed to avow his attachment to the gospel of Christ, even when he exposed himself to ridicule and censure. When Mr. Whitfield was at Boston in the year 1740, he treated that eloquent itinerant with the greatest respect. He even followed him as far as Worcester, and requested him to continue his faithful instructions and pungent addresses to the conscience, desiring him to spare neither ministers nor rulers. He was indeed deeply interested in the progress of holiness and religion. As he approached the termination of his life, he often expressed his desire to depart and to enter the world of glory. — Burr's Funeral Sermon; Hutchinson, II. 367-397; Holmes, II. 78; Smith's N. J., 437-438; Belknap's N. H.; Whitfield's Jour. for 1743; Marshall, I. 299; Minot, I. 61; Elliot.

BELCHER, JONATHAN, chief justice of Nova Scotia, was the second son of the preceding, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1728. He studied law at the temple in London and gained some distinction at the bar in England. At the settlement of Chebucto, afterwards called Halifax, in honor of one of the king's ministers, he proceeded to that place, and being in 1760 senior councillor, on the death of Gov. Lawrence he was appointed lieutenant-governor, in which office he was succeeded by Col. Wilmot in 1763. In 1761 he received his appointment of chief justice; in the same year, as commander in chief, he made a treaty with the Mirimichi, Jédiuk, and Pogninouch, Mickmack tribes of Indians. He died at Halifax March, 1776, aged 65. He was a man of prudence and integrity, and a friend of New England. In 1756 he married at Boston the sister of Jerem. Allen, sheriff of Suffolk; on her death in 1771 Mr. Secomb published a discourse, and her kinsman, Dr. Byles, a monody. Andrew Belcher, his son, was a distinguished citizen of Halifax and a member of the council in 1801. A daughter married Dr. Timothy L. Jemison of Cambridge, Mass. — Mass. Hist. Coll. v. 102; Jemison; Eliot.

BELDEN, JOSHUA, physician of Weathersfield, was the son of Rev. Joshua Belden of that town, who reached the age of 90 years. After graduating at Yale college in 1787, he studied physic with Dr. L. Hopkins. Besides his useful toils as a physician, he was employed in various offices of public trust. He was a zealous supporter of all charitable and religious institutions. At the age of 50 he fell a victim suddenly to the spotted fever, June 6, 1818. — Thacher's Medical Biography.

BELKNAP, JEREMY, D. D., minister in Boston, and eminent as a writer, died June 20, 1798, aged 54. He was born June 4, 1744, and was a descendant of Joseph Belknap, who lived in Boston in 1658. He received the rudiments of learning in the grammar school of the celebrated Mr. Lovel, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1762. He exhibited, at this early period, such marks of genius and taste, and such talents in writing and conversation, as to excite the most pleasing hopes of his future usefulness and distinction. Having upon his mind deep impressions of the truths of religion, he now applied himself to the study of theology, and he was ordained pastor of the church in Dover, N. H., Feb. 18, 1767. Here he passed near twenty years of his life, with the esteem and affection of his flock, and respected by the first characters of the state. He was persuaded by them to compile his history of New Hampshire, which gained him a high reputation. In 1786 he was dismissed from his people. The Presbyterian church in Boston becoming vacant by the removal of Mr. Annan, and having changed its establishment from the Presbyterian to the Congregational form, soon invited him to become its pastor. He was accordingly installed April 4, 1787. Here he passed the remainder of his days, discharging the duties of his pastoral office, exploring various fields of literature, and giving his efficient support to every useful and benevolent institution. After being subject to frequent returns of ill health he was suddenly seized by a fatal paralytic affection.

Dr. Belknap in his preaching did not possess the graces of elocution, nor did he aim at splendid diction; but presented his thoughts in plain and perspicuous language, that all might understand him. While he lived in Boston, he avoided controversial subjects, dwelling chiefly upon the practical views of the gospel. His sermons were filled with a rich variety of observations on human life and manners. He was peculiarly careful in giving religious instruction to young children, that their feet might be early guided in the way of life. In the afternoon preceding his death, he was engaged in catechizing the youth of his society. In the various relations of life his conduct was exemplary. He was a member of many literary and humane societies, whose interests he essentially promoted. Wherever he could be of any service, he freely devoted his time and talents. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts historical society. He had been taught the value of an association, whose duty it should be to collect and preserve manuscripts and bring together the materials for illustrating the history of our country; and he had the happiness of seeing such an institution incorporated in 1794.

Dr. Belknap gained a high reputation as a writer; but he is more remarkable for the patience and accuracy of his historical researches, than for elegance of style. His deficiency in natural science, as manifested in his history of New Hampshire, is rendered more prominent by the rapid progress of natural history since his death. His Foresters is not only a description of American manners, but a work of humor and wit, which went into a second edition. Before the Revolution he wrote much in favor of freedom and his country, and he afterwards gave to the public many fruits of his labors and researches. His last and most interesting work, his American Biography, he did not live to complete. He was a decided advocate of our republican forms of government, and ever was a warm friend of the constitution of the United States, which he considered the bulwark of our national security and happiness. He was earnest in his wishes and prayers for the government of his country, and in critical periods took an open and unequivocal, and, as far as professional and private duties allowed, an active part.

The following extract from some lines, found among his papers, expresses his choice with regard to the manner of his death; and the event corresponded with his wishes.

When faith and patience, hope and love
Have made us meet for heaven above,
How blest the privilege to rise,
Snatched in a moment to the skies!
Unconscious, to resign our breath,
Nor taste the bitterness of death.

Dr. Belknap published a sermon on military duty, 1772; a serious address to a parishioner upon the neglect of public worship; a sermon on Jesus Christ, the only foundation; election sermon, 1784; history of New Hampshire, the first volume in 1784, the second in 1791, and the third in 1792; a sermon at the ordination of Jedediah Morse, 1789; a discourse in 1792, on the completion of the third century from Columbus' discovery of America; dissertations upon the character and resurrection of Christ, 12mo.; collection of psalms and hymns, 1795; convention sermon, 1796; a sermon on the national fast, May 9, 1793; American biography, first volume in 1794, the second in 1798; the foresters, an American tale, being a sequel to the history of John Bull, the clothier, 12mo. He published also several essays upon the African trade, upon civil and religious liberty, upon the state and settlement of this country, in periodical papers; in the Columbian magazine printed in Philadelphia; in the Boston magazine, 1784; in the historical collections; and in newspapers. Two of his sermons on the institution and observation of the Sabbath were published in 1801. — Mass. Hist. Coll. VI. X.-XVIII.; Columbian Cent., June 25, 1798; Polyanthos, I. 1-13.

BELKNAP, EZEKIEL, died in Atkinson, N. H., Jan. 5, 1836, aged 100 years and 40 days; an officer in the Revolutionary army. He was the son of Moses, who died in 1813, aged 99, and grandson of Hannah B., who died aged 107.

BELL, JOHN, a distinguished citizen of New Hampshire, of great judgment, decision, and integrity, died at Londonderry, Nov. 30, 1825, aged 95 years. His father, John, was an early settler of that town. During the Revolutionary war he was a leading member of the senate. From an early age he was a professor of religion. Two of his sons, Samuel and John, were governors of New Hampshire; the former was a senator of the United States. His grandson, John Bell, son of Samuel, a physician of great promise, died at Grand Caillon, La., Nov. 27, 1830 aged 30.

BELL, SAMUEL, governor, died in Chester, N. H., Dec. 23, 1850, aged 81; a graduate of Dartmouth, a judge of the superior court from 1816 to 1819, governor from 1819 to 1823, and a senator in congress from 1823 to 1835.

BELL, JOHN, governor of N. H. in 1828, died at Chester, March 22, 1836.

BELMONT, RICHARD, earl of, governor of New York, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, was appointed to these offices early in May, 1695, but did not arrive at New York until May, 1698. He had to struggle with many difficulties, for the people were divided, the treasury was un-supplied, and the fortifications were out of repair. Notwithstanding the care of government, the pirates, who in time of peace made great depredations upon Spanish ships and settlements in America, were frequently in the sound, and were supplied with provisions by the inhabitants of Long Island. The belief, that large quantities of money were hid by these pirates along the coast, led to many a fruitless search; and thus the natural credulity of the human mind and the desire of sudden wealth were suitably punished. The Earl of Bellmont remained in the province of New York about a year. He arrived at Boston May 26, 1699, and in Massachusetts he was received with the greatest respect, as it was a new thing to see a nobleman at the head of the government. Twenty companies of soldiers and a vast concourse of people met "his lordship and countess" on his arrival. "There were all manner of expressions of joy, and, to end all, firework and good drink at night." He in return took every method to ingratiate himself with the people. He was condescending, affable, and courteous upon all occasions. Though a churchman, he attended the weekly lecture in Boston with the general court, who always adjourned for the purpose.

For the preachers he professed the greatest regard. By his wise conduct he obtained a larger sum as a salary and as a gratuity, than any of his predecessors or successors. Though he remained but fourteen months, the grants made to him were one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling. His time was much taken up in securing the pirates and their effects, to accomplish which was a principal reason of his appointment. During his administration Capt. Kidd was seized, and sent to England for trial. Soon after the session of the general court in May, 1700, he returned to New York, where he died March 5, 1701. He had made himself very popular in his governments. He was a nobleman of polite manners, a friend to the revolution, which excited so much joy in New England, and a favorite of king William. Hutchinson, who was himself not unskilled in the arts of popularity, seems to consider his regard to religion as pretended, and represents him as preferring for his associates in private the less precise part of the country. As the earl was once going from the lecture to his house with a great crowd around him, he passed by one Bullivant, an apothecary, and a man of the liberal cast, who was standing at his shop-door loitering. "Doctor," said the earl with an audible voice, "you have lost a precious sermon to-day." Bullivant whispered to one of his companions, who stood by him, "if I could have got as much by being there, as his lordship will, I would have been there too." However, there seems to be no reason to distrust the sincerity of Bellamont. The dissipation of his early years caused afterwards a deep regret. It is said, that while residing at fort George, N. Y., he once a week retired privately to the chapel to meditate humbly upon his juvenile folly. Such a man might deem a sermon on the method of salvation "precious," without meriting from the scoffer the charge of hypocrisy. — Hutchinson, II. 87, 108, 112-16, 121.

BELLAMY, JOSEPH, D. D., an eminent minister, died March 6, 1790, aged 71, in the fiftieth year of his ministry. He was born at New Cheshire in 1719, and was graduated at Yale college in 1735. It was not long after his removal from New Haven, that he became the subject of those serious impressions, which, it is believed, issued in renovation of heart. From this period he consecrated his talents to the evangelical ministry. At the age of eighteen he began to preach with acceptance and success. An uncommon blessing attended his ministry at Bethlem in the town of Woodbury; a large proportion of the society appeared to be awakened to a sense of religion, and they were unwilling to part with the man, by whose ministry they had been conducted to a knowledge of the truth. He was ordained to the pastoral office over this church in 1740. In this retirement he devoted himself with uncommon ardor to his studies and the duties of his office till the memorable revival, which was most conspicuous in 1742. His spirit of piety was then blown into a flame; he could not be contented to confine his labors to his small society. Taking care that his own pulpit should be vacant as little as possible, he devoted a considerable part of his time for several years to itinerating in different parts of Connecticut and the neighboring colonies, preaching the gospel daily to multitudes, who flocked to hear him. He was instrumental in the conversion of many. When the awakening declined, he returned to a more constant attention to his own charge. He now began the task of writing an excellent treatise, entitled true religion delineated, which was published in 1750. His abilities, his ardent piety, his theological knowledge, his acquaintance with persons under all kinds of religious impressions qualified him peculiarly for a work of this kind. From this time he became more conspicuous, and young men, who were preparing for the gospel ministry, applied to him as a teacher. In this branch of his work he was eminently useful till the decline of life, when he relinquished it. His method of instruction was the following. After ascertaining the abilities and genius of those, who applied to him, he gave them a number of questions on the leading and most essential subjects of religion, in the form of a system. He then directed them to such books as treat these subjects with the greatest perspicuity and force of argument, and usually spent his evenings in inquiring into their improvements and solving difficulties, till they had obtained a good degree of understanding in the general system. After this, he directed them to write on each of the questions before given them, reviewing those parts of the authors which treated on the subject proposed. These dissertations were submitted to his examination. As they advanced in ability to make proper distinctions, he led them to read the most learned and acute opposers of the truth, the deistical, arian, and socinian writers, and laid open the fallacy of their most specious reasonings. When the system was completed, he directed them to write on several of the most important points systematically, in the form of sermons. He next led them to peruse the best experimental and practical discourses, and to compose sermons on like subjects. He revised and corrected their compositions, inculcating the necessity of a heart truly devoted to Christ, and a life of watching and prayer; discoursing occasionally on the various duties, trials, comforts, and motives of the evangelical work; that his pupils might be, as far as possible, "scribes well instructed in the kingdom of God." In 1786 Dr. Bellamy was seized by a paralytic affection, from which he never recovered. His first wife, Frances Sherman of New Haven, whom he married about 1744, died in 1785, the mother of seven children. Of these Jonathan Bellamy, a lawyer, took an active part in the war, and died of the small pox in 1777; and Rebecca married Rev. Mr. Hart. His eldest son, David, died at Bethlem May, 1826, aged 75. His second wife was the relict of Rev. Andrew Storrs of Watertown.

Dr. Bellamy "was a large and well-built man, of a commanding appearance." As a preacher, he had perhaps no superior, and very few equals. His voice was manly, his manner engaging and most impressive. He had a peculiar faculty of arresting the attention; he was master of his subject and could adapt himself to the meaneast capacity. When the law was his theme, he was awful and terrifying; on the contrary, in the most melting strains would he describe the sufferings of Christ and his love to sinners, and with most persuasive eloquence invite them to be reconciled to God.

He was a man of wit and humor. He and Mr. Sanford married sisters. B. said to S. in reference to their different manner of preaching, — "When I go a fishing, I have a suitable pole, and black line, and, creeping along, keeping myself out of sight, throw my hook gently into the water; but you, with a white-peeled pole, and white line, march up boldly to the bank, and splash in your hook and line, crying out, 'Bite, you dogs!'"

In his declining years he did not retain his popularity as a preacher. As a pastor he was diligent and faithful. He taught not only publicly but from house to house. He was particularly attentive to the rising generation. Besides the stated labors of the Lord's day, he frequently spent an hour in the intervals of public worship in catechising the children of the congregation. In a variety of respects Dr. Bellamy shone with distinguished lustre. Extensive science and ease of communicating his ideas rendered him one of the best of instructors. His writings procured him the esteem of the pious and learned at home and abroad, with many of whom he maintained an epistolary correspondence. In his preaching, a mind rich in thought, a great command of language, and a powerful voice rendered his extemporary discourses peculiarly acceptable. He was one of the most able divines of this country. In his sentiments he accorded mainly with President Edwards, with whom he was intimately acquainted. From comparing the first chapter of John with the first of Genesis he was led to believe, and he maintained, that the God, mentioned in the latter as the Creator, was Jesus Christ.

He published a sermon entitled, early piety recommended; true religion delineated, 1750; sermons on the Divinity of Christ, the millennium, and the wisdom of God in the permission of sin, 1758; letters and dialogues on the nature of love to God, faith in Christ, and assurance, 1759; essay on the glory of the gospel; a vindication of his sermon on the wisdom of God in the permission of sin; the law a schoolmaster; the great evil of sin; election sermon, 1762. Besides these, he published several small pieces on creeds and confessions; on the covenant of grace; on church covenanting; and in answer to objections made against his writings. The following are the titles of some of these: the half-way covenant, 1768; the inconsistency of renouncing the half-way covenant and retaining the half-way practice; that there is but one covenant, against Moses Mather. His works, in 2 vols., with memoir by Dr. T. Edwards, were published by Doct. Tract. Soc., Boston, 1850. — Brainerd's Life, 22, 41, 43, 55; Trumbull, II. 159; Theol. Mag., I. 5.

BELLAMY, SAMUEL, a noted pirate, in his ship, the Whidah, of twenty-three guns and one hundred and thirty men, captured several vessels on the coast of New England; but in April, 1717, he was wrecked on Cape Cod. The inhabitants of Wellfleet still point out the place of the disaster. More than one hundred bodies were found on the shore. Only one Englishman and one Indian escaped. A few days before, the master of a captured vessel, while seven pirates on board were drunk, ran her on shore on the back of the cape. Six of the pirates were executed at Boston in November.

BELLINGHAM, RICHARD, governor of Massachusetts, was a native of England, where he was bred a lawyer. He came to this country in 1634, and August 3d was received into the church, with his wife Elizabeth, and in the following year was chosen deputy governor. In 1641 he was elected governor, in opposition to Mr. Winthrop, by a majority of six votes; but the election did not seem to be agreeable to the general court. He was re-chosen to this office in 1654, and after the death of Gov. Endicot was again elected in May, 1665. He continued chief magistrate of Massachusetts during the remainder of his life. He was deputy governor thirteen years, and governor ten. In 1664 he was chosen major-general. In this year the king sent four commissioners, Nichols, Cartwright, Carr, and Maverick, to regulate the affairs of the colonies. A long account of their transactions is given by Hutchinson. Bellingham and others, obnoxious to the king, were required to go to England to answer for themselves; but the general court, by the advice of the ministers, refused compliance and maintained the charter rights. But they appeased his majesty by sending him "a ship load of masts." He died Dec. 7, 1672, aged 80 years, leaving several children. Of his singular second marriage in 1641 the following is a brief history: A young gentlewoman was about to be contracted to a friend of his, with his consent, "when on the sudden the governor treated with her and obtained her for himself." He failed to publish the contract where he dwelt, and he performed the marriage ceremony himself. The great inquest presented him for breach of the order of court; but at the appointed time of trial, not choosing to go off from the bench and answer as an offender, and but few magistrates being present, he escaped any censure.

His excuse for this marriage was "the strength of his affection." In his last will he gave certain farms, after his wife's decease, and his whole estate at Winisimet, after the decease of his son and his son's daughter, for the annual encouragement of "godly ministers and preachers," attached to the principles of the first church, "a main one whereof is, that all ecclesiastical jurisdiction is committed by Christ to each particular organical church, from which there is no appeal." The general court, thinking the rights of his family were impaired, set aside the will. His sister, Anne Hibbins, widow of William Hibbins, an assistant, was executed as a witch in June, 1656. Hubbard speaks of Bellingham as "a very ancient gentleman, having spun a long thread of above eighty years;" "he was a great justiciary, a notable hater of bribes, firm and fixed in any resolution he entertained, of larger comprehension than expression, like a vessel, whose vent holdeth no good proportion with its capacity to contain, a disadvantage to a public person." He did not harmonize with the other assistants; yet they respected his character and motives.

Gov. Bellingham lived to be the only surviving patentee named in the charter. He was severe against those who were called sectaries; but he was a man of incorruptible integrity, and of acknowledged piety. In the ecclesiastical controversy, which was occasioned in Boston by the settlement of Mr. Davenport, he was an advocate of the first church. — Hutchinson, I. 41, 43, 97, 211, 269; Neal's Hist., I. 300; Mather's Mag., II. 18; Holmes, I. 414; Savage's Winthrop, II. 43.

BENEDICT, NOAH, minister of Woodbury, Conn., was graduated at Princeton college in 1757, and was ordained as the successor of Anthony Stoddard, Oct. 22, 1760. He died in Sept., 1813, aged 75. He published a sermon on the death of Dr. Bellamy, 1790, and memoirs of B., 1811.

BENEDICT, JOEL, D. D., minister of Plainfield, Conn., was graduated at Princeton college in 1765, settled at Plainfield in 1782, and died in 1816, aged 71. He was a distinguished Hebrew scholar; and for his excellent character he was held in high respect. One of his daughters married Dr. Nott, president of Union college. He published a sermon on the death of Dr. Hart, 1809.

BENEZET, ANTHONY, a philanthropist of Philadelphia, died May 3, 1784, aged 71. He was born at St. Quintins, a town in the province of Picardy, France, Jan. 31, 1713. About the time of his birth the persecution against the Protestants was carried on with relentless severity, in consequence of which many thousands found it necessary to leave their native country, and seek a shelter in a foreign land. Among these were his parents, who removed to London in Feb., 1715, and, after remaining there upwards of sixteen years, came to Philadelphia in Nov., 1731. During their residence in Great Britain they had imbibed the religious opinions of the Quakers, and were received into that body immediately after their arrival in this country.

In the early part of his life Benezet was put an apprentice to a merchant; but soon after his marriage in 1722, when his affairs were in a prosperous situation, he left the mercantile business, that he might engage in some pursuit, which would afford him more leisure for the duties of religion and for the exercise of that benevolent spirit, for which during the course of a long life he was so conspicuous. But no employment, which accorded perfectly with his inclination, presented itself till the year 1742, when he accepted the appointment of instructor in the Friends' English school of Philadelphia. The duties of the honorable, though not very lucrative, office of a teacher of youth he from this period continued to fulfil with unremitting assiduity and delight and with very little intermission till his death. During the two last years of his life his zeal to do good induced him to resign the school, which he had long superintended, and to engage in the instruction of the blacks. In doing this he did not consult his worldly interest, but was influenced by a regard to the welfare of men, whose minds had been debased by servitude. He wished to contribute something towards rendering them fit for the enjoyment of that freedom, to which many of them had been restored. So great was his sympathy with every being capable of feeling pain, that he resolved towards the close of his life to eat no animal food. His active mind did not yield to the debility of his body. He persevered in his attendance upon his school till within a few days of his decease.

Such was the general esteem in which he was held, that his funeral was attended by persons of all religious denominations. Many hundred negroes followed their friend and benefactor to the grave, and by their tears they proved that they possessed the sensibilities of men. An officer, who had served in the army during the war with Britain, observed at this time, "I would rather be Anthony Benezet in that coffin, than George Washington with all his fame." He exhibited uncommon activity and industry in every thing which he undertook. He used to say, that the highest act of charity was to bear with the unreasonableness of mankind. He generally wore plush clothes, and gave as a reason for it, that, after he had worn them for two or three years, they made comfortable and decent garments for the poor. So disposed was he to make himself contented in every situation, that when his memory began to fail him, instead of lamenting the decay of his powers, he said to a young friend, "This gives me one great advantage over you, for you can find entertainment in reading a good book only once; but I enjoy that pleasure as often as I read it, for it is always new to me." Few men, since the days of the apostles, ever lived a more disinterested life; yet upon his death-bed he expressed a desire to live a little longer, "that he might bring down self." The last time he ever walked across his room was to take from his desk six dollars, which he gave to a poor widow, whom he had long assisted to maintain. In his conversation he was affable and unreserved; in his manners gentle and conciliating. For the acquisition of wealth he wanted neither abilities nor opportunity; but he made himself contented with a little; and with a competency he was liberal beyond most of those, whom a bountiful Providence had encumbered with riches. By his will he devised his estate, after the decease of his wife, to certain trustees for the use of the African school. While the British army was in possession of Philadelphia, he was indefatigable in his endeavors to render the situation of the persons who suffered from captivity, as easy as possible. He knew no fear in the presence of a fellow man, however dignified by titles or station; and such was the propriety and gentleness of his manners in his intercourse with the gentlemen, who commanded the British and German troops, that, when he could not obtain the object of his requests, he never failed to secure their civilities and esteem. Although the life of Mr. Benezet was passed in the instruction of youth, yet his expansive benevolence extended itself to a wider sphere of usefulness. Giving but a small portion of his time to sleep, he employed his pen both day and night in writing books on religious subjects, composed chiefly with a view to inculcate the peaceable temper and doctrines of the gospel, in opposition to the spirit of war, and to expose the flagrant injustice of slavery, and fix the stamp of infamy on the traffic in human blood. His writings contributed much towards meliorating the condition of slaves, and undoubtedly had influence on the public mind in effecting the complete prohibition of that trade, which until the year 1808 was a blot on the American national character. In order to disseminate his publications and increase his usefulness, he held a correspondence with such persons in various parts of Europe and America, as united with him in the same benevolent design, or would be likely to promote the objects, which he was pursuing. No ambitious or covetous views impelled him to his exertions. Regarding all mankind as children of one common Father and members of one great family, he was anxious, that oppression and tyranny should cease, and that men should live together in mutual kindness and affection. He himself respected and he wished others to respect the sacred injunction of doing unto others as they would that others should do unto them. On the return of peace in 1783, apprehending that the revival of commerce would be likely to renew the African slave trade, which during the war had been in some measure obstructed, he addressed a letter to the queen of Great Britain, to solicit her influence on the side of humanity. At the close of this letter he says, "I hope thou wilt kindly excuse the freedom used on this occasion by an ancient man, whose mind for more than forty years past has been much separated from the common course of the world, long painfully exercised in the consideration of the miseries under which so large a part of mankind, equally with us the objects of redeeming love, are suffering the most unjust and grievous oppression, and who sincerely desires the temporal and eternal felicity of the queen and her royal consort." He published, among other tracts, an account of that part of Africa inhabited by negroes, 1762; a caution to Great Britain and her colonies, in a short representation of the calamitous state of the enslaved negroes in the British dominions, 1767; some historical account of Guinea, with an inquiry into the slave trade, 1771; a short account of the society of Friends, 1780; a dissertation on the Christian religion, 1782; tracts against the use of ardent spirits; observations on the Indian natives, 1784. — Rush's Essays, 311-314; Vaux's Memoir; New and Gen. Biog. Dict.; Am. Museum, IX. 192-194.

BENJAMIN, NATHAN, missionary, died at Constantinople Jan. 27, 1855, aged 43; one month after the death of Mrs. Grant. Born in Catskill, he lived in Williamstown, where he graduated in 1831, and at Andover in 1834. He married Mary G. Wheeler of New York, and proceeded to Argos in 1836, and to Athens in 1838, where he labored six years, chiefly in connection with the press. In 1844 he entered upon the Armenian mission at Trebizond; but the ill health of his wife brought him to America in 1845.

Being summoned to a new mission, he arrived at Smyrna Dec. 7, 1847; and there he toiled in the printing of the Bible and tracts in the Armenian. The printing operations were transferred to Constantinople in 1852; and there he also preached stately in Greek and English. Living at Pera, and being the treasurer of the mission, a great amount of business fell upon him. He died of the typhus fever; his last words were, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly."—Mr. B. had a large share of common sense, a sound judgment, a knowledge of books and of men. By printed truth he will preach for ages to thousands of Armenians.

BENNET, DAVID, a physician, was born in England Dec. 1, 1615, and died at Rowley, Mass., Feb. 4, 1719, aged 103 years. He never lost a tooth. His senses were good to the last. His wife was the sister of William Phipps. His son, Spencer, who took the name of Phipps, was graduated in 1703, was lieutenant-governor of Mass., and died April 4, 1757, aged 72. — Farmer.

BENNETT, BARTLETT, a Baptist minister, died at Cincinnati Oct. 12, 1842, aged 99. He was born in Albemarle county, Va., in 1743; was a preacher at the age of 25, a pioneer of Kentucky.

BENSON, EGBERT, LL. D., judge, died at Jamaica, N. Y., in Aug., 1833, aged 86; a man of learning and eminent virtues. He was a graduate of Columbia college in 1765, a member of congress, a judge of the supreme court of New York, and of the circuit court of the United States. He wrote remarks on "The Wife" of Irving.

BENTLEY, WILLIAM, D. D., born in Boston, graduated at Harvard in 1777, and was ordained over the second church of Salem Sept., 1783. He died suddenly Dec. 29, 1819, aged 61. In his theological notions he was regarded as a Socinian. Some of his sermons were remarkably deficient in perspicuity of style. For nearly twenty years he edited the Essex Register, a newspaper, which espoused the democratic side in politics. He was a great collector of books, and much conversant with ancient branches of learning, admitting of little practical application. His valuable library and cabinet he bequeathed chiefly to the college at Meadville, Pennsylvania, and to the American Antiquarian society at Worcester. An eulogy was pronounced by Prof. E. Everett.—He published a sermon on Matt. 7: 21, 1790; on the death of J. Gardiner, 1791; of Gen. Fiske, 1797; of B. Hodges, 1804; collection of psalms and hymns, 1795; three masonic addresses and a masonic charge, 1797-1799; at the artillery election, 1796; at ordination of J. Richardson, 1806; before the female charitable society; at the election, 1807; a history of Salem in Historical Collections, vol. VII.

BENTLEY, WILLIAM, an eminent Baptist minister, died at Weathersfield in Jan., 1856, aged 81.

BERKELEY, CARTER, M. D., died in Hanover, Va., Nov. 3, 1739, aged 71,—while feeling the pulse of a dying patient. He was a descendant of Sir William B.; a distinguished physician, a benevolent man and a Christian.

BERKELEY, WILLIAM, governor of Virginia, was born of an ancient family near London and was educated at Merton college, in Oxford, of which he was afterwards a fellow. He was admitted master of arts in 1629. In 1630 he travelled in different parts of Europe. He is described as being in early life the perfect model of an elegant courtier and a high-minded cavalier. He succeeded Sir Francis Wyatt in the government of Virginia in 1641. Some years after his arrival the Indians, irritated by encroachments on their territory, massacred about five hundred of the colonists. This massacre occurred about April 18, 1644, soon after, as Winthrop says, an act of persecution. Sir William with a company of horse surprised the aged Oppeceanough, and brought him prisoner to Jamestown. The Indian emperor was a man of dignified sentiments. One day, when there was a large crowd in his room gazing at him, he called for the governor, and said to him, "If it had been my fortune to have taken Sir William Berkeley prisoner, I should have disdained to have made a show of him to my people." About a fortnight after he was taken, a brutal soldier shot him through the back, of which wound the old man soon died. A firm peace was soon afterwards made with the Indians.

During the civil war in England Gov. Berkeley took the side of the king, and Virginia was the last of the possessions of England, which acknowledged the authority of Cromwell. Severe laws were made against the Puritans, though there were none in the colony; commerce was interrupted; and the people were unable to supply themselves even with tools for agriculture. It was not till 1651, that Virginia was subdued. The parliament had sent a fleet to reduce Barbadoes, and from this place a small squadron was detached under the command of Capt. Dennis. The Virginians, by the help of some Dutch vessels which were then in the port, made such resistance, that he was obliged to have recourse to other means besides force. He sent word to two of the members of the council, that he had on board a valuable cargo belonging to them, which they must lose, if the protector's authority was not immediately acknowledged. Such dissensions now took place in the colony, that Sir William and his friends were obliged to submit on the terms of a general pardon. He however remained in the country, passing his time in retirement at his own plantation, and observing with satisfaction, that the parliament made a moderate use of its success, and that none of the Virginia royalists were persecuted for their resistance.

After the death of Gov. Matthews, who was appointed by Cromwell, the people applied to Sir William to resume the government; but he declined complying with their request, unless they would submit themselves again to the authority of the king. Upon their consenting to do this, he resumed his former authority in January, 1659; and King Charles II. was proclaimed in Virginia before his restoration to the throne of England. The death of Cromwell, in the mean time, dissipated from the minds of the colonists the fear of the consequences of their boldness. After the restoration Gov. Berkeley received a new commission and was permitted to go to England to pay his respects to his majesty. During his absence the deputy governor, whom he had appointed, in obedience to his orders collected the laws into one body. The church of England was made the established religion, parishes were regulated, and, besides a parsonage house and glebe, a yearly stipend in tobacco, to the value of eighty pounds, was settled on the minister. In 1662 Gov. Berkeley returned to Virginia, and in the following year the laws were enforced against the dissenters from the establishment, by which a number of them were driven from the colony. In 1667, in consequence of his attempt to extend the influence of the council over certain measures of the assembly, he awakened the fears and indignation of the latter body. From this period the governor's popularity declined. A change also was observed in his deportment, which lost its accustomed urbanity. His faithlessness and obstinacy may be regarded as the causes of Bacon's rebellion in 1676. The people earnestly desired, that Bacon might be appointed general in the Indian war; and the governor promised to give him a commission, but broke his promise, and thus occasioned the rebellion. As his obstinacy caused the rebellion, so his revengeful spirit, after it was suppressed, aggravated the evils of it by the severity of the punishments inflicted on Bacon's adherents. Though he had promised pardon and indemnity, "nothing was heard of but fines, executions, and confiscations." When the juries refused to aid his projects of vengeance, he resorted to the summary proceedings of martial law. The assembly at length restrained him by their remonstrances. Charles II. is said to have remarked concerning him, "The old fool has taken away more lives in that naked country, than I have taken for the murder of my father." After the rebellion, peace was preserved not so much by the removal of the grievances, which awakened discontent, as by the arrival of a regiment from England, which remained a long time in the country.

In 1677 Sir William was induced, on account of his ill state of health, to return to England, leaving Col. Jeffreys deputy governor. He died soon after his arrival, and before he had seen the king, after an administration of nearly forty years. He was buried at Twickenham July 13, 1677. The following extract from his answer in June, 1671, to inquiries of the committee for the colonies, is a curious specimen of his loyalty: "We have forty-eight parishes and our ministers are well paid, and by my consent should be better, if they would pray oftener and preach less; but, as of all other commodities, so of this, the worst are sent us, and we have few, that we can boast of, since the persecution in Cromwell's tyranny drove divers worthy men hither. Yet I thank God, there are no free schools, nor printing; and I hope we shall not have these hundred years. For learning has brought disobedience, and heresy, and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them and libels against the best government." Thus Sir William, of a very different spirit from the early governors of New England, seems to have had much the same notion of education as the African governor, mentioned by Robert Southey in his colloquies. The black prince said, he would send his son to England, that he might learn "to read book and be rogue." More recently Mr. Giles of Virginia expressed his belief, that learning was become too general.

He published the lost lady, a tragi-comedy, 1639; a discourse and view of Virginia, pp. 12. 1663. — Keith's Hist. Virginia, 144-162; Wynne, II. 216-224; Holmes, I. 293, 311; Chalmers, I. 336, 337; Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, II. 586; Sav. Winthrop, II. 159, 165.

BERKELEY, GEORGE, bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, and a distinguished benefactor of Yale College, was born March 12, 1684, at Kilerin in the county of Kilkenny, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. After publishing a number of his works, which gained him a high reputation, particularly his theory of vision, he travelled four or five years upon the continent. He returned in 1721, and a fortune was soon bequeathed him by Mrs. Vanhomrigh, a lady of Dublin, the "Vanessa" of Swift. In 1724 he was promoted to the deanery of Derry, worth 1100 pounds per annum. Having for some time conceived the benevolent project of converting the savages of America to Christianity by means of a college to be erected in one of the isles of Bermuda, he published a proposal for this purpose at London in 1725, and offered to resign his own opulent preferment, and to dedicate the remainder of his life to the instruction of youth in America on the subsistence of 100 pounds a year. He obtained a grant of 10,000 pounds from the government of Great Britain, and immediately set sail for the field of his labors. He arrived at Newport, R. I., in Feb., 1729, with a view of settling a correspondence there for supplying his college with such provisions as might be wanted from the northern colonies. Here he purchased a country seat and farm in the neighborhood of Newport, and resided about two years and a half. His house, which he called Whitehall, still remains, situated half a mile north-east from the state house. To the Episcopal church he gave an organ and a small library. His usual place of study was a cliff or crag near his dwelling. His residence in this country had some influence on the progress of literature, particularly in Rhode Island and Connecticut. The presence and conversation of a man so illustrious for talents, learning, virtue, and social attractions could not fail of giving a spring to the literary diligence and ambition of many, who enjoyed his acquaintance. Finding, at length, that the promised aid of the ministry towards his new college would fail him, Dean Berkeley returned to England. At his departure he distributed the books, which he had brought with him, among the clergy of Rhode Island. He embarked at Boston in Sept., 1731. In the following year he published his minute philosopher, a work of great ingenuity and merit, which he wrote while at Newport. It was not long before he sent, as a gift to Yale college, a deed of the farm, which he held in Rhode Island; the rents of which he directed to be appropriated to the maintenance of the three best classical scholars, who should reside at college at least nine months in a year in each of three years between their first and second degrees. All surplusages of money, arising from accidental vacancies, were to be distributed in Greek and Latin books to such undergraduates, as should make the best composition in the Latin tongue upon such a moral theme as should be given them. He also made a present to the library of Yale college of nearly one thousand volumes. When it is considered, that he was warmly attached to the Episcopal church, and that he came to America for the express purpose of founding an Episcopal college, his munificence to an institution, under the exclusive direction of a different denomination, must be thought worthy of high praise. It was in the year 1733 that he was made bishop of Cloyne; and from this period he discharged with exemplary faithfulness the episcopal duties, and prosecuted his studies with unabating diligence. On the 14th of January, 1753, he was suddenly seized at Oxford, whither he had removed in 1752, by a disorder called the palsy of the heart, and instantly expired, being nearly sixty-nine years of age. Pope ascribes

"To Berkeley every virtue under heaven."

His fine portrait by Smibert, with his family and the artist himself, will be contemplated with delight by all, who visit Yale college. Bishop Berkeley, while at Cloyne, constantly rose between three and four in the morning. His favorite author was Plato. His character, though marked by enthusiasm, was singularly excellent and amiable. He was held by his acquaintance in the highest estimation. Bishop Atterbury, after being introduced to him, exclaimed, "so much understanding, so much knowledge, so much innocence, and such humility I did not think had been the portion of any but angels, till I saw this gentleman." It is well known, that Bishop Berkeley rejected the commonly received notion of the existence of matter, and contended, that what are called sensible material objects are not external but exist in the mind, and are merely impressions made upon our mind by the immediate act of God. These peculiar sentiments he supported in his work, entitled, the principles of human knowledge, 1710, and in the dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, 1713. Besides these works, and the minute philosopher, in which he attacks the free thinker with great ingenuity and effect, he published, also, arithmetica absque algebra aut Euclide demonstrata, 1707; theory of vision, 1709; de motu, 1721; an essay towards preventing the ruin of Great Britain, 1721; the analyst, 1734; a defence of free thinking in mathematics, 1735; the querist, 1735; discourse addressed to magistrates, 1736; on the virtues of tar water, 1744; maxims concerning patriotism, 1750. — Chandler's Life of Johnson, 47–60; Müller, II. 349; Rees' Cycl.; Holmes, II. 53.

BERKLEY, ALEXANDER, died at Lynchburg, Va., Oct. 25, 1825, aged 114: his wife died Jan. 9, 1825, aged 111.

BERKLEY, NORBORNE, baron de Botetourt, one of the last governors of Virginia while a British colony, obtained the peerage of Botetourt in 1764. In July, 1768, he was appointed governor of Virginia in the place of Gen. Amherst. He died at Williamsburg Oct 15, 1770, aged 52. At his death the government, in consequence of the resignation of John Blair, devolved upon William Nelson, until the appointment in December of Lord Dummore, then governor of New York. Lord Botetourt seems to have been highly respected in Virginia. His exertions to promote the interests of William and Mary college were zealous and unremitting. He instituted an annual contest among the students for two golden medals of the value of five guineas; one for the best Latin oration on a given subject, and the other for superiority in mathematical science. For a long time he sanctioned by his presence morning and evening prayers in the college. No company nor avocation prevented his attendance on this service. He was extremely fond of literary characters. No one of this class, who had the least claims to respect, was ever presented to him without receiving his encouragement. — Miller, II. 378; Boston Gazette, Nov. 12, 1770; Marshall, II. 130.

BERNARD, FRANCIS, governor of Massachusetts, was the governor of New Jersey, after Gov.

Belcher, in 1758. He succeeded Gov. Pownall of Massachusetts, in 1760. Arriving at Boston Aug. 2d, he continued at the head of the government nine years. His administration was during one of the most interesting periods in American history. He had governed New Jersey two years in a manner very acceptable to that province, and the first part of his administration in Massachusetts was very agreeable to the general court. Soon after his arrival Canada was surrendered to Amherst. Besides voting a salary of 1300 pounds, they made to him at the first session a grant of Mt. Desert Island, which was confirmed by the king. Much harmony prevailed for two or three years; but this prosperous and happy commencement did not continue. There had long been two parties in the State, the advocates for the crown, and the defenders of the rights of the people. Gov. Bernard was soon classed with those, who were desirous of strengthening the royal authority in America; the sons of liberty therefore stood forth uniformly in opposition to him. His indiscretion in appointing Mr. Hutchinson chief justice, instead of giving that office to Col. Otis of Barnstable, to whom it had been promised by Shirley, proved very injurious to his cause. In consequence of this appointment he lost the influence of Col. Otis, and by yielding himself to Mr. Hutchinson he drew upon him the hostility of James Otis, the son, a man of great talents, who soon became the leader on the popular side. The laws for the regulation of trade and the severities of the officers of customs were the first things which greatly agitated the public mind; and afterwards the stamp act increased the energy of resistance to the schemes of tyranny. Gov. Bernard possessed no talent for conciliating; he was for accomplishing ministerial purposes by force; and the spirit of freedom gathered strength from the open manner in which he attempted to crush it. His speech to the general court after the repeal of the stamp act was by no means calculated to assuage the angry passions which had lately been excited. He was the principal means of bringing the troops to Boston, that he might overawe the people; and it was owing to him, that they were continued in the town. This measure had been proposed by him and Mr. Hutchinson long before it was executed. While he professed himself a friend to the province, he was endeavoring to undermine its constitution, and to obtain an essential alteration in the charter, by transferring from the general court to the crown the right of electing the council. His conduct, though it drew upon him the indignation of the province, was so pleasing to the ministry, that he was created a baronet March 20, 1769. Sir Francis had too little command of his temper. He could not conceal his resentments, and he could not restrain his censures. One of his last public measures was to prorogue the general court in July, in consequence of their refusing to make provision for the support of the troops. The general court, however, before they were prorogued, embraced the opportunity of drawing up a petition to his majesty for the removal of the governor. It was found necessary to recall him, and he embarked Aug. 1, 1769, leaving Mr. Hutchinson, the lieutenant-governor, commander in chief. There were few who lamented his departure. He died in England in June, 1779. His second son, Sir John B., who held public offices in Barbadoes and St. Vincent's, died in 1809; his third son, Sir Thomas B., was graduated at Harvard college in 1767, and marrying in England a lady of fortune, the daughter of Patrick Adair, devoted much of his time to various benevolent institutions in London, so as to gain the reputation of a philanthropist; he died July 1, 1818: his publications, chiefly designed to improve the common people, were numerous.

The newspapers were very free in the ridicule of the parsimony and domestic habits of Bernard. But he was temperate, a friend to literature, and a benefactor of Harvard college, exerting himself for its relief after the destruction of the library by fire. He was himself a man of erudition, being conversant with books, and retaining the striking passages in his strong memory. He said, that he could repeat the whole of Shakespeare. Believing the Christian religion, he attended habitually public worship. Though attached to the English church, when he resided at Roxbury, he often repaired to the nearest Congregational meeting, that of Brookline.

If a man of great address and wisdom had occupied the place of Sir Francis, it is very probable, that the American Revolution would not have occurred so soon. But his arbitrary principles and his zeal for the authority of the crown enkindled the spirit of the people, while his representations to the ministry excited them to those measures, which hastened the separation of the colonies from the mother country.

From the letters of Gov. Bernard, which were obtained and transmitted to this country by Mr. Bolland, it appears, that he had very little regard to the interests of liberty. His select letters on the trade and government of America, written in Boston from 1763 to 1768, were published in London in 1774. His other letters, written home in confidence, were published in 1768 and 1769. He wrote several pieces in Greek and Latin in the collection made at Cambridge, styled, "Pietas et Gratulatio," 1761. — Minor's Hist. Mass. i. 73-222; Gordon, i. 139, 272-274; Marshall, ii. 96, 114; Eliot.

BERRIEN, JOHN MACPHERSON, attorney-general of U. S., died at Savannah Jan. 1, 1856: he had been a senator. A speech of his is in Williston's "Eloquence."

BERRY, JOHN, died on Peterson's Creek, Va., in 1845, aged 101: he was a soldier in various battles.

BETHUNE, DUVIE, an eminent philanthropist and Christian, was born at Dingwall, Rosshire, Scotland, in 1771. In early life he resided at Tobago, where his only brother was a physician. At the command of his pious mother he left the irreligious island and removed to the United States in 1792, and settled as a merchant in New York. He soon joined the church of Dr. Mason; in 1802 became one of its elders. He died Sept. 18, 1824. His wife was the daughter of Isabella Graham. Before a tract society was formed in this country Mr. Bethune printed ten thousand tracts at his own expense, and himself distributed many of them. He also imported Bibles for distribution. From 1803 to 1816 he was at the sole expense of one or more Sunday schools. The tenth of his gains he devoted to the service of his heavenly Master. In his last sickness he said: "I wish my friends to help me through the valley by reading to me the word of God. I have not read much lately but the Bible: the Bible! the Bible! I want nothing but the Bible! O, the light, that has shined into my soul through the Bible!" His end was peace. Such a benefactor of the human family is incomparably more worthy of remembrance, than the selfish philosophers and the great warriors of the earth. — N. Y. Observer; Boston Recorder, Oct. 16.

BETTS, THADDEUS, died at Norwalk, Conn., April 7, 1840. He was a graduate of Yale of 1807, a lawyer of eminence, lieutenant-governor, and senator of the U. S.

BEVERIDGE, JOHN, a poet, was a native of Scotland. In 1758 he was appointed professor of languages in the college and academy of Philadelphia. He published in 1765 a volume of Latin poems, entitled, "Epistolæ familiares et alia quædam miscellanea." In an address to John Penn he suggests, that a conveyance to him of some few acres of good land would be a proper return for the poetic mention of the Penn family. The Latin hint was lost upon the Englishman. The unrewarded poet continued to ply the birch in the vain attempt to govern seventy or eighty ungovernable boys. — Mem. Hist. Soc. of Penn., i. 145.

BEVERLY, ROBERT, a native of Virginia, died in 1716. He was clerk of the council about 1697, when Andros was governor, with a salary of 50 pounds and perquisites. Intimately associated with the government, his views of public measures were influenced by his situation. His book was written by a man in office. Peter Beverly was at the same time clerk of the house of burgesses.

Mr. Beverly published a history of that colony, London, 1705, in four parts, embracing the first settlement of Virginia and the government thereof to the time when it was written; the natural productions and conveniences of the country, suited to trade and improvement; the native Indians, their religion, laws, and customs; and the state of the country as to the policy of the government and the improvements of the land. Another edition was published with Gribelin's cuts, 8vo. 1722; and a French translation, with plates, Amsterd., 1707. This work in the historical narration is as concise and unsatisfactory, as the history of Stith is prolix and tedious.

BIART, PIERRE, a jesuit missionary, came from France to Port Royal in June, 1611. Of his voyage and events at Acadia he made a relation, in which Charlevoix confides more than in the memoirs used by De Laet to decry the Jesuits. Biart gave the name of Souriquois to the Indians afterwards called Micmacs. In 1612 he ascended the Kinibequi or Kennebec, and was well received by the Canibas, formerly called the Canibequi, a nation of the Abenakis, from whom the name of the river is derived. This visit was soon after the attempted establishment of the English under Popham at the mouth of the Kennebec. He was followed by Dreuillettes in 1646. Biart obtained provisions for Port Royal. In 1613 he repaired to the Penobscot, to the settlement called S. Sauveur. According to Charlevoix he performed a miracle in healing by baptism a sick Malecite Indian child. But the miraculous powers of the Jesuit failed him on the arrival of Argall, who took him prisoner and carried him to Virginia and England.—Charlev. l. 131; Maine Hist. Coll., i. 325.

BIBB, WILLIAM W., governor of Alabama, was a representative from Georgia from 1813 to 1815. He was appointed in 1817 governor of the territory of Alabama, and under the constitution of the State was elected the first governor in 1819. He died at his residence near fort Jackson July 9, 1820, aged 39 years, and was succeeded by Israel Pickens. He was highly respected for his talents and dignity as a statesman; and in private life was condescending, affable and kind.

BIDDLE, NICHOLAS, a naval commander, was born in Philadelphia Sept. 10, 1750. In sailing to the West Indies in 1765 he was cast away. The long boat being lost and the yawl not being large enough to carry away all the crew, he and three others were left by lot two months in misery on an island, which was uninhabited. His many voyages made him a thorough seaman. In 1770 he went to London and entered the British navy. When Capt. Phipps, afterwards Lord Mulgrave, was about to sail on his exploring expedition, Biddle, then a midshipman; absconded from his own ship and entered on board the Carcass before the mast. Horatio Nelson was on board the same vessel. After the commencement of the Revolution he returned to Philadelphia. Being appointed commander of the Andrew Doria, a brig of 14 guns and 130 men, he sailed under Com. Hopkins in the successful expedition against New Providence. After refitting at New London, he was ordered to proceed off the banks of Newfoundland. He captured in 1776, among other prizes, two ships from Scotland with four hundred Highland troops. Being appointed to the command of the Randolph, a frigate of thirty-two guns, he sailed from Philadelphia in Feb., 1777. He soon carried into Charleston four valuable prizes, one of them the True Briton of twenty guns. A little fleet was now fitted out under his command, with which he cruised in the West Indies. In an action with the British ship Yarmouth of sixty-four guns March 7, 1778, Capt. Biddle was wounded, and a few minutes afterwards, while he was under the hands of the surgeon, the Randolph with a crew of three hundred and fifteen blew up, and he and all his men, but four, perished. The four men were tossed about four days on a piece of the wreck, before they were taken up. The other vessels escaped, from the disabled condition of the Yarmouth. Capt. Biddle was but 27 years of age. He had displayed the qualities requisite for a naval commander,—skill, coolness, self-possession, courage, together with humanity and magnanimity. His temper was cheerful. Believing the gospel, his religious impressions had a powerful influence upon his conduct. He was a brother of the late Judge Biddle.—Rogers; Biog. Americana.

BIDDLE, THOMAS, was a captain of artillery in the campaigns on the Niagara in 1813 and 1814. He served under Gen. Scott at the capture of Fort George. In the battle of Lundy's lane he brought off a piece of the enemy's artillery. After the war, with the brevet rank of major, he removed to St. Louis, Missouri, and was paymaster in the army. He was shot in a duel with Spencer Pettis, a member of congress, and died Aug. 29, 1831, at the age of 41. The history of this affair is the history of consummate folly, discreditable pusillanimity, and hardened depravity. Political controversy was the origin of the duel. Biddle had anonymously abused Pettis in the newspapers; this led to a retort of hard words. Next, Biddle assaulted Pettis when he was asleep, with a cowskin. Bonds were imposed on Biddle for the preservation of the peace. At last the friends of Mr. Pettis urged him and constrained him to challenge his chastiser and to hazard his life and soul in the attempt of mutual murder.

The distance chosen by Biddle, who was near-sighted, was five feet, so that the pistols would overlap each other, making death apparently certain to both: accordingly both fell, Friday, Aug. 26th, and soon their spirits went into eternity with the guilt of blood. Pettis died on Saturday and Biddle on Monday. The promoters of this duel must be regarded as sharers in the guilt. Dean Swift remarked, "None but fools fight duels, and the sooner the world is rid of such folks, the better." It will be well for those, who call themselves men of honor, and well for their miserable families, if they shall learn to fear the judgment of God rather than the sneers of unprincipled men, and if they shall learn to abstain from calumny, to forgive injuries, and to love a brother.—N. Y. Mercury, iv. 9.

BIDDLE, NICHOLAS, died at Andalusia, near Philadelphia, Feb. 27, 1844, aged 58. He was the son of Charles Biddle of Philadelphia, a whig of the Revolution. At the age of 19 he was secretary to Armstrong in his mission to Paris. On his return he studied law and devoted himself much to literature, for a time editing the Port-Folio. In 1819 he was one of the directors of the bank of the United States, and in 1823 succeeded Mr. Cheves as president,—a post which he filled sixteen years. Under his management and the hostility of Gen. Jackson the bank broke down. He wrote the commercial digest.

BIDDLE, WILLIAM P., died at Newbern, N. C., Aug. 8, 1853, after a ministry of nearly half a century. Born in Virginia, he was a pioneer of the Baptists in North Carolina.

BIDDLE, JAMES, commodore, died at Philadelphia Oct. 1, 1848, aged 65. Educated at the Pennsylvania university, he entered the navy in 1800, and was engaged in various actions. He captured the Penguin. He signed the commercial treaty with Turkey in 1832, and commanded a squadron in China in 1847.

BIENVILLE, LE MOYNE DE, governor of Louisiana and founder of New Orleans, took the name of his brother, who was killed by the Iroquois in 1691. While in command at Mobile, he manifested his humanity by liberating the prisoners, which were brought from Carolina by the Indians, in the Indian war of 1715. In 1714 he constructed a fort at Natchez, and in 1717, on a visit to the governor of Mobile, he obtained permission to lay the foundation of the city of New Orleans. In 1726, M. Perrier being nominated commandant of Louisiana in his place, he went to France; but in 1733 he returned with a new commission as governor. In 1740, with a large army of French, Indians, and negroes, he made a second expedition against the Chickasaws; proceeding up the Mississippi, he encamped near their towns, and brought them to terms of peace.—Charlevoix; Holmes, i. 513; ii. 16.

BIGELOW, TIMOTHY, colonel, died at Worcester March 31, 1790, aged 50. He was the son of Daniel; and he had an eminent son of his own name. A blacksmith, he was the associate of the leading patriots of his day. On hearing of the battle of Lexington he marched at the head of minute-men; he marched up the Kennebec against Quebec, and was taken prisoner; at the head of the fifteenth Mass. regiment he was at Saratoga, Rhode Island, Valley Forge, and West Point. He was an original grantor of Montpelier. As a benefactor of Leicester academy he is honored by its friends. With an ardent temperament he was dignified and graceful.—Lincoln's Hist. Worcester.

BIGELOW, TIMOTHY, a lawyer, was born at Worcester, Ms., April 30, 1767, the son of Col. Timothy B., who served in Arnold's expedition to Quebec, and commanded the 16th regiment in the Revolutionary war, and probably a descendant of John Bigelow, who lived in Watertown in 1642. After graduating at Harvard college in 1786, he studied law, and in 1789 commenced the practice at Groton. For more than twenty years from 1790 he was a distinguished member of the legislature; for eleven years he was the speaker of the house of representatives. In his politics he was ardently attached to the federal party. Of the Hartford convention in 1814 he was a member; and grand master of masons. In 1807 he removed to Medford and kept an office in Boston. He died May 18, 1821, aged 54. His wife was the daughter of Oliver Prescott; one of his daughters married Abbott Lawrence. Mr. Bigelow was a learned, eloquent, and popular lawyer. It has been computed, that during a practice of thirty-two years he argued not less than fifteen thousand causes. His usual antagonist was Samuel Dana. Over the multitudinous assembly of six or seven hundred legislators of Massachusetts he presided with great dignity and energy. Of many literary and benevolent societies he was an active member; and in private life was respected and beloved. He published an oration before the Phi Beta Kappa society, 1797. An extract of his eulogy on S. Dana is in the historical collections.—Jennison; Maine Hist. Coll. i. 363, 388, 409; Mass. Hist. Coll. S. S. ii. 235, 252.

BIGELOW, LEWIS, died in Peoria, Illinois, Oct. 3, 1838, aged 53. He was a member of congress from Massachusetts in 1821, and the author of Digest of twelve vols. of Massachusetts Reports.

BIGELOW, JONATHAN, died Jan. 26, 1854, aged 90. Born in Boylston, he graduated at Brown university in 1816, and was successively a minister at Lubec in 1821; at Rochester, Mass., for twenty years from 1828; at Euclid, Ohio, in 1850, where his labors were greatly blessed. He was regarded as a scholar, and a faithful minister.

BIGELOW, WILLIAM, died in Boston, Jan. 12, 1844, aged 70, a graduate of Harvard in 1794. He was a teacher, a wit, writer of poetry, editor of several periodicals, and author of a history of his native town, Natick, and of Sherburne. Unhappily he did not hold the mastery over the appetites, which lead to a disregard of the laws of temperance.

BIGOT, VINCENT, a Jesuit missionary, was employed in 1697 by Gen. De Denonville to collect a village of the Penobscot Indians, who had been dispersed, in order to counteract the designs of Gov. Andros. It would seem, that he had been a missionary among these Indians near Pentagoet, or Penobscot, for some years before, but had been driven off by the disputes with a company of fishermen. Bigot returned, says Denonville, "at my request, in order to keep the savages in our interest, which they had abandoned." Such was the worldly policy, which produced the Jesuit missions in Maine; and the Jesuits, by their vows of obedience being subject to their superiors, were convenient instruments of politic governors and adventurous generals. Denonville, in a memoir which he prepared after his return to France, ascribes much of the good understanding which had been preserved with the Abenaki Indians, to the influence of the two father Bigots: the name of the younger was James. Vincent chiefly resided at St. Francois, among the Indians there assembled by the governor of Canada. In an expedition of the Abenakis against New England, Bigot accompanied them, as is related by Charlevoix under the year 1721, from the lips of the missionary himself, and witnessed their heroism in a battle, in which at the odds of twenty English for one Indian they fought a whole day, and without the loss of a man strewed the field of battle with the dead and put the English to flight. In this story there is as much truth, as in father Biart's miracle on the Penobscot. There was no such battle in 1721, nor in any other year; though it is true, that in 1724 many Indians with father Ralle fell in battle at Norridgewock, without the loss of one of the English. Mr. Southey says: "Let any person compare the relations of our Protestant missionaries with those of the Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans, or any other Romish order, and the difference, which he cannot fail to perceive, between the plain truth of the one and the audacious and elaborate mendacity of the other, may lead him to a just inference concerning the two churches."—Charlevoix, I. 531, 559; III. 308; Southey's Coll. II. 374; Maine Hist. Col. I. 328.

BIG WARRIOR, the principal chief of the Creek nation, died Feb. 9, 1825. With a colossal body, he had a mind of great power. In November, 1824, he and Little Prince and other chiefs, signed the declaration of a council of the tribe, asserting their reluctance to sell any more land, and their claims to justice, and describing the progress made in the arts of civil life. They, who think the Indians incapable of civilization, may be surprised to learn, that the upper Creeks alone had manufactured thirty thousand yards of 'homespun.' He had always been a friend of the whites, and fought for them in many a battle.

BILLINGS, ASAHEL, died at Hardwick July 16, 1838, aged 100; an officer at the capture of Burgoyne.

BILLINGS, BENJAMIN, M. D., died at Mansfield, Mass., Oct. 9, 1842, aged 82. He was a surgeon in the Revolutionary army.

BINGHAM, WILLIAM, a senator of the United States, was graduated at the college of Philadelphia in 1768; he was agent for his country at Martinique in the period of the Revolution; in 1786 he was a delegate to congress from Pennsylvania; in 1795 he succeeded Mr. Morris as senator. Of the measures of Mr. Adams' administration, he was a decided advocate. He died at Bath, England, Feb. 7, 1804, aged 52. He married in 1780 Miss Willing of Philadelphia; his son, William, married in Montreal in 1822; a daughter was married to a son of Sir Francis Baring. He purchased about the year 1793 more than two millions of acres of land in Maine, at an eighth of a dollar per acre, or for more than $250,000. In 1715 Mr. Greenleaf calculated the cost to have amounted to forty-nine cents per acre, when perhaps the average value might not exceed seventeen cents. Mr. B. published "a letter from an American on the subject of the restraining proclamation," with strictures on Lord Sheffield's pamphlets, 1784; description of certain tracts of land in the district of Maine, 1793.

BINGHAM, CALEB, a bookseller of Boston, died April 6, 1817, aged 60. A native of Salisbury, Conn., he was the son of Daniel, and a descendant of Thomas of Norwich. By his mother he descended from R. Conant. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1782. He was the preceptor of Moor's academy and afterwards for many years a teacher in one of the principal schools of Boston. Quitting the toils of instruction, he kept a large book shop in Cornhill, Boston, and compiled for the benefit of youth various books, some of which went through many editions. For several years he was a director of the State prison, in which capacity he made great efforts for the mental improvement of the younger criminals. In his politics he belonged to the school of Mr. Jefferson. He had a character of strict integrity and uprightness, and he was an exemplary professor of religion. A daughter, Sophia, married Col. Townson of the army. He published an interesting narrative, entitled, "the hunters;" young lady's accidence, 1789; epistolary correspondence; the Columbian Orator, 1797; Atala, a translation from Chateaubriand. The sale of his school books in editions and copies was as follows: young lady's accidence, 20 eds., 100,000; child's companion, 20 eds., 180,000; American preceptor, 64 eds., 640,000; Geographical catechism, 22 eds., 100,000; Columbian orator, 23 eds., 190,000; Juvenile letters, 7 eds., 25,000.

BINGHAM, JEREMIAH, died in Cornwall, Vt., in 1842, aged 94. Born in Norwich, Conn., he was a useful schoolmaster in Mass. and N. H. He was the first settler in C.: through his efforts a church of eight persons was formed in 1785.

BINGHAM, SIBYL M., wife of Rev. Hiram Bingham, died at Easthampton, Mass., in March, 1848, aged 55. She was a missionary at the Sandwich Islands twenty years.

BINKLEY, ADAM, colonel, died in Davidson co., Tenn., Feb. 28, 1837, aged 136. He served during the Revolutionary war; then married and had eleven children.

BINNEY, AMOS, colonel, died in Boston Jan. 10, 1833, aged 65. Born at Hull, he never went to school one day; yet was intelligent and capable. He was navy agent in Boston; a Methodist, and a man of charity.

BIRDSEYE, NATHAN, died Jan. 28, 1818, aged 103. He graduated at Yale college in 1736, and was ordained the fourth pastor of West Haven, Oct., 1742. His predecessors were Samuel Johnson, Jonathan Arnold, and Timothy Allen; his successor was Noah Williston. After being in the ministry sixteen years, he was dismissed in June, 1758, and retired to his patrimonial estate at Oronoake in Stratford, where he resided sixty years, till his death. About a hundred of his posterity were present at his funeral. The whole number of his descendants was two hundred and fifty-eight, of whom two hundred and six were living. His wife, with whom he had lived sixty-nine years, died at the age of 88. By her he had twelve children, alternately a boy and a girl; he had seventy-six grandchildren; one hundred and sixty-three great-grandchildren; and seven of the fifth generation. Of all the branches of his numerous family, scattered into various parts of the United States, not one of them had been reduced to want. Most of them were in prosperous, all in comfortable circumstances. In his last years he occasionally preached, and once at Stratford to great acceptance, after he was one hundred years old. At last he became blind and deaf; yet his retentive memory and sound judgment and excellent temper gave an interest to his conversation with his friends. He died without an enemy, in the hope of a happy immortality. According to his account of the Indians near Stratford, about the year 1700 there were sixty or eighty fighting men; in 1761 but three or four men were left.

However, the race was not exterminated; for of the emigrants there lived at Kent on the "Oustonnoc river" one hundred and twenty-seven souls. — Mass. Hist. Coll. x. 111.

BIRCH, THOMAS, died in Philadelphia Jan. 14, 1851, aged 72; an artist. He was distinguished for landscape and marine painting, delighting in coast and river scenes.

BIRCHARD, SOLOMON, M. D., an eminent physician, died at Baltimore Nov. 30, 1836, aged 77.

BIRD, ROBERT M., M. D., died at Philadelphia Jan. 23, 1854, aged 50. He was one of the editors and proprietors of the North American; also a novel writer, author of Nick of the Woods and Peter Pilgrim.

BISHOP, GEORGE, a Quaker, published "New England judged, not by man's but by the Spirit of the Lord, and the summe sealed up of New England's persecutions, being a brief relation of the sufferings of the Quakers in that part of America from the beginning of the 5th m. 1656, to the end of the 10th m. 1660: wherein the cruel whippings and scourgings, bonds and imprisonments, &c., burning in the hand and cutting off of ears, banishment upon pain of death, and putting to death, &c., are shortly touched, 1661." He gives an account of the execution of Wm. Robinson, Marmaduke Stephenson, Mary Dyer, and William Ledea, for returning after being banished as Quakers; such was the bloody spirit of persecution in men, who sought liberty of conscience in a wilderness. Among the banished was Mary Fisher, who travelled as far as Adrianople, and in the camp of the grand vizier delivered her message "from the great God to the great Turk." Hutchinson remarks, "she fared better among the Turks, than among the Christians." — Hutch. i. 180.

BISHOP, ABRAHAM, died at New Haven April 28, 1844, aged 81. He graduated in 1778. He was a zealous political writer on the democratic or republican side, and for twenty years collector of the port of New Haven. He published an oration, 1800; proofs of a conspiracy, 1802.

BISHOP, ROBERT H., D. D., died at College Hill, Ohio, April 29, 1855, aged 78. Born in Scotland, he graduated at Edinburgh in 1794. Coming to this country in 1801, he was a teacher and professor in various seminaries, and president of Miami university. At his death he was a professor in Farmer's college.

BISSELL, JOSIAH, a generous philanthropist, died in April, 1831, aged 40. He was the son of Deacon Josiah Bissell. About the year 1814 or 1815 he was one of a number of young men, who removed from Pittsfield, Mass., to the new town of Rochester, N. Y. The increase in the value of the land, which he had purchased, made him rich; but his wealth he very liberally employed in promoting the various benevolent operations of the day. He expended many thousands of dollars. Were his example followed by the rich, the face of the world would soon be renewed. At great expense he was the principal promoter of the "Pioneer" line of stages, so called, which did not run on Sunday, and which was established for the sole purpose of preventing the desecration of the holy day. His piety was ardent; his courage unshaken by the calumnies and revilings of men who preferred gain to godliness. As he had lived for Christ, he died in the triumphs of faith. When told that he would soon die, he said, "Why should I be afraid to die? The Lord knows I have loved his cause more than all things else; I have wronged no man; I possess no man's goods; I am at peace with all men; I have peace, and trust, and confidence; I am ready, willing, yea anxious to depart." When told the next day that he was better, he said, "I desire to go: my face is set." "Tell my children to choose the Lord Jesus Christ for their portion, and to serve him better than I have done. Say to the church,—go on gloriously. Say to impenitent sinners,—if they wish to know the value of religion, look at a dying bed."

BISSELL, EMERY, Dr., died in Norwalk in 1849, aged 60; a highly respectable physician.

BIXBY, SUSAN, the wife of M. H. Bixby, a Baptist missionary in Maulmain, Burmah, died at Burlington, Vt., Aug. 18, 1856, aged 26. She went out to Burmah in 1833. She believed, that more than one soul was won by her to God's service.

BLACK, JOHN, D. D., died in Pittsburgh, Nov., 1849, aged 82; one of the early settlers of P.

BLACKBURN, SAMUEL, general, died in Bath county, Va., March 2, 1835, aged 77; an eminent lawyer and legislator. By his will he liberated forty-six slaves and provided for their transportation to Liberia. Did he misjudge in thinking it an act, required by humanity and justice, to restore freedom to his slaves?

BLACKBURN, GIDEON, D. D., died at Carlinville, Ill., Aug. 23, 1838, an eloquent preacher for forty years. He organized some of the first churches in the west. From 1803 to 1809 he was for part of each year a missionary to the Cherokees, establishing a school at Hywassee, under the general assembly. He also set up a school in Tennessee in 1806.

BLACK DOG, chief of the Osages, died March 24, 1848.

BLACK HAWK, an Indian chief, died Oct. 3, 1838, at his camp on the river Des Moines, aged 73. His Indian name was Muck-ker-ta-mesheck-ker-kerk.

BLACK HOOFF, a chief of the Shawanese tribe of Indians, died at Wapaghkonnetta in Sept., 1831, aged 114 years. In war he had been a formidable enemy, though the latter part of his warfaring life had been devoted to the American cause. He was at St. Clair's, Harmer's, and Crawford's defeats, and perhaps was the last survivor of those who were concerned in Braddock's defeat.

BLACKMAN, ADAM, first minister of Stratford, Conn., was a preacher in Leicestershire and Derbyshire, England. Mr. Goodwin writes the name Blakeman. After he came to this country, he preached a short time at Scituate, and then at Guilford; in 1640 he was settled at Stratford, where he died in 1665. His successors were Israel Chauncey, Timothy Cutler, Hezekiah Gould, Israhiah Wetmore, and Mr. Dutton, afterwards professor at Yale. Notwithstanding his name, Mather represents him as for his holiness "purer than snow, whiter than milk." With almost the same name as Melancthon, he was a Melancthon among the reformers of New Haven, but with less occasion than the German, to complain, that "old Adam was too hard for his young namesake." Mr. Hooker so much admired the plainness and simplicity of his preaching, that he said, if he could have his choice, he should choose to live and die under his ministry. His son, Benjamin, a graduate of Harvard college in 1663, preached for a time at Malden, but left that place in 1678; and afterwards at Scarborough: in 1683 he was a representative of Saco, in which town he was a large landholder, and owner of all the mill privileges on the east side of the river. His wife died in 1715, in Boston.—Magnalia, III. 94; Folsom's Hist. Saco, 164.

BLACKMAN, ELEAZER, died at Hanover, Pa., Nov. 4, 1845, aged 85; a respected citizen, the last survivor of the massacre of Wyoming.

BLACKSTONE, WILLIAM, an Episcopal minister, and the first inhabitant of Boston, settled there as early as 1625 or 1626; and there he lived, when Gov. Winthrop arrived in the summer of 1630 at Charlestown, the records of which place say: "Mr. Blackstone, dwelling on the other side of Charles river, alone, at a place by the Indians called Shawmut, where he only had a cottage, at or not far off the place, called Blackstone's point, he came and acquainted the governor of an excellent spring there, withal inviting him and soliciting him thither; whereupon, after the death of Mr. Johnson and divers others, the governor, with Mr. Wilson, and the greatest part of the church, removed thither." Though Mr. Blackstone had first occupied the peninsula, or Trimountain; yet all the right of soil, which the charter could give, was held by the governor and company. In their regard to equity they at a court, April 1, 1633, agreed to give him fifty acres near his house in Boston to enjoy forever. In 1634 he sold the company this estate, probably for thirty pounds, which was raised by an assessment of six shillings or more on each inhabitant. With the proceeds he purchased cattle, and removed, probably in 1635, to Pawtucket river, now bearing his name, Blackstone river, a few miles north of Providence, near the southern part of the town of Cumberland. He was married July 4, 1659, to widow Sarah Stephenson, who died June, 1673. He died May 26, 1675, having lived in New England fifty years. His residence was about two miles north of Pawtucket, on the eastern bank of the Blackstone river, and within a few rods of Whipple's bridge. From his house a long extent of the river could be seen to the south. The cellar and well are at this day recognized. A small round eminence west of his house is called Study Hill, from its being his place of retirement for study. His grave near his house was marked by a large round white stone. — Holmes, I. 377; 2 Coll. Hist. Soc., x. 171; IX. 174; Savage's Winthrop, I. 44; Everett's Address, Second Cent., 29.

BLAIR, JAMES, first president of William and Mary college, Virginia, and a learned divine, died Aug. 1, 1743, in a good old age. He was born and educated in Scotland, where he obtained a benefice in the Episcopal church. On account of the unsettled state of religion, which then existed in that kingdom, he quitted his preferments and went into England near the end of the reign of Charles II. The bishop of London prevailed on him to go to Virginia, as a missionary, about the year 1685; and in that colony by his exemplary conduct and unwearied labors in the work of the ministry he much promoted religion, and gained to himself esteem and reputation. In 1689 he was appointed by the bishop, ecclesiastical commissary, the highest office in the church which could be given him in the province. This appointment, however, did not induce him to relinquish the pastoral office, for it was his delight to preach the gospel of salvation.

Perceiving that the want of schools and seminaries for literary and religious instruction would in a great degree defeat the exertions, which were making in order to propagate the gospel, he formed the design of establishing a college at Williamsburg. For this purpose he solicited benefactions in this country, and by direction of the assembly made a voyage to England in 1691 to obtain the patronage of the government. A charter was procured in this year with liberal endowments, and he was named in it as the first president; but it does not appear that he entered on the duties of his office before the year 1729, from which period till 1742 he discharged them with faithfulness. The college however did not flourish very greatly during his presidency, nor for many years afterwards. The wealthy farmers were in the habit of sending their sons to Europe for their education. After a life of near sixty years in the ministry, he died, and went to enjoy the glory for which he was destined. Mr. Blair was for some time president of the council of the colony, and rector of Williamsburg. He was a faithful laborer in the vineyard of his Master, and an ornament to his profession and to the several offices, which he sustained. He published: our Saviour's divine sermon on the mount, in divers sermons and discourses, 4 vol. 8vo., London, 1742. This work is spoken of with high approbation by Dr. Doddridge, and by Dr. Williams in his Christian preacher. — Introduction to the above work; Miller's Retr., II. 335, 336; New and Gen. Biog. Dict.; Burnet's Hist. own times, II. 129, 120.

BLAIR, SAMUEL, a learned minister in Pennsylvania, died about 1751. He was a native of Ireland. He came to America very early in life, and was one of Mr. Tennent's pupils in his academy at Neshaminy. About the year 1745 he himself opened an academy at Fog's manor, Chester county, with particular reference to the study of theology as a science. He also took the pastoral charge of the church in that place; but such was his zeal to do good, that he did not confine himself to his own society, but often dispensed the precious truths of heaven to destitute congregations. His brother succeeded him in the care of the church.

Mr. Blair was one of the most learned and able, as well as pious, excellent, and venerable men of his day. He was a profound divine and a most solemn and impressive preacher. To his pupils he was himself an excellent model of pulpit eloquence. In his life he gave them an admirable example of Christian meekness, of ministerial diligence, of candor, and catholicism, without a dereliction of principle. He was eminently serviceable to the part of the country where he lived, not only as a minister of the gospel, but as a teacher of human knowledge. From his academy, that school of the prophets, as it was frequently called, there issued forth many excellent pupils, who did honor to their instructor, both as scholars and Christian ministers. Among the distinguished characters, who received their classical and theological education at this seminary, were his nephew, Alexander Cumming, Samuel Davies, Dr. Rodgers of New York, and James Finley, Hugh Henry, and a number of other respectable clergymen. Mr. Davies, after being informed of his sickness, wrote respecting him to a friend the following lines:

"O, had you not the mournful news divulg'd,
My mind had still the pleasing dream indulg'd,
Still fancied Blair with health and vigor bless'd,
With some grand purpose lab'ring in his breast,
In studious thought pursuing truth divine;
Till the full demonstration round him shine;
Or from the sacred desk proclaiming loud
His master's message to the attentive crowd,

While heavenly truth with bright conviction glares,
And coward error shrinks and disappears,
While quick remorse the hardy sinner feels,
And Calvary's balm the bleeding conscience heals."

He published animadversions on the reasons of A. Craghead for quitting the Presbyterian church, 1742; a narrative of a revival of religion in several parts of Pennsylvania, 1744. — Miller's Retr. II. 343; Mass. Miss. Magazine, III. 363; Davies' Life.

BLAIR, JOHN, an eminent minister in Pennsylvania, was ordained to the pastoral charge of three congregations in Cumberland county as early as 1742. These were frontier settlements and exposed to depredations in the Indian wars, and he was obliged to remove. He accepted a call from Fog's manor in Chester county, in 1757. This congregation had been favored with the ministry of his brother, Samuel Blair; and here he continued about nine years, besides discharging the duties of the ministry, superintending also a flourishing grammar school, and preparing many young men for the ministry. When the presidency of New Jersey college became vacant, he was chosen professor of divinity and had for some time the charge of that seminary before the arrival of Dr. Witherspoon. After this event he settled at Walkill in the State of New York. Here he labored a while with his usual faithfulness, and finished his earthly course Dec. 8, 1771, aged about 51 years.

He was a judicious and persuasive preacher, and through his exertions sinners were converted and the children of God edified. Fully convinced of the doctrines of grace, he addressed immortal souls with that warmth and power, which left a witness in every bosom. Though he sometimes wrote his sermons in full, yet his common mode of preaching was by short notes, comprising the general outlines. His labors were too abundant to admit of more; and no more was necessary to a mind so richly stored, and so constantly impressed with the great truths of religion. For his large family he had amassed no fortune, but he left them what was infinitely better, a religious education, a holy example, and prayers, which have been remarkably answered. — His disposition was uncommonly patient, placid, benevolent, disinterested, and cheerful. He was too mild to indulge bitterness or severity, and he thought that truth required little else than to be fairly stated and properly understood. Those, who could not relish the savor of his piety, loved him as an amiable, and revered him as a great man. In his last sickness he imparted his advice to the congregation, and represented to his family the necessity of an interest in Christ. A few nights before he died he said, "Directly I am going to glory. My Master calls me; I must be gone." He published a few occasional sermons and tracts in defence of important truths. — Evang. Intellig. I. 241–244.

BLAIR, SAMUEL, minister of Boston, the son of Rev. Samuel Blair, died Sept. 24, 1818, aged 77. He was born at Fog's manor in 1741. After being graduated at the college of New Jersey in 1760, he was a tutor in that seminary. He was settled as colleague with Dr. Sewall over the old south church in Boston Nov. 26, 1766. He had been previously ordained as a Presbyterian. In the next year he was chosen president of the college in New Jersey, as successor of Finley, but he declined the appointment, in consequence of the ascertained willingness of Dr. Witherspoon to accept the place, which at first he had rejected. By reason of ill health and some difficulty respecting the half-way covenant, Mr. Blair was dismissed Oct. 10, 1769. He never resumed a pastoral charge. During the last years of his life he resided at Germantown, where he died suddenly. He was succeeded by Mr. Bacon and Mr. Hunt. Distinguished for talents and learning, he was in preaching, with a feeble voice, a master of the touching and pathetic. He married in 1769 a daughter of Dr. Shippen, the elder, of Philadelphia: his daughter married Charles Pierce. He published an oration on the death of George II., 1761. — Wisner's Hist. O. S. Church, 31; Green's Discourses, 392, 396.

BLAIR, JOHN, one of the associate judges of the supreme court of the United States, died at Williamsburg in Virginia August 31, 1800, aged 68. He was a judge of the court of appeals in Virginia in 1787, at which time the legislature of that State, finding the judiciary system inconvenient, established circuit courts, the duties of which they directed the judges of the court of appeals to perform. These judges, among whose names are those of Blair, Pendleton, and Wythe, remonstrated and declared the act unconstitutional. In the same year, he was a member of the general convention, which formed the constitution of the United States. To that instrument the names of Blair and Madison are affixed as the deputies from Virginia. In September, 1789, when the government, which he had assisted in establishing, had commenced its operation, he was appointed by Washington an associate judge of the supreme court, of which John Jay was chief justice. He was an amiable, accomplished, and truly virtuous man. He discharged with ability and integrity the duties of a number of the highest and most important public trusts; and in these, as well as in the relations of private life, his conduct was upright, and so blameless, that he seldom or never lost a friend or made an enemy. Through life he in a remarkable manner experienced the truth of our Saviour's declaration, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth;" and at death he illustrated the force of the exclamation, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." — Claypoole's Adv., Sept. 12, 1800; Marshall, v. 216.

BLAKE, JOSEPH, governor of South Carolina, was a proprietary and a nephew of the famous Admiral Blake. He succeeded Gov. Thomas Smith in 1694, and Archdale in 1696, and was himself succeeded by James Moore in 1700. During Blake's administration a set of forty-one articles, called "the last fundamental constitutions," was sent from England by the Earl of Bath, the palatine, and other patentees; but the change in the government was never confirmed by the Carolina assembly. Mr. Blake died in 1700. Although a dissenter, yet with a highly honorable spirit of liberality he prevailed on the assembly to settle on the Episcopal minister of Charleston 150 pounds a year, and to furnish him with a house, glebe, and two servants. A very different, an intolerant and persecuting spirit was manifested towards the dissenters in the subsequent administration of Johnson. — Univ. Hist. XL. 427.

BLAKE, JAMES, a preacher, died Nov. 17, 1771, aged 21. He was a native of Dorchester, and was graduated at Harvard in 1769. In college he was distinguished by the sweetness of his temper and the purity of his morals. He conciliated the love of his fellow students, and the high approbation of his instructors. After pursuing for some time his theological studies under the care of Mr. Smith of Weymouth, he began with reluctance at a very early period the important work of the ministry. A small volume of his sermons, which was published by his friends after his death, displays a strength of mind and a knowledge of theoretical and practical divinity very uncommon in a person so young. His sermons also indicate a warmth of pious feeling, honorable to his character. — Pref. to his Serm. Coll. Hist. Soc. IX. 189.

BLAKE, GEORGE, died at Boston Oct. 6, 1841, aged 73. A graduate of 1789, he was a lawyer of eminence, and United States attorney for Massachusetts. He published an oration at Boston July 4, 1795; masonic eulogy on Washington, 1800.

BLAKE, FRANCIS, brother of the preceding, a graduate of 1789, died at Worcester in 1817. He published orations, 1796 and 1812, and examination of embargo laws, 1808.

BLAKE, JOHN, general, died in Bangor Jan. 21, 1842, aged 89; — a soldier of the Revolution.

BLAKE, CALEB, minister of Westford forty-five years, died May 11, 1847, aged 85. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1784. He published a sermon before a charitable society, 1815.

BLAKE, ELEAZAR, deacon, died in Rindge in Oct., 1852, aged 95. He was in the battle of Lexington with the militia from Wrentham, and served in the war.

BLAKE, JAMES, died at Dorchester May 22, 1753, aged 65; the author of annals of Dorchester.

BLAKE, THOMAS DAWES, doctor, died in Farmington, Me., Nov. 20, 1849, aged 81, an eminent physician. He was a native of Boston.

BLAKELEY, JOHNSTON, a captain in the navy, was born in Ireland in 1781. After his father's removal to Wilmington, N. C., he passed a few years in the university of that State. In the year 1800 he obtained a midshipman's warrant. Appointed to the command of the Wasp, in 1814 he captured and burnt the Reindeer, after an action of nineteen minutes, with the loss of twenty-one men; the enemy lost sixty-seven. In an action Sept. 1, 1814, the Avon struck to him, though the approach of other vessels prevented his taking possession of her. The last account of the Wasp is, that she was spoken off the Western Isles. In what manner Blakeley died is, therefore, not known. His wife and an infant daughter survived. The legislature of North Carolina passed the resolution that this child "be educated at the expense of the State."

BLAKEMAN, ADAM, first minister of Stratford, died in 1665. His son Benjamin, a graduate of Harvard in 1663, was a preacher at Malden. The catalogue has the name Blackman.

BLANC, VINCENT LE, a traveller in Asia, Africa, and America, from the age of twelve to sixty, gives an account of Canada in his book, entitled, "Les Voyages fameux, &c.," 1648. Though his narrative is in some respects valuable, yet it is confused, with little regard to dates, and tolerant towards fables. The author speaks of the giant stature of the Indians. — Charlevoix, I. 4.

BLANC, JEAN LE, chief of the Outaouais, or Ottawa Indians, — called Le Blanc, because his mother was as white as a French woman, — was a chief of talents, and difficult to be won by the governor. He rescued the Father Constantine, who had fallen into the hands of the Indians. In 1707 he appeared before the governor at Montreal and excused his tribe for some disorders. This chief, whom Charlevoix denominates a bad Christian and a great drunkard, was asked by Frontenac, of what he supposed the water of life, or rum, for which he was so greedy, was composed; he replied, — "It is an extract of tongues and hearts; for when I have been drinking it, I fear nothing and talk marvellously." He might have added, — "It is the essence of folly and madness; for when I have swallowed it, I play the part of a fool and a madman." Yet the governor, De Callieres, was very careful never to send away a chief until after "regaling" him. Thus, from policy and covetousness, have drunkards had the poison dealt out to them from age to age. — Charlevoix, II. 274, 311; III. 306.

BLAND, RICHARD, a political writer, died in 1778. He was for some years a principal member of the house of burgesses in Virginia. In 1768 he was one of the committee to remonstrate with parliament on the subject of taxation; in 1773 one of the committee of correspondence; in 1774 a delegate to Congress. He was again chosen a deputy to Congress Aug. 12, 1775; in returning thanks for this appointment he spoke of himself as "an old man, almost deprived of sight, whose great ambition had ever been to receive the plaudit of his country, whenever he should retire from the public stage of life." The honor, which cometh from God, would have been a higher aim. Though he declined the appointment from old age, he declared he should ever be animated "to support the glorious cause, in which America was engaged." Francis L. Lee was appointed in his place. Mr. Wirt speaks of him as "one of the most enlightened men in the colony; a man of finished education and of the most unbending habits of application. His perfect mastery of every fact connected with the settlement and progress of the colony had given him the name of the Virginia antiquary. He was a politician of the first class, a profound logician, and was also considered as the first writer in the colony." He published in 1766 an inquiry into the rights of the British colonies, in answer to a pamphlet published in London in the preceding year, entitled, regulations lately made concerning the colonies, and taxes imposed on them, considered. This was one of the three productions of Virginia during the controversy with Great Britain; the other writers were Arthur Lee and Jefferson. He wrote also in 1758 on the controversy between the clergy and the assembly concerning the tobacco tax for the support of the clergy. — Jefferson's Notes, qu. 23; Wirt's Life of Henry, 46.

BLAND, THEODORIC, a worthy patriot and statesman, died at New York while attending congress, June 1, 1790, aged 48. He was a native of Virginia, and descended from an ancient and respectable family. He was bred to the science of physic; but upon the commencement of the American war he quitted the practice, and took an active part in the cause of his country. He soon rose to the rank of colonel, and had the command of a regiment of dragoons. While in the army he frequently signalized himself by brilliant actions. In the year 1780 he was elected to a seat in congress. He continued in that body three years, the time allowed by the confederation. After the expiration of this term he again returned to Virginia, and was chosen a member of the State legislature. He opposed the adoption of the constitution, believing it to be repugnant to the interests of his country, and was in the minority that voted against its ratification. But, when it was at length adopted, he submitted to the voice of the majority. He was chosen to represent the district in which he lived, in the first congress under the constitution. When the subject of the assumption of the State debts was debated in March, 1790, he made a speech in favor of the assumption, differing in respect to this measure from all his colleagues. In this speech he expressed his attachment to the constitution as amended, though he wished for more amendments, and declared his dread of silent majorities on questions of great and general concern. He was honest, open, candid; and his conduct was such in his intercourse with mankind, as to secure universal respect. Though a legislator, he was not destitute of a genius for poetry. — Gazette of the U. S., April 17 and June 5, 1790.

BLAND, THEODORIC, died at Annapolis Nov. 16, 1846, aged 69. For twenty-two years he was chancellor of Maryland.

BLATCHFORD, SAMUEL, D. D., minister of Lansingburg, N. Y., died March 17, 1828, aged 60. He was a native of Plymouth, England, where he was educated and became a dissenting minister. In 1795 he emigrated to the United States: after a residence of one year at Bedford, Westchester county, he succeeded Dr. Dwight at Greenfield; subsequently he was the minister at Bridgeport, whence he was invited to Lansingburg in 1804. — His son, Henry Blatchford, who had been pastor of the Branch church, Salem, Mass., and thence removed to Lansingburg, died in Maryland Sept., 1822, aged 34. — Dr. Blatchford was a sound scholar and theologian, and as a pastor kind, persuasive, and often eloquent in his manner. He was endeared to his acquaintance by his estimable virtues and his Christian graces.

BLATCHFORD, JOHN, D. D., the son of the preceding, died at the house of his son-in-law, M. Collins, in St. Louis, April 8, 1855, aged 56. He was for some years the minister of the Presbyterian church in Chicago. His last residence was at Quincy, Illinois.

BLAUVELT, ISAAC, a minister, died in New Rochelle April, 1841, aged 90, in the peace and hope of the gospel.

BLED SOE, JESSE, died in Kentucky June 30, 1837. He may be held up as a beacon and a warning to others. A lawyer, a senator of the United States in 1813, professor of law in the university, chief justice of the supreme court of Kentucky; of talents, eloquence, and unequalled influence for a time, he yet in consequence of intemperance became a miserable outcast and wanderer.

aged 31. She was the daughter of Mr. Brandt Schuyler, and was born in October, 1752. From early life she was passionately fond of books. In 1769 she was married to John I. Bleecker, Esq., of New Rochelle, and removed to Poughkeepsie, and shortly afterwards to Tomhanc, a beautiful, solitary village, eighteen miles above Albany, where she lived a number of years in great tranquillity and happiness. But the approach of Burgoyne's army in 1777 drove her from her retreat in circumstances of terror. She fled on foot with her two little daughters, and obtained shelter for the night at Stone Arabia. In a few days she lost the youngest of her children. This affliction cast a gloom over her mind; and possessing an excessive sensibility, though not unacquainted with religious consolations, she was unable to support the weight of her troubles. After the peace she revisited New York to awaken afresh the scenes of her childhood; but the dispersion of her friends, and the desolation, which everywhere presented itself to her sight, overwhelmed her. She returned to her cottage, where she died. She was the friend of the aged and infirm, and her kindness and benevolence to the poor of the village, where she lived, caused her death to be deeply lamented. After her death, some of her writings were collected and published, in 1793, under the title of the posthumous works of Ann Eliza Bleecker, in prose and verse. To this work are prefixed memoirs of her life, written by her daughter, Margaretta V. Faugeres. There is also added to the volume a collection of Mrs. Faugeres' essays. — Hardie's Biog. Dict.; Spec. Amer. Poetry, I. 211-220.

BLEECKER, ANTHONY, a poet, was born about the year 1778 and educated at Columbia college in the city of New York. The circumstances of his family constrained him to study law, though he never succeeded as an advocate in consequence of an unconquerable diffidence, a somewhat rare failing in a lawyer. Yet was he respected in his profession for his learning and integrity. After a short illness he died in the spring of 1827, aged 49 years. For thirty years the periodical literature of New York and Philadelphia was constantly indebted to his fancy and good taste. — Spec. Amer. Poetry, II. 381-386.

BLEECKER, HARMANUS, died in Albany in July, 1849, aged 70. He was the son of Jacob B., a respected merchant, and a descendant of John Jansen B. As a lawyer he was associated with Theodore Sedgwick. As a member of congress he opposed the war of 1812. Mr. Van Buren appointed him minister to Holland. With the Dutch language he was perfectly acquainted; in Holland he married a Dutch lady of beauty and accomplishments. He was himself of pleasing manners and great dignity; and he had a deep sense of justice and an unflinching regard to it.

BLANNERHASSETT, HARMAN, died in the island of Guernsey, in 1831, aged 63. His widow, Margaret, died in New York in utter poverty in 1842. He was an Englishman of wealth and well educated, who came to Marietta in 1797. He bought a plantation of one hundred and seventy acres on a beautiful island in the Ohio, fourteen miles below the Muskingum, in Virginia, now known by his name. His mansion and improvements cost 40,000 dollars. He was a man of science and taste, and his wife was most beautiful and accomplished, skilled in French and Italian. His home was a scene of enchantment. But now, in 1806, came the destroyer, Aaron Burr, and persuaded him to engage in his projects. In consequence he fled from the island; was tried for treason; and had heavy debts to pay, contracted for Burr. He next lived ten years in Mississippi, and thence removed to Montreal and England. Dr. Hildreth has published the Deserted Isle, being verses written by his wife. He thinks the unhappy man was an Infidel, and "lacked one thing, without which no man can be happy: a firm belief in the overruling providence of God." — Hildreth's Biog. Memoirs.

BLINMAN, RICHARD, first minister of New London, Connecticut, was a native of Great Britain, and was minister at Chepstow in Monmouthshire. On his arrival in this country in 1642 it was his intention to settle with his friends, who accompanied him, at Green's harbor, or Marshfield, near Plymouth. But some difficulty arising in that place, he removed to Cape Ann, which the general court in the year above mentioned established a plantation and called Gloucester. He removed to New London in 1648. Here he continued in the ministry about ten years, and was then succeeded by Gershom Bulkley. In 1658 he removed to New Haven, and after a short stay in that town returned to England. On his way he stopped in 1659 at Newfoundland, where he declined to settle. Johnson wrote his name Blindman; Trumbull, Blynman. — Having lived to a good old age, he happily concluded at the city of Bristol a life spent in doing good. A short time before his death he published in answer to Mr. Danvers a book entitled, an essay tending to issue the controversy about infant baptism, 18mo., 1674. — Nonconform. Memor. III. 177; Coll. Hist. Soc. IX. 39; Savage's Winthrop, II. 64; Trumbull's Conn. I. 293, 310, 314, 522.

BLISS, JAMES C., M. D., died in New York July 31, 1855, aged 64. Born in Bennington, he graduated at the college of physicians in New York in 1815, and then commenced his practice of forty years. As a physician and Christian he was eminent; in the families of ministers and of the poor his services were gratuitous. He was a member of the south Dutch church, then an elder in the Bleecker street church. He joined the young men's missionary society; was corresponding secretary of the New York religious tract society, for which he prepared in one year seventy-five religious tracts; and was one of the founders of the American tract society, and one of the executive committee, most diligent for thirty years. His last tear fell in hearing his daughter repeat the text, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard," &c. — N. Y. Observer, Aug. 16, 1855.

BLISS, JOHN, colonel, an officer of the Revolution, died in Springfield in 1804, descended from Thomas Bliss of Hartford, who died in 1640, and from Nathaniel of Springfield. — He was a senator and a judge of the court of common pleas. His daughter was the mother of Judge Oliver B. Morris of Springfield.

BLISS, GEORGE, LL. D., died at Springfield March 8, 1830, aged 65. He was a son of Moses B. of S. and Abigail Metcalf, a daughter of William M. of Lebanon. His father died July 4, 1814, aged 78. G. Bliss's three wives were Hannah, daughter of Dr. John Clark of Lebanon; Mary Lathrop of New Haven, and Abigail, daughter of Rev. David S. Rowland. He had four children by his first wife and four by his third. His brother Moses died in S. in 1849, aged 75. He had ten children.

BLISS, JOHN, colonel, died at St. Augustine Nov. 22, 1854, aged 66. A graduate of Cambridge in 1808, he was an officer, wounded at Niagara falls in 1814; he was an instructor and commander of cadets at West Point from 1813 to 1819. His military office he resigned in 1837; he lived at Buffalo.

BLODGET, SAMUEL, remarkable for enterprise, died in Aug., 1807, aged 84. He was born at Woburn, Mass., and resided many years at Haverhill. Before the Revolution he was a judge of the court of common pleas for the county of Hillsborough, N. H. He was engaged in the expedition against Louisbourg in 1745. Having raised in 1783, by a machine of his invention, a valuable cargo from a ship sunk near Plymouth, he was induced to go to Europe for the purpose of recovering from the deep the treasures buried therein. In Spain he met with discouragement. His project for raising the Royal George was no better received in England. After his return he set up a duck manufactory in 1791; and in 1793 he removed to N. H. and commenced the canal, which bears his name, around Amoskeag falls. He expended much money without completing the work, became embarrassed, and for a time suffered imprisonment for debt. Judge B. was rigidly temperate. At all seasons he slept in a large room, with open windows. He intended to live, in consequence of the course he pursued, until he was at least 100 years old; but he died of a consumption, occasioned by his exposure in travelling from Boston to Haverhill in a cold night. His projects for public improvements unhappily involved him in great pecuniary losses. He wanted more skill. — Mass. Hist. Coll., n. s. iv. 158.

BLOOMFIELD, JOSEPH, governor of New Jersey, was probably a descendant of Thomas Bloomfield, who lived at Newbury, Mass., in 1638 and afterwards removed to New Jersey. He was a soldier of the Revolution. He succeeded Richard Howell as governor in 1801, and was succeeded in that office by Aaron Ogden in 1812. In the war, which commenced in this year, he was a brigadier-general. He died at Burlington Oct. 3, 1823. Gen. Bloomfield was a firm republican in politics; in congress a sound legislator; a brave soldier in the field; and in private life an excellent man. — Farmer's Collect., II. App. 91.

BLOUNT, WILLIAM, governor of the territory south of the Ohio, was appointed to that office in 1790. The first governor of Tennessee under the constitution in 1796 was John Sevier. While a member of the senate of the U. S. from Tennessee, Mr. Blount was expelled from that body in July, 1797, for being concerned in a project of the British to conquer the Spanish territories, and instigating the Creeks and Cherokees to lend their aid. He died at Knoxville March 26, 1800, aged 56.

BLOUNT, WILLIE, governor of Tenn. from 1809 to 1815, died at Nashville Sept. 10, 1835, aged 68.

BLOWERS, THOMAS, minister in Beverly, Massachusetts, died June 17, 1729, aged 51. He was born at Cambridge Aug. 1, 1677. His mother was the sister of Andrew Belcher. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1695, and was ordained pastor of the first church in Beverly Oct. 29, 1701. He was a good scholar, and an excellent minister; of sincere and ardent piety; of great meekness and sweetness of temper; of uncommon stability in his principles and steadiness in his conduct. He was a vigilant, prudent pastor, and a close, pathetic preacher. He published a sermon on the death of Rev. Joseph Green of Salem village, 1715. — N. E. Weekly Journal, June 23, 1729; Foxcroft's Funeral Sermon.

BLOWERS, SAMPSON SALTER, died at Halifax, N. S., Oct. 25, 1842, aged 100 years and 6 months. A graduate of Harvard in 1763, he survived all who graduated before him. Born in Boston, he studied law under Gov. Hutchinson. In 1770 he was counsel with Adams and Quincy in the trial of the British soldiers. As a tory he was sent to Halifax. He was raised to the supreme bench in 1795, and was presiding judge from 1801 to 1833. His name was in the prescribing act of Mass. in 1778.

BOGARDUS, EVERARDUS, the first minister of the Reformed Dutch church in New York, came early to this country, though the exact time of his arrival is not known. The records of this church begin with the year 1639. He was ordained and sent forth, it is believed, by the classis of Amsterdam, which had for a number of years the superintendence of the Dutch churches in New Netherlands, or the province of New York. The tradition is, that Mr. Bogardus became blind and returned to Holland some time before the surrender of the colony to the British in 1664. He was succeeded by John and Samuel Megapolensis. — Christian's Mag. N. Y. i. 368.

BOGARDUS, ROBERT, general, nearly fifty years at the bar of New York, died Sept. 12, 1841, aged 70. He was a State senator.

BOGART, ABRAHAM, died in the poor-house in Maury county, Tenn., June 14, 1833, aged 118 years, — a native of Delaware. He never drank spirits and he never was sick.

BOLLAN, WILLIAM, agent of Massachusetts in Great Britain, died in England in 1776. He was born in England, and came to this country about the year 1740. In 1743 he married a most amiable and accomplished lady, the daughter of Gov. Shirley, who died at the age of 25. Mr. Bollan was a lawyer of eminence, in profitable business, was advocate general, and had just received the appointment of collector of customs for Salem and Marblehead, when he was sent to England in 1745 as agent to solicit a reimbursement of the expenses in the expedition against Cape Breton. It was a difficult, toilsome agency of three years; but he conducted it with great skill and fidelity, and obtained at last a full repayment of the expenditure, being 183,649 pounds sterling. He arrived at Boston Sept. 19, 1748, with 633,000 ounces of silver and ten tons of copper, reckoned at 175,000 pounds sterling, or nearly 800,000 dollars. He was again sent to England as the agent: but it appears from a letter, which he wrote in 1752 to the secretary of Massachusetts, that for his three years' services the colony, after seven years from his appointment, voted him the sum of only 1500 pounds sterling. He had supported his family, and advanced of his money in the agency business as much as fifteen hundred pounds; he had abandoned a profitable business, which would have yielded him double the amount voted him; and besides this he had passed his years in the degradation of "a continual state of attendance and dependence on the motions and pleasures of the great," standing alone too without any support or assistance. After Gov. Shirley was superseded, attempts were made to displace Mr. Bollan, notwithstanding his address and talents, and his long, faithful, and important services. His connection with Shirley and his attachment to the Episcopal form of worship awakened prejudices. Dissatisfaction had also been occasioned by his making some deductions from the money, granted in 1759, as a reimbursement to the province, and his neglecting to correspond with the general court. He was dismissed in 1762, and Jasper Mauduit, whose learning and talents were not adequate to the office, was appointed in his place. In 1768 or 1769 he obtained from Alderman Beckford copies of thirty-three letters of Gov. Bernard, which he sent to Massachusetts, being employed as agent by the council, though not by the general court. For this act Lord North exclaimed against him in parliament; but it restored his lost popularity. Mr. Hancock declared in the house of representatives, that there was no man, to whom the colonies were more indebted. In 1775 he exerted himself in recommending to the mother country conciliatory measures. Several of his letters and writings are in the Mass. Historical Collections, vols. i. and vi. In one of them he maintains, that the boundary of Nova Scotia to the north is the river of Canada. He published a number of political tracts, among which are the following: importance of Cape Breton truly illustrated, Lond., 1746; coloniæ Anglicanæ illustratæ, 1762; the ancient right of the English nation to the American fishery examined and stated, 1764; the mutual interests of Great Britain and the American colonies considered, 1765; freedom of speech and writing upon public affairs considered, 1766; the importance of the colonies in North America and the interests of Great Britain with regard to them considered, 1766; epistle from Timoleon, 1768; continued corruption of standing armies, 1768; the free Briton's memorial, in defence of the right of election, 1769; a supplemental memorial, on the origin of parliaments, &c., 1770; a petition to the king in council Jan. 26, 1774, with illustrations intended to promote the harmony of Great Britain and her colonies. This petition he offered as agent for the council of the province of Massachusetts. — Hutchinson's Mass. ii. 436; Minot's Contn. ii. 109, 110; Eliot.

BOLLES, LUCIUS, D. D., died in Boston Jan. 5, 1844, aged 64. He had been pastor of the first Baptist church, Salem, and was many years secretary of the Baptist board of foreign missions. He published a sermon before the association, 1822.

BOLLMAN, ERICH, M. D., was born at Hoya, in Hanover, in Europe, and was well educated, receiving his medical degree at Gottingen. He settled as a physician at Paris. In 1794 he engaged in the project of releasing La Fayette from the prison of Olmutz. His coadjutor was Francis Huger, an American, son of Col. Huger of South Carolina. He found means through the surgeon to communicate with the prisoner. As La Fayette was riding out for his health, Nov. 8, the guard was attacked and overcome: the prisoner and his deliverers galloped off, but missing the way, were soon captured. Dr. Bollman was confined twelve months and then banished. After he came to the United States, he was implicated in the conspiracy of Burr. On his return from South America he died at Jamaica of the yellow fever Dec. 9, 1821. He published paragraphs on banks, 1810; improved system of the money concerns of the union, 1816; strictures on the theories of Mr. Ricardo. — Jennison.

BOMFORD, GEORGE, colonel, died in Boston, March 25, 1828. He was distinguished in the war with Great Britain. He perfected the ordinance department.

BOMMASEEN, an Indian chief, signed the treaty of Pemaquid in Maine Aug. 11, 1693, with Madockawondo and other sagamores. It was one part of the agreement that, as the French had instigated wars, the Indians should abandon the French interest. The treaty is given at length by Mather. The next year, after various barbarities at Kittery and elsewhere, in which he was suspected to have been concerned, Bommascen presented himself with two other Indians at Pemaquid, "as loving as bears and as harmless as tigers," pretending to have just come from Canada; when Capt. March made him prisoner Nov. 19, and sent him to Boston, where he was kept a year or two in gaol. In 1696 one of the ministers of Boston visited Bommascen at his request in prison, when the savage inquired, whether it was true, as the French had taught him, that the Virgin Mary was a French lady, and that it was the English who murdered Jesus Christ, and whether he required his disciples "to revenge his quarrel upon the English?" The minister gave him suitable religious instruction, and taught him how to obtain the pardon of sins from God, without paying beaver skins for it to a priest; which instruction was received with strong expressions of gratitude. This is the serious narrative of Cotton Mather. Unless the Indian invented the story, what a proof is here furnished of the depravity of the French teachers of the savages! After his liberation Bommascen manifested his humanity by saving the life of Rebecca Taylor, a captive, whom her master was endeavoring to hang with his belt near Montreal in 1696. — Hutchinson, II. 149; Magnal. VII. 22.

BOND, THOMAS, M. D., a distinguished physician and surgeon, died March 26, 1784, aged 72. He was born in Maryland in 1712. After studying with Dr. Hamilton, he spent a considerable time in Paris. On his return he commenced the practice of medicine at Philadelphia about the year 1734. With his brother, Dr. Phineas Bond, he attended the Pennsylvania hospital, in which the first clinical lectures were delivered by him. He assisted in founding the college and academy. Of a literary society, composed of Franklin, Bartram, Godfrey, and others, he was a member in 1743, and an officer of the philosophical society from its establishment. The annual address before the society was delivered by him in 1782, on the rank of man in the scale of being. For half a century he had the first practice in Philadelphia. Though disposed to pulmonary consumption, by attention to diet, and guarding against the changes of the weather, and the obstruction of blood when his lungs were affected, he lived to a good old age. His daughter, married to Thomas Lawrence, died in 1771. His brother, Dr. Phineas Bond, who studied at Leyden, Paris, Edinburgh, and London, and was an eminent practitioner in Philadelphia, died in June, 1773, aged 56. He published in the London Medical Inquiries and Observations, vol. I., an account of a worm in the liver, 1754; on the use of Peruvian bark in serofula, vol. II. — Thacher's Med. Biog.; Ramsay's Rev. Med. 37; Miller I. 312.

BOND, THOMAS E., D. D., editor of the New York Christian Advocate and Journal, died March 19, 1856, aged 74. A native of Maryland, he joined the Methodist church in Baltimore in 1805; and there he lived many years in various offices of trust. He was respected and beloved.

BONNYCASTLE, CHARLES, died in Oct., 1840, aged 48, the son of John B. of England. He was the author of algebra; professor of mathematics in the university of Virginia; and published a work on inductive geometry.

BONYTHON, RICHARD, captain, died before 1653. He was one of the first settlers of Saco, had a grant of one hundred and twenty acres in Saco, 1629. He was one of the commissioners under Gorges for the government of the province of Maine, then called New Somersetshire, in 1636. The first meeting was held at Saco March 25, which was the first day of the year. When Gorges had obtained from the king a new charter of the province, Bonython was named one of the council, with Vines, Jocelyn, and others, in 1640. The last court under this authority was held at Wells in 1646. He lived in a house on the left bank of the Saco, just below the falls. His name is written Benynton by Sullivan and Bonighton by Farmer and Willis. He was an upright and worthy magistrate; even against his own son he once entered a complaint. This son was John Bonython, who was outlawed for contemning the summons of court and was guilty of various outrages; he died in 1684. — His ungovernable temper procured him the title of the sagamore of Saco in the couplet proposed for his gravestone, which represents him as having gone to the evil spirit of the Indians :

"Here lies Bonython, the sagamore of Saeco ;
He lived a rogue and died a knave and went to Hobomocko."

Although he left many children, yet his name is extinct in Maine and probably in New England. — Folsom's Hist. Saco, 113, 115 ; Sullivan, 368.

BOOGE, PUBLIUS V., died in Oneida co., New York, Sept. 28, 1836, aged 72 ; the oldest minister in the presbytery of O. A graduate of Yale in 1787, he preached much in New England.

BOONE, DANIEL, colonel, one of the first settlers of Kentucky, died in Missouri Sept. 26, 1820, aged nearly 90. While he was young, his parents, who came from Bridgewater, Eng., removed from Pennsylvania or Virginia to the Yadkin river in North Carolina. He was early addicted to hunting in the woods ; in the militia he attained to the rank of colonel. In 1769, in consequence of the representation of John Finley, who had penetrated into the wilderness of Kentucky, he was induced to accompany him in a journey to that country. He had four other companions, John Stuart, Joseph Holden, James Money, and William Cool, with whom he set out May 1. On the 7th of June they arrived at the Red river, a branch of the Kentucky ; and here from the top of a hill they had a view of the fertile plains, of which they were in pursuit. They encamped and remained in this place till Dec. 22, when Boone and Stuart were captured by the Indians near Kentucky river. In about a week they made their escape ; but on returning to their camp, they found it plundered, and deserted by their companions, who had gone back to Carolina. Stuart was soon killed by the Indians ; but Boone was joined by his brother, and they remained and prosecuted the business of hunting during the winter, without further molestation. His brother going home for supplies in May 1770, he remained alone in the deep solitude of the western wilderness until his return with ammunition and horses July 27th. During this period this wild man of the woods, though greeted every night with the howlings of wolves, was delighted in his excursions with the survey of the beauties of the country, and found greater pleasure in the solitude of wild nature, than he could have found amid the hum of the most elegant city. With his brother he traversed the country to Cumberland river. It was not until March, 1771, that he returned to his family, resolved to conduct them to the paradise which he had explored.

Having sold his farm, he set out with his own and five other families Sept. 25, 1773, and was joined in Powell's valley by forty men. After passing over two mountains, called Powell's and Walden's, through which, as they ranged from the northeast to the southwest, passes were found, and approaching the Cumberland, the rear of the company was attacked by the Indians on the 10th of October, when six men were killed, among whom was the eldest son of Col. Boone. One man was also wounded, and the cattle were scattered. This disaster induced them to retreat about forty miles to the settlement on Clinch river, where he remained with his family, until June 6, 1774, when, at the request of governor Dunmore, he conducted a number of surveyors to the falls of Ohio. On this tour of eight hundred miles he was absent two months. After this he was intrusted by the governor, during the campaign against the Shawanese, with the command of three forts. Early in 1775, at the request of a company in North Carolina, he attended a treaty with the Cherokee Indians at Wataga, in order to make of them the purchase of lands on the south side of the Tennessee river. After performing this service, he was employed to mark out a road from the settlements on the Holston to the Kentucky river. While thus employed, at the distance of about fifteen miles from what is now Boonesborough, the party was attacked by the Indians, who killed four and wounded five. In April, at a salt-lick, on the southern bank of the Kentucky, in what is now Boonesborough, a few miles from Lexington, he began to erect a fort, consisting of a block house and several cabins, enclosed with palisades. On the 14th of June he returned to his family in order to remove them to the fort. His wife and daughters were the first white women who stood on the banks of the Kentucky river. July 14, 1776, when all the settlements were attacked, two of Col. Calway's daughters and one of his own were taken prisoners ; Boone pursued with eighteen men, and in two days overtook the Indians, killed two of them, and recovered the captives. The Indians made repeated attacks upon Boonesborough ; Nov. 15, 1777, with one hundred men, and July 4, with two hundred men. On both sides several were killed and wounded ; but the enemy were repulsed ; as they were also July 19, from Logan's Fort of fifteen men, which was besieged by two hundred. The arrival of twenty-five men from Carolina and in August of one hundred from Virginia gave a new aspect to affairs, and taught the savages the superiority of "the long knives," as they called the Virginians. Jan. 1, 1778, he went with thirty men to the blue licks on the Licking river to make salt for the garrison. Feb. 7, being alone, he was captured by a party of one hundred and two Indians and two Frenchmen ; he capitulated for his men, and they were all carried to Chillicothe on the Little Miami, whence he and ten men were conducted to Detroit, where he arrived March 30. The governor, Hamilton, treated him with much humanity, and offered 100 pounds for his redemption. But the savages refused the offer from affection to their captive. Being carried back to Chillicothe in April, he was adopted as a son in an Indian family. He assumed the appearance of cheerfulness; but his thoughts were on his wife and children. Aware of the envy of the Indians, he was careful not to exhibit his skill in shooting. In June he went to the salt springs on the Scioto. On his return to Chillicothe he ascertained that four hundred and fifty warriors were preparing to proceed against Boonesborough. He escaped June 16, and arrived at the fort June 20th, having travelled one hundred and sixty miles in four days, with but one meal. His wife had returned to her father's. Great efforts were made to repair the fort in order to meet the expected attack. August 1, he went out with nineteen men to surprise Point Creek town on the Scioto; meeting with thirty Indians, he put them to flight, and captured their baggage. At last, Aug. 8, the Indian army of four hundred and forty-four men, led by Captain Dugnesne and eleven other Frenchmen, and their own chiefs, with British colors flying, summoned the fort to surrender. The next day Boone, having a garrison of only fifty men, announced his resolution to defend the fort, while a man was alive. They then proposed that nine men should be sent out sixty yards from the fort to enter into a treaty; and when the articles were agreed upon and signed, they said it was customary on such occasions, as a token of sincere friendship, for two Indians to shake every white man by the hand. Accordingly two Indians approached each of the nine white men, and grappled with the intent of making him a prisoner; but the object being perceived, the men broke away and re-entered the fort. An attempt was now made to undermine it; but a counter trench defeated that purpose. At last, on the 20th, the enemy raised the siege, having lost thirty-seven men. Of Boone's men two were killed and four wounded. "We picked up," said he, "one hundred and twenty-five pounds of bullets, besides what stuck in the logs of our fort, which certainly is a great proof of their industry." In 1779, when Boone was absent, revisiting his family in Carolina, Col. Bowman with one hundred and sixty men fought the Shawanese Indians at old Chillicothe. In his retreat the Indians pursued him for thirty miles, when in another engagement Col. Harrod suggested the successful project of mounting a number of horses and breaking the Indian line. Of the Kentuckians nine were killed. June 22, 1780, about six hundred Indians and Canadians under Col. Bird attacked Riddle's and Martin's stations and the forks of Licking river with six pieces of artillery, and carried away all as captives. Gen. Clarke, commanding at the falls of Ohio, marched with his regiment and troops against Reccaway, the principal Shawanese town, on a branch of the Miami, and burned the town, with the loss of seventeen on each side. About this time Boone returned to Kentucky with his family. In Oct., 1780, soon after he was settled again at Boonesborough, he went with his brother to the Blue Licks, and as they were returning the latter was slain by a party of Indians, and he was pursued by them by the aid of a dog. By shooting him Boone escaped. The severity of the ensuing winter was attended with great distress, the enemy having destroyed most of the corn. The people subsisted chiefly on buffalo's flesh. In May, 1782, the Indians having killed a man at Ashton's station, Captain A. pursued with twenty-five men, but in an attack upon the enemy he was killed with twelve of his men. August 10 two boys were carried off from Maj. Hay's station. Capt. Holden pursued with seventeen men; but he also was defeated, with the loss of four men. In a field near Lexington an Indian shot a man, and running to scalp him, was himself shot from the fort and fell dead upon his victim. On the 15th August five hundred Indians attacked Brient's station, five miles from Lexington, and destroyed all the cattle; but they were repulsed on the third day, having about thirty killed, while of the garrison four were killed and three wounded. Boone, with Cols. Todd and Trigg and Maj. Harland, collected one hundred and seventy-six men and pursued on the 18th. They overtook the enemy the next day a mile beyond the Blue Licks, about forty miles from Lexington, at a remarkable bend of a branch of Licking river. A battle ensued, the enemy having a line formed across from one bend to the other, but the Kentuckians were defeated with the great loss of sixty killed, among whom were Cols. Todd and Trigg, and Maj. Harland, and Boone's second son. Many were the widows made in Lexington on that fatal day. The Indians having four more killed, four of the prisoners were given up to the young warriors to be put to death in the most barbarous manner. Gen. Clarke, accompanied by Boone, immediately marched into the Indian country and desolated it, burning old Chillicothe, Peccaway, new Chillicothe, Willis Town, and Chillicothe. With the loss of four men he took seven prisoners and five scalps, or killed five Indians. In October the Indians attacked Crab Orchard. One of the Indians having entered a house, in which were a woman and a negro, and being thrown to the ground by the negro, the woman cut off his head. From this period to the peace with Great Britain the Indians did no harm. "Two darling sons and a brother," said Boone, "have I lost by savage hands, which have also taken from me forty valuable horses and abundance of cattle. Many dark and sleepless nights have I spent, separated from the cheerful society of men, scorched by the summer's sun and pinched by the winter's cold, an instrument ordained to settle the wilderness."

From this period he resided in Kentucky and Virginia till 1798, when in consequence of an imperfect legal title to the lands, which he had settled, he found himself dispossessed of his property. In his indignation he fled from the delightful region, which he had explored, when a wilderness, and which now had a population of half a million. With his rifle he crossed the Ohio and plunged into the immense country of the Missouri. In 1799 he settled on the Femme Osage river with numerous followers. In 1800 he discovered the Boone's Lick country, now a fine settlement: in the same year he visited the head waters of the Grand Osage river and spent the winter upon the head waters of the Arkansas. At the age of 80, in company with a white man and a black man, laid under strict injunctions to carry him back to his family, dead or alive, he made a hunting trip to the head waters of the Great Osage, and was successful in trapping beaver and other game. In Jan., 1812, he addressed a memorial to the legislature of Kentucky, stating that he owned not an acre of land in the region, which he first settled; that in 1794 he passed over into the Spanish province of Louisiana, under an assurance from the governor, who resided at St. Louis, that land should be given him; that accordingly ten thousand acres were given him on the Missouri and he became Syndic or chief of the district of St. Charles; but that on the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States his claims were rejected by the commissioners of land, because he did not actually reside; and that thus at the age of 80 he was a wanderer, having no spot of his own whereon to lay his bones. The legislature instructed their delegates to congress to solicit a confirmation of this grant. He retained, it is believed, 2,000 acres. In his old age he pursued his accustomed course of life, trapping bears and hunting with his rifle. He died at the house of his son, Maj. A. Boone, at Charette. He left sons and daughters in Missouri. In consequence of his death the legislature of Missouri voted to wear a badge of mourning for twenty days. A brother died in Mississippi, Oct., 1808, aged 81. Col. Boone was of common stature, of amiable disposition, and honorable integrity. In his last years he might have been seen by the traveller at the door of his house, with his rifle on his knee and his faithful dog at his side, lamenting the departed vigor of his limbs, and meditating on the scenes of his past life. Whether he also meditated on the approaching scenes of eternity, and his dim eyes ever kindled up with the glorious hopes of the Christian is not mentioned in the accounts of him, which have been examined. But of all objects an irreligious old man, dead as to worldly joy and dead as to celestial hope, is the most pitiable. An account of his adventures, drawn up by himself, was published in Filson's supplement to Imlay's description of the western territory, 1793. — Niles' Weekly Register, March 13, 1813.

BOOTH, CHAUNCEY, minister of Coventry, Conn.; died May 24, 1851, aged 68. He was settled in 1815 and dismissed in 1844: he toiled in six revivals.

BOOTT, KIRK, died at Lowell, April 11, 1837, aged 46. Born in Boston, educated in England, he served as an officer in Spain under the Duke of Wellington. During two years at Woolwich, he acquired skill as a draftsman and engineer. He superintended the erection of the Lowell manufacturing establishments, and was a man of energy, and generous and liberal.

BORDLEY, JOHN BEALE, a writer on agriculture, died at Philadelphia Jan. 25, 1804, aged 76. In the former part of his life he was an inhabitant of Md. He was of the profession of the law, and before the Revolution was a judge of the superior court and court of appeals of Maryland. He had also a seat at the executive council of the province. But he was not allured by this office from his duty to his country. He found our Revolution necessary to our freedom, and he rejoiced in its accomplishment. His habitual and most pleasing employment was husbandry; which he practised extensively upon his own estate on Wye Island in the bay of Chesapeake. As he readily tried every suggested improvement, and adopted such as were confirmed by his experiments, and as he added to his example frequent essays upon agricultural subjects, he was greatly instrumental in diffusing the best knowledge of the best of all arts. He was cheerful in his temper, and was respected and beloved. In religion he was of the most liberal or free system within the pale of revelation. In his political principles he was attached to that republican form of government, in which the public authority is founded on the people, but guarded against the sudden fluctuations of their will. He published Forsyth's treatise on fruit trees with notes; sketches on rotations of crops, 1792; essays and notes on husbandry and rural affairs, with plates, 1799 and 1801; a view of the courses of crops in England and Maryland, 1804. — U. S. Gazette, Feb. 7.

BORK, CHRISTIAN, minister of the Dutch Reformed church in Franklin street, N. Y., died about 1825 or 1830, at an advanced age, and was succeeded by George Dubois. In the Revolutionary war he was a soldier in the British army. He studied with Dr. Livingston, and was first settled near Albany. Once in ministering, by way of exchange at Stephentown to an English congregation, he made a part of the prayer in Dutch and German. He preached without notes and was fervent and eminently useful. If it be true, as reported, that, having a yoke-fellow not of the sweetest temper, she once locked him in his study at the moment for going to the church; it is altogether probable, from his own energy of character, that this little obstacle was instantly removed.

BOSTWICK, DAVID, an eminent minister in New York, was of Scotch extraction, and was born about the year 1720. He was first settled at Jamaica on Long Island, where he continued till 1756, when the synod translated him to the Presbyterian society of New York. In this charge he continued till Nov. 12, 1763, when he died, aged 43. He was of a mild, catholic disposition, of great piety and zeal; and he confined himself entirely to the proper business of his office. He abhorred the frequent mixture of divinity and politics, and much more the turpitude of making the former subservient to the latter. His thoughts were occupied by things, which are above, and he wished to withdraw the minds of his people more from the concerns of this world. He was deeply grieved, when some of his flock became, not fervent Christians, but furious politicians. He preached the gospel, and as his life corresponded with his preaching, he was respected by good men of all denominations. His doctrines he derived from the scriptures, and he understood them in accordance with the public confessions of the reformed churches. His discourses were methodical, sound, and pathetic, rich in sentiment, and ornamented in diction. With a strong, commanding voice, his pronunciation was clear, distinct, and deliberate. He preached without notes, with great ease and fluency; but he always studied his sermons with great care. With a lively imagination and a heart deeply affected by the truths of religion, he was enabled to address his hearers with solemnity and energy. Few men described the hideous deformity of sin, the misery of man's apostasy from God, the wonders of redeeming love, and the glory and riches of divine grace in so distinct and affecting a manner. He knew the worth of the soul and the deceitfulness of the human heart; and he preached with plainness, more intent to impress sinners with their guilt and to teach them the truths of God, than to attract their attention to himself. Though he was remarkable for his gentleness and prudence, yet in preaching the gospel he feared no man. He knew whose servant he was, and with all boldness and impartiality he delivered his message, proclaiming the terrors of the divine law to every transgressor, however elevated, and displaying the mild glories of the gospel for the comfort and refreshment of every penitent believer. A few months before his death his mind was greatly distressed by apprehensions respecting the interests of his family, when he should be taken from them. But God was pleased to give him such views of his power and goodness, and such cheerful reliance upon the wisdom and rectitude of his government, as restored to him peace and calmness. He was willing to cast himself and all that was dear to him, upon the providence of his heavenly Father. In this temper he continued to his last moment, when he placidly resigned his soul into the hands of his Saviour. Such is the serenity, frequently imparted to Christians in the solemn hour of dissolution.

He published a sermon, preached May 25, 1758, entitled, self disclaimed and Christ exalted. It received the warm recommendation of Gilbert Tennent. He published also an account of the life, character, and death of Pres. Davies, prefixed to Davies' sermon on the death of George II., 1761. After his decease there was published from his manuscripts a vindication of the right of infants to the ordinance of baptism, being the substance of several discourses from Acts ii. 39. — Middleton's Biog. Evan. iv. 414—418; New and Gen. Biog. Dict.; Smith's New York, 193; Pref. to Bostwick's Vindication.

BOUCHER, PIERRE, governor of Trois Rivières in Canada, died at the age of nearly 100 years, having lived to see numerous descendants, some of the fifth generation. He was sent to France to represent the temporal and spiritual wants of the colony; and published in 1664 an account of Canada, entitled, Histoire veritable et naturelle des moeurs et productions, &c.

BOUCHER, JONATHAN, a learned archæologist, was a native of Cumberland, — the northern county of England, the country of lakes, the abode of the poets Wordsworth and Southey, and the resort of "the lakers," — but came to America at the age of 16. After receiving Episcopal ordination, he was appointed rector of Hanover and then of St. Mary, Va. Gov. Eden gave him also the rectory of St. Anne, Annapolis, and of Queen Anne, in Prince George's county. These are indeed saintly and princely names for a Protestant, republican country. However, Mr. Boucher was a loyalist, unshaken by the mighty democratic movements around him. In his farewell sermon, at the beginning of the Revolution in 1775, he declared that, as long as he lived, he would say with Zadock, the priest, and Nathan, the prophet, "God save the king!" Returning to England, he was appointed vicar of Epsom; and there he spent the remainder of his life. He died April 27, 1804, aged 67. He was esteemed one of the best preachers of his time. During the last fourteen years of his life he was employed in preparing a glossary of provincial and archæological words, intended as a supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary. The manuscripts of Mr. Boucher were purchased of his family in 1831 by the proprietors of the English edition of Dr. Webster's Dictionary, who proposed to publish them as a supplement to Webster. He published in 1799 a view of the causes and consequences of the American Revolution in fifteen discourses, preached in N. America between 1763 and 1775, dedicated to Washington, containing many anecdotes illustrative of political events; — also, two sermons before the grand juries of Surrey and Cumberland, 1799.

BOUCHER, CHARLES, died at Berthier, Canada East, May, 1852, aged 106.

BOUCHETTE, JOSEPH, colonel, surveyor-general of Lower Canada, died April 8, 1841, aged 67, with only a few minutes' illness. He published a description of Lower Canada, 4to., 1815.

BOUDINOT, ELIAS, L.L. D., first president of the American Bible society, died in Burlington, N. J., Oct. 24, 1821, aged 81. He was born in Philadelphia May 2, 1740. His great-grandfather, Elias, was a Protestant in France, who fled from his country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes; his father, Elias, died in 1770; his mother, Catherine Williams, was of a Welsh family. After a classical education he studied law under Richard Stockton, whose eldest sister he married. Soon after commencing the practice of law in New Jersey, he rose to distinction. He early espoused the cause of his country. In 1777 congress appointed him commissary-general of prisoners; and in the same year he was elected a delegate to congress, of which body he was elected the president in Nov., 1782. In that capacity he put his signature to the treaty of peace. He returned to the profession of the law; but was again elected to congress under the new constitution, in 1789, and was continued a member of the house six years. In 1796 Washington appointed him the director of the mint of the United States, as the successor of Rittenhouse: in this office he continued till 1805, when he resigned it, and retiring from Philadelphia passed the remainder of his life at Burlington, N. J. He lost his wife about the year 1808. His daughter married Wm. Bradford. His brother, Elisha Boudinot, died at Newark Oct. 17, 1819, aged 71. After the establishment in 1816 of the Bible society which he assisted in creating, he was elected its first president; and he made to it the munificent donation of 10,000 dollars. He afterwards contributed liberally towards the erection of its depository. In 1812 he was elected a member of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, to which he presented the next year a donation of 100 pounds sterling. When three Cherokee youth were brought to the foreign mission school in 1818, one of them by his permission took his name, for he was deeply interested in every attempt to meliorate the condition of the American Indians. His house was the seat of hospitality and his days were spent in the pursuits of biblical literature, in the exercise of the loveliest charities of life, and the performance of the highest Christian duties. He was a trustee of Princeton college, in which he founded in 1805 the cabinet of natural history, which cost 3,000 dollars. He was a member of a Presbyterian church. By the religion which he professed he was supported and cheered as he went down to the grave. His patience was unexhausted; his faith was strong and triumphant. Exhorting those around him to rest in Jesus Christ as the only ground of trust, and commending his daughter and only child to the care of his friends, he expressed his desire to depart in peace to the bosom of his Father in heaven, and his last prayer was, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

By his last will Dr. Boudinot bequeathed his large estate principally to charitable uses; 200 dollars for ten poor widows; 200 to the New Jersey Bible society to purchase spectacles for the aged poor, to enable them to read the Bible; 2,000 dollars to the Moravians at Bethlehem for the instruction of the Indians; 4,000 acres of land to the society for the benefit of the Jews; to the Magdalen societies of New York and Philadelphia 500 dollars each; three houses in Philadelphia to the trustees of the general assembly for the purchase of books for ministers; also, 5,000 dollars to the general assembly for the support of a missionary in Philadelphia and New York; 4,080 acres of land for theological students at Princeton; 4,000 acres to the college of New Jersey for the establishment of fellowships; 4,542 acres to the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, with special reference to the benefit of the Indians; 3,270 acres to the hospital at Philadelphia, for the benefit of foreigners; 4,589 acres to the American Bible society; 13,000 acres to the mayor and corporation of Philadelphia, to supply the poor with wood on low terms; also, after the decease of his daughter, 5,000 dollars to the college and 5,000 to the theological seminary of Princeton, and 5,000 to the A. B. of commissioners for foreign missions, and the remainder of his estate to the general assembly of the Presbyterian church. How benevolent, honorable, and useful is such a charitable disposition of the property, which God intrusts to a Christian, compared with the selfish and narrow appropriation of it to the enrichment of family relatives, without any reference to the diffusion of truth and holiness in the earth? For such deeds of charity the names of Boudinot, and Burr, and Abbot, and Norris, and Phillips will be held in lasting, most honorable remembrance. Dr. Boudinot published the age of revelation, or the age of reason an age of infidelity, 1790, also 1801; an oration before the society of the Cincinnati, 1793; second advent of the Messiah, 1815; star in the west, or an attempt to discover the long lost tribes of Israel, preparatory to their return to their beloved city, Jerusalem, 8vo. 1816. Like Mr. Adair, he regards the Indians as the lost tribes. — Panoplist 17 : 399; 18 : 25; Green's Disc. 278.

BOUDINOT, ELLAS, a Cherokee Indian, died June 10, 1839, being murdered by Indians west of the Mississippi. He was a man of education, talents, and influence.

BOUDINOT, ADRIANA, died at Hanover, N. H., in Sept., 1855, aged 78, the widow of Tobias B. of New Jersey, the nephew of Elias B. Born in the West Indies, she was of Huguenot descent from Mr. Lasalle of St. Thomas, whose daughter married Mr. Malleville : their son Thomas, governor of the Danish Islands, was the father of Maria Malleville. She first married Gov. Suhm, who was the father of Maria Wheelock, and next Mr. Von Beverhoudt, who removed to N. J., to Beverwyck, in Parsippany, and was the father of Mrs. Boudinot. She died in Christian peace. Her father's house was honored with the visits of Washington and his wife while the army was at Morris.

BOUGHTON, BENJAMIN, died in Fredericksburgh, Va., in 1842, bequeathing 2,000 dollars to the Bible society, the same to the tract society, with a legacy to Sunday schools.

BOULDIN, THOMAS T., judge, died in Washington Feb. 11, 1834, a member of congress from Va. Having been blamed for not speaking of the death of his predecessor, Randolph, he rose to reply, sank down into a chair, and died.

BOUND, EPHRAIM, first minister of the second Baptist church in Boston, was ordained in 1743 and died in 1765 : he was useful and respected.

BOUQUET, HENRY, a brave officer, was appointed lieutenant colonel in the British army in 1756. In the year 1763 he was sent by General Amherst from Canada with military stores and provisions for the relief of Fort Pitt. While on his way he was attacked by a powerful body of Indians on the 5th and 6th of August, but by a skilful manœuvre, supported by the determined bravery of his troops, he defeated them, and reached the fort in four days from the action. In the following year he was sent from Canada on an expedition against the Ohio Indians, and in October he reduced a body of the Shawanese, Delawares, and other Indians to the necessity of making terms of peace at Tuscarawas. He died at Pensacola in February, 1766, being then a brigadier general. Thomas Hutchins published at Philadelphia in 1765 an historical account of the expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764, with a map and plates. — Annual Register for 1763, p. 27-31 ; for 1764, p. 181 ; for 1766, p. 62.

year 1685. He was one of the first emigrants from England, who settled at Sandwich. Being a religious man, he officiated publicly on the Lord's day, until a minister, Mr. Smith, was settled ; he then turned his attention to the Indians at the southward and eastward, and resolved to bring them to an acquaintance with the gospel. He went to Marshpee, not many miles to the south. The first account of him is in 1658, when he was in that town, assisting in the settlement of a boundary between the Indians and the proprietors of Barnstable. Having obtained a competent knowledge of the Indian language he entered on the missionary service with activity and ardor. On the 17th of August, 1670, he was ordained pastor of an Indian church at Marshpee, constituted by his own disciples and converts ; which solemnity was performed by the famous Eliot and Cotton. He left no successor in the ministry but an Indian, named Simon Popmonet. Mr. Bourne is deserving of honorable remembrance not only for his zealous exertions to make known to the Indians the glad tidings of salvation, but for his regard to their temporal interests. He wisely considered that it would be in vain to attempt to propagate Christian knowledge among them, unless they had a territory, where they might remain in peace, and have a fixed habitation. He therefore, at his own expense, not long after the year 1660, obtained a deed of Marshpee from Quachatisset and others to the South Sea Indians, as his people were called. This territory, in the opinion of Mr. Hawley, was perfectly adapted for an Indian town, being situated on the Sound, in sight of Martha's Vineyard, cut into necks of land, and well watered. After the death of Mr. Bourne, his son, Shearjashub Bourne, Esq., succeeded him in the Marshpee inheritance, where he lived till his death in 1719. He procured from the court at Plymouth a ratification of the Indian deeds, so that no parcel of the lands could be bought by any white person or persons without the consent of all the said Indians, not even with the consent of the general court. Thus did the son promote the designs of the father, watching over the interests of the aborigines. A letter of Mr. Bourne, giving an account of the Indians in Plymouth county and upon the Cape, is preserved in Gookin. — Mather's Mag. III. 199 ; Coll. Hist. Soc. I. 172, 196-199, 218 ; III. 188-190 ; VIII. 170.

BOURNE, EZRA, chief justice of the court of common pleas for Barnstable county, died at Marshpee in Sept., 1764, aged 87. He was the youngest son of Shearjashub Bourne, who died at Sandwich, March 7, 1719, aged 75. He succeeded his father in the superintendence of the Indians, over whom he had great influence. He married a sister of Rev. Thomas Prince. His son, Shearjashub, a graduate of Harvard college in 1743, died at Bristol, R. I., Feb. 9, 1781. His grandson, Shearjashub, a graduate of 1764, a representative in congress and chief justice of the common pleas for Suffolk, died in 1806. His grandson, Benjamin, L.L. D., a graduate of 1775, a member of congress, and appointed a judge of the circuit court of Rhode Island in 1801, died Sept. 17, 1808.—Coll. Hist. Soc. III. 190.

BOURNE, JOSEPH, missionary to the Indians, was the son of the preceding and graduated in 1722 at Harvard college, in the catalogue of which his name is erroneously given Bourn. He was ordained at Marshpee as successor to Simon Popponnet Nov. 26, 1729. He resigned his mission in 1742, complaining much of the ill treatment which the Indians received, and of the neglect of the commissioners with regard to his support. He was succeeded by an Indian, named Solomon Briant; but he still took an interest in the cause, in which he was once particularly engaged, and much encouraged and assisted the missionary, Mr. Hawley. Mr. Bourne died in 1767.—Coll. Hist. Soc. III. 190-191.

BOURS, PETER, Episcopal minister in Marblehead, died in 1762, aged 36. He was a native of Newport, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1747. After his settlement at Marblehead, he discharged with faithfulness the duties of his office nine years, enforcing the doctrines of the gospel with fervency, and illustrating the truth of what he taught by his life. His predecessors were Mousam, Pigot, Malcolm; his successors, Weeks, Harris, Bowers. His dying words were "O Lamb of God, receive my spirit."—Whitwell's Ser. on Death of Barnard; Coll. Hist. Soc. VIII. 77.

BOUTELLE, TIMOTHY, L.L. D., died in Waterville, Me., Nov. 12, 1855, aged 77. Born in Leominster, he graduated at Harvard in 1800. He devoted his life to the legal profession in Waterville, but sometimes occupied public stations. The cause of internal improvement and of education was dear to him.—Boston Advertiser, July 16, 1856.

BOWDEN, JOHN, D. D., professor of belles-lettres and moral philosophy in Columbia college, N. Y., was an Episcopal clergyman more than forty years. In 1787 he was rector of Norwalk. He was elected bishop of Connecticut, but, as he declined, Mr. Jarvis was appointed. He died at Ballston July 31, 1817, aged 65. He published a letter to E. Stiles, occasioned by his ordination sermon at New London, 1787; the apostolic origin of episcopacy, in a series of letters to Dr. Miller, 2 vols. 8vo. 1808.—Jennison.

BOWDITCH, NATHANIEL, L.L. D., F. R. S., president of the American academy, died at Boston March 16, 1838, aged nearly 65, being born at Salem March 26, 1773. The son of a shipmaster, he had little education. From 1795 he spent nine years in a seafaring life. He was president of a marine insurance company from 1804 to 1823, when he became actuary for the rest of his life of the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Co. By his extraordinary genius and industry he became acquainted with Latin, Greek, French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and German, and was one of the most eminent of mathematicians and astronomers. About to die, with his children arranged in the order of age at his bedside, he said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word." He published Practical Navigator in 1802, and various communications in the Memoirs of the American Academy; and at his own expense, a translation of the Mecanique Celeste of La Place, with a commentary in four large quarto vols.

BOWDOIN, JAMES, L.L. D., Governor of Massachusetts, and a philosopher and statesman, died Nov. 6, 1790, aged 63. He was born in Boston August 8, 1727, and was the son of James Bowdoin, an eminent merchant. His grandfather, Peter Bowdoin, or Pierre Baudouin, was a physician of Rochelle, in France. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, he fled with a multitude of Protestants, and went first to Ireland, and came to Falmouth, now Portland, in Casco Bay, Maine, as early as April, 1687. He owned several tracts of land, one tract of twenty-three acres extending across the Neck, where South street now is. In about three years he removed to Boston. The day after his departure the Indians attacked, May 15, 1690, and in a few days destroyed Casco. The time of his death is not ascertained; his will is dated in 1704, but was not proved till 1719. He had two sons and two daughters. His eldest son, James, the father of Gov. B., by his industry, enterprise and economy having acquired a great estate and laid the foundation of the eminence of his family, died Sept. 4, 1747, aged 71; he also left two sons, James and William, the latter by his second wife.

Mr. Bowdoin was graduated at Harvard college in 1745. During his residence at the university he was distinguished by his genius and unwearied application to his studies, while his modesty, politeness, and benevolence gave his friends assurance that his talents would not be prostituted, nor his future eminence employed for the promotion of unworthy ends. When he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, he came in possession of an ample fortune, left him by his father, who died Sept. 4, 1747. He was now in a situation the most threatening to his literary and moral improvement, for one great motive, which impels men to exertion, could have no influence upon him, and his great wealth put it completely in his power to gratify the giddy desires of youth. But his life had hitherto been regular, and he now with the maturity of wisdom adopted a system which was most rational, pleasing, and useful. He determined to combine with the enjoyments of domestic and social life a course of study which should enlarge and perfect the powers of his mind. At the age of twenty-two years he married a daughter of John Erving, and commenced a system of literary and scientific research, to which he adhered through life.

In the year 1753 the citizens of Boston elected him one of their representatives in the general court, where his learning and eloquence soon rendered him conspicuous. He continued in this station until 1756, when he was chosen into the council, in which body he was long known and respected. With uniform ability and patriotism he advocated the cause of his country. In the disputes which laid the foundation of the American revolution, his writings and exertions were eminently useful. Governors Bernard and Hutchinson were constrained to confess, in their confidential letters to the British ministry, the weight of his opposition to their measures. In 1769 Bernard negatived him, when he was chosen a member of the council, in consequence of which the inhabitants of Boston again elected him their representative in 1770. Hutchinson, who in this year succeeded to the governor's chair, permitted him to take a seat at the council board, because, said he, "his opposition to our measures will be less injurious in the council, than in the house of representatives." He was chosen a delegate to the first congress, but the illness of Mrs. Bowdoin prevented him from attending with the other delegates. In the year 1775, a year most critical and important to America, he was chosen president of the council of Massachusetts, and he continued in that office the greater part of the time till the adoption of the State constitution in 1780. He was president of the convention which formed it; and some of its important articles are the result of his knowledge of government.

In the year 1785, after the resignation of Hancock, he was chosen governor of Massachusetts, and was re-elected the following year. In this office his wisdom, firmness, and inflexible integrity were conspicuous. He was placed at the head of the government at the most unfortunate period after the revolution. The sudden influx of foreign luxuries had exhausted the country of its specie, while the heavy taxes of the war yet burthened the people. This state of suffering awakened discontent, and the spirit of disorder was cherished by unlicensed conventions, which were arrayed against the legislature. One great subject of complaint was the administration of justice. Against lawyers and courts the strongest resentments were manifested. In many instances the judges were restrained by mobs from proceeding in the execution of their duty. As the insurgents became more audacious from the lenient measures of the government and were organizing themselves for the subversion of the constitution, it became necessary to suppress by force the spirit of insurrection. Gov. Bowdoin accordingly ordered into service upwards of four thousand of the militia, who were placed under the command of the veteran Lincoln. As the public treasury did not afford the means of putting the troops in motion, some of the citizens of Boston with the governor at the head of the list subscribed in a few hours a sufficient sum to carry on the proposed expedition. This decisive step rescued the government from the contempt into which it was sinking, and was the means of saving the commonwealth. The dangerous insurrection of Shays was thus completely quelled.

In the year 1787 Gov. Bowdoin was succeeded by Hancock, in consequence of the exertions of the discontented, who might hope for greater clemency from another chief magistrate. He died in Boston, after a distressing sickness of three months. His wife, Elizabeth Erving, died in May, 1803, aged 72. He left two children, James, and a daughter who married Sir John Temple, consul-general of Great Britain in the United States, and died Oct. 26, 1809.

Gov. Bowdoin was a learned man, and a constant and generous friend of literature. He subscribed liberally for the restoration of the library of Harvard college in the year 1764, when it was consumed by fire. He was chosen a fellow of the corporation in the year 1779; but the pressure of more important duties induced him to resign this office in 1784. He ever felt, however, an affectionate regard for the interests of the college, and bequeathed to it four hundred pounds, the interest of which was to be applied to the distribution of premiums among the students for the encouragement of useful and polite literature. The American academy of arts and sciences, incorporated at Boston May 4, 1780, at a time when our country was in the deepest distress, was formed under his influence, and was an object of his constant attention. He was chosen its first president, and he continued in that office till his death. He was regarded by its members as the pride and ornament of their institution. To this body he bequeathed one hundred pounds and his valuable library, consisting of upwards of twelve hundred volumes upon every branch of science. He was also one of the founders and the president of the Massachusetts bank, and of the humane society of Massachusetts. The literary character of Gov. Bowdoin gained him those honors, which are usually conferred on men distinguished for their literary attainments. He was constituted doctor of laws by the university of Edinburgh, and was elected a member of the royal societies of London and Dublin.

He was deeply convinced of the truth and excellence of Christianity, and it had a constant effect upon his life. He was for more than thirty years an exemplary member of the church in Brattle street, to the poor of which congregation he bequeathed a hundred pounds. His charities were abundant. He respected the injunctions of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which he professed. He knew the pleasures and advantages of family devotion, and he conscientiously observed the Christian sabbath, presenting himself habitually in the holy temple, that he might be instructed in religious duty, and might unite with the worshippers of God. In his dying addresses to his family and servants he recommended the Christian religion to them as of transcendent importance, and assured them, that it was the only foundation of peace and happiness in life and death. As the hour of his departure approached, he expressed his satisfaction in the thought of going to the full enjoyment of God and his Redeemer.

Gov. Bowdoin was the author of a poetic "Paraphrase of the Economy of Human Life," dated March 28, 1759. He also published a philosophical discourse, publicly addressed to the American academy of arts and sciences in Boston Nov. 8, 1780, when he was inducted into the office of president. This is prefixed to the first volume of the society's memoirs. In this work he published several other productions, which manifest no common taste and talents in astronomical inquiries. The following are the titles of them: Observations upon an hypothesis for solving the phenomena of light, with incidental observations tending to show the heterogeneity of light, and of the electric fluid, by their union with each other; Observations on light and the waste of matter in the sun and fixed stars occasioned by the constant efflux of light from them; Observations tending to prove by phenomena and scripture the existence of an orb, which surrounds the whole material system, and which may be necessary to preserve it from the ruin, to which, without such a counterbalance, it seems liable by that universal principle in matter, gravitation. He supposes, that the blue expanse of the sky is a real concave body encompassing all visible nature; that the milky way and the lucid spots in the heavens are gaps in this orb, through which the light of exterior orbs reaches us; and that thus an intimation may be given of orbs on orbs and systems on systems innumerable and inconceivably grand. — *Thacher's Fun. BOWDOIN, JAMES, the son of the preceding, died Oct. 11, 1811, aged 58. He was born Sept. 22, 1752. After he graduated at Harvard college in 1771, he proceeded to England, where he prosecuted the study of the law nearly a year at the university of Oxford. After revisiting his native country he sailed again for Europe, and travelled in Italy, Holland, and England. On hearing of the battle of Lexington he returned home. The anxieties of his father prevented him from engaging in military service, to which he was inclined. Before the close of the war he married the daughter of Mr. William Bowdoin, the half brother of his father. Devoting much of his time to literary pursuits at his residence in Dorchester, he yet sustained successively the public offices of representative, senator, and councillor.

Soon after the incorporation of the college, which bears the name of Bowdoin, he made to it a donation of one thousand acres of land and more than eleven hundred pounds. About this time he was chosen a fellow, or elected into the corporation of Harvard college, and retained the office seven years. Having received a commission from Mr. Jefferson, the President of the United States, as minister plenipotentiary to the court of Madrid, he sailed May 10, 1805, and was abroad until April 18, 1808. The objects of his mission, which related to the settlement of the limits of Louisiana, the purchase of Florida, and the procuring of compensation for repeated spoliation of American commerce, were not accomplished. During his absence he spent two years in Paris, where he purchased many books, a collection of well arranged minerals, and fine models of crystallography, which he afterwards presented to Bowdoin college. After his return much of his time was spent upon his family estate, the valuable island of Nausaun, near Martha's Vineyard. At this time his translation of Daubenton's "Advice to Shepherds" was published for the benefit of the owners of sheep. He had previously published, anonymously, "Opinions respecting the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain." In July, 1811, he executed a deed to Bowdoin college of six thousand acres in the town of Lisbon. By his last will he bequeathed to the college several articles of philosophical apparatus, a costly collection of seventy fine paintings, and the reversion of Nausaun island on the failure of issue male of the devisees. The college claims are now settled.

After a long period of infirmity and of painful attacks of disease he died without children. His widow married Gen. Henry Dearborn. At her decease she left a sum of money and a number of valuable family portraits to the college. The name of James Bowdoin was borne by one of the heirs of his estate,—the son of his niece who married Thomas L. Winthrop, the lieutenant governor of Massachusetts. — Jenks' Eulogy.

college in 1814. He was the son of Lieut. Gov. Winthrop. He took the name of his grandfather Bowdoin and received a competent fortune. Relinquishing the practice of the law, he devoted himself to literature, especially to history. The chronological index of the ten vols. of second series of the Historical Society was made out by him, and he performed other useful labors for the society. A brief memoir is in Hist. Coll. 3d series, vol. IX.

BOWEN, JABEZ, LL. D., lieut. governor of Rhode Island, was born in Providence, graduated at Yale college in 1757, and died May 7, 1815, aged 75 years. For thirty years he was the chancellor of the college at Providence as the successor of Gov. Hopkins. During the Revolutionary war he was devoted to the cause of his country, and was a member of the board of war, judge of the supreme court, and lieut. governor. Of the national convention at Annapolis and of the State convention to consider the constitution he was a member. During the administration of Washington he was commissioner of loans for Rhode Island. Of the Bible society of R. I. he was the president. In the maturity of his years he became a member of the first Congregational church. His great capacity for public business, joined to his unquestioned integrity, gave him an elevated character and great influence in society. A gentleman of the same name was a judge of the superior court in Georgia; having in an elegant charge, delivered at Savannah, made some imprudent remarks concerning the colored population, the grand jury presented his charge, in consequence of which he sent them all to prison. He was removed from office, and, it is said, died insane at Philadelphia.

BOWEN, PARDON, M. D., a distinguished physician, died Oct. 25, 1826, aged 69. He was born in Providence March 22, 1757. Richard Bowen is said to have been his ancestor; perhaps it was Griffith Bowen, who lived in Boston in 1639. His father was Dr. Ephraim Bowen, an eminent physician of Providence, who died Oct. 21, 1812, aged 96 years. After graduating at the college of Rhode Island in 1775, he studied with his brother, Dr. William Bowen, and embarked as surgeon in a privateer in 1779. Though captured and imprisoned seven months at Halifax, he was not deterred from engaging repeatedly in similar enterprises, resulting in new imprisonments. In 1782 he reached home and was content to remain on shore. In 1783 he repaired to Philadelphia for his improvement in his profession at the medical school. After his return it was but gradually that he obtained practice. At length his success was ample; his eminence in medicine and surgery were undisputed. During the prevalence of the yellow fever he shrank not from the peril; more than once was he attacked by that disease. For much of his success he was indebted to his study of idiosyncrasy, or of the peculiarities, moral, intellectual and physical, of his patients. In 1820 he experienced an attack of the palsy, which terminated his professional labors, in consequence of which he retired to the residence of his son-in-law, Franklin Greene, at Potowomut (Warwick), where he passed years of suffering, sometimes amounting to agony. In the life-giving energy of the doctrines, precepts, and promises of the Bible he found the only adequate support and solace. His wife, who survived him, was the daughter of Henry Ward, secretary of Rhode Island. Dr. Bowen sustained an excellent character; he was modest, upright, affable; free from covetousness and ambition; beneficent; and in his last days an example of Christian holiness. He published an elaborate account of the yellow fever of Providence in 1805 in Hosack's medical register, vol. IV. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

BOWEN, WILLIAM C., M. D., professor of chemistry in Brown university, received this appointment in 1812, and died April 23, 1815, aged 29. He was the only son of Dr. William Bowen, who was an eminent practitioner at the age of 80 years, and was born June 2, 1785. After graduating at Union college in 1793, he studied medicine with Dr. Pardon Bowen; also at Edinburgh and Paris, and at London as the private pupil of Sir Astley Cooper. He did not return till Aug. 1811. Experiments to discover the composition of the bleaching liquor, just brought into use in England, laid the foundation of the disease which terminated his life. He married a daughter of Col. Olney. Though his labors on chlorine impaired his property and destroyed his life, they led to the creation of the valuable bleaching establishments of Rhode Island. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

BOWEN, NATHANIEL, D. D., bishop of South Carolina, died Aug. 25., 1839, aged 59.

BOWEN, CHARLES, died Dec. 19, 1845, aged 38, drowned with his wife and oldest child by the sinking of the steamer Belle Zane in the Mississippi, by striking a snag, five hundred miles above New Orleans. He lived in Zanesville, Ohio, but was a native of Charlestown, and in Boston published for several years the North American Review, Amer. Almanac, Token, and other works.

BOWIE, ROBERT, general, governor of Maryland, succeeded John F. Mercer as governor in 1803, and was succeeded by Robert Wright in 1805. He was again governor in 1811, but the next year was succeeded by Levin Winder. He died at Nottingham in Jan., 1818, aged 64. He was an officer of the Revolution, and presents one of the multitude of instances in America of the success of patriotism, integrity, and benevolence, unassisted by the advantages of wealth or of a learned education.

BOWLES, WILLIAM A., an Indian agent, died Dec. 23, 1805. He was born in Frederic county, the son of a schoolmaster in Maryland, who was an Englishman and brother of Carington B., keeper of the famous print-shop, Ludgate hill, London. At the age of thirteen Bowles privately left his parents and joined the British army at Philadelphia. Afterwards he entered the service of the Creek Indians and married an Indian woman. Ferocious like the savages, he instigated them to many of their excesses. The British rewarded him for his exertions. After the peace he went to England. On his return his influence with the Indians was so disastrous, that the Spaniards offered six thousand dollars for his apprehension. He was entrapped in Feb., 1792, and sent a prisoner to Madrid and thence to Manilla in 1795. Having leave to go to Europe, he repaired to the Creeks and commenced his depredations anew; but being again betrayed in 1804 into the hands of the Spaniards, he was confined in the Moro castle, Havana, where he died. Such is the miserable end of most of the unprincipled adventurers, of whom there is any account. A memoir of him was published in London, 1791, in which he is called ambassador from the united nations of Creeks and Cherokees. — Jennison.

BOYD, THOMAS, a soldier, who perished by the hands of the Indians, was a private soldier belonging to Capt. Matthew Smith's Pennsylvania rifle company, in Arnold's expedition through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec in 1775. He was the largest and strongest man in the company. He was taken prisoner in the assault, Dec. 31. After being exchanged he was a lieutenant in the first Pennsylvania regiment, and accompanied Gen. Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians in the Seneca country, New York, in Aug. and Sept., 1779. When the army had marched beyond Canandaigua, and was near the Genesee town on the Genesee river, Boyd was sent out in the evening of Sept. 12 to reconnoitre the town six miles distant. He took twenty-six men, with an Onondaga chief, named Han-Jost. The guides mistook the road, and led him to a castle six miles higher up the river than Genesee. Here a few Indians were discovered, of whom two were killed and scalped. On his return Boyd was intercepted by several hundred Indians and rangers under Butler. His flanking parties escaped; but he and fourteen men with the Onondaga chief were encircled. Resorting to a small grove of trees, surrounded with a cleared space, he fought desperately till all his men but one were killed and he himself was shot through the body. The next day his body and that of his companion, Michael Parker, were found at Genesee, barbarously mutilated. The Indians had cruelly whipped him; stabbed him with spears; pulled out his nails; plucked out an eye, and cut out his tongue. His head was cut off. Simpson, afterwards general, his companion at Quebec, decently buried him. His scalp, hooped and painted, found in one of the wigwams, was recognized by Simpson by its long, brown, silky hair. — Maine Hist. Coll. I. 416; American Remembrancer, 1780, 162.

BOYD, WILLIAM, minister of Lamington in New Jersey, died May 15, 1808. He was descended from Scottish ancestors, who emigrated to Pennsylvania. He was born in Franklin county, 1758. At the age of fifteen he lost his father, but about the same time it pleased the Father of mercies to turn him from darkness to light. His collegial education was completed at Princeton in 1778, under the presidency of Dr. Witherspoon. After pursuing the study of theology with Dr. Allison, of Baltimore, he commenced preaching the gospel. His popularity and talents would have procured him a conspicuous situation; but he was destitute of ambition. He preferred a retired situation, and accepted the call of Lamington. Here he continued till his death. A lively faith in the Redeemer gave him hope and triumph. He was a man of unfeigned humility, amiable in the various relations of life, and remarkable for prudence and moderation in all his deportment. He was a preacher of peculiar excellence. Deeply penetrated himself with a sense of the total depravity of the human heart, and of the inability of man to perform anything acceptable to God without the influence of the Holy Spirit, he endeavored to impress these truths on others. He dwelt upon the necessity of a Divine atonement, and of faith in the Redeemer, in order to justification; upon the riches of Divine grace and the encouragements of the gospel to the humble and contrite; upon the dangers of self-deception and the false refuges of the wicked. He was remarkable for a natural facility and perspicuity of expression. For a few years he wrote his sermons and committed them to memory; but for the remainder of his life he depended, after having digested his subject, upon the vigor of his powers. A penetrating eye, natural gestures, a sweet and commanding voice, and an irreproachable character, gave weight and authority to his words. But his labors, like those of many other good men, were attended with only a gradual increase of the church committed to his care.

He was formed no less for society than for the pulpit, having a friendly disposition, being animated in conversation, accommodating himself to the tempers of others, and mingling condescension with dignity. — Evang. Intellig. May, 1808.

BOYD, JOHN P., brigadier-general in the army of the United States, died at Boston Oct. 4, 1830, aged 62. He commanded the detachment of fifteen hundred men of Williamson's army, which fought the battle of Williamsburg, Upper Canada, with eighteen hundred of the enemy, the garrisons of Kingston and Prescott, Nov. 11, 1813. In this severe action brigadier-general Covington was killed; the American loss was three hundred thirty-nine; the British one hundred eighty-one. This British force being in the rear, and the co-operation of Hampton having failed, the proposed descent to Montreal was abandoned, and the American army recrossed the St. Lawrence and went into winter quarters at French Mills. Gen. Boyd was a good officer; his early military career was in India. But this service was of a peculiar kind. He organized three battalions, each of about five hundred men, and had also a small irregular force. He had six cannon, three or four elephants, and as many English officers. He hired his men and his officers at a certain number of rupees a month. This corps, as regarded arms and equipments, was his sole property; and in the command of it he entered the service of any of the Indian princes who would give him the best pay. Once he was in the pay of Holkar; afterwards in the Peshwa service; then, quitting the Mahratta territory, he was hired for the service of Nizam Ally Khan. Then he marched to Poona, and, having no eligible offer of employment, he sold out his elephants, guns, arms, and equipments, to Col. Felose, a Neapolitan partisan, who acquired the implements, elephantine and human, for carrying on the same trade of hired ruffianship. In 1808 he was in Paris. After the war he received the appointment of naval officer for the port of Boston. He published documents and facts relative to military events during the late war, 1816. — Boston Weekly Messenger, VIII. 774.

BOYD, WILLIAM, died in 1800, a graduate of Harvard in 1796. He wrote a poem on Woman, and other pieces.

BOYLE, JOHN, chief justice of Kentucky, died Jan. 28, 1834. He had been a judge of the circuit court of the United States, and was able and distinguished.

BOYLSTON, ZABDIEL, F. R. S., an eminent physician, who first introduced the inoculation of the small pox in America, died at Boston March 1, 1766, aged 86. He was born of respectable parents at Brookline, Mass., in 1680. His father was Peter B., the son of Doctor Thomas B., who received his medical degree at Oxford, and came to this country and settled in Brookline in 1635. After a good private education, he studied physic under the care of Dr. John Cutler, an eminent physician and surgeon of Boston, and in a few years arrived at great distinction in his profession, and accumulated a handsome fortune. He was remarkable for his skill, his humanity, and his close attention to his patients. In the year 1721 the small pox prevailed in Boston, and being fatal, like the plague, it carried with it the utmost terror. This calamity had not visited the town since the year 1702, in which year, as well as in the year 1692, it had proved destructive to the lives of many, though it was much less mortal than when it appeared in the year 1678. On its re-appearance, Dr. Cotton Mather, who had read in a volume of the philosophical transactions, put into his hands by Dr. Douglass, two communications from the east, the one from Timoni at Constantinople, and the other from Pylarini, the Venetian consul at Smyrna, giving an account of the practice of inoculation for the small pox, conceived the idea of introducing this practice in Boston. He accordingly, June 6, addressed a letter to the physicians of Boston, inclosing an abridgment of those communications, and requesting them to meet and take the subject into consideration. As this request was treated with neglect, he wrote to Dr. Boylston separately, June 24, and sent him all the information which he had collected, in the hope that he would be persuaded to embrace a new and favorable means for the preservation of human life. Dr. Boylston happily was a man of benevolence and courage. When there was before him a promising opportunity for diminishing the evils of human life, he was not afraid to struggle with prejudice, nor unwilling to encounter abuse. The practice would be entirely new in America, and it was not known that it had been introduced into Europe. Yet he determined to venture upon it. He first inoculated, June 26th, his son Thomas, of the age of six years, and two of his servants. Encouraged by the success of this experiment, he began to enlarge his practice. The other physicians gave their unanimous opinion against inoculation, as it would infuse a malignity into the blood; and the selectmen of Boston forbade it in July. But these discouragements did not quench the zeal and benevolence, which were now excited; though prejudice might have triumphed over an enlightened practice, if the clergy had not stepped in to aid the project. Six venerable ministers of Boston gave their whole influence in its favor; and the weight of their character, the confidence which was reposed in their wisdom, and the deep reverence inspired by their piety, were hardly sufficient to preserve the growing light from extinction. They were abused, but they triumphed. July 17, Dr. Boylston inoculated his son John, who was older than Thomas, and Aug. 23, his son Zabdiel, aged 14. During the year 1721 and the beginning of 1722 he inoculated two hundred and forty-seven persons in Boston and the neighboring towns. Thirty-nine were inoculated by other physicians, making in the whole two hundred and eighty-six, of whom only six died. During the same period, of five thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine persons, who had the small pox in the natural way, eight hundred and forty-four died. The utility of the practice was now established beyond dispute, and its success encouraged its more general introduction in England, in which country it had been tried upon a few persons, most or all of whom were convicts. In the prosecution of his good work Dr. Boylston was obliged to meet not only the most virulent, but the most dangerous opposition. Dr. Lawrence Dalhonde, a French physician in Boston, gave his deposition concerning the pernicious effects of inoculation, which he had witnessed in Europe. The deposition, dated July 22, was published by the selectmen, the rulers of the town, in their zeal against the practice. Dr. Douglass, a Scotchman, violent in his prejudices, and bitter and outrageous in his conduct, bent his whole force to annihilate the practice, which had been introduced. One argument, which he brought against it, was that it was a crime, which came under the description of poisoning and spreading infection, which were made penal by the laws of England. In the pamphlets, which were published in 1721 and 1722, various kinds of reasoning are found. The following extracts will give some idea of the spirit of them. "To spread abroad a moral contagion, what is it but to cast abroad arrows and death? If a man should wilfully throw a bomb into a town, burn a house, or kill a man, ought he not to die? I do not see how we can be excused from great impiety herein, when ministers and people, with loud and strong cries, made supplications to almighty God to avert the judgment of the small pox, and at the same time some have been carrying about instruments of inoculation and bottles of the poisonous humor, to infect all who were willing to submit to it, whereby we might as naturally expect the infection to spread, as a man to break his bones by casting himself headlong from the highest pinnacle. Can any man infect a family in the town in the morning, and pray to God in the evening, that the distemper may not spread?" It was contended, that, as the small pox was a judgment from God for the sins of the people, to endeavor to avert the stroke would but provoke him the more; that inoculation was an encroachment upon the prerogatives of Jehovah, whose right it was to wound and to smite; and that, as there was an appointed time to man upon earth, it would be useless to attempt to stay the approach of death.

The people became so exasperated, that it was unsafe for Dr. Boylston to travel in the evening. They even paraded the streets with halters and threatened to hang him. But his cool and determined spirit, supported by his trust in God, enabled him to persevere. As he believed himself to be in the way of his duty, he did not tremble at the apprehension of the evils which might come upon him. When his family were alarmed for his safety, he expressed to them his resignation to the will of heaven. To such a height was the popular fury raised, that a lighted granado was thrown in the night into the chamber of Mr. Walter, minister of Roxbury, who had been privately inoculated in the house of his uncle, Dr. Mather of Boston. The shell, however, was not filled with powder, but with a mixture of brimstone and bituminous matter.

Had Dr. Boylston gone at this time to England, he might have accumulated a fortune by his skill in treating the small pox. He did not however visit that country till 1725, when inoculation was common. He was then received with the most flattering attention. He was chosen a member of the royal society, though he was not, as Dr. Thacher supposes, the first American thus honored, for Dr. Cotton Mather was elected in 1713. He enjoyed the friendship of some of the most distinguished characters of the nation. Of these he used to mention with great respect and affection Dr. Watts, with whom he corresponded. After his return to his native country he continued at the head of his profession, and engaged in a number of literary pursuits. His communications to the royal society were ingenious and useful. After a long period of eminence and skill in his profession, his age and infirmities induced him to retire to his patrimonial estate in Brookline, where he passed the remainder of his days. He had the pleasure of seeing inoculation universally practised, and of knowing, that he was himself considered as one of the benefactors of mankind. Occupied in his last days in agricultural pursuits, he bestowed much care on the improvement of the breed of horses. Those of his own farm were celebrated. It seems that he had a vigorous old age, notwithstanding the asthma, which afflicted him forty years, for he was seen at the age of 84, in the streets of Boston, riding a colt, which, as an excellent horseman, he was breaking to the bit. He died saying to his friends, "my work in this world is done, and my hopes of futurity are brightening." His wife, who died before him, was Jerusha Minot of Boston. His second son, John, a merchant, died at Bath, England, Jan. 17, 1795, aged 80, bequeathing much to his native town. The inscription upon his tomb represents, that through a life of extensive beneficence he was always faithful to his word, just in his dealings, affable in his manners, and that after a long sickness, in which he was exemplary for his patience and resignation to his Maker, he quitted this mortal life in a just expectation of a blessed immortality.

Dr. Boylston published some account of what is said of inoculating or transplanting the small pox by the learned Dr. Emanuel Timonius and Jacobus Pylarinus, 1721; an historical account of the small pox inoculated in New England, with some account of the nature of the infection, and some short directions to the inexperienced, dediated to the princess of Wales, London, 1726, and Boston, 1730; and several communications in the philosophical transactions. — Mass. Mag., Dec., 1789, 1776–1779; Pierce's Cen. Discourse; Holmes, II. 148; Boylston's Hist. Account; Hutchinson, II. 273–276; Thacher's Med. Biog.

BOYLSTON, NICHOLAS, a benefactor of Harvard college, died in Boston Aug. 18, 1771, aged 55. His portrait, which is an admirable painting, is in the philosophy chamber of the college. He had been an eminent merchant, and was about to retire from business to enjoy the fruit of his industry, when he was removed from the earth. He was honest in his dealings, and remarkable for his sincerity, having a peculiar abhorrence of all dissimulation. He bequeathed to the university at Cambridge 1500 pounds for laying the foundation of a professorship of rhetoric and oratory. This sum was paid into the college treasury by his executors Feb. 11, 1772; and the fund became accumulated to 23,200 dollars before any appropriation was made. John Quincy Adams, then a senator of the United States, was installed the first professor, June 12, 1806, with the title of "The Boylston professor of rhetoric and oratory in Harvard college." — Holmes, II. 179.

BOYLSTON, WARD NICHOLAS, a patron of medical science, was the son of the preceding, and died at his seat in Roxbury, Mass., Jan. 7, 1828, aged 78 years. In the year 1800 he gave to the medical school of Harvard college a valuable collection of medical and anatomical books and engravings, making also an arrangement for its perpetual enlargement. — Bartlett's Prog. Med. Science.

BORMAN, JOHN L., died near Oxford, Maryland, April 20, 1823, aged 64, a profound lawyer. He published a sketch of the history of Maryland during the three first years, 1811.

BRACE, JONATHAN, judge, died at Hartford Aug. 26, 1837, aged 83. He was a member of Congress in 1798, judge of county court and of probate, and a highly respected citizen.

BRACE, LUCY COLLINS, wife of Rev. Dr. J. Brace, died at Newington, Conn., Nov. 16, 1854, aged 72. It had been proposed to celebrate in a few weeks, the fiftieth year of her husband's settlement and of their marriage. For many years she met every Sunday a Bible class of her own age and a missionary society; she was an example of the various excellences exhibited in the lives of a multitude of pastor's wives in our country.

BRACKEN, JOHN, bishop in Virginia, died at Williamsburg July 15, 1818. He had been for many years not only a bishop, but president of William and Mary college.

about 1749, and graduated at Princeton in 1771, in the class with James Madison. He was the master of an academy in Maryland before the Revolution. In 1781 he settled at Pittsburg, which he deemed favorably situated for becoming a large town; and in its improvement he engaged with zeal. He wrote for the newspapers many essays in prose and poetry. His pieces were generally satirical; one of them ridiculed the society of the Cincinnati. In 1789 he was appointed judge. In 1798 political partisans reproached him for his partiality to Mr. Gallatin. A few years before his death he removed to Carlisle. His wife, whom he married in 1790, was Sabina Wolf, a young lady of German origin, whose parents lived on the banks of the Ohio river. He published a poem on the rising glory of America, 1774; eulogium of the brave men who fell in the contest with Great Britain, 1779; modern chivalry, the adventures of Capt. Farrago, etc., 1792; 2d edit. 2 vols., 1808; oration July 4, 1793; incidents of the insurrection in 1794 in Pennsylvania, 1795; gazette publications, collected, 1806; law of miscellanies, containing instructions for the study of the law, 1814.

BRACKETT, ANTHONY, captain, an early settler at Casco, or Falmouth, as Portland, Maine, was at first called, was killed by the Indians Sept. 21, 1689. He was the son of Anthony B., of Greenland, N. H., then a part of Portsmouth. He lived at Casco as early as 1662, and was one of the settlers around the back cove. His farm consisted of four hundred acres. The Indians, led by Simon, who escaped from prison at Dover, and was familiar at Brackett's, took him, his wife, and five children, and a negro servant prisoners Aug. 11, 1676. Michael Mitton, the brother of his wife, was killed. At Presumpscot also the party killed and captured several persons. Thomas Brackett, his brother, who lived at Clark's point, on the neck, was shot down and his wife and three children taken; Megunnaway, an Indian, "a notorious rogue," being concerned in his murder. In all thirty-four persons were killed and carried into captivity. The prisoners were conveyed to Arrousie Island, of which the Indians had recently gained possession, killing Capt. Lake and wounding Davis. Being left there in November while the Indians proceeded on an expedition, Brackett escaped in an old leaky birch canoe, which his wife had repaired with a needle and thread, found in a deserted house; and crossed over to Black point with his family, and got on board a vessel bound to Piscataqua. After the peace of Casco, April 12, 1678, he returned, and in 1682 was intrusted with the command of fort Loyall at Portland. In 1688 he was put in command of the three forts, erected by Andros. In 1679 he married for his second wife Susannah Drake of Hampton, covenanting with her father, that one half of his estate should be her jointure and descend to her male children. A dispute between the children of the two marriages respecting this property was adjusted by an amicable division. His sons were Anthony and Seth: the latter was killed at the capture of Saco, May 20, 1690, and the former taken prisoner. His posterity still remain at Casco. Thomas Brackett's wife, the sister of M. Mitton, died in captivity; his son Joshua afterwards lived in Greenland, where he died, being the father of Anthony and Joshua of Portland. — Willis' Hist. of Portland, in Maine Hist. Coll., i. 94, 200, 207, 143–156.

BRACKETT, JOSHUA, M. D., a distinguished physician, died July 17, 1802, aged 69. He was born in Greenland, New Hampshire, in May, 1733, and after graduating at Harvard college in 1752, studied theology at the request of his parents, and became a preacher; but the science of medicine had for him greater attractions. He studied with Dr. Clement Jackson, then the principal physician in Portsmouth, and established himself in that town, in which he continued during the remainder of his life. His wife, Hannah Whipple of Kittery, died in May, 1805, aged 70, bequeathing to the New Hampshire medical society, of which her husband had been president, 500 dollars. She was skilful in botany, having a garden of rare plants.

Dr. Brackett was a skilful, faithful, benevolent physician, particularly successful in obstetrical practice; mild, amiable, unassuming, affable; warm in friendship, an enemy to flattery, a despiser of popular applause. It is stated that he never made a charge for his professional services to the poor, with whom he thought the payment would occasion any embarrassment. In his religious sentiments he was a Universalist. He took a deep interest in the promotion of natural history at Cambridge, and requested his wife to appropriate 1500 dollars towards the professorship of that science in Harvard college. She complied with his request and added to the amount. Dr. Brackett was a zealous whig in the Revolution; during which he was appointed judge of the maritime court of New Hampshire, and honorably sustained the office, till its duties were transferred to the district court. He was a benefactor of the New Hampshire medical society, of which he was president from 1793 to 1799, presenting to it, at its establishment, one hundred and forty-three vols. of valuable medical books. — Adams' Ann. Portsmouth, 321; Thacher's Med. Biog.; Med. Repos. s. h., i. 211.

BRACKETT, JAMES, died at Rock Island, Ill., May 19, 1852, aged 70. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1805, he was a lawyer of Otsego. He was a literary man and published several addresses.

BRADBURY, THEOPHILUS, a judge of the superior court of Massachusetts, died Sept. 6, 1803, aged 63. He was a graduate at Harvard college in 1757. His early days were devoted with diligence and success to the profession of the law. He resigned the emoluments arising from his practice for the appointment of a judge, in which station he was intelligent and faithful in executing the laws. A sudden attack of disease at length rendered him incapable of discharging the duties of his office. — Columb. Centinel, Sept. 11, 1803.

BRADDOCK, EDWARD, major-general, and commander in chief of the British forces in America, died July 13, 1775. He arrived in Virginia with two regiments from Ireland in February, 1755. The plan of military operations having been settled in April, by a convention of the several governors at Alexandria, he undertook to conduct in person the expedition against Fort Du Quesne, now Pittsburg. Meeting with much delay from the necessity of opening roads, the general determined to advance with rapidity at the head of twelve hundred men, leaving the heavy baggage to the care of Colonel Dunbar, who was to follow by slow and easy marches. He reached the Monongahela July 8th. The succeeding day he expected to invest the fort. He accordingly made his dispositions in the morning. He was advised to advance the provincial companies in the front for the purpose of scouring the woods, and discovering any ambuscade, which might be formed for him. But he held both his enemy and the provincials in too much contempt to follow this salutary counsel. Three hundred British regulars composed his van, which was suddenly attacked, at the distance of about seven miles from the fort, by an invisible enemy, concealed by the high grass. The whole army was soon thrown into confusion. The brave general exerted his utmost powers to form his broken troops under a galling fire upon the very ground where they were first attacked; but his efforts were fruitless. With such an enemy, in such a situation, it was necessary either to advance or retreat. All his officers on horseback, excepting his aid, the late General Washington, were killed or wounded; and after losing three horses he received a mortal wound through his right arm into his lungs. The defeated army fled precipitately to the camp of Dunbar, near forty miles distant, where Braddock, who was brought off the ground in a tumbril, expired of his wounds. Sixty-four out of eighty-five officers, and about half his privates were killed and wounded, making in the whole a loss of about seven hundred men. Of the killed were William Shirley of the staff, and Col. Sir Peter Halket; and among the wounded, Robert Orme, Roger Morris, Sir John St. Clair and others of the staff; and Lieut.-Cols. Gage and Burton. Though Mante defends the conduct of Braddock, yet this disaster obviously resulted from the contempt of good advice.—Marshall, I. 384, 390–393; II. 14–19; Holmes, II. 60; Coll. Hist. Soc. VII. 89–94; s. s. VIII. 153; Wynne, II. 37–42; Mante, 17, 21, 26.

BRADFORD, WILLIAM, governor of Plymouth, died May 9, 1657, aged 67. The names of Bradford and Brewster, who were driven from England into exile by ecclesiastical bigotry and intolerance, are names among the most honorable and memorable in the history of the world. He was governor in 1621, and in all thirty-one years. He was a first settler, one of the hundred Pilgrims in the Mayflower in 1620. He was born in March, 1590, in Austerfield, a little village in the southern border of Yorkshire, in England. His grandfather, William B., and John Hanson lived in Austerfield in 1575, and were the only persons of property in the townlet. Alice, the daughter of Mr. Hanson and Mary Gresham, was his mother. His father, William, died in 1591; his grandfather, William, in 1596. He had a good patrimony. He was left to the care of his uncle Robert. Scrooby, in Nottinghamshire, the residence of Brewster, was only four or five miles distant from Austerfield, to the south. At Brewster's house, the manor, was formed a new church in 1606 or 1607, most of the members of which had probably belonged to the church of Mr. Clifton at Babworth, only a mile or two south of Scrooby: Clifton was the minister, Brewster the elder. Mr. Bradford was one of the founders of this church. At the age of 12 or 13 years his mind was seriously impressed by divine truth in reading the Scriptures, and an illness of long continuance conspired to preserve him from the follies of youth. His good impressions were confirmed by attending upon the ministry of Mr. Richard Clifton, and by his union with the Puritan company, which met at Mr. Brewster's in Scrooby. As he advanced in years he was stigmatized as a Separatist; but such was his firmness, that he cheerfully bore the frowns of his relatives and the scoffs of his neighbors, and connected himself with the church over which Mr. Clifton and Mr. Robinson presided, fearless of the persecution, which he foresaw this act would draw upon him. Believing that many practices of the established church of England were repugnant to the directions of the word of God, he was fully resolved to prefer the purity of Christian worship to any temporal advantages, which might arise from bending his conscience to the opinions of others.

In the autumn of 1607, when he was seventeen years of age, he was one of the company of Dissenters who made an attempt to go over to Holland, where a commercial spirit had established a free toleration of religious opinions; but the master of the vessel betrayed them, and they were thrown into prison at Boston in Lincolnshire. In the spring of the next year he made another unsuccessful attempt. At length he effected his favorite object and joined his brethren at Amsterdam. Here he put himself an apprentice to a French Protestant, who taught him the art of silk-dying. When he reached the age of twenty-one years, and came in possession of his estate in England, he converted it into money, and engaged in commerce, in which he was not successful.

Mr. Bradford, after a residence of about ten years in Holland, engaged with zeal in the plan of removal to America, which was formed by the English church at Leyden under the care of Mr. Robinson. He accordingly embarked for England, July 22, 1620, and on the sixth of September set sail from Plymouth with the first company. While the ship in November lay in the harbor of Cape Cod, he was one of the foremost in the several hazardous attempts to find a proper place for the seat of the colony. Before a suitable spot was agreed upon, his wife fell into the sea and was drowned. Soon after the death of Governor Carver at Plymouth, April 5, 1621, Mr. Bradford was elected governor in his place. He was at this time in the thirty-third year of his age, and was most conspicuous for wisdom, fortitude, piety, and benevolence. The people appointed Isaac Allerton his assistant, not because they could repose less confidence in him than in Carver, who had been alone in the command, but chiefly on account of his precarious health. One of the first acts of his administration was to send an embassy to Massasoit, for the purpose of confirming the league with the Indian sachem, of procuring seed corn for the next season, and of exploring the country. It was well for the colony that the friendship of Massasoit was thus secured, for his influence was extensive. In consequence of his regard for the new settlers, nine sachems in September went to Plymouth, and acknowledged themselves loyal subjects of King James. In the same month a party was sent out to explore the Bay of Massachusetts. They landed under a cliff, supposed to be Copp's Hill, in Boston, where they were received with kindness by Obbatinewa, who gave them a promise of his assistance against the squaw sachem. On their return they carried with them so good a report of the country, that the people lamented that they had established themselves at Plymouth; but it was not now in their power to remove.

In the beginning of 1622 the colony began to experience a distressing famine, occasioned by the arrival of new settlers, who came unfurnished with provisions. In the height of their distress a threatening message was received from Canonicus, sachem of Narragansett, expressed by the present of a bundle of arrows, bound with the skin of a serpent. The governor sent back the skin filled with powder and ball. This prompt and ingenious reply terminated the correspondence. The Narragansetts were so terrified, that they even returned the serpent's skin without inspecting its contents. It was however judged necessary to fortify the town; and this work was performed by the people while they were suffering the extremity of famine. For some time they subsisted entirely upon fish. In this exigency Governor Bradford found the advantage of his friendly intercourse with the Indians. He made several excursions among them, and procured corn and beans, making a fair purchase by means of goods which were brought by two ships in August, and received by the planters in exchange for beaver. The whole quantity of corn and beans thus purchased amounted to twenty-eight hogsheads. But still more important benefits soon resulted from the disposition of Governor Bradford to preserve the friendship of the natives. During the illness of Massasoit in the spring of 1623, Mr. Winslow was sent to him with cordials, which contributed to his recovery. In return for this benevolent attention the grateful sachem disclosed a dangerous conspiracy, then in agitation among the Indians, for the purpose of totally extirpating the English. This plot did not originate in savage malignity, but was occasioned by the injustice and indiscretion of some settlers in the Bay of Massachusetts. As the most effectual means of suppressing the conspiracy, Massasoit advised that the chief conspirators, whom he named, should be seized and put to death. This melancholy work was accordingly performed by Captain Standish, and the colony was relieved from apprehension. When the report of this transaction was carried to Holland, Mr. Robinson, in his next letter to the governor, expressed his deep concern at the event. "O that you had converted some," said he, "before you had killed any!"

The scarcity, which had been experienced by the planters, was in part owing to the impolicy of laboring in common and putting the fruit of their labor into the public store. To stimulate industry by the prospect of individual acquisition, and thus to promote the general good by removing the restraints upon selfishness, it was agreed, in the spring of 1623, that every family should plant for themselves, on such ground as should be assigned them by lot. After this agreement the governor was not again obliged to traffic with the Indians in order to procure the means of subsistence for the colony. Thus have failed the common-stock projects of various enthusiasts.

The original government of Plymouth was founded entirely upon mutual compact, entered into by the planters before they landed, and was intended to continue no longer than till they could obtain legal authority from their sovereign. The first patent was obtained for the colony in the name of John Pierce; but another patent of larger extent was obtained of the council for New England, January 13, 1630, in the name of William Bradford, his heirs, associates, and assigns, which confirmed the title of the colonists to a large tract of land, and gave them power to make all laws, not repugnant to the laws of England. In the year 1640, when the number of people was increased, and new townships were erected, the general court requested Governor Bradford to surrender the patent into their hands. With this request he cheerfully complied, reserving for himself no more than his proportion, as settled by a previous agreement. After this surrender the patent was immediately delivered again into his custody. For several of the first years after the first settlement of Plymouth, the legislative, executive, and judicial business was performed by the whole body of freemen in assembly. In 1634 the governor's assistants, the number of whom, at the request of Mr. Bradford, had been increased to five in 1624, and to seven in 1633, were constituted a judicial court, and afterwards the supreme judicature. Petty offences were tried by the selectmen of each town, with liberty of appeal to the next court of assistants. The first assembly of representatives was held in 1639, when two deputies were sent from each town, excepting Plymouth, which sent four. In 1649 this inequality was done away.

Such was the reputation of Mr. Bradford, acquired by his piety, wisdom, and integrity, that he was annually chosen governor, as long as he lived, excepting in the years 1633, 1636, and 1644, when Mr. Winslow was appointed, and the years 1634 and 1638, when Mr. Prince was elected chief magistrate. At these times it was by his own request that the people did not re-elect him. Governor Winthrop mentions the election of Mr. Winslow in 1633, and adds, "Mr. Bradford having been governor about ten years, and now by importunity got off." What a lesson for the ambitious, who bend their whole influence to gain and secure the high offices of State! Mr. Bradford strongly recommended a rotation in the election of governor. "If this appointment," he pleaded, "was any honor or benefit, others beside himself should partake of it; if it was a burden, others beside himself should help to bear it." But the people were so much attached to him, that for thirty years they placed him at the head of the government, and in the five years when others were chosen, he was first in the list of assistants, which gave him the rank of deputy governor. After an infirm and declining state of health for a number of months, he was suddenly seized by an acute disease in May, 1657. In the night, his mind was so enraptured by contemplations upon religious truth and the hopes of futurity, that he said to his friends in the morning, "the good Spirit of God has given me a pledge of my happiness in another world, and the first fruits of eternal glory." The next day, May 9, 1657, he was removed from the present state of existence, greatly lamented by the people not only in Plymouth, but in the neighboring colonies. Hubbard makes the day of his death June 5; but the lines given by Morton are doubtless good, at least for the date:

"The ninth of May, about nine of the clock,
A precious one God out of Plymouth took;
Governor Bradford then expired his breath."

His sister, Alice, married to George Morton, who died in 1624, survived her brother.

The seal which Gov. B. used was a double eagle. His wife, Dorothy May, was drowned at Cape Cod, Dec. 7, 1620, so that she never reached Plymouth. His second wife was Alice Southworth, the widow of Edward Southworth, whom he married in 1623. His son, John, was born of his first wife; William, Mercy, and Joseph were his children by Alice Southworth. John died without children. William had fifteen children, and Joseph had seven; from these have descended the Bradfords of New England and many beyond its bounds.

In the N. E. Register of Jan. and July, 1850, is published a genealogy, containing the names of four hundred and fourteen of his descendants, besides many of their children, living chiefly in Massachusetts. Besides the bearers of the name of Bradford, there are families bearing other names, whose children are his descendants, some of which names are the following: Adams, Allen, Allyn, Baker, Barnes, Brewster, Chandler, Child, Chipman, Church, Collins, Cook, Delano, Drew, Dwight, Elliot, Ensign, Fessenden, Finney, Fitch, Fowler, Frazer, Freeman, Gay, Gilbert, Gridley, Hammond, Hobart, Holmes, Hopkins, Hunt, Lane, Lawrence, Le Baron, Lee, Loring, Metcalf, Mitchell, Paddock, Partridge, Prince, Ripley, Robbins, Rockwell, Sampson, Skinner, Smith, Soule, Spooner, Stanford, Steel, Stirling, Sylvester, Wadsworth, Waring, Weston, Whiting, Wiswall. The supposed honor of descent from such a man as Bradford will be only disgrace, unless there be caught from the record of his life something of his independence of thought, something of his unswerving adherence to the right, something of his self-sacrificing spirit, something of his zealous toils, his benevolence, and his piety.

Governor Bradford, though not favored with a learned education, possessed a strong mind, a sound judgment, and a good memory. In the office of chief magistrate he was prudent, temperate, and firm. He would suffer no person to trample on the laws or to disturb the peace of the colony. Some young men, who were unwilling to comply with the order for laboring on the public account, excused themselves on a Christmas day, under pretence that it was against their conscience to work. But not long afterwards, finding them at play in the street, he commanded the instruments of their game to be taken from them, and told them that it was against his conscience to suffer them to play, while others were at work, and that, if they had any religious regard to the day, they should show it in the exercise of devotion at home. This gentle reproof had the desired effect. On other occasions his conduct was equally moderate and determined. Suspecting John Lyford, who had imposed himself upon the colony as a minister, of factious designs, and observing that he had put a great number of letters on board a ship for England, the governor in a boat followed the ship to sea, and examined the letters. As satisfactory evidence against Lyford was thus obtained, a convenient time was afterwards taken for bringing him to trial, and he was banished.

Though he never enjoyed great literary advantages, Governor Bradford was much inclined to literary pursuits. He was familiar with the French and Dutch languages, and attained considerable knowledge of the Latin and Greek; but he more assiduously studied the Hebrew, because, as he said, "he would see with his own eyes the ancient oracles of God in their native beauty." He had read much of history and philosophy; but theology was his favorite study. Dr. Mather represents him as an irrefragable disputant, especially against the Anabaptists. Yet he was by no means severe or intolerant. He wished rather to convince the erroneous, than to suppress their opinions by violence. His disposition was gentle and condescending. Though he was attached to the discipline of the Congregational churches, yet he was not a rigid Separatist. He perceived that the reformed churches differed among themselves in the modes of discipline, and he did not look for a perfect uniformity. His life was exemplary and useful. He was watchful against sin, a man of prayer, and conspicuous for holiness. His son, William Bradford, was deputy governor of the colony after his father's death, and died at Plymouth at the age of seventy-nine. Several of his descendants were members of the council of Massachusetts, and one of them was a deputy governor of Rhode Island and a senator in the congress of the United States.

Governor Bradford wrote a history of Plymouth people and colony, beginning with the first formation of the church in 1602 and ending with 1647. It was contained in a folio volume of two hundred seventy pages. Morton's memorial is an abridgment of it. Prince and Hutchinson had the use of it, and the manuscript was deposited with Mr. Prince's valuable collection of papers in the library of the old south church in Boston. In the year 1775 it shared the fate of many other manuscripts in that place. It was carried away by the barbarians of the British army, who converted the old south church into a riding school. This invaluable work, after having been lost eighty years, has just been recovered and printed entire. For this recovery the American public is indebted to Rev. John S. Barry, who, in writing his History of Massachusetts, had occasion, in 1855, to consult an English book, in which he noticed a reference to a manuscript history of Plymouth in the Fulham library, with quotations, which satisfied him that it was Bradford's lost MS. This was found to be the case by Mr. Charles Deane, through the agency of Rev. Joseph Hunter of London. An exact copy was obtained, retaining the ancient spelling, and was printed by the Mass. Historical Society in 1856, with a preface and notes by Mr. Deane, chairman of the publishing committee of the society.

This manuscript was used in their historical writings by Morton, Prince, and Hutchinson. A portion of the work, taken from the church records of Plymouth, but not recorded as Bradford's writing, was published by Dr. Young in his chronicles of the pilgrims in 1841, most of which had been previously printed by Hazard as a work of Morton. Of the way, by which the manuscript reached the Fulham library, no information has been obtained. In this primitive book Mr. Deane has inserted a page of a fac simile of the handwriting of Bradford; and he has annexed Gov. B.'s list of the passengers in the Mayflower, from which he concludes that the number of passengers was one hundred and two, instead of one hundred, the usually-reckoned number. But in this perhaps he falls into an error, for two, whom he counts, were hired seamen for one year, when they returned, and could not be considered among "the first beginners," who laid the foundation of all the colonies, any more than any other seamen. Mr. D. also mistakes in making Gov. B. sixty-eight years old.

Gov. B. had a large book of copies of letters relative to the affairs of the colony, which is lost. A fragment of it, however, found in a grocer's shop at Halifax, was published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, to which is subjoined a descriptive and historical account of New England in verse. If this production is somewhat deficient in the beauties of poetry, it has the more substantial graces of piety and truth. He published some pieces for the confutation of the errors of the times, particularly of the Anabaptists.—Belknap's Amer. Biog. II. 217-251; Mather's Magnalia, II. 2-5; Davis' Morton, 269; Neal's New England, I. 99, 316; Prince's Annals, Pref. VI, IX. 196; *Coll. Hist. BRADFORD, ALICE, the wife of Gov. B., died at Plymouth March 27, 1670, aged 80, having survived her husband nearly thirteen years. Born in England, she first married Edward Southworth, living with him seven years in Nottinghamshire, near the residence of Mr. Bradford, who well knew her, and, as report says, had early sought her hand. Her name was Alice Carpenter. Being left a widow, Gov. Bradford renewed his offer to her two years after the death of his first wife, Dorothy May. She was now of the age of thirty-three. Waiving her right to demand a personal visit, which would call away the governor from his important duties to the colony in the wilderness, she generously listened to his request, and came over in the ship Ann, which arrived Aug. 1, 1623. She was accompanied by the governor's brother-in-law, George Morton, by her sister, Bridget Fuller, and by two daughters of Elder Brewster. Her two sons, Thomas and Constant Southworth, were brought over in 1629 or 1630. She was married Aug. 14, and lived with her husband nearly thirty years. She brought with her considerable property. She was well educated, and of extraordinary capacity and great worth. She incessantly toiled for the literary improvement and the refinement of the youth at Plymouth. If she ever felt honored in being married to Mr. Southworth, who was descended in the tenth generation from Sir Gilbert S., knight of Lancaster, yet she must have felt more happy in being the companion of him who laid the foundation of civil and religious freedom in a new world, and whose name would be held illustrious by the generations to come of their descendants and others, down to the end of time. Her sister, Mary Carpenter, an old maid, a member of the church of Duxbury, died at Plymouth March 20, 1667, aged ninety. Other sisters were Bridget, who married Samuel Fuller, and gave to the church the lot of ground on which the parsonage stood; Priscilla, the wife of William Wright; and the wives of John Cooper and Rev. Mr. Reyner. At the end of Bradford's History are published two pages of memorial lines by N. Morton, "Upon the life and death of that godly matron, Mistris Alice Bradford," from which it appears that she and her father belonged to the Puritan Separatists of the north of England, who fled to Holland when she was seventeen years old. He is called a confessor; and it is added:

"And shee with him and other in her youth Left their own native country for the truth,
And in successe of time shee married was
To one whose grace and vertue did surpass,
I mean good Edward Southworth, whose not long

After mentioning the death of her last husband, the writer says:

"E'r since that time in widowhood shee hath Lived a life in holynes and faith
In reading of Gods word and contemplation,
Which heald her to assurance of salvation
Through Gods good sperit workeing with the same, Forever praised be his holy name."

"Tis sad to see our houses disposess'd
Of holy saints whose memory is bless'd;
When they decease and closed are in tombe,
Theres few or none that rises in their rome,
Thats like to them in holines and grace."

The same writer says of her husband :

"It is enough to name
The name of Bradford fresh in memory,
Which smeles with odoriforus fragraneyce."

— Thacher's Plym. 116; Bradford's Hist. 460.

BRADFORD, JOHN, the eldest son of the preceding by his first wife, was born in England, and came over with Alice Southworth in 1623. He lived in Duxbury in 1645, and in 1652 was deputy to the general court. He married Martha Bourne, of Marshfield. In 1653 he removed to Norwich, Conn., where he died without offspring in 1678, aged about 61. His widow married Thomas Tracy.

BRADFORD, WILLIAM, major, son of the preceding, deputy governor of Plymouth colony, was born June 17, 1624, and died Feb. 20, 1704, aged 79. He was buried at his request by the side of his father. These homely lines are on his monument :

"He lived long but still was doing good,
And in his country's service lost much blood.
After a life well spent he's now at rest;
His very name and memory is blest."

In King Philip's war he commanded the Plymouth troops, and in the Narragansett fort fight, Dec. 19, 1675, at East Kingston, when the fort was taken, he received a ball in his body, which he bore during the remainder of his life. In his last will he provided for fifteen children, nine sons and six daughters; and their very numerous descendants in New England can of course all trace their ancestry to Gov. Bradford. His descendants are of the oldest line of the Bradfords, for his elder brother John had no children. His residence was on the north side of Jones' river, in what is now Kingston. His first wife was Alice, daughter of Thomas Richards, of Weymouth; his second was widow Wiswall; his third was Mary, the widow of Rev. J. Holmes, of Duxbury.

BRADFORD, JOSEPH, the third son of Governor Bradford, was born in 1630, and died in 1715, aged 84. His wife was Jael, the daughter of Rev. Peter Hobart, of Hingham. His sons were John, Samuel, and William; his daughters Alice or Olive, Abigail, Mercy, and Priscilla, whose husbands were as follows: Alice or Olive married Edward Mitchell and Joshua Hersey; Abigail married Gideon Sampson; Mercy married Jonathau Freeman and Isaac Cushman; and Priscilla married Seth Chipman. Farmer says he left a son Elisha.

BRADFORD, GAMALIEL, colonel, died at Duxbury, Jan. 9, 1807, aged 75. He was an officer in the French wars and in the army of the Revolution, and a judge. His father, Gamaliel, died in 1778, aged 73, the son of Samuel, the son of Major William. His daughter, Sophia, died Feb. 2, 1855, aged 93. Alden B. was his son; and Dr. Gamaliel B., of Boston, his grandson.

BRADFORD, WILLIAM, a senator of the United States, the son of Samuel B., and a descendant in the fourth generation from Gov. Bradford, died July 6, 1808, aged 78. He was born at Plympton, Mass., in Nov., 1729. Having studied physic with Dr. E. Hersey, he commenced the practice in Warren, R. I., and was skilful and successful. In a few years he removed to Bristol, and built a house on that romantic and venerable spot, Mount Hope, which is associated with the name of King Philip. Here he studied law and became eminent in civil life in Rhode Island. In the Revolutionary contest he took a decided part in favor of the rights of the colonies. In the cannonade of Bristol, in the evening of Oct. 7, 1775, by the British vessels of war, the Rose, Glasgow, and Siren, he went on board the Rose, and negotiated for the inhabitants. About this time his own house was destroyed by the enemy. In 1792 he was elected a senator in congress, but soon resigned his place for the shades of his delightful retreat. He was many years speaker of the assembly of Rhode Island, and deputy governor. He had lived a widower thirty-three years; his wife, Mary Le Baron, of Plymouth, whom he married in 1751, died Oct. 2, 1775. His eldest son, Major William Bradford, was aid to Gen. Charles Lee, of the Revolutionary army. By industry and rigid economy, Mr. Bradford acquired an independent fortune, in the use of which he was hospitable and liberal. For many years he was accustomed to deposit with his minister a generous sum, to be expended in charity to the poor. In his habits he was temperate, seeking his bed at an early hour of the evening, and rising early and walking over his extensive farm. Thus he attained nearly to the age of fourscore. — Thacher's Med. Biog.; Griswold's Fun. Serm.

BRADFORD, WILLIAM, the first printer in Pennsylvania, died May 23, 1752, aged 93. He was born in Leicester, England, and, being a Quaker, emigrated to this country in 1682 or 1683, and landed where Philadelphia was afterwards laid out, before a house was built. In 1687 he printed an almanac. The writings of George Keith, which he printed, having caused a quarrel among the Quakers, for one of them, represented as seditious, he was arrested with Keith and imprisoned in 1692. It is remarkable, that in his trial, when the justice charged the jury to find only the fact as to printing, Bradford maintained that the jury were also to find whether the paper was really seditious, and maintained that "the jury are judges in law, as well as the matter of fact." This is the very point which awakened such interest in England in the time of Wilkes. Bradford was not convicted; but, having incurred the displeasure of the dominant party in Philadelphia, he removed to New York in 1693. In that year he printed the laws of the colony. Oct. 16, 1725, he began the first newspaper in New York, called the N. Y. Gazette. In 1728 he established a paper-mill at Elizabethtown, N. Y., which, perhaps, was the first in this country. Being temperate and active, he reached a great age, a stranger to sickness. In the morning of the day of his death he walked about the city. By his first wife, a daughter of Andrew Sowles, a printer in London, he had two sons, Andrew and William. For more than fifty years he was printer to the New York government, and for thirty years the only printer in the province. He was kind and affable, and a friend to the poor. — Thomas, II. 91; Penn. Gaz., May 28, 1752.

BRADFORD, ANDREW, a printer, the son of the preceding, died Nov. 23, 1742, aged about 56. He was the only printer in Pennsylvania from 1712 to 1723. He published the first newspaper in Philadelphia Dec. 22, 1719, called the American Weekly Mercury. In 1732 he was post-master; in 1735 he kept a bookshop, at the sign of the Bible, in Second street. In 1738 he removed, having purchased a house, No. 8 South Front street, which in 1810 was occupied as a printing house by his descendant, Thomas Bradford, the publisher of the True American, a daily paper. His second wife, with whom he failed to find happiness, was Cornelia Smith, of New York; she continued the Mercury till the end of 1746, and died in 1755. — Thomas, II. 30, 325.

BRADFORD, WILLIAM, colonel, a printer, and a soldier of the Revolution, died Sept. 25, 1791, aged 72. He was the grandson of the first printer in Philadelphia. His father, William, was a seaman. Adopted by his uncle, Andrew Bradford, he became his partner in business; but his foster mother, Mrs. Cornelia B., wishing him to fall in love with her adopted niece, and he choosing to fall in love with some other lady, caused the partnership to be dissolved. In 1741 he went to England, and returned in 1742 with printing materials and books. At this period he married a daughter of Thomas Budd, who was imprisoned with his ancestor in 1692. He published Dec. 2, 1742, the Pennsylvania Journal, which was continued till the present century, when it was superseded by the True American. In 1754 he opened, at the corner of Market and Front streets, the London coffee-house; in 1762 he opened a marine insurance office with Mr. Kydd. He opposed the stamp act in 1765, and in the early stage of the war he took up arms for his country. As a major and colonel in the militia he fought in the battle of Trenton, in the action at Princeton, and in several other engagements. He was at Fort Mifflin when it was attacked. After the British army left Philadelphia, he returned with a broken constitution and a shattered fortune. Business had found new channels. Soon he experienced the loss of his beloved wife; age advanced upon him; a paralytic shock warned him of approaching death. To his children he said, "Though I bequeath you no estate, I leave you in the enjoyment of liberty." Such patriots deserve to be held in perpetual remembrance. He left three sons: Thomas, his partner in business, William, attorney-general, and Schuyler, who died in the East Indies; also three daughters. — Thomas, II. 48, 330; U. S. Gaz.

BRADFORD, WILLIAM, attorney-general of the United States, died Aug. 23, 1795. He was the son of the preceding, born in Philadelphia Sept. 14, 1755, and was early placed under the care of a respectable clergyman a few miles from the city. His father had formed the plan of bringing him up in the insurance office, which he then conducted; but so strong was the love of learning implanted in the mind of his son, that neither persuasions, nor offers of pecuniary advantage, could prevail with him to abandon the hopes of a liberal education. He was graduated at Princeton college in 1772. During his residence at this seminary he was greatly beloved by his fellow students, while he confirmed the expectations of his friends and the faculty of the college by giving repeated evidence of genius and taste. At the public commencement he had one of the highest honors of the class conferred upon him. He continued at Princeton till the year following, during which time he had an opportunity of attending the lectures on theology of Dr. Witherspoon.

He now commenced the study of the law under Edward Shippen, and he prosecuted his studies with unwearied application. In the spring of 1776 he was called upon by the peculiar circumstances of the times to exert himself in defence of the dearest rights of human nature, and to join the standard of his country in opposition to the oppressive exactions of Great Britain. When the militia were called out to form the flying camp, he was chosen major of brigade to Gen. Roberdeau, and on the expiration of his term accepted a company in Col. Hampton's regiment of regular troops. He was soon promoted to the station of deputy muster-master-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, in which office he continued about two years, till his want of health obliged him to resign his commission and return home. He now recommenced the study of the law, and in Sept., 1779, was admitted to the bar of the supreme court. In Aug., 1780, he was appointed attorney-general of Pennsylvania.

In 1784 he married the daughter of Elias

Boudinot, of New Jersey, with whom he lived till his death in the exercise of every domestic virtue that adorns human nature. On the reformation of the courts of justice under the new constitution of Pennsylvania, he was solicited to accept the office of a judge of the supreme court, and was commissioned by Gov. Mifflin, Aug. 22, 1791. In this station his indefatigable industry, unshaken integrity and correct judgment enabled him to give general satisfaction. Here he had determined to spend a considerable part of his life; but on the promotion of Edmund Randolph to the office of secretary of State, as successor of Mr. Jefferson, he was urged to accept the office of attorney-general of the United States, now left vacant. He accordingly received the appointment Jan. 28, 1794. But he continued only a short time in this station, to which he was elevated by Washington. He was succeeded by Mr. Lee, of Virginia. According to his express desire, he was buried by the side of his parents in the burial ground of the second Presbyterian church in Philadelphia.

Mr. Bradford possessed a mild and amiable temper, and his genteel and unassuming manners were united with genius, eloquence, and taste. As a public speaker he was persuasive and convincing. He understood mankind well, and knew how to place his arguments in the most striking point of light. His language was pure and sententious; and he so managed most of his forensic disputes, as scarcely ever to displease his opponents, while he gave the utmost satisfaction to his clients. He possessed great firmness of opinion, yet was remarkable for his modesty and caution in delivering his sentiments. Combining a quick and retentive memory and an excellent judgment with great equanimity and steadiness in his conduct, and a pleasing deportment, he conciliated respect and affection. Towards his country he felt the sincerest attachment, and her interests he preferred to every selfish consideration. His charities were secret, but extensive; and none in distress were ever known to leave him with discontent. It is mentioned as a proof of his benevolence, that he adopted and educated as his own son an orphan child of Joseph Reed. His friendships were few, but very affectionate, and those who aided him in his first setting out in life were never ungratefully forgotten. Though engaged constantly in public business, yet the concerns of this world did not make him regardless of the more important concerns of religion. He firmly believed the Christian system, for he had given it a thorough examination. By its incomparable rules he regulated his whole conduct, and on its promises he founded all his hopes of future happiness.

In the earlier periods of his life he was not unacquainted with the walks of poetry, and some of his poetical productions, in imitation of the pastorals of Shenstone, were published in the Philadelphia magazines. They were at the time held in high estimation. He published in 1793 an inquiry how far the punishment of death is necessary in Pennsylvania, with notes and illustrations, to which is added an account of the gaol and penitentiary house of Philadelphia, by Caleb Lownes. This work was written at the request of Gov. Mifflin, and was intended for the use of the legislature, in the nature of a report, they having the subject at large under their consideration. Furnishing a proof of the good sense and philanthropy of the author, it gained him great credit. It had much influence in meliorating the criminal laws, and hastening the almost entire abolition of capital punishments, not only in Pennsylvania, but in many other States, where the interests of humanity have at last prevailed over ancient and inveterate prejudices. — Rees' Cycl.; Hardie's Biog. Diet.; Marshall, v. 489, 639; Gaz. U. S., Aug. 24, 1795.

BRADFORD, SUSAN, wife of the preceding, died in Burlington, N. J., Nov. 30, 1854, nearly 90. Susan Vergereau was the eldest daughter of Elias Boudinot, born Dec. 21, 1764: her mother was Hannah Stockton, of Princeton, a daughter of John, a signer of the declaration of independence. Her father's great-grandfather was a Huguenot, who fled to England. She was married in 1784 to Wm. Bradford, who died in 1795. A widow for the rest of her life, she lived in Burlington from 1805 till her death. Bishop Doane visited her daily the last twenty years. She was opulent and benevolent, and eminently pious.

BRADFORD, THOMAS, died at Philadelphia in May, 1838, aged 94. He was an eminent printer, editor, and publisher, succeeding Franklin in 1763 as printer to the continental congress.

BRADFORD, ROBERT, major, died in Belpre, Ohio, in 1823, aged 73. He was born in 1750, the son of Robert, of Kingston; and was a descendant of the sixth generation from Gov. B. In the war of the Revolution he was a brave officer. The sword given him by Lafayette is in the hands of his only surviving son, O. L. Bradford, of Wood county, Va. As an associate of the Ohio company, he removed to Marietta in 1788. The next year he and other officers settled Belpre, where he encountered the perils of the Indian scalping-knife. He was a worthy, cheerful, warm-hearted pioneer of the west. — Hildreth's Biog. Mem. relating to Ohio.

BRADFORD, ANDREW, died at Duxbury in Jan., 1837, aged 91; a descendant of Gov. B. He was a quartermaster in the Revolutionary army, a twin brother of Peter B., who died two years before.

BRADFORD, JOHN, died Jan. 27, 1825, aged 68. He was born in Boston Aug., 1756, graduated at Harvard in 1774, and was ordained at Roxbury in May, 1785. T. Gray wrote an obituary notice, with a sketch of the Roxbury churches, 1825.

BRADFORD, ALDEN, died in Boston Oct. 26, 1843, aged 78. He was born in Duxbury, the son of Gamaliel, was graduated in 1756, and a minister in Pownalborough, now Wiscasset, eight years. From 1812 to 1824 he was secretary of State of Massachusetts. He published a history of Mass. from 1764 to 1789, 2 vols. ; from 1790 to 1820 ; also two sermons on the doctrines of Christ, 1794, at Hallowell ; eulogy on Washington ; ordination of N. Tilton, 1801 ; sermon at Plymouth ; oration, 1804 ; on death of Knox, 1806 ; biography of C. Strong, 1820 ; on State rights, 1824 ; discourse, 1830 ; and account of Wiscasset and Duxbury in historical collections.

BRADFORD, EBENEZER, minister of Rowley, a brother of Moses, died Jan. 3, 1801, aged 55. A graduate of Princeton in 1773, he was settled at R. in 1782, after living a few years in Danbury. His son, John Melancthon B., D. D., was a graduate at Providence in 1800. His wife was a sister of Dr. Green, of Philadelphia. He published a sermon at the ordination of N. Howe, 1791 ; strictures on Dr. Langdon's remarks on Hopkins' system, 1794 ; at a thanksgiving, also at a fast, 1795 ; at the installation of J. H. Stevens, 1795.

BRADFORD, MOSES, died in Montague June 13, 1838, aged 73. A descendant of Gov. Bradford by his son William, he was born in Canterbury, Conn., the brother of Rev. E. B., of Rowley. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1785, and was from 1790 the minister of Francestown thirty-seven years, eminently useful, the church growing from fifty members to three or four hundred. He had three sons, who were preachers.

BRADFORD, EPIPHAN P., minister of New Boston, N. H. nearly forty years, died Dec. 14, 1845 : a graduate of Harvard in 1803, and a diligent laborer.

BRADFORD, GAMALIEL, M. D., superintendent of the Mass. general hospital, died in Boston Oct. 22, 1839, aged nearly 44 ; a descendant of William B., and a graduate of 1814. He was an adversary of phrenology, and of slavery. He wrote eighty miscellaneous pieces ; among them an address on temperance ; a letter on slavery, and various reviews. A Memoir by Dr. Francis is in Hist. Coll. 3d series, vol IX.

BRADLEY, SAMUEL, killed in the "Bradley massacre," was an early settler at Concord, N. H., then Rumford. On the 11th Aug., 1746, as he was proceeding with six others to Hopkinton, the party was attacked by a hundred Indians a mile and a half from Concord village. Samuel Bradley was killed and scalped near the brook. To his brother, Jonathan Bradley, a lieutenant in Capt. Ladd's company, quarter was offered ; but he refused it, and fought till he was hewed down with the tomahawk. Three others were killed : Alexander Roberts and William Stickney were made prisoners. Mr. Bradley was a young man ; his widow, who married Richard Calfe, of Chester, died Aug. 10, 1817, aged 98. His son, John, who was two years old at the time of the massacre, was a very respectable citizen of Concord, and served in both branches of the legislature. He died July 5, 1815, aged 71, leaving sons, among whom was Samuel A. Bradley, of Fryeburg. Seven persons of the name of Bradley were killed by the Indians in Haverhill, Mass., in March, 1697 ; in 1704 a Mrs. Bradley, after killing an Indian by pouring boiling soap on him, was taken prisoner.—Bouton's Cent. Disc. ; Moore's Ann. of Concord ; Coll. Hist. Soc. s. s. iv. 129.

BRADLEY, STEPHEN R., a senator of the United States, was born Oct. 20, 1754, in Wallingford, now Cheshire, Conn., and graduated at Yale college in 1775. He was the aid of Gen. Wooster, when that officer fell in a skirmish with the enemy. Removing to Vermont, he contributed much to the establishment of that State. He was one of its first senators to congress, in which body he continued, with one intermission, until he retired from public life in 1812. He died at Walpole, N. H., Dec. 16, 1830, aged 76. He published Vermont's appeal, 1779, which has been sometimes ascribed to Ira Allen.

BRADLEY, WILLIAM H., a poet, was born in Providence, R. I. After being educated as a physician, he went to Cuba, where he died in 1825. He published Giuseppino, an occidental story, 1822 ; besides many fugitive pieces.—Spec. Amer. Poet. II. 394, 398.

BRADLEY, ABRAHAM, assistant postmaster general, died at Washington May 7, 1838.

BRADLEY, PHINEAS, Dr., died at Washington Feb. 28, 1845, aged 75. Born at Litchfield, he practised physic at Painted Post, N. Y. ; but about 1800 accepted an appointment in the post office at Washington ; he was second assistant postmaster-general.

BRADLEY, JOSHUA, a Baptist minister, died at St. Paul, Minnesota, Nov. 22, 1855, aged 85. From his 20th year he was engaged in education and the ministry, rendering great services to the cause of religion.

BRADLEY, EMILIE, wife of Dr. D. B. Bradley, missionary to Siam, died at Bangkok Aug. 2, 1845, aged 34. Her name was Emilie Royce, of Clinton, N. Y. She embarked July 2, 1834, and had been ten years a missionary. Her end was remarkably peaceful, like that of many other missionaries. She was glad the Siamese could see how a Christian could die ; she wished them to judge which religion makes the soul most happy in the hour of death.

BRADSTREET, SIMON, governor of Mass., the son of a nonconformist minister in England, died at Salem, March 27, 1697, aged 94. He was born at Horbling in Lincolnshire in March, 1603. His father died when he was at the age of fourteen. But he was soon afterwards taken into the religious family of the Earl of Lincoln, in which he continued about eight years under the direction of Thomas Dudley, and among other offices sustained that of steward. He lived a year at Emanuel college, Cambridge, pursuing his studies amidst many interruptions. He then returned to the earl's; but soon accepted the place of steward in the family of the Countess of Warwick. Here he continued till he married a daughter of Mr. Dudley, and was persuaded to engage in the project of making a settlement in Massachusetts. He was in March, 1630, chosen assistant of the colony, which was about to be established, and arrived at Salem in the summer of the same year. He was at the first court, which was held at Charlestown Aug. 23. He was afterwards secretary and agent of Massachusetts, and commissioner of the united colonies. He was sent with Mr. Norton in 1662 to congratulate King Charles on his restoration, and as agent of the colony to promote its interests. From 1673 to 1679 he was deputy governor. In this last year he succeeded Mr. Leverett as governor, and remained in this office till, May, 1686, when the charter was dissolved, and Joseph Dudley commenced his administration as president of New England. In May, 1689, after the imprisonment of Andros, he was replaced in the office of governor, which station he held till the arrival of Sir William Phipps in May, 1692, with a charter which deprived the people of the right of electing their chief magistrate. He had been fifty years an assistant of the colony. He had lived at Cambridge, Ipswich, Andover, Boston, and Salem.

Gov. Bradstreet, though he possessed no splendid talents, yet by his integrity, prudence, moderation, and piety acquired the confidence of all classes of people. When King Charles demanded a surrender of the charter, he was in favor of complying; and the event proved the correctness of his opinion. He thought it would be more prudent for the colonists to submit to a power which they could not resist, than to have judgment given against the charter, and thus their privileges be entirely cut off. If his moderation in regard to religious affairs, particularly towards the Anabaptists and the Quakers, was not so conspicuous, it was not a fault peculiar to him. Yet he had the good sense to oppose the witchcraft delusion. He had eight children by his first wife, the daughter of governor Thomas Dudley, who wrote a volume of poems. His second wife, a sister of Sir George Downing, was the widow of Joseph Gardner, of Salem. His son, Simon, the minister of New London, graduated 1660, was ordained Oct. 5, 1670, and died 1685. Another son, Major Dudley B., was taken prisoner by the Indians with his wife at Andover in 1698. — Mather's Magnalia, II. 19, 20; Hutchinson, I. 18, 219, 323; II. 13, 105; Holmes, I. 466.

BRADSTREET, ANNE, a poetess, was the daughter of Governor Dudley, and was born in 1612 at Northampton, England. At the age of sixteen she married Mr. Bradstreet, afterwards governor of Massachusetts, and accompanied him to America in 1630. After being the mother of eight children, she died Sept. 16, 1672, aged 60.

Her volume of poems was dedicated to her father, in a copy of verses dated March 20, 1642, and is probably the earliest poetic volume written in America. The title is: "Several Poems, compiled with great variety of wit and learning, full of delight; wherein especially is contained a complete discourse and description of the four elements, constitutions, ages of man, seasons of the year, together with an exact epitome of the three first monarchies, viz: the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman commonwealth, from the beginning to the end of their last king, with divers other pleasant and serious poems. By a gentlewoman of New England." A third edition was published in 1758. — Spec. Amer. Poet. Intr. XX.; American Quar. Rev. II. 494-496.

BRADSTREET, SIMON, minister of Charlestown, Mass., was graduated at Harvard college in 1693, and was ordained as successor of Mr. Morton, Oct. 26, 1698. He received J. Stephens as colleague in 1721, and Mr. Abbot as his colleague in 1724. After a ministry of more than forty years, he died Dec. 31, 1741, aged 72. His successors were Abbot, Prentice, Paine, and Dr. Morse. He was a very learned man, of a strong mind, tenacious memory, and lively imagination. Lieut.-Governor Tailer introduced him to Governor Burnet, who was himself a fine scholar, by saying, here is a man who can whistle Greek; and the governor afterwards spoke of him as one of the first literary characters and best preachers whom he had met with in America. Mr. Bradstreet was subject to hypochondriacal complaints, which made him afraid to preach in the pulpit some years before he died. He delivered his sermons in the deacon's seat, without notes, and they were in general melancholy effusions upon the wretched state of mankind and the vanity of the world. He possessed such a catholic spirit, that some of the more zealous brethren accused him of Arminianism; but the only evidence of this was his fondness for Tillotson's sermons, and his being rather a practical than a doctrinal preacher. He seldom appeared with a coat, but always wore a plaid gown, and was generally seen with a pipe in his mouth. His Latin epitaph upon his predecessor, Mr. Morton, has been preserved by the Mass. Hist. Society.—Hist. Coll. VIII. 75; Budington.

BRADSTREET, SIMON, minister of Marblehead, was the son of the preceding, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1728. He was ordained successor of Mr. Holyoke Jan. 4, 1738, and died Oct. 5, 1771; Isaac Story, who married his daughter, having been his colleague four or five months. He was an excellent scholar, a most worthy and pious Christian, and faithful pastor; laboring to bring his hearers to the love of God, the reception of the Saviour, and the practice of holiness. He published a sermon on the death of his brother Samuel, of Charlestown, 1755.

BRADSTREET, JOHN, a major-general in America, appointed by the king of Great Britain, was in 1746 lieutenant-governor of St. John's, Newfoundland. He was afterwards distinguished for his military services. It was thought of the highest importance in the year 1756 to keep open the communication with Fort Oswego on Lake Ontario. Gen. Shirley accordingly enlisted forty companies of boatmen, each consisting of fifty men, for transporting stores to the fort from Schenectady, and placed them under the command of Bradstreet, who was an active and vigilant officer, and inured to the hardships to which that service exposed him. In the beginning of the spring of this year a small stockaded post with twenty-five men, at the carrying place, was cut off. It became necessary to pass through the country with large squadrons of boats, as the enemy infested the passage through the Onondaga river. On his return from Oswego, July 3, 1756, Col. Bradstreet, who was apprehensive of being ambushed, ordered the several divisions to proceed as near each other as possible. He was at the head of about three hundred boatmen in the first division, when at the distance of nine miles from the fort the enemy rose from their ambuscade and attacked him. He instantly landed upon a small island and with but six men maintained his position, till he was reinforced. A general engagement ensued, in which Bradstreet with gallantry rushed upon a more numerous enemy, and entirely routed them, killing and wounding about two hundred men. His own loss was about thirty. In the year 1758 he was intrusted with the command of three thousand men on an expedition against Fort Frontenac, which was planned by himself. He embarked at Oswego on Lake Ontario, and on the evening of Aug. 25th landed within a mile of the fort. On the 27th it was surrendered to him. Forty pieces of cannon and a vast quantity of provisions and merchandize, with one hundred and ten prisoners, fell into his hands. The fort and nine armed vessels and such stores as could not be removed, were destroyed. In August, 1764, he advanced with a considerable force toward the Indian country, and at Presque Isle compelled the Delawares, Shawanese, and other Indians to terms of peace. He was appointed major-general in May, 1772. After rendering important services to his country, he died at New York Oct. 21, 1774.—Wynne, II. 59–61, 86–88; Ann. Reg. for 1764, 181; Holmes, II. 198; Marshall, I. 137, 438; Coll. Hist. Soc., VII. 150, 155; Mante.

BRADSTREET, STEPHEN I., died in Cleveland June 9, 1837, aged 42; pastor of the first church, then editor of the Ohio Observer and of the Cleveland Messenger; a graduate of Dartmouth, 1819.

BRADY, HUGH, major-general, died in Detroit April 15, 1851, aged 83. Born in Pennsylvania, he entered the army in 1792, and served under Wayne against the Indians. At the battle of Chippewa he headed his regiment. From 1825 he was stationed at Detroit. A life of rigid temperance and regular activity gave him an elastic step in old age. He had a pure and upright character.

BRAINARD, JOHN GARDINER CALKINS, a poet, was the son of Judge Jeremiah G. Brainard of New London, Conn., died Sept. 26, 1828, aged 32. He was born about the year 1797. He was graduated in 1815 at Yale college. Though his name differs in one letter from that of the celebrated missionary, yet probably they had a common ancestor. Indeed his name, in a catalogue of the college, is given Brainerd, while that of John, a brother of David, is printed Brainard. These are probably both mistakes. Autograph letters of David and John in my possession present the form of Brainerd; the other form of the name being adopted by the poet and his father, I do not feel authorized to change it for the sake of uniformity. Brainard studied law and commenced the practice at Middletown; but not finding the success which he desired, in 1822 he undertook the editorial charge of the Connecticut Mirror at Hartford. Thus he was occupied about seven years, until, being marked as a victim for the consumption, he returned about a year before his death to his father's house.

He was an excellent editor of the paper, which he conducted, enriching it with his poetical productions, which have originality, force, and pathos, and with many beautiful prose compositions, and refraining from that personal abuse, which many editors seem to think essential to their vocation. In this respect his gentlemanly example is worthy of being followed by the editorial corps. He, who addresses himself every week or every day to thousands of readers, sustains a high responsibility. If, destitute of good breeding and good principles, he is determined to attract notice by the personalities, for which there is a greedy appetite in the community; if he yields himself a slave to the party which he espouses, and toils for it by contumelies upon his opponents; if, catching the spirit of an infuriated zealot, and regardless of truth and honor, he scatters abroad his malignant slanders and inflammatory traducements; then, instead of a wise and benevolent teacher and guide, he presents himself as a sower of discord and a minister of evil.

When he was a member of Yale college in 1815, during a revival of religion, he was deeply impressed with his sin and danger; but his religious sensibility soon diminished, and the world occupied again his thoughts, though speculatively he assented to the truths of the gospel. Thus he lived twelve or thirteen years, till a few months before his death. Then, at his father's house, during his decay by the consumption, he spent his days and evenings in reading religious books and in pious meditations. To his minister, Mr. McEwen, he said, "This plan of salvation in the gospel is all that I want; it fills me with wonder and gratitude, and makes the prospect of death not only peaceful, but joyous." Pale and feeble, he went to the house of God, and made a profession of religion and was baptized. The next Sabbath, as he could not attend meeting, the Lord's supper was administered at his room. His last remark to his minister was, "I am willing to die; I have no righteousness, but Christ and his atonement are enough. God is a God of truth, and I think I am reconciled to him." The change experienced by the renovated, pardoned sinner, is described by him in the following lines:

"All sights are fair to the recovered blind;
All sounds are music to the deaf restored;
The lame, made whole, leaps like the sportive hind;
And the sad, bow'd down sinner, with his load
Of shame and sorrow, when he cuts the cord,
And leaves his pack behind, is free again
In the light yoke and burden of his Lord."

He published Occasional pieces of poetry, 12mo., 1825.—Specimens Amer. Poetry, III. 198-212; Hawes' Sermon.

BRAINERD, DAVID, an eminent preacher and missionary to the Indians, died at Northampton Oct. 9, 1747, aged 29; his gravestone by mistake says Oct. 10. He was born at Haddam, Conn., April 20, 1718. His grandfather was Deacon Daniel B., who was born in Braintree, Essex, England, and who settled in Haddam about 1660, and died in 1715. He came to this country at the age of eight, in the Wyllys family, about 1649; his wife was Hannah, daughter of Jared Spencer. His father, H Ezekiah Brainerd, was an assistant of the colony, or a member of the council, who died when his son was about nine years of age; his mother, Dorothy, the daughter of Rev. Jeremiah Hobart, and widow of D. Mason, died when he was fourteen years of age. His elder brother, H Ezekiah, was a representative of Haddam; and his brother Nehemiah, who died in 1742, was a minister in Glastenbury. His sister, Martha, married Gen. Joseph Spencer, of East Haddam. As his mind was early impressed by the truths of religion, he took delight in reading those books which communicate religious instruction; he called upon the name of God in secret prayer; he studied the Scriptures with great diligence; and he associated with several young persons for mutual encouragement and assistance in the paths of wisdom. But in all this he afterwards considered himself as self-righteous, as completely destitute of true piety, as governed by the fear of future punishment and not by the love of God, as depending for salvation upon his good feelings and his strict life, without a perception of the necessity and the value of the mediation of Christ. At this time he indeed acknowledged, that he deserved nothing for his best works, for the theory of salvation was familiar to him; but while he made the acknowledgment, he did not feel what it implied. He still secretly relied upon the warmth of his affections, upon his sincerity, upon some quality in himself, as the ground of acceptance with God; instead of relying upon the Lord Jesus, through whom alone there is access to the Father. At length he was brought under a deep sense of his sinfulness, and he perceived, that there was nothing good in himself. This conviction was not a sudden perturbation of mind; it was a permanent impression, made by the view of his own character, when compared with that holy law of God, which he was bound to obey. But the discovery was unwelcome and irritating. He could not readily abandon the hope, which rested upon his religious exercises. He was reluctant to admit, that the principle, whence all his actions proceeded, was entirely corrupt. He was opposed to the strictness of the Divine law, which extended to the heart as well as to the life. He murmured against the doctrines, that faith was indispensably necessary to salvation, and that faith was completely the gift of God. He was irritated in not finding any way pointed out, which would lead him to the Saviour; in not finding any means prescribed, by which an unrenewed man could of his own strength obtain that, which the highest angel could not give. He was unwilling to believe, that he was dead in trespasses and in sins. But these unpleasant truths were fastened upon his mind, and they could not be shaken off. It pleased God to disclose to him his true character and condition, and to quell the tumult of his soul. He saw that his schemes to save himself were entirely vain, and must forever be ineffectual; he perceived that it was self-interest which had before led him to pray, and that he had never once prayed from any respect to the glory of God; he felt that he was lost. In this state of mind, while he was walking in a solitary, place in the evening of July 12, 1739, meditating upon religious subjects, his mind was illuminated with completely new views of the Divine perfections; he perceived a glory in the character of God and in the way of salvation by the crucified Son of the Most High, which he never before discerned; and he was led to depend upon Jesus Christ for righteousness, and to seek the glory of God as his principal object.

In September, 1739, he was admitted a member of Yale college, but he was expelled in February, 1742. The circumstances which led to this expulsion were these: There had been great attention to religion in the college, and Mr. Brainerd, whose feelings were naturally warm, and whose soul was interested in the progress of the gospel, was misled by an intemperate zeal, and was guilty of indiscretions, which at that time were not unfrequent. In a conversation with some of his associates he expressed his belief, that one of the tutors was destitute of religion. Being in part overheard, his associates were compelled by the rector to declare, respecting whom he was speaking; and he was required to make a public confession in the hall. Brainerd thought, that it was unjust to extort from his friends what he had uttered in conversation, and that the punishment was too severe. As he refused to make the confession, and as he had been guilty of going to a separate meeting after prohibition by the authority of college, he was expelled. In the circumstances, which led to this result, there appears a strong disposition to hunt up offences against the "New Lights," as those who were attached to the preaching of Mr. Whitfield and Tennent, were then called. It was not so strange that a young man should have been indiscreet, as that he should confess himself to have been so. Mr. Brainerd afterwards perceived that he had been uncharitable and had done wrong, and with sincerity and humility he acknowledged his error and exhibited a truly Christian spirit; but he never obtained his degree. Though he felt no resentment, and ever lamented his own conduct; yet he always considered himself as abused in the management of this affair.

In the spring of 1742 he went to Rippon, to pursue the study of divinity under the care of Mr. Mills; and at the end of July was licensed to preach, by the association of ministers which met at Danbury, after they had made inquiries respecting his learning, and his acquaintance with experimental religion. Soon after he began his theological studies, he was desirous of preaching the gospel to the heathen, and frequently prayed for them. In November, after he was licensed, he was invited to go to New York, and was examined by the correspondents of the society for propagating Christian knowledge, and was appointed by them a missionary to the Indians.

He arrived on the first of April, 1743, at Kaunameek, an Indian village in the woods between Stockbridge, in the State of Massachusetts, and Albany, at the distance of about twenty miles from the former place and fifteen miles from Kinderhook. He now began his labors at the age of twenty-five, and continued in this place about a year. At first he lived in a wigwam among the Indians; but he afterwards built himself a cabin, that he might be alone, when not employed in preaching and instructing the savages. He lodged upon a bundle of straw, and his food was principally boiled corn, hasty pudding, and samp. With a feeble body, and frequent illness, and great depression of mind, he was obliged to encounter many discouragements, and to submit to hardships, which would be almost insupportable by a much stronger constitution. But he persisted in his benevolent labors, animated by the hope that he should prove the means of illuminating some darkened mind with the truth as it is in Jesus. Besides his exertions, which had immediate reference to the instruction of the savages, he studied much, and employed much time in the delightful employment of communing in the wilderness with that merciful Being, who is present in all places, and who is the support and joy of all Christians. When the Indians at Kaunameek had agreed to remove to Stockbridge and place themselves under the instruction of Mr. Sergeant, Mr. Brainerd left them and bent his attention towards the Delaware Indians.

He was ordained at Newark in New Jersey by a Presbytery, June 12, 1744, on which occasion Mr. Pemberton of New York preached a sermon. He soon afterwards went to the new field of his labors, near the forks of the Delaware in Pennsylvania, and continued there a year, making two visits to the Indians on Susquchannah river. He again built him a cabin for retirement; but here he had the happiness to find some white people, with whom he maintained family prayer. After the hardships of his abode in this place, with but little encouragement from the effect of his exertions, he visited the Indians at Crosweeksung, near Freehold in New Jersey. In this village he was favored with remarkable success. The Spirit of God seemed to bring home effectually to the hearts of the ignorant heathens the truths, which he delivered to them with affection and zeal. His Indian interpreter, who had been converted by his preaching, cooperated cheerfully in the good work. It was not uncommon for the whole congregation to be in tears, or to be crying out under a sense of sin. In less than a year Mr. Brainerd baptized seventy-seven persons, of whom thirty-eight were adults, that gave satisfactory evidence of having been renovated by the power of God; and he beheld with unspeakable pleasure between twenty and thirty of his converts seated around the table of the Lord. The Indians were at the time entirely reformed in their lives. They were very humble and devout, and united in Christian affection. In a letter, dated Dec. 30, 1745, he says: "The good work which you will find largely treated of in my journal, still continues among the Indians; though the astonishing Divine influence, that has been among them, is in a considerable measure abated. Yet there are several instances of persons newly awakened. When I consider the doings of the Lord among these Indians, and then take a view of my journal, I must say, 't is a faint representation I have given of them.'" Nor is there any evidence, that he misjudged. The lives of these Indian converts in subsequent years, under John Brainerd and William Tennent, were, in general, holy and exemplary, furnishing evidence of the sincerity of their faith in the gospel.

In the summer of 1746 Mr. Brainerd visited the Indians on the Susquehannah, and on his return in September found himself worn out by the hardships of his journey. His health was so much impaired, that he was able to preach but little more. Being advised in the spring of 1747 to travel in New England, he went as far as Boston, and returned in July to Northampton, where, in the family of Jonathan Edwards, he passed the remainder of his days. He gradually declined till Tuesday, Oct. 9, 1747, when, after suffering inexpressible agony, he entered upon that rest which remaineth for the faithful servants of God.

Mr. Brainerd was a man of vigorous powers of mind. While he was favored with a quick discernment and ready invention, with a strong memory and natural eloquence, he also possessed in an uncommon degree the penetration, the closeness and force of thought, and the soundness of judgment which distinguish the man of talents from him who subsists entirely upon the learning of others. His knowledge was extensive, and he added to his other attainments an intimate acquaintance with human nature, gained not only by observing others, but by carefully noticing the operations of his own mind. As he was of a sociable disposition, and could adapt himself with great ease to the different capacities, tempers, and circumstances of men, he was remarkably fitted to communicate instruction. He was very free, and entertaining, and useful in his ordinary discourse; and he was also an able disputant. As a preacher he was perspicuous and instructive, forcible, close, and pathetic. He abhorred an affected boisterousness in the pulpit, and yet he could not tolerate a cold delivery, when the subject of discourse was such as should warm the heart, and produce an earnestness of manner.

His knowledge of theology was uncommonly extensive and accurate. President Edwards, whose opinion of Mr. Brainerd was founded upon an intimate acquaintance with him, says, that "He never knew his equal, of his age and standing, for clear, accurate notions of the nature and essence of true religion, and its distinctions from its various false appearances." Mr. Brainerd had no charity for the religion of those, who, indulging the hope that they were interested in the Divine mercy, settled down in a state of security and negligence. He believed that the good man would be continually making progress towards perfection, and that conversion was not merely a great change in the views of the mind and the affections of the heart, produced by the Spirit of God; but that it was the beginning of a course of holiness, which through the Divine agency would be pursued through life. From the ardor with which he engaged in missionary labors, some may be led to conclude, that his mind was open to the influence of fanaticism. During his residence at college, his spirit was indeed somewhat tinged with the zeal of bitterness; but it was not long before he was restored to true benevolence and the pure love of the truth. From this time he detested enthusiasm in all its forms. He reprobated all dependence upon impulses, or impressions on the imagination, or the sudden suggestion of texts of Scripture. He withstood every doctrine which seemed to verge towards antinomianism, particularly the sentiments of those who thought that faith consists in believing, that Christ died for them in particular, and who founded their love of God, not upon the excellence of his character, but upon the previous impression that they were the objects of his favor, and should assuredly be saved. He rebuffed the pride and presumption of laymen, who thrust themselves forth as public teachers and decried human learning and a learned ministry; he detested the spirit, which generally influenced the Separatists through the country; and he was entirely opposed to that religion, which was fond of noise and show, and delighted to publish its experiences and privileges. Very different from the above was the religion which Mr. Brainerd approved, and which he displayed in his own life. In his character were combined the most ardent and pure love to God and the most unaffected benevolence to man, an alienation from the vain and perishable pursuits of the world, the most humbling and constant sense of his own iniquity, which was a greater burden to him than all his afflictions, great brokenness of heart before God for the coldness of his love and the imperfection of his Christian virtues, the most earnest breathings of soul after holiness, real delight in the gospel of Jesus Christ, sweet complacence in all his disciples, incessant desires and importunate prayers that men might be brought to the knowledge and the obedience of the truth, and that thus God might be glorified and the kingdom of Christ advanced, great resignation to the will of his heavenly Father, an entire distrust of his own heart and a universal dependence upon God, the absolute renunciation of everything for his Redeemer, the most clear and abiding views of the things of the eternal world, a continual warfare against sin, and the most unwearied exertion of all his powers in the service and in obedience to the commands of the Most High. He believed that the essence of true religion consists in the conformity of the soul to God, in acting above all selfish views, for his glory, desiring to please and honor him in all things, and that from a view of his excellency, and worthiness in himself to be loved, adored, and obeyed by all intelligent creatures. When this divine temper is wrought in the soul by the special influences of the Holy Spirit, discovering the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, he believed that the Author of all good could not but delight in his own image, and would most certainly complete his own work, which he had begun in the human heart. His religion did not consist in speculation; but he carried his own principles into practice. Resisting the solicitations of selfishness, he consecrated his powers to the high and benevolent objects, enjoined in the Scriptures. It was his whole aim to promote in the most effectual manner the glory of his Redeemer. After the termination of a year's fruitless mission at Kaunameek, where he had suffered the greatest hardships, he was invited to become the minister of East Hampton, one of the best parishes on Long Island; but though he was not insensible to the pleasures of a quiet and fixed abode, among Christian friends, in the midst of abundance; yet, without the desire of fame, he preferred the dangers and sufferings of a new mission among savages. He loved his Saviour, and wished to make known his precious name among the heathen.

In his last illness and during the approaches of death he was remarkably resigned and composed. He spoke of that willingness to die, which originates in the desire of escaping pain, and in the hope of obtaining pleasure or distinction in heaven, as very ignoble. The heaven, which he seemed to anticipate, consisted in the love and service of God. "It is impossible," said he, "for any rational creature to be happy without acting all for God. I long to be in heaven, praising and glorifying him with the angels. There is nothing in the world worth living for, but doing good and finishing God's work; doing the work, which Christ did. I see nothing else in the world, that can yield any satisfaction, besides living to God, pleasing him, and doing his whole will. My greatest comfort and joy has been to do something for promoting the interests of religion, and for the salvation of the souls of particular persons." When he was about to be separated forever from the earth, his desires seemed to be as eager as ever for the progress of the gospel. He spoke much of the prosperity of Zion, of the infinite importance of the work which was committed to the ministers of Jesus Christ, and of the necessity, which was imposed upon them, to be constant and earnest in prayer to God for the success of their exertions. A little while before his death he said to Mr. Edwards: "My thoughts have been much employed on the old, dear theme, the prosperity of God's church on earth. As I waked out of sleep, I was led to cry for the pouring out of God's Spirit and the advancement of Christ's kingdom, which the dear Redeemer did and suffered so much for; it is this especially which makes me long for it." He felt at this time a peculiar concern for his own congregation of Christian Indians. Eternity was before him with all its interests. "T is sweet to me," said he, "to think of eternity. But O, what shall I say to the eternity of the wicked! I cannot mention it, nor think of it. The thought is too dreadful!" In answer to the inquiry, how he did, he said: "I am almost in eternity; I long to be there. My work is done. I have done with all my friends. All the world is now nothing to me. O, to be in heaven, to praise and glorify God with his holy angels!" At length, after the trial of his patience by the most excruciating sufferings, his spirit was released from its tabernacle of clay, and entered those mansions which the Lord Jesus hath prepared for all his faithful disciples.

The exertions of Mr. Brainerd in the Christian cause were of short continuance, but they were intense, and incessant, and effectual. One must be either a very good or a very bad man, who can read his life without blushing for himself. If ardent piety and enlarged benevolence, if the supreme love of God and the inextinguishable desire of promoting his glory in the salvation of immortal souls, if persevering resolution in the midst of the most pressing discouragements, if cheerful self-denial and unremitting labor, if humility and zeal for godliness, united with conspicuous talents, render a man worthy of remembrance; the name of Brainerd will not soon be forgotten.

He published a narrative of his labors at Kaunameek, annexed to Mr. Pemberton's sermon at his ordination; and his journal, or an account of the rise and progress of a remarkable work of grace amongst a number of Indians in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, with some general remarks, 1746. This work, which is very interesting, and which displays the piety and talents of the author, was published by the commissioners of the society in Scotland, with a preface by them, and an attestation by W. Tennent and Mr. McKnight. His life, written by President Edwards, is compiled chiefly from his own diary. Annexed to it are some of his letters and other writings. It is a book which is well calculated to enkindle a flame of benevolence and piety in the breast. A new edition of his memoirs was published in 1822 by Sereno Edwards Dwight, including his journal. Mr. Edwards had omitted the already printed journals, which had been published in two parts: the first, from June 19 to Nov. 4, 1745, entitled Mirabilia Dei inter Indicos; the second, from Nov. 24, 1745, to June 19, 1746, with the title, Divine grace displayed, &c. These journals Mr. Dwight has incorporated in a regular chronological series with the rest of the diary, as alone given by Edwards. — Brainerd's Life; his Journal; Edwards' Fun. Sermon; Middleton's Biog. Evang. iv. 262–264; Assembly Miss. Mag. ii. 449–452; Boston Recorder, 1824, p. 196.

BRAINERD, JOHN, a missionary, brother of the preceding, died about 1780. He was graduated at Yale college in 1746, and was a trustee of Princeton college from 1754 to 1780. The Indian congregation of his brother being removed from Croswecksung or Crosweeks to Cranberry, not far distant, he succeeded his brother in the mission about the year 1748. His efforts were incessant for their good; but he had to encounter great difficulties. A drunken Indian sold their lands; the greedy government of New Jersey was hostile to the tribe; and Mr. Brainerd, unable to support a schoolmaster, endeavored himself, amidst numerous avocations, to teach them the elements of learning as well as the truths of religion. The place of his residence in 1754 was Bethel, whence he wrote to Dr. Wheelock: "It belongs to thousands to endeavor to Christianize the Indians, as well as to us. It is as really their duty, and would be every way as much to their advantage, as ours. If the country in general were but sensible of their obligation, how would they exert themselves, how freely would they disburse of their substance, and what pains would they take to accomplish this great and good work?" About 1755 Wm. Tennent succeeded him. In 1763 he lived at Great Egg Harbor. In 1772 he lived at Brotherton, N. J.

BRANT, JOSEPH, a famous Indian chief, was at the head of the six nations, so called, in the State of New York. Each of these was divided into three or more tribes, called the turtle tribe, the wolf tribe, the bear tribe. He was a Mohawk of pure Indian blood. His father, Brant, a chief, was denominated an Onondaga Indian, and about the year 1756 had three sons in Sir Wm. Johnson's army. Young Brant was sent by Sir William to Dr. Wheelock's Indian charity school at Lebanon Crank, now the town of Columbia, Connecticut; and after he had been there educated, employed him in public business. His Indian name was Thayendanege. About the year 1762 Rev. Charles J. Smith, a missionary to the Mohawks, took Brant as his interpreter; but the war obliging him to return, Brant remained and went out with a company against the Indians, behaving "so much like the Christian and the soldier, that he gained great esteem." In 1765 his house was an asylum for the missionaries in the wilderness, and he exerted himself for the religious instruction of his poor Indian brethren. In 1775 he visited England; and it was there perceived, of course, after the education he had received, that he spoke and wrote the English language with tolerable accuracy. In the war, which commenced in that year, he attached himself to the British cause. The barbarities attending the memorable destruction of the beautiful settlement of Wyoming, in July, 1778, have been ascribed to him by the writers of American history and by Campbell in his poem, Gertrude of Wyoming; but Brant was not present in that massacre; the Indians were commanded by Col. John Butler, a tory and refugee, whose heart was more ferocious than that of any savage. Col. Brant, however, was the undisputed leader of the band, which in July, 1779, destroyed the settlement of Minisink in Orange county, New York, a few miles from West Point. In June he left Niagara with about three hundred warriors of the six nations and a number of tories, for the purpose of destroying the settlements upon the Delaware river. On the 20th of July he appeared on the west of Minisink and sent down a party, which, after destroying the settlement, returned with their booty to the main body at Grassy-swamp brook. The next day one hundred and twenty men assembled under the command of a physician, Col. Tusten, and marched seventeen miles toward the enemy. In the morning of July 22d, Col. Hathorn arrived and took the command, and in a short time the battle commenced and lasted the whole day. The fire was irregular, from behind trees and rocks, both by the Indians and Americans, every man fighting in his own way. Brant and his whole force were engaged. About sunset our troops, having expended their ammunition, retreated and were pursued by the savages. Dr. Tusten, in a nook of rocks, had dressed the wounds of seventeen men, whose cries for protection and mercy, when they heard the retreat ordered, were piercing to the soul; but they all perished, with Dr. Tusten, under the Indian tomahawk. On this day forty-four Americans fell, some of whom were the pride and flower of the village of Goshen. Among them were Jones, Little, Duncan, Wisner, Vail, Townsend, and Knapp. Major Poppino, who escaped, lived to nearly one hundred years, and was present with an assemblage of ten or twelve thousand people, when their bones were buried July 22, 1822. After the peace of 1783 Brant visited England, and passed the remainder of his life in Upper Canada. In 1785 he in self-defence killed one of his sons, who in a fit of drunkenness had attempted his life; in consequence of this act he resigned his commission of captain in the British service, and surrendered himself to justice; but Lord Dorchester, the governor, would not accept his resignation. He sent his two sons, Joseph and Jacob, in 1801, to the care of President Wheelock, of Dartmouth college, to be educated in Moor's school. He died at his seat in Upper Canada, at the head of Lake Ontario, Nov. 24, 1807, aged 65. His daughter married Wm. J. Kerr, Esq., of Niagara, in 1824.

His son, John, an Indian chief, was in England in 1822, and placed before the poet, Campbell, documents to prove that his father was not present at the massacre at Wyoming, and that he was in fact a man of humanity. After reading them Campbell published a letter, in which he recanted the charges of ferocity, advanced in his Gertrude; but he assigns rather an inadequate reason for this change in the estimate of his character, namely, that Brant enjoyed the friendship of some high-minded British officers, which would not have been the case, had he been ferocious, and destitute of amiable qualities. In the war of the Revolution he was doubtless the leader of savages, who took delight in scalps; he was undeniably in command, when the wounded of Minisink were butchered; yet the slaughter may have occurred entirely without his orders. Probably his subsequent intercourse with civilized men and reading the New Testament may have softened his character. I am able to state, on the authority of his son Joseph, that as he lay in his bed and looked at the sword hanging up in his bedroom, with which he had killed his son, he was accustomed to cry in the sorrow of his heart. He once proposed to write a history of the six nations. He published the book of common prayer and the gospel of Mark, in the Mohawk and English languages, 8vo. London, 1787. The gospel according to St. John, in Mohawk, entitled Nene Karighwysoston tsinhorighhoten ne Saint John, which is ascribed to him in the Cambridge catalogue, was the work of the chief, John Norton; it is without date, but was printed at London in 1807 or 1808 by the British and foreign Bible society, in an edition of two thousand copies.—Holmes, II. 292, 302; Mass. Hist. Coll. x. 154; Phil. Trans. LXXVI. 231; Panoplist, III. 323, 324; Weld's Trav. II. 297; Wheelock's Narrative; Eastern Argus, May 7, 1822.

BRATTLE, THOMAS, a respectable merchant of Boston, was born Sept. 5, 1657, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1676, and was afterwards treasurer of that institution. He was a principal founder of the church in Brattle street, of which Dr. Colman was the first minister. His death occurred May 18, 1713, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was brother-in-law of Mr. Pemberton. Several of his communications on astronomical subjects were published in the philosophical transactions. He wrote an excellent letter, giving an account of the witchcraft delusion in 1692, which is preserved in the Hist. Collections.—Holmes, I. 511; Colman's Life, 42; Coll. Hist. Soc. v. 61–79.

BRATTLE, WILLIAM, minister of Cambridge, Mass., brother of the preceding, died Feb. 15, 1717, aged 54. He was born in Boston about the year 1662, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1680. He was afterwards for several years a tutor and fellow of that seminary. He exerted himself to form his pupils to virtue and the fear of God, punishing vice with the authority of a master, and cherishing every virtuous disposition with parental goodness. When the small pox prevailed in the college, he was not driven away in terror; but with benevolent courage remained at his post, and visited the sick, both that he might administer to them relief, and might impress upon them those truths which were necessary to their salvation. As he had never experienced the disease, he now took it in the natural way; for the practice of inoculation had not been introduced into America. But the course of the disorder was mild, and he was soon restored to his usual health. He was ordained pastor of the church in Cambridge, as successor of Mr. Gookin, Nov. 25, 1696, and after a useful ministry of twenty years was succeeded by Dr. Appleton. His funeral was attended Feb. 20, a day memorable for the great snow which then commenced, and which detained for several days at Cambridge the magistrates and ministers, who were assembled on the occasion. The snow was six feet deep in some parts of the streets of Boston.

Mr. Brattle was a very religious, good man, an able divine, and an excellent scholar. Such was his reputation for science, that he was elected a fellow of the royal society. He was polite and affable, compassionate and charitable. Having a large estate, he distributed of his abundance with a liberal hand; but his charities were secret and silent. His pacific spirit and his moderation were so conspicuous, as to secure to him the respect of all denominations. So remarkable was his patience under injuries, and such a use did he make of the troubles of life, that he was heard to observe, that he knew not how he could have spared any of his trials. Uniting courage with his humility, he was neither bribed by the favor, nor overawed by the displeasure of any man. He was a man of great learning and abilities, and at once a philosopher and a divine. But he placed neither learning nor religion in unprofitable speculations, but in such solid and substantial truth, as improves the mind and is beneficial to the world. The promotion of religion, learning, virtue, and peace was the great object, in which he was constantly employed. As he possessed peneration and a sound judgment, his counsel was often sought and highly respected. Such was his regard to the interests of literature, that he bequeathed to Harvard college 250 pounds, besides a much greater sum in other charitable and pious legacies. With regard to his manner of preaching, Dr. Colman, comparing him and Mr. Pemberton, who died about the same time, observes: "They performed the public exercises in the house of God with a great deal of solemnity, though in a manner somewhat different; for Mr. Brattle was all calm, and soft, and melting; but Mr. Pemberton was all flame, zeal, and earnestness." The death of this good man, after a languishing disease, was peaceful and serene.

He published a system of logic, entitled, "compendium logicæ secundum principia D. Renati Cartesii plerumque eformatum et catechisticè propositum." It was held in high estimation, and long recited at Harvard college. An edition of it was published in the year 1758. — Holmes Hist. Cambridge; Coll. Hist. Soc. VII. 32, 55-59; X. 168; Holmes, II. 94; Boston News-Letter, No. 671.

BRATTLE, WILLIAM, a man of extraordinary talents and character, the son of the preceding, died in Oct., 1776, aged about 75. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1722. He was a representative of Cambridge in the general court, and was long a member of the council. He studied theology and preached with acceptance. His eminence as a lawyer drew around him an abundance of clients. As a physician his practice was extensive and celebrated. He was also a military man, and obtained the appointment of major-general of the militia. While he secured the favor of the governor of the State, he also ingratiated himself with the people. In his conduct there were many eccentricities. He was attached to the pleasures of the table. At the commencement of the American Revolution an unhappy sympathy in the plans of General Gage induced him to retire to Boston, from which place he accompanied the troops to Halifax, where he died. His first wife was the daughter of Gov. Saltonstall; his second was the widow of James Allen, and daughter of Col. Fitch. His son, Thomas Brattle, of Cambridge, died Feb. 7, 1801. — Coll. Hist. Soc. VII. 58; VIII. 82.

BRAXTON, CARTER, a member of congress in 1776, died October 10, 1797, aged 61. He was the son of George Braxton, a rich planter of Newington, King and Queen's county, Virginia, born Sept. 10, 1736. His mother was the daughter of Robert Carter of the council. After being educated at William and Mary college, he married and settled down as an independent planter. On the death of his wife he visited England, and returned in 1760. By his second wife, the daughter of Richard Corbin of Lanneville, he had sixteen children: she died in 1814, and all the children but one were dead before 1829. In 1765 he became a member of the house of burgesses, and was distinguished for his patriotic zeal. In November, 1775, he was elected the successor of Peyton Randolph in congress, but continued a member of that body only till the signing of the declaration of independence. During the remainder of his life he was often a member of the legislature and council of Virginia. His talents were respectable; his oratory easy; his manners peculiarly agreeable. His last days were embittered by unfortunate commercial speculations, and vexatious lawsuits: some of his friends, his sureties, suffered with him. Though in early life a gentleman of large fortune, he found himself, in his old age, by his own imprudence, involved in inextricable embarrassments. Happy are they, who are wisely content with their lot, and who use liberally their wealth, not for display, but for the purposes of a noble charity. — Goodrich's Lives.

BRAY, THOMAS, D. D., ecclesiastical commissary for Maryland and Virginia, died Feb. 15, 1730, aged 73. He was sent out by the bishop of London, in 1699, and was indefatigable in his efforts to promote religion in the colonies, and among the Indians and Negroes. Libraries were instituted by him, both for missionaries and parishes. He crossed the Atlantic several times, and spent the greater part of his life in these labors. Soliciting the charities of others, he in his disinterested zeal contributed the whole of his small fortune to the support of his plans. Through his exertions parish libraries were established in England, and various benevolent societies in London were instituted, particularly the society for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts. He published a memorial on the state of religion in North America with proposals for the propagation of religion in the several provinces; circular letters to the clergy of Maryland; cursum catecheticum Americanum, 1700; apostolic charity; bibliotheca parochialis; discourse on the baptismal covenant.

BRAZER, JOHN, D. D., died at Charleston, S. C., Feb. 26, 1846, aged 56. Born in Worcester, he graduated in Cambridge, in 1813; he was afterwards a professor. He was ordained over the north society in Salem, Nov. 14, 1820, successor of J. E. Abbott. Many of his writings appeared in the north American Review. He published a sermon at the ordination of J. Cole; on the death of Dr. Holyoke; at the installation of A. Bigelow; Memoir of Dr. Holyoke; before society for education; several in the Christian preacher; use of affliction; on prayer; power of unitarianism over the affections.

BREARLEY, DAVID, chief justice of New Jersey, died Aug. 23, 1790, aged, it is said, only 26. He was born in that State in 1763, and received the degree of A. M. at Princeton, in 1781. He attained to great eminence at the bar. Soon after he received the appointment of judge, he died at his seat near Trenton. He was appointed by Washington in 1789, district judge for New Jersey, and was succeeded by Robert Morris.

BREARLEY, JOSEPH, general, died at Morristown, in 1805, aged 93.

BREBEUF, JEAN DE, a Jesuit missionary among the Indians in Canada, arrived at Quebec in 1625. According to Charlevoix, he twice, when among the Hurons, in a time of drought, obtained rain in answer to his prayers. However, taken prisoner by the Iroquois in 1649, he was cruelly put to death by them, with his associate, father Lallemand. Amidst their barbarities, the savages said to him, "You have assured us, that the more one suffers on earth the greater will be his happiness in heaven; out of kindness to you, we therefore torture you." At least Charlevoix reports that they said so. Brebeuf was 55 years of age. He was the uncle of the poet of Normandy, George de B. He translated into Huron an abridgment of the Christian doctrine by Ledesma. This is annexed to Champlain's relation du voyage, 1632. — Charlevoix, I. 294.

BRECK, ROBERT, a minister of Marlborough, died Jan. 6, 1731, aged 48. He was born in Dorchester in 1682, the son of Captain John Breck, a very ingenious and worthy man, and grandson of Edward Breck, a settler of Dorchester in 1636. After his father's death he was sent to Harvard college, where he graduated in 1700. He was ordained Oct. 25, 1704, as successor of Mr. Brimsmead. His successors were Kent, Smith, and Packard. He left a wife and four children. His wife was Elizabeth Wainwright of Haverhill. A daughter married Rev. Mr. Parkman, of Westborough. He was a man of vigorous talents, of quick perception, and tenacious memory, of solid judgment, and extensive learning. So great was his skill in the Hebrew, that he read the Bible out of it to his family. He was also well versed in philosophy, mathematics, antiquities, and history; and his extensive knowledge he was always ready to communicate for the instruction of others. As a pastor he was prudent and faithful; he was an orthodox, close, methodical preacher. He was a strong disputant; a strenuous assertor of the privileges of the churches; and an opponent of Episcopal claims. United with his piety, he possessed a singular courage and resolution. Before his settlement he preached some time on Long Island, during the administration of Gov. Cornbury, when, though a young man, he boldly asserted the principles of the nonconformists, notwithstanding the threatening and other ill-treatment, which he experienced. In temper, he was grave and meditative, yet at times cheerful, and in conversation entertaining. A perfect stranger to covetousness, he was ever hospitable and charitable. In severe pain he was resigned; and his end was peace. So great was the esteem, in which he was held, that in his sickness a day of fasting was kept for him Oct. 15, 1730, when several ministers were present; and on his death, sermons were preached by Swift of Framingham, Prentice of Lancaster, and Loring of Sudbury. He published an election sermon, 1728; the danger of falling away after a profession; a sacramental sermon, 1728. — Boston Weekly News-Letter, Jan. 21; Weekly Journal, Jan. 18, 1731; Loring's Sermon.

BRECK, ROBERT, minister of Springfield, died April 23, 1784, aged 70. He was the son of the preceding, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1730. He was ordained Jan. 27, 1736. His settlement occasioned an unhappy controversy. It was alleged against him, that he did not deem a knowledge of Jesus Christ necessary to the salvation of the heathen, and that he treated lightly of the atonement. A narrative relating to his ordination was published; followed by "an answer to the Hampshire narrative;" and this by "a letter" to the author of the narrative, 1737. His superior intellectual powers were enlarged by an extensive acquaintance with men and books. He accustomed himself to a close manner of thinking and reasoning. By diligent application, he acquired a rich fund of the most useful knowledge. His disposition was remarkably cheerful and pleasant, and his conversation was entertaining and instructive, sometimes enlivened by humor, but always consistent with the sobriety of the Christian and the dignity of the minister. He was easy of access, hospitable, compassionate, and benevolent. His sense of human weakness and depravity led him to admire the gracious provision of the gospel, and he delighted to dwell upon it in his public discourses. His religious sentiments he formed on a careful examination of the Scriptures. Steady to his own principles, he was yet candid towards those who differed from him. In his last illness, he spoke in the humblest terms of himself, but professed an entire reliance on divine mercy through the Mediator, and he resigned himself to death with the dignity of a Christian.

His first wife was Eunice, daughter of his predecessor, Rev. D. Brewer; his second wife was Helena, the widow of Rev. E. Dorr. His successor was Mr. Howard. His son, Robert, who died at Northampton, in 1799, aged 63, was clerk of the court of common pleas. The son of the latter, Colonel John, died in N., in 1827, aged 55; leaving sons, Dr. Edward, Robert, and Theodore, now citizens of Brecksville, Ohio.

He published a sermon, 1748; on the death of Rev. D. Parsons, 1781; of Rev. S. Williams, 1782; at the ordination of D. Parsons, 1783; also a century sermon Oct. 16, 1775, on the burning of the town by the Indians.—Lathrop's Funeral Sermon; Holland's History of Western Massachusetts, i. 201.

BRECK, SAMUEL, a merchant, removed from Boston to Philadelphia, where he died May 7, 1809. His daughter married James Lloyd.

BRECK, DANIEL, died in Hartland, Vt., Dec., 1845, aged 97. Born in Boston, he was religiously educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1774. As a chaplain he accompanied Porter's regiment to Canada, and was in the attack upon Quebec. He preached the first sermon at Marietta, on the text, "Of his kingdom there shall be no end;" having visions of the progress of the gospel in the vast western country. He was a man of high character and excellence, the father of Judge Breck of Kentucky.

BRECKENRIDGE, JOHN, attorney-general of the United States, died at Lexington, Kentucky, Dec. 14, 1806. He was elected a member of the senate in the place of Humphrey Marshall, and took his seat in 1801. In Jan., 1802, he submitted in the senate a resolution to repeal an act of the preceding session respecting the judiciary establishment of the United States, by which sixteen new circuit judges had been created. It was this resolution, which called forth the most astonishing powers of argument and eloquence. In 1803 Mr. Breckenridge distinguished himself by supporting resolutions in relation to Spanish affairs of a milder complexion, than those advocated by Mr. Ross. After the resignation of Mr. Lincoln of Mass., he was appointed attorney-general in his place.

BRECKENRIDGE, JOHN, D. D., died near Lexington, Ky., Aug. 4, 1841, aged 44. His parents were John B. and Mary Hopkins Cabell, of a Virginia family. He was one of nine children, born at Cabell's Dale, near Lexington, where he died. He was a devoted preacher, and wore himself out by his labors.

BRECKENRIDGE, ROBERT, general, died in Lexington, Ky., in Sept., 1833, aged 78.

BREED, ALLEN, one of the first settlers of Lynn, died March 17, 1692, aged 91. He was born in England in 1601 and arrived in this country in 1630, probably in the Arabella at Salem, June 12. He was a farmer and lived in the western part of Sumner street, Lynn, possessing two hundred acres of land. The village, in which he resided, derived from him the name of "Breed's End." He is one of the grantees, named in 1640 in the Indian deed of South Hampton, Long Island, which was settled from Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Fitch, and others. The name of his wife was Elizabeth; and his children were Allen, Timothy, Joseph, and John. Of these,

Allen was living in 1692, when it was voted by the town, that Allen Breed, senior, "should sit in the pulpit." The descendants in Lynn and other towns in Massachusetts, are numerous; from one of them was derived the name of Breed's Hill, in Charlestown, celebrated for the battle of 1775, called by mistake the battle of Bunker's Hill, for the battle was fought on Breed's not Bunker's Hill. One of his descendants at Lynn was Col. Fred. B., an officer of the Revolution, who died July, 1820, aged 68. Among the descendants in Connecticut were Gershom Breed, an eminent merchant of Norwich, and his sons, John M. Breed, mayor of the city, a graduate of Yale, 1768; Shubael Breed, a graduate of 1778; and Simeon Breed, a graduate of 1781. The widow of the last is still living, aged 89, the sister of E. Perkins, who died, aged above 100 years.—Lewis' History of Lynn, 25; Farmer's Register; Dwight's Travels, III. 313.

BREESE, SAMUEL SIDNEY, died in Sconodoa, Oneida county, N. Y., Oct. 15, 1848, aged 80. Born in Philadelphia, a descendant of the Huguenots, he was one of the first settlers of Cazenovia; then was the law partner of Judge Platt of Whitestown. In 1813, he became a farmer for the rest of his life. He was a member of the convention to form a new constitution. He was an excellent citizen, and a sincere Christian. His end was peace, through hope in the atoning blood.

BRENTON, WILLIAM, Governor of Rhode Island, was a representative of Boston for several years from 1635. Of Rhode Island he was president between 1660 and 1661, and governor under the charter from 1666 to 1669; in both which offices he succeeded Arnold, and was succeeded by him. He died in Newport, 1674. Several of his descendants held important offices in the colony: they adhered to the royal government at the Revolution. An admiral in the British navy was a native of Newport.—Farmer's Reg.

BRESSANI, FRANCISCO GIUSEPPE, a Jesuit missionary, was a Roman by birth. He toiled with much zeal in his mission among the Hurons in Canada, until it was broken up. Having been taken captive and tortured, he bore in his mutilated hands for the rest of his life, the proofs of his sufferings. He died in Italy. In 1643 there was published an account of his mission in Italian, entitled, Breve relatione d'ulcune missioni, &c.—Charlevoix.

BREWER, DANIEL, died at Springfield, Nov. 5, 1733, aged 65, in the 40th year of his ministry. He succeeded Mr. Glover, and was followed by Mr. Breck. Born in Roxbury, he graduated at Harvard in 1697, and was ordained in 1694. His wife was Catharine, daughter of Rev. N. Chauncey of Hatfield; her sister, Sarah, married Rev.

S. Whittelsey of Wallingford. He left six children. He published: God's help to be sought in time of war, 1724.

BREWER, CHAUNCEY, doctor, died at Springfield, in 1830, aged 87, a graduate of Yale, 1762.

BREWSTER, WILLIAM, one of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, the Elder and only teacher for some years, died about April 16, 1644, aged 83. This is the date given by Bradford; but Morton says, about April 18. He was born, probably, at Scrooby, in 1560. As there was a William B. in that town in 1571, he was probably the father of Elder Brewster of Plymouth, who himself passed the last years of his residence in England at Scrooby, as a public officer. This place, which is of great interest in American history, is a small town in Nottinghamshire, only two miles south of Bawtry, in Yorkshire, and ten miles west of Gainsborough, in Lincolnshire. It was a post town, and had a small well-built church, and an Episcopal manor, which was an occasional residence of the Archbishop of York. The manor was built in two courts, of timber, except the front, which was of brick, with a moat around it. This, it will be found, became the residence of Brewster. Nothing now remains of it, but the stone gateway. On the wood-work of the church is seen a vine bearing clusters of grapes. His family was one of some eminence. The coat-armor of one of the name, bore "a chevron ermine between three silver étoiles on a sable field." Our Brewster derives, in our view, no honor from his family; but the device of stars breaking through the darkness of night is a very suitable device for the American Brewster. He was the chief light of the Plymouth colony, in a dark wilderness.

Mr. Brewster was educated at the university of Cambridge, where his mind was impressed with religious truth, and he was renewed by the Spirit of God. After completing his education he entered into the service of William Davison, ambassador of Queen Elizabeth in Holland. This gentleman, who was friendly to religion, possessed the highest regard for Mr. Brewster, and reposed in him the utmost confidence. He esteemed him as a son. Mr. Brewster in return proved himself not unworthy of the friendship, which he had experienced; for when Davison, who had been appointed secretary of state, incurred the affected displeasure of the queen for drawing, in compliance with her orders, the warrant for the execution of Mary, he did not forsake his patron. He remained with him, and gave him what assistance it was in his power to afford, under the troubles, with which it was the policy of Elizabeth to overwhelm the innocent secretary in the year 1587. When he could no longer serve him, he retired to the north of England among his old friends.

It was now, that he resided at Scrooby, where he was post, or postmaster, from 1594 to Sept.

30, 1607. The recorded payments to him amounted in that period to 456 pounds. He was also inn-keeper to the travellers by post. As there were no cross-posts he had to provide for distant deliveries. If he had a good income, it enabled him to exercise a generous hospitality; and his abode in the Archbishop's manor furnished a convenient place of meeting for the new Puritan Separatist church.

His attention was now chiefly occupied by the interests of religion. His life was exemplary, and it seemed to be his great object to promote the highest good of those around him. He endeavored to excite their zeal for holiness, and to encourage them in the practice of the Christian virtues. As he possessed considerable property, he readily and abundantly contributed towards the support of the gospel. He exerted himself to procure faithful preachers for the parishes in the neighborhood. By degrees he became disgusted with the impositions of the prelatical party, and their severity towards men of a moderate and peaceable disposition. As he discovered much corruption in the constitution, forms, ceremonies, and discipline of the established church, he thought it his duty to withdraw from its communion, and to establish with others a separate society. This new church, under the pastoral care of the aged Mr. Clifton and Mr. Robinson, met on the Lord's days at Mr. Brewster's house, where they were entertained at his expense, as long as they could assemble without interruption. When at length the resentment of the hierarchy obliged them to seek refuge in a foreign country, he was the most forward to assist in the removal. He was seized with Mr. Bradford, in the attempt to go over to Holland in 1607, and was imprisoned at Boston, in Lincolnshire. He was the greatest sufferer of the company, because he had the most property. Having, with much difficulty and expense, obtained his liberty, he first assisted the poor of the society in their embarkation, and then followed them to Holland.

He had a large family and numerous dependents; and his estate was exhausted. As his education had not fitted him for mechanical or mercantile employments, he was now pressed with hardships. In this exigency he found a resource in his learning and abilities. He opened a school at Leyden, for instructing the youth of the city and of the university in the English tongue; and being familiar with the Latin, with which they were also acquainted, he found no impediment from the want of a language common to both. By means of a grammar, which he formed himself, he soon assisted them to a correct knowledge of the English. By the help of some friends he also set up a printing-press, and published several books against the hierarchy, which could not obtain a license for publication in England.

Such was his reputation in the church at Leyden, that he was chosen a ruling elder, and he accompanied the members of it, who came to New England in 1620. He suffered with them all the hardships attending their settlement in the wilderness. He partook with them of labor, hunger, and watching; and his Bible and his sword were equally familiar to him. As the church at Plymouth was for several years destitute of a minister, Mr. Brewster, who was venerable for his character and years, officiated as a preacher, though he could never be persuaded to administer the sacraments. According to the principles of the church, the ruling elder, in the absence of the teaching elder or pastor, was permitted to dispense the word. No regular minister was procured before the year 1629, when Ralph Smith was settled. Previously to this period the principal care of the church rested upon Mr. Brewster, who preached twice every Lord's day; and afterwards he occasionally exercised for the good of the church his talents in teaching. He died in the peace and hope of the Christian. His children were Patience, Fear, Love (a son), Wrestling, Jonathan, Lucretia, William, Mary. Jonathan removed to New London, thence to Norwich, Conn., and died 1659. His estate and residence, to which he early removed, were in Duxbury; his son, Love, succeeded him in his house. His three hundred books were valued at 43 pounds; his whole estate at 150 pounds.

Through his whole life he was remarkably temperate. He drank nothing but water, until within the last five or six years. During the famine, which was experienced in the colony, he was resigned and cheerful. When nothing but oysters and clams were set on his table, he would give thanks that his family were permitted "to suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sand." He was social and pleasant in conversation, of a humble and modest spirit; yet, when occasion required, courageous in administering reproof, though with such tenderness as usually to give no offence. He was conspicuous for his compassion towards the distressed; and if they were suffering for conscience sake, he judged them, of all others, most deserving of pity and relief. He had a peculiar abhorrence of pride. In the government of the church he was careful to preserve order and the purity of doctrine and communion, and to suppress contention. He was eminent for piety. In his public prayers he was full and comprehensive, making confession of sin with deep humility, and supplicating with fervor the Divine mercy through the merits of Jesus Christ. Yet he avoided a tedious prolixity, lest he should damp the spirit of devotion. In his discourses he was clear and distinguishing, as well as pathetic; and it pleased God to give him uncommon success, so that many were converted by his ministry. At his death he left what was called an excellent library. It was valued at 43 pounds in silver, and a catalogue of the books is preserved in the colony records.

The church at Plymouth, of which Mr. Brewster was ruling elder, was peculiar for the liberty of "prophesying" or preaching, which was allowed even to such private members as were "gifted." When Governor Winthrop visited Plymouth in 1632, in the afternoon's exercise of the Lord's day, a question, according to custom, was propounded, upon which a number of the congregation expressed their opinions, and the Governor of Massachusetts, being requested, "spoke to it" with the rest. "The preachments of the gifted brethren," says Dr. Mather, "produced those discouragements to the ministers, that almost all left the colony, apprehending themselves driven away by the neglect and contempt with which the people on this occasion treated them." This church admitted none to its communion without either a written or oral declaration of their faith and religious experience. The Scriptures were not read in public, nor was the psalm before singing, till in compassion to a brother, who could not read, one of the elders or deacons was permitted to read it line by line, after it had been previously expounded by the minister. No children were baptized unless one of the parents was in full communion, and baptized children were considered as subjects of ecclesiastical discipline. While in Holland the Lord's supper was administered every Sabbath; but it was omitted in America till a minister was obtained, and then it was administered only once in a month. — *Belknap's Amer. BREWSTER, JONATHAN, son of the preceding, lived in Duxbury in 1632, and was deputy and attorney. He removed to New London in 1638. He expressed in a letter dated at "Moheken," Sept., 1656 — probably New London — an intention of going to England. He died 1659. His son Benjamin removed to Norwich soon after 1648. By his wife, Anna Dart, of New London, he had sons Jonathan, Daniel, William, and Benjamin; and his descendants are to be found now in the vicinity. Seabury Brewster, of Norwich, the father of the dentist, Christopher Brewster, who was knighted by the Emperor of Russia, was descended from Wrestling, the brother of Jonathan, and was born in Plymouth in 1755. In 1779 there were eleven Brewster families in the east society of Norwich.

BREWSTER, RUTH, daughter of the preceding, married first John Picket, and next, in 1668, Charles Hill, of New London, who, after her death, married a daughter of Major John Mason.

BREWSTER, NATHANIEL, minister of Brookhaven, Long Island, was a graduate of the first class of Harvard college in 1642. At first he was settled in the ministry at Norfolk, England; on his return to America he was settled at Brookhaven in 1665, and died in 1690, leaving sons, John, Timothy, and Daniel, whose descendants of respectable standing remain on Long Island. — Farmer's Register.

BREWSTER, EBENEZER, general, a descendant of Elder Brewster, died at Hanover, N. H., Jan. 4, 1814, aged 74. He emigrated from Norwich, Conn. The following was his son.

BREWSTER, AMOS AVERY, colonel, died at Hanover, N. H., April 24, 1845, aged 68. He was many years sheriff of the county. His wife was a daughter of Adriana Boudinot. He suffered the unhappiness of burying six young children within a period of five years.

BREWSTER, LYMAN D., died in Hennespin, Oct. 22, 1835, aged 51; from Connecticut he removed to the west, to Tennessee and Illinois. He bequeathed 20,000 dollars to the African colonization society, and 2,500 dollars to schools.

BRICKETT, JOHN, published a work, entitled Natural history of North Carolina, with cuts, Dublin, 1737.

BRIDGE, THOMAS, minister of the first church in Boston, was born at Hackney, England, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1675. After visiting Europe as a merchant, he became a minister. He first preached at Jamaica; then at New Providence and Bermuda, and at West Jersey. He was ordained at Boston as colleague with Mr. Wadsworth, May 10, 1705. He died suddenly of an apoplexy, Sept. 26, 1715, aged 58. He was eminent for his Christian virtues. While he was upright in his dealings, he was also meek and mild; his heart was kind; and he was humble and devout. He was habitually serious. Though his talents were not conspicuous, yet his thoughts were always expressed in suitable and manly language. In prayer he was eminent. His intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures and the devotional frame of his mind rendered his supplications to the throne of grace very interesting. While he was himself exceedingly desirous of doing good, free from every particle of envy, he sincerely rejoiced in the usefulness and respectability of others. He was not desirous of honor, and so humble was the opinion which he had formed of himself, that the expression of his humility sometimes put to the blush those who were younger and more desirous of distinction. He was diligent in study, but his Bible was his library. To this book he devoted his attention, and became well acquainted with its important truths. Such was his moderation, so greatly was he desirous of peace, that it was thought he was sometimes silent when he ought to have spoken, and that he yielded too much to others. He published the following sermons: at the artillery election, 1705; on the choice of the town officers, 1710; on faith, 1713. — Colman's Fun. Serm.; Hist. Coll. III. 257.

BRIDGE, JOSIAH, second minister of East Sudbury, Mass., was graduated at Harvard college in 1758, and ordained Nov. 4, 1761, the successor of Wm. Cook, who died Nov. 12, 1760, aged 63, in the thirty-seventh year of his ministry. Mr. Bridge died June 20, 1801, aged 61, in the fortieth year of his ministry, and was succeeded by Joel Foster, who died in 1812. Before the division of the church the ministers of Sudbury were E. Brown, Sherman, and I. Loring. He was a popular preacher, with a clear, loud voice. His convention sermon in 1792 and Dudley lecture in 1797 were not printed. He published a sermon at the ordination of J. Damon; the election sermon, 1789. — Coll. Hist. Soc. s. s. IV. 61; Palladium, June 26th, 1801.

BRIDGE, EBENEZER, died Oct. 1, 1792, aged 77. Born in Boston, he was graduated in 1736, and ordained at Chelmsford in 1741, and was in office fifty years. He published the artillery election sermon, 1752; the election sermon, 1767.

BRIDGE, MATTHEW, minister of Framingham, died in 1775, a graduate of 1741. He published a sermon at the ordination of E. Stone, Reading, 1761.

BRIDGE, EDMUND, died at Dresden, Maine, Sept., 1825, aged 86. He was born in Lexington, and was a patriot of the Revolution. From 1781 to 1815 he was sheriff of Lincoln. He was an advocate of the Christian ministry and of public schools, held in esteem for his integrity and benevolence. He was the father of Judge Bridge, of Augusta.

BRIDGHAM, SAMUEL W., general, chancellor of Brown university, died in Dec., 1840, at Providence, aged 67. He was mayor, and attorney-general.

BRIDGMAN, JAMES G., a missionary, went to China in 1844, and was ordained at Canton. He died Dec. 6, 1850, in a fit of insanity inflicting a fatal wound.

BRIGGS, JAMES, the first minister of Cummington, died in 1825, aged about 70. A graduate of Yale in 1775, he was settled in 1779, the town giving him two hundred acres of land and sixty pounds for a settlement. He was a very respectable and useful minister.

BRIGGS, ELIAKIM, died at Dighton, Sept. 27, 1852, aged 86, the last of seven children, whose ages amounted to 588 years. Five brothers reached the ages of 72, 86, 87, 88, 96. The ages of two sisters amounted to 159 years.

BRIGHAM, PAUL, lieut.-gov. of Vermont, died at Norwich, June 16, 1824, aged 79. For four years he was a captain in the war of independence; five years high sheriff of Windsor county; five years chief judge of the county court; and twenty-two years lieutenant-governor. His various duties he discharged to the acceptance of his fellow citizens, till the infirmities of age admonished him to retire from the public service.—Farmer's Coll. III. Appendix, 64.

BRIGHAM, ELIJAH, judge, a member of congress, died of the croup at Washington, April 22, 1816. A native of Northborough and graduate of Dartmouth in 1778, he settled as a merchant in Westborough, and sustained various public offices.

BRIGHAM, AMARIAH, Dr., died in Utica, Sept. 8, 1849, aged 51, formerly principal of the Retreat at Hartford, and from 1842 superintendent of the State asylum for the insane at Utica. He was a brother of Dr. B., secretary of the American Bible society.

BRIGHT, FRANCIS, first minister in Charlestown, Mass., was a pupil of the famous Mr. Davenport. He arrived at Naumkeag, or Salem, in June, 1629, in company with Mr. Skelton and Mr. Higginson. Disagreeing in judgment with his two brethren, he removed to Charlestown. After tarrying here a little more than a year, and finding that the people were disposed to carry the reformation to a greater length than he thought was necessary, he returned to England in 1630. He was succeeded by Mr. Wilson.—Morse and Parish's N. E., 74; Morton, 82; Prince, 184, 188.

BRIMMER, GEORGE W., died at Florence in Sept., 1838. A graduate of Harvard in 1803, he was skilled in painting and architecture.

BRIMMER, MARTIN, mayor of Boston, died April 25, 1847. A graduate of 1814, he was distinguished for his liberality and zeal in promoting the interests of public education.

BRIMSMEAD, WILLIAM, first minister of Marlborough, died July 3, 1701. He was a native of Dorchester, and probably the son of John Brimsmead, who lived in Dorchester in 1638, and who had a son, John, born 1640. The name is the same as Brimsmead, as it was written in 1752 in the last will of John Brimsmead, of Milford, one of whose daughters married Dr. Wheelock; and the same as Brinsmade, as it was written by Daniel Nathaniel B., of Woodbury, in 1777, and as it is written at the present day. He was educated at Harvard college, but never received a degree. He, with others of his class, being displeased with a vote of the corporation, requiring the students to reside four years at Cambridge instead of three, left the institution in 1647. He was employed as a preacher at Plymouth in 1665. At Marlborough he preached as early as Sept., 1660, though he was not ordained till Oct. 3, 1666. As he was preaching, Sunday, March 20, 1676, the assembly was dispersed by an outcry of "Indians at the door." All reached the fort safely, except one man, who was wounded. The meeting-house and many dwelling-houses were burnt. He was succeeded by Mr. Brock. He was never married. He is represented as a well accomplished servant of Christ. He published the election sermon, 1681. Among the papers made use of by Prince in compiling his annals, was a journal in Latin kept by Mr. B. from 1665 to 1695 inclusively.—Coll. Hist. Soc. v. 47, 122; ix. 179; x. 89.

BRINSMADE, DANIEL, minister of Washington, Conn., died April 23, 1793, aged 74. He was a graduate of 1745. Dr. Porter succeeded him. His son, Judge Daniel, a graduate of 1772, died in 1826, aged 75. The son of the latter is Gen. Daniel B. Brinsmade, of Washington.

BRISTED, JOHN, died at Providence, Feb. 23, 1855, aged 76. He was a native of England, who arrived at New York in 1806, and in 1820 married a daughter of J. J. Astor, by whom he had a son, Charles Astor Bristed. He was many years a useful Episcopal minister; his liberality was experienced by students in theology.

BRISTOL, WILLIAM, U. S. judge for the district of Conn., died at New Haven, March 7, 1836, aged 57. Born in Hamden, he graduated in 1798. He was a judge of the State court in 1819; an upright judge and an able lawyer.

BRIT, THOMAS, died on Sampit, near Georgetown, Aug., 1825, aged 115, a soldier in the Cherokee, French, and Revolutionary wars. He rode on horseback in one day thirty-eight miles, three weeks before his death.

BROCK, JOHN, minister of Reading, died June 18, 1688, aged 67. He was born in England in 1620, and was distinguished for early piety. He came to this country about the year 1637. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1646, and, after residing there two years longer, engaged in preaching the Gospel, first at Rowley and then at the Isle of Shoals. He continued at this last place till 1662, when he removed to Reading, as successor of Samuel Hough, being ordained Nov. 13, 1662. Here he ministered in holy things till his death. He was succeeded by Mr. Pierpont. His wife was the widow of Mr. Hough.

Mr. Brock was an eminent Christian, and a laborious, faithful minister, preaching not only on the Sabbath, but frequently on other days. He established lectures for young persons, and for the members of the church. He often made pastoral visits, and they were rendered very useful by his happy talents in conversation. He was so remarkable for holiness and devotion, that it was said of him by the celebrated Mitchell: "He dwells as near heaven as any man upon earth." He was full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. Several remarkable stories are related of the efficacy of his prayers, in which he frequently had a particular faith, or an assurance of being heard. When he lived at the Isle of Shoals, he persuaded the people to enter into an agreement to spend one day in every month, besides the Sabbaths, in religious worship. On one of these days the fishermen, who composed his society, desired him to put off the meeting, as the roughness of the weather had for a number of days prevented them from attending to their usual employment. He endeavored in vain to convince them of the impropriety of their request. As most of them were determined to seize the opportunity for making up their lost time, and were more interested in their worldly than in their spiritual concerns, he addressed them thus: "If you are resolved to neglect your duty to God, and will go away, I say unto you, catch fish if you can; but as for you, who will tarry and worship the Lord Jesus Christ, I will pray unto him for you, that you may catch fish until you are weary." Of thirty-five men, only five remained with the minister. The thirty, who went from the meeting, with all their skill caught through the whole day but four fishes; while the five, who attended divine service, afterwards went out and caught five hundred. From this time the fishermen readily attended all the meetings which Mr. Brock appointed. A poor man, who had been very useful with his boat in carrying persons, who attended public worship, over a river, lost his boat in a storm, and lamented his loss to his minister. Mr. Brock said to him: "Go home, honest man; I will mention the matter to the Lord; and you will have your boat again to-morrow." The next day, in answer to earnest prayer, the poor man recovered his boat, which was brought up from the bottom by the anchor of a vessel, cast upon it without design. A number of such remarkable correspondences between the events of Providence and the prayers of Mr. Brock, caused Mr. John Allen, of Dedham, to say of him: "I scarce ever knew any man so familiar with the great God, as his dear servant Brock." — Mather's Magnalia, iv. 141-143; Coll. Hist. Soc. vii. 251-254; Stone's Fun. Sermon on Prentiss; Fitch's Sermon at the ordination of Tucke.

BROCK, ISAAC, major-general in the British army, captured Gen. Hull and his whole army at Detroit, Aug. 16, 1812. He afterwards proceeded to the Niagara frontier, and was killed in the battle of Queenstown, Oct. 13th. He was rallying his troops, which had been put to flight by a desperate charge of Col. Chrystie, when he was pierced by three balls. He was a brave and generous officer. During his funeral the guns of the American fort were fired as a token of respect. — Brackenridge's Hist. War, 73.

BROECK, ABRAHAM TEN, a patriot of the Revolution, was the president of the convention of the State of New York in 1776, and signed their eloquent address, dated at Fishkill, Dec. 21, which was written by John Jay. In Oct., 1781, he was the mayor of the city of Albany, and communicated to Gen. Heath a vote of thanks for the protection he had afforded the city. He died at Albany, Jan., 1810, aged 76.

BROECK, JOHN TEN, died at Albany in Dec., 1822. He was a patriot of the Revolution, and held various public offices, while he adorned in private life his Christian profession. — Amer. Rememb. 1777, p. 53; Heath, 320.

BROCKWAY, THOMAS, minister of Columbia, died in 1808, aged about 60. He graduated in 1768 at Yale, in the first class, whose names are alphabetically arranged. They had been previously put down according to supposed family rank or dignity. A native of Lyme, he succeeded Dr. Wheelock at Lebanon crank, now Columbia.

BROCKWAY, DEODATE, died in Ellington, Conn., Feb., 1849, aged 73, the son of the preceding, a graduate of 1797. Soon after his settlement he fell from the steeple of his new meeting-house, sixty-five feet, and was well nigh crippled for life. He was a man of sense and of high moral and Christian worth; in private life urbane and a model of hospitality. His son, John H., a graduate of 1820, was a member of congress 1839-1843. Among a few sermons, which he published, was an election sermon.

BRODHEAD, JOHN, died at New Market, N. H., April 7, 1838, aged 67, a respected Methodist minister and member of congress.

BRODHEAD, JACOB, D. D., died in Springfield, Mass., June 6, 1855, aged 73. The synod of the reformed Dutch church in session in New Brunswick, being on that day apprised by telegraph of his death, appointed a committee to attend in New York the funeral of this father in their church. Of this committee was Dr. Bethune, who had succeeded Dr. Brodhead in three of his pastoral charges — at Rhinebeck, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn — and who delivered a discourse on his decease, which was published.

It appears, by the address of Dr. De Witt, that Dr. B. was born May 14, 1782, at Marbletown, Ulster county, and was the son of Charles, a patriot and soldier, who commanded a company — chiefly raised at his own expense — at the surrender of Burgoyne. An early ancestor, Capt. Daniel, came from Yorkshire, and settled with the Hollanders and Huguenots of Ulster. Dr. B. was a graduate of Union college in 1801. In 1804 he succeeded his cousin, John Brodhead Romeyn, as pastor of the Dutch church at Rhinebeck flats. In 1809 he was installed as a colleague with Drs. Livingston, Kuypers, and Abel over the collegiate Dutch church in New York; — this sense of collegiate — as indicating a common church, composed of several churches having collegiate pastors — not being given in our dictionaries. In 1813 he took the charge of the first Dutch church in Crown street, Philadelphia. After twelve years he returned to New York, and was the pastor of Broome-street Dutch church; afterwards of Flatbush church, and from 1841 to 1846 of the central church of Brooklyn. He was an eminently pious and most useful man, a faithful servant of God in all his fields of labor, and he died in great peace in the family of his only daughter. In his sickness the Supper was administered to him by Dr. Osgood, assisted by his brethren in Springfield, Buckingham, Parsons, and Seeley.

His first wife was Anna, daughter of John N. Bleeker, Albany. His son, John Romeyn B., naval officer of New York, is known as a historian; his daughter is the wife of George M. Atwater, of Springfield. A memorial was published, with a fine portrait, containing Dr. Bethune's sermon and other pieces. He published the following discourses: at Philadelphia, 1813; a plea for the poor, 1814; new year's memorial, 1826; at thanksgiving, 1826; on education, 1831; on death of Dr. Kuypers, 1833; preached in central church, 1851.

BRODNAX, WILLIAM H., general, died in Virginia, of the cholera, in Oct., 1834, aged 48. He was a lawyer, a member of the house of delegates, and deserves honorable remembrance as an advocate of the gradual abolition of slavery.

BROMFIELD, EDWARD, an eminent merchant in Boston, died April 10, 1756, aged 60. He was born in Nov., 1695. His father, Edward, was a member of the council; his mother was the eldest daughter of Rev. Mr. Danforth, of Roxbury. By means of her instructions and the instructions of his grandmother, a daughter of Mr. Wilson, of Boston, his mind in early life was deeply impressed by religious truth. His whole life was conscientious, upright, and holy. He sustained several important trusts, and with incorruptible integrity sought the public good. He was a representative of his native town in the general court, from the year 1739 to 1743; and he would have been continued, as colleague with his brother-in-law, Thomas Cushing, but he preferred the humbler station of overseer of the poor, in which office he remained twenty-one years successively. His daughter, Sarah, married Jeremiah Powell, a member of the council. His son, Col. Henry Bromfield, a merchant in Boston, passed his last days at Harvard, where he died, Feb. 9, 1820, aged 92. His daughter married Daniel D. Rogers, of Boston. Mr. Bromfield was eminent for his Christian virtues. In his intercourse with others he was open, friendly, pleasant, and remarkable for candor. Attached to the ancient principles of New England, he loved the most zealous and awakening ministers; he worshipped the Most High in his family; he partook of the supper of his Lord and Master with the humblest reverence and the most ardent gratitude and love. In his last sickness, so deep was the sense of his unworthiness and guilt, that he enjoyed little composure till just before his death, when his apprehensions were in a great measure removed. In his most desponding moments he ever justified the ways of God. — Prince's Fun. Sermon; Boston Gaz., April 19, 1756.

BROMFIELD, EDWARD, a young man of uncommon genius, the son of the preceding, was born in Boston in 1723. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1742. He lived but a short time to display his virtues and his talents, for he died August 18, 1746, aged 23 years. From his childhood he was very amiable and modest. As he grew up, the powers of his mind were unfolded, and he discovered remarkable ingenuity and penetration, which were strengthened and increased as he became acquainted with mathematical science. His genius first appeared in the use of the pen, by which with admirable exactness he sketched the objects of nature. He made himself so familiar with Weston's shorthand, that he was able to take down every word of the professor's lectures at the college, and the sermons which were delivered from the pulpit. He was skilful in projecting maps. As he was well skilled in music, he made with his own hands an excellent organ, with two rows of keys and several hundred pipes. The workmanship exceeded anything of the kind which had been imported from England. He took peculiar pleasure in pursuits which related to natural philosophy, for he wished to behold the wisdom of God in his works. He made great improvement in the microscopes, which were then used, most accurately grinding the finest glasses, and multiplying the powers of optical instruments. He met with no mechanism which he did not readily improve. But these were only the amusements of Mr. Bromfield. He was engaged in the pursuits of higher and more interesting objects than those which had reference only to the earth and could occupy the mind but a few days. Though from childhood he possessed the virtues, which endeared him to his acquaintance, yet it was not before he reached the age of seventeen that he was converted by the influence of the Divine Spirit from his natural state of selfishness and iniquity to the supreme love of his Maker. From this period the truths of revelation claimed his intense study, and it was his constant aim to conform his life to the requisitions of the gospel. Nothing interested him so much as the character of Jesus Christ and the wonders of redemption, which he hoped would excite his admiration in the future world, and constitute his everlasting blessedness. He left behind him a number of manuscripts, which contained his pious meditations, and marked his progress towards perfection. Though his body was feeble, his whole soul was indefatigable. In his eyes there was an expression of intellect, which could not be mistaken. Had his life been spared, his name might have been an honor to his country, and philosophy might have been dignified by a connection with genuine religion. — Prince's Account of Bromfield; Panoplist, II. 193–197.

BROOKE, FRANCIS J., judge of the court of appeals in Virginia, died March 3, 1851, aged 87. He was a soldier of the Revolution, a friend of Washington. His first campaign, with his twin brother John, was under Lafayette in 1781. He was often in the legislature. In 1811 he was judge of appeals, and was re-elected in 1831 till the time of his death.

BROOKE, GEORGE M., major-general, died in San Antonio March 9, 1851. He entered the army in 1808; and he received various brevets for his defence of Fort Erie, for his sortie, and for his conduct in the war with Mexico. Fort Brooke at Tampa Bay, where he was stationed, received his name.

BROOKS, ELEAZER, a brigadier-general, died at Lincoln Nov. 9, 1806, aged 80 years. He was born in Concord, Mass., in 1726, and was a descendant of Capt. Thomas Brooks, a settler of Concord in 1636, who died May 22, 1667. Without the advantages of education he acquired a valuable fund of knowledge. It was his practice in early life to read the most approved books, and then to converse with the most intelligent men respecting them. In 1774 he was chosen a representative to the general court, and continued thirty-seven years in public life, being successively a representative, a member of the senate, and of the council. He took a decided part in the American Revolution. At the head of a regiment he was engaged in the battle at White Plains in 1776, and distinguished himself by his cool, determined bravery. From the year 1801 he secluded himself in the tranquil scenes of domestic life. Gen. Brooks possessed an uncommonly strong and penetrating mind, and his judgment as a statesman was treated with respect. He was diligent and industrious, slow in concerting, but expeditious in performing his plans. He was a firm believer in the doctrines of Christianity, and in his advanced years accepted the office of deacon in the church at Lincoln. This office he ranked above all others which he had sustained in life. — Stearns' Fun. Sermon; Columb. Centinel, Nov. 22, 1806.

BROOKS, JOHN, LL. D., governor of Mass., died March 1, 1825, aged 72. His residence was at Medford, where he was born in 1752. His father was Capt. Caleb B., a farmer; and his early years were spent in the toils of a farm, with no advantages of education but those of a town school. At the age of fourteen by a written indenture as an apprentice for seven years he was placed under the tuition of Dr. Simon Tufts. At this period he formed a friendship with his fellow student, Count Rumford. While studying medicine he also exhibited a fondness for military exercises, forming the village boys into companies and training them. Commencing the practice of physic at Reading, he took the command of a company of minute-men, for the drilling of whom he acquired some skill by observing the trainings of the British soldiers in Boston. On the news of the expedition to Lexington, April 19, 1775, he instantly marched; and, meeting the British force returning from Concord, he ordered his men to place themselves behind the barns and fences, and to fire continually upon the enemy. He soon received the commission of major in the army. He entered the service of his country with an excellent character and a high sense of moral rectitude. On the evening of June 16th he assisted in throwing up the fortifications at Breed's hill; but next morning being dispatched by Col. Prescott with a message to Gen. Ward at Cambridge, and being obliged for the want of a horse to go on foot, he did not participate in the memorable battle of the 17th June. In 1777 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel. He accompanied Arnold in August, 1777, against Col. St. Leger on the Mohawk, and suggested to Arnold the successful project of dispersing the Indians by sending out one Cuyler to spread an exaggerated account of our forces. In the battle of Saratoga, Oct. 7, at the head of his regiment he stormed and carried the intrenchments of the German troops. In the battle of Monmouth he was acting adjutant-general. When the conspiracy at Newburg in March, 1783, had well nigh disgraced the army, Washington rode up to Brooks and requested him to keep his officers within quarters to prevent their attending the insurgent meeting; the reply was, "Sir, I have anticipated your wishes, and my orders are given." With tears in his eyes, Washington took him by the hand and said, "Col. Brooks, this is just what I expected from you."

From the army Brooks returned to private life, free from the vices incident to soldiery, rich in honor, esteem, and affection, but without property and without the means of providing for his family, except by resuming his profession. His aged and infirm teacher, Dr. Tufts, resigned his business into the hands of his pupil. For many years he was major-general of the militia of his county, and he established excellent discipline, for which during the whole war he had been distinguished. As a member of the convention he advocated the adoption of the constitution of the United States. By Washington he was appointed marshal of the district and inspector of the revenue; in the war of 1812 he was appointed adjutant-general of Massachusetts by Gov. Strong, whom he succeeded as chief magistrate in 1816. For seven years successively he was re-elected; and with great dignity and faithfulness he presided over the affairs of the commonwealth. In 1823 he retired to private life, being succeeded by William Eustis. His wife died many years before. His only daughter, Luey, the wife of Rev. George O. Stuart of Kingston, Upper Canada, died Dec., 1814; and his son, John, a lieutenant in the navy, of youthful beauty and generous enterprise, fell in the battle of Lake Erie Sept. 10, 1813, on board Perry's flag-ship Lawrence. One son survived him.

Gov. Brooks held a high rank as a physician. He was scientific and skillful. His manners were dignified, courteous, and benign; and his kind offices were doubled in value by the manner in which he performed them. In the office of chief magistrate, he labored incessantly for the public good. His addresses to the legislature manifested large and liberal views. No one could doubt his integrity and devoted patriotism. He was the governor of the people; not of a party. In his native town, of which he was the pride, the citizens were accustomed to refer their disputes to his arbitrament, so that lawyers could not thrive in Medford. In private life he was most amiable and highly esteemed, the protector and friend of his numerous relatives, and the delight of all his acquaintance. The sweetness of his temper was evinced by the composure and complacency of his countenance. Towards the close of his life, he connected himself with the church in Medford, under the pastoral care of Dr. Osgood. A short time before he died, he said: "I see nothing terrible in death. In looking to the future I have no fears. I know in whom I have believed; and I feel a persuasion, that all the trials appointed me, past or present, will result in my future and eternal happiness. I look back upon my past life with humility. I am sensible of many imperfections that cleave to me. I know, that the present is neither the season nor the place in which to begin the preparation for death. Our whole life is given us for this great object, and the work of preparation should be early commenced, and be never relaxed till the end of our days. To God I can appeal, that it has been my humble endeavor to serve him in sincerity, and wherein I have failed, I trust in his grace to forgive. I now rest my soul on the mercy of my adorable Creator, through the only mediation of his Son, our Lord. O, what a ground of hope is there in that saying of an apostle, that God is in Christ reconciling a guilty world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them? In God I have placed my eternal all; and into his hands I commit my Spirit!" To the medical society he bequeathed his library. Besides his valuable official communications as chief magistrate, he published an oration to Cincinnati society, 1787; discourse before the humane society, 1795; eulogy on Washington, 1800; discourse on pneumonia, before the medical society, 1808. — Thacher's Med. Biog., 192-207; Dixwell's Memoir; Columb. Centinel, May 18, 1825.

BROOKS, PETER CHARDON, died in Boston, Jan. 1, 1849, aged 82. A native of Medford, he opened an Insurance office in Boston, in 1789; he was very successful, and retired from business in 1803, in early life, a man of great wealth; yet he was afterwards, for a few years, the president of the New England Insurance Company, the first company of the kind in the State. For the remainder of his long life, he lived in summer in Medford, and in winter in Boston. The principal merchants with whom he was associated in business, were Thomas Russell, John Hancock, the Amorys, Joseph Burrell, S. Breck, S. Brown, C. Bulfinch, John Codman, S. Elliot, Gardner Green, Stephen Higginson, Tuthill Hubbard, John C. Jones, Theodore Lyman, Jonathan Mason, Samuel Parkman, the Perkins', the Phillips', W. Powell, David Sears, and Joseph Russell, of whom only the last was living in 1854. As a member of the senate and chairman of a committee, he did great service to the cause of public virtue, by his report on the Plymouth Beach Lottery. It put an end to all grants of lotteries in Massachusetts. It appears that the lottery, granted in 1812, had been conducted by the managers in eleven classes; the result was, that from 118,000 tickets, amounting to 883,000 dollars, the managers paid the town of Plymouth less than 10,000 dollars. The following were his principles in business: To abstain from all speculative investments; to take no more than the legal interest; and never to borrow money. As a man he was highly respected and esteemed. His three daughters were married to Edward Everett, Charles F. Adams, and Dr. N. L. Frothingham. His life, by E. Everett, is in "Lives of American Merchants."

BROOKS, ALEXANDER S., lieutenant-colonel, was killed in Florida, Dec. 19, 1836, by the bursting of the boiler of a steam packet. A son of Gov. B., a graduate of 1802, he was in the army of his country nearly thirty years.

BROOKS, MARA, MRS., died at Matanzas, Nov. 11, 1845, aged about 50 years. She was born in Medford; lived some years in Boston, and at last in Matanzas. About 1828 she visited Europe, and shared the friendship of Wordsworth and Southey, who superintended the publication of her poem, Zophiel, and pronounced her "the most impassioned and imaginative of all poetesses." The refinement of her taste has been questioned; but the reputation of her poems was high.

BROOKS, JAMES G., poet and editor, died at Albany, Feb. 20, 1841, aged 39. Born at Claverack, he graduated at Union college in 1819. He edited various papers in New York, Winchester, Rochester, and Albany. He published The Rivals of Este, and other poems, by J. G. and Mary E. Brooks, 1829.

BROOME, JOHN, lieutenant-governor of New York and president of the Senate, was an eminent merchant, and for many years at the head of various commercial, charitable, and religious institutions. In 1777 he was a member of the convention, which framed the constitution of New York. In 1804 he was elected lieutenant-governor; and he died Aug 8, 1810, aged 82.

BROUWERE, JOHN H. J., a sculptor and painter, died in Newport, R. I., Sept. 5, 1834.

BROWN, CHADD, minister of Providence, R. I., fled thither from persecution in Massachusetts, in 1636, and became in 1639 one of the members of the Baptist church, then formed by Roger Williams, when Wm. Wickenden was appointed first elder. With him Mr. Brown was associated in the pastoral care of the church, in 1642. He died about 1665, and his colleague in 1669. In 1792 the town of Providence voted to erect a monument to his memory. His descendants for nearly two centuries have been among the most distinguished citizens of Rhode Island. His grandson, James Brown, was a minister of the same church; and four of the grandsons of James have been patrons of Brown university; — Nicholas; Joseph, L.L.D., who died Dec., 1785; John, an eminent merchant, who died Sept. 20, 1803, aged 67; and Moses. — Coll. Hist. Soc. s. s. IX. 197.

BROWN, EDMUND, the first minister of Sudbury, Mass., came from England in 1637, was ordained Aug., 1640, over the 18th church in Mass., and died June 22, 1677. He sustained a good character, and was a man of distinction in his day. His successors were James Sherman, who was dismissed in 1705; Israel Loring, who died March 9, 1772, aged 89; and Jacob Bigelow, and Timothy Hilliard.

BROWN, JOHN, minister of Haverhill, Mass., was born in Brighton, and was graduated in 1714, and ordained the successor of Joseph Gardner, May 13, 1719. He died Dec. 2, 1742, aged 46, being greatly esteemed for his learning, piety, and prudence, and was succeeded by Edward Barnard. By his wife, Joanna, daughter of Rev. Roland Cotton, he had four sons, educated at Cambridge, three of whom were ministers; viz., John of Cohasset, who graduated in 1741, and died Sept. 21, 1791; Cotton of Brookline, who graduated in 1743, and died April 13, 1751; and Thomas of Stroudwater, who graduated in 1752, and died in 1797. Of his three daughters, one married John Chipman of Marblehead, and another Rev. Edward Brooks of North Yarmouth and Medford, father of Peter C. Brooks. He published a sermon on the death of Thomas Symmes, 1726. — Mass. Hist. Coll. s. s. IV. 142.

BROWN, JOHN, colonel, a distinguished officer in the Revolutionary war, was born in Sandisfield, Berkshire county, Mass., Oct. 19, 1744. His parents removed from Woodstock, Conn., first to Brimfield, then to Granville, and to Sandisfield, and last to Rutland, Vt. After graduating at Yale college in 1771, he studied law with Oliver Arnold in Providence, and commenced the practice at Caghawaga, now Johnstown, New York, and was appointed king's attorney. However, in a short time, about the year 1773, he removed to Pittsfield, where there was then but one lawyer, Woodbridge Little. But these two men of the law had very different notions of patriotism. Mr. Brown was resolved to hazard every thing in resistance of oppression. Bold and prudent and having a fine personal appearance, he was selected by the state committee of correspondence in 1774 for the hazardous enterprise of going to Canada to excite the people to revolt. He went in the spring of 1774, and returned in the autumn, and went again in 1775. His pretence was the purchase of horses; but the Canadians remarked that he was a singular jockey, for the horses never suited him. Once, indeed, the house in which he lodged was assailed; but he made his escape. He was a delegate to the provincial congress, Feb. 15, 1775. Immediately after the battle of Lexington, some gentlemen in Connecticut formed the project of taking Ticonderoga by surprise. Captains Edward Mott and Noah Phelps of Hartford marched April 29th, privately, with sixteen unarmed men. Arriving at Pittsfield, they communicated the project to Mr. Brown and Col. James Easton; also to Arnold, who was then at Pittsfield. These gentlemen instantly engaged in the affair, and led by Arnold, they captured the fort of Ticonderoga, May 10th. Mr. Brown was intrusted with the business of conveying away the prisoners, amounting to 100, and was also sent as express to the general congress at Philadelphia, where he arrived May 17th. In July, he and Allen were dispatched through the woods into Canada, to assure the Canadians that their religion and liberties should not be impaired by the approaching army. On the 24th of Sept., he took fort Chamblee. The next day, Allen, who expected the co-operation of Brown, marched upon Montreal, but was attacked by a superior force, and was taken prisoner. As this was an expedition unauthorized by any higher authority, Allen was treated with great severity.

While Arnold was before Quebec, Maj. Brown arrived from Sorel and joined him; Montgomery had arrived two days before. In the attack on Quebec, Dec. 31st, Maj. Brown, with a part of a regiment of Boston troops, was directed to cooperate, by making a false attack upon the walls to the south of St. John's gate, and to set fire to the gate with combustibles, prepared for the purpose. He executed his part in the enterprise; Col. Livingston, owing to the depth of the snow, failed in his. In this assault, Montgomery fell. The congress, Aug. 1, 1776, voted him a commission of lieutenant-colonel, with rank and pay in the continental army from Nov., 1775. In Dec., 1776, he conducted a regiment of militia to fort Independence. After the defeat of Col. Baum at Bennington, in 1777, he was dispatched by Gen. Lincoln, from Pawlet to the north end of Lake George with 500 men, to relieve our prisoners. By marching all night, he attacked the enemy at break of day, Sept. 17th, at the landing, three miles from Ticonderoga; set at liberty 100 of our men; made prisoners of 293; took the landing, Mount Defiance, Mount Hope, the French lines, and the block house; 400 batteaux, an armed sloop, several gun-boats, a few cannon, and a vast quantity of plunder. His letter to Gates, Sept. 13, described his success, which tended to raise the spirit of the troops, and to excite the militia to join their brethren. After this exploit, he joined the main army. In the next month Burgoyne was captured.

Soon after this event, Col. Brown retired from the service, on account of his detestation of Arnold. In the campaign in Canada, in 1776, he had become acquainted with his character; and it is remarkable, that at this period, three years before the treason of Arnold, Col. Brown published a handbill of thirteen or fourteen articles against him, in the height of his fame, charging him with levying contributions on the Canadians for his own private use and benefit. He said that Arnold would prove a traitor, for he had sold many a life for money. The people of La Prairie had submitted on the promise of good quarters; but their village was plundered and burnt, and lives were destroyed. After this, Col. Brown was employed occasionally in the Massachusetts service. He was chosen a member of the general court, in 1778.

In the fall of 1780, he marched up the Mohawk, for the relief of Gen. Schuyler, but was led by a traitor into an ambuscade of Canadians, Tories, and Indians at Stone Arabia, in Palatine, and was slain on his birth-day, Oct. 19, 1780, aged 36 years. Forty-five of his men, many of whom marched from Berkshire the week before, were also killed. The same day, at Fox's Mills, Gen. Van Rensselaer defeated the same party under Sir John Johnson. This force had destroyed Scholiarie. Col. Brown's daughters married Wm. Butler, printer, Northampton; and Dr. Hooker of Rutland, Vt.; the former is still living at Northampton, at an advanced age. His son, Henry C. Brown, was for several years the sheriff of Berkshire. When he was in Albany, on his way to Stone Arabia, Col. Brown had the curiosity to call upon Ann Lee, then in prison, the mother of the Shakers; and he assured her, by way of pleasantries, that on his return he should join her society. About a fortnight after his death, two grave-looking Shakers proceeded from Albany to Pittsfield, and presented themselves before the widow of Col. Brown, saying, that they came from mother Ann with this message to her, that her husband in spirit, since his death, had come and joined mother Ann's company, and had given express orders that his widow should also join the society. But mother Ann, with all her art, did not in this case find a dupe. Mrs. Brown, who became the wife of Capt. Jared Ingersoll, and who gave me this narrative, bid the stupid messengers go about their business. Yet this mother Ann is now by multitudes regarded as a divinely commissioned teacher of true religion and the way to heaven. When will rational men cease to yield up their understandings to gross and palpable imposture, like that of Ann Lee and Emanuel Swedenborg? It will never be, until they are willing to receive the truth of God from his Word, and to obey his commands.—Hist. Berkshire, 119, 122, 378; Amer. Rememb. 1776. p. 458; Coll. Hist. Soc. II. 56, 117, 197; s. s. II. 240, 243; III. 236.

BROWN, JOSEPH, professor of experimental philosophy, in the college of R. I., died Dec. 3, 1785, aged 52. He was distinguished for skill in mechanical science; being the first in this country to construct and apply the British invention of the steam engine.

BROWN, NICHOLAS, an eminent merchant of Rhode Island, died at Providence, May 29, 1791, aged 61. He was the grandson of James Brown, minister of the Baptist church, in Providence; and James was the grandson of Chadd Brown, a minister of the same church, after Roger Williams, in 1642. From early youth his attention had been directed to mercantile pursuits, and by the divine blessing upon his diligence and uprightness he acquired a very ample fortune. But although he was rich, he did not make an idol of his wealth. His heart was liberal, and he listened to every call of humanity or science. The interests of government, of learning, of religion were dear to him. He loved his country, and rejoiced in her freedom. The public buildings in Providence, sacred to religion and science, are monuments of his liberality. He was an early and constant patron of the college. In his religious principles he was a Baptist, and he was a lover of good men of all denominations. He was not ashamed of the gospel, nor of the poorest of the true disciples of the Redeemer. His general knowledge, and the fruitfulness of his invention,

BROWN, ANDREW, editor of the Philadelphia Gazette, was born in Ireland, about the year 1744. He came to America in 1773, as a soldier in the British regiment; but he quitted the service, and settled in Massachusetts. He engaged in the American cause at the commencement of the war, and displayed great courage in the battles of Lexington and Bunker's Hill. He was also a useful officer in the northern army under General Gates. At the close of the war he established an academy for young ladies in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, on a very liberal and extensive plan. He afterwards removed to Philadelphia, where he pursued the same object; but as his employment did not well accord with a very irritable temper, he relinquished it. He now established the Federal Gazette, the first number of which was published Oct. 1, 1788. The present government of the United States had not then commenced, and his paper was the channel through which some of the most intelligent friends of the constitution addressed the public. He pursued his task with indefatigable industry; but difficulties pressed upon him, and he seemed to have little prospect of deriving much pecuniary advantage from his paper, before the city was visited with yellow fever in 1793. As he remained in Philadelphia during the ravages of the pestilence, and continued his Gazette, when the other daily papers were suspended, he derived from the circumstance an increase of patronage, which at length rewarded his labors. His exertions were not relaxed through his success; but changing the name of his paper to that of the Philadelphia Gazette, and resolving, that it should not be devoted exclusively to any political sect, but should be open to discussions from every side, he made it a correct vehicle of important intelligence. The profits of his establishment were now great, and he was in the midst of prosperity, when it pleased God to overwhelm him with ruin. His house took fire by means of his office, which was one part of it, Jan. 27, 1797, and in an unsuccessful attempt to rescue his family from the flames, he was so much burned, that he survived but a few days. His wife and three children were next day committed to a common grave, and the next Saturday, Feb. 4, 1797, his spirit followed them into another world. The only survivor of the family was a son, born in Ireland of a former wife, who became one of the proprietors of the Gazette, after the death of his father. — Hardie's Biog. Dict.; Monthly Mag., 1797, p. 71, 72.

BROWN, JOHN, died Sept. 21, 1701, aged 66, the minister of Cohasset for forty-four years. He was the son of Rev. J. B., of Haverhill, and a graduate of 1711. When, settled, he called to see an opposer, who said he liked his person, but disapproved his preaching. "I agree with you," said Mr. B., "my preaching I do not like very well myself; but how great a folly, that you and I should set up our opinion against that of the whole parish!" This stroke of humor reconciled the opponent. He published a sermon on the death of Dr. Mayhew, 1766; also on the deceitfulness of the heart, and a thanksgiving discourse.

BROWN, MOSES, a brave officer in the navy of the United States, died of an apoplectic fit, Jan. 1, 1804, aged 62 years. During the last 48 years of his life he followed the profession of a mariner. In the Revolutionary war his reputation gained him the command of several of the largest private armed ships from New England. In these stations he was zealous, brave, and successful. He was engaged in several severe battles with the enemy. When the small American navy was establishing, a number of years after the war, the merchants of Newburyport built a ship by subscription for the government, and obtained the command of her for Capt. Brown. His advanced age had not impaired his skill, nor deprived him of his zeal and activity. While he commanded the Merrimac, he was as enterprising and successful as formerly. When the reduction of the navy took place, he was dismissed from office; but his finances did not allow him to retire from business, and he followed till his death his accustomed avocation. — N. E. Repository, Jan. 14, 1804.

BROWN, WILLIAM HILL, a poet, died at Murfreesborough, North Carolina, where he was studying law, Sept. 2, 1793, aged 27. He wrote a tragedy, founded on the death of Andre, and a comedy. His Ira and Isabella was published in 1807.

BROWN, SAMUEL, M. B., a physician in Boston, was the son of an innkeeper of the same name, and was born at Worcester in 1768. He graduated at Harvard college in 1793; obtained the degree of M. B. in 1797; and died at Bolton in Jan., 1805, aged 36. His wife was a daughter of Dr. Jeffries. He lost a brother by the yellow fever of 1798. Dr. Brown was very much respected, and promised to be distinguished in his profession. He published a dissertation on bilious malignant fever, 1797, and a valuable dissertation on yellow fever, which received the premium of the humane society, 8vo., 1800; on mercury, in Medical Repository, vol. VI.

BROWN, CHARLES BROCKDEN, a distinguished writer, died Feb. 22, 1810, aged 39. He was born in Philadelphia Jan. 17, 1771. After a classical education under Robert Proud, author of the history of Pennsylvania, he was at the age of eighteen apprenticed to a lawyer, Alexander Wilcox; but his time was chiefly employed, not in the study of the law, but in various literary pursuits. Timidity and an invincible dislike to the legal profession prevented him from becoming a member of the bar. He published in 1798 his first novel, Wieland, which gained for him reputation; and in 1799 Ormond, or the secret witness, which was less successful. Next followed Arthur Mervyn, in which the ravages of the yellow fever, witnessed by the author in Philadelphia and New York, are faithfully described. He wrote also Edgar Huntley; and in 1801 Clara Howard, in an epistolary form, and then Jane Talbot in 1804,—the two last being much inferior to his preceding productions. He conducted two periodical works; in 1799 and 1800 the Monthly Magazine and American Review, and in 1805 the Literary Magazine and American Register. He also wrote three political pamphlets. In 1806 he commenced the semi-annual American Register, five volumes of which he lived to publish.

Of a delicate constitution, his lungs in 1809 gave clear indications that he was in a consumption. He travelled in New Jersey and New York, but without benefit. His wife, whom he married in 1804, was the sister of John B. Linn. His son, Eugene L., a youth of great promise, died of the consumption in 1824.

His novels, which were admired while he lived, fell into oblivion after his death; but after a few years they began to be read in England, and they were republished in Boston. They present, in rich language, varied incidents and powerful emotions, and the author has a wonderful invention; but his scenes are terrific, and the horrors of crime are oppressive to the heart. As his novels were produced with great rapidity, they are all deficient in unity, and apparently unfinished. There is no moral in them; no useful end was proposed. Mr. Brown wrote for amusement, and for the indulgence of his diseased imagination; and his writings, like much of modern literature, are not tinged with the spirit of that holy religion, which will at a future day pervade the productions of all the learned of the earth. He was an admirer of Godwin; and by Godwin, who acknowledged that he was indebted to him, he was regarded as a writer of distinguished genius. His style is free from affectation, simple and nervous. "For a large part of his short life he appears as a sad enthusiast, a sceptical inquirer, a dissatisfied observer, a whimsical projector of better things for society than he could ever bring to pass, or in a calm moment wish to realize; turning his mind to various pursuits with rash eagerness; planning epics, studying architecture, forming literary associations, discussing legal questions with his fellow students, and abandoning the profession of his choice before he had felt either its vexations or excitements, or even framed a tolerable excuse for his conscience, or an answer to the persuasions of his friends. Such was his hurried, mingled, undirected life." The latter part of his literary career was more beneficial to himself and useful to the world. With a fixed and important object before him, and a course of study, directed in its subjects and manner of prosecution by a sober judgment, his days might have been prolonged, and have been passed in comparative happiness.

In 1815 William Dunlap published a short account of his life, with selections from his letters, manuscripts, and printed works. Besides the magazines already mentioned, and the novels, which were reprinted at Boston, 6 vols., 1827, Mr. Brown translated Volney's travels in the U. S., 1804; and wrote a memoir of J. B. Linn, prefixed to Valerian, 1805; address to the government of the U. S. on the cession of Louisiana to the French, etc., 1803; the British treaty, 1808; address to congress on the restrictions of foreign commerce, etc., 1809.—North American Review, June, 1819; Encyclopedia Americana.

BROWN, SAMUEL R., author of several books, in the war of 1812 was a volunteer in the corps of mounted riflemen, commanded by Col. R. M. Johnson. He afterwards edited a newspaper at Cayuga, N. Y., called the Patriot, which on account of pecuniary embarrassment he relinquished in 1815. He died at Cherry Valley, Sept. 15, 1817, aged 42. He published view of the campaigns of the northwestern army, 1814; history of the war of 1812, in two vols.; western gazetteer, or emigrant's directory, 1817.

BROWN, CHARLES. M. D., died at Harper's Ferry Sept., 1824, leaving a large estate to the Philadelphia medical hospital.

BROWN, RICHARD, colonel, a Cherokee Indian, died in Tennessee Jan. 26, 1818, aged 45, when Gen. Jackson was proceeding against the Seminole Indians. He was one of the Cherokee delegation, appointed to proceed to Washington in order to carry into effect the objects of a treaty, which the nation had made with the United States. The American government had not in 1818 renounced and cast away the obligations of sacred treaties with the Cherokees, pledging the faith of the country for their protection within defined boundaries. Col. Brown was regarded by his countrymen as a leader in war and a wise counsellor in peace. In every battle during the Creek war he was at the head of the Cherokees under Gen. Jackson, whose personal friendship he enjoyed. He was severely wounded in the action at the Horse Shoe. His blood and that of his countrymen was shed for ungrateful and faithless whites, determined for the sake of their lands to drive them from their beautiful hills and valleys into the wide plains of the wilderness beyond the Mississippi. Possibly a returning sense of right will yet spare the remains of the red men, the original occupants of our country, and allow them to lie down in the dust by the graves of their fathers. An old English charter will be found a poor justification of injustice and inhumanity towards a weak and defenceless people.—Boston Patriot, Feb. 18, 1818.

BROWN, CLARK, died in William and Mary parish, Maryland, where he was an Episcopal minister, Jan. 12, 1817. He had been a Congregational minister in Machias in 1795, and at Brimfield in 1798. He published a sermon on Noah's prophecy as to Japheth, 1805; a Masonic sermon, 1814; a volume of select sermons was published after his death.

BROWN, FRANCIS, D. D., president of Dartmouth college, died July 27, 1820, aged 36. He was born at Chester, N. H., Jan. 11, 1784, and graduated in 1805 at Dartmouth, where he was a tutor from 1806 to 1809. In January, 1810, he was ordained the minister of North Yarmouth, Maine, as the successor of Tristram Gilman, whose daughter he married. Of Bowdoin college he was an overseer and trustee. In 1815 he was appointed president of Dartmouth college. He died of the consumption. His predecessor was Dr. Wheelock; his successor Dr. Dana. "His talents and learning, amiableness and piety eminently qualified him for the several stations which he filled, and rendered him highly useful and popular." He published several sermons, among which are the following: at the ordination of Allen Greely, 1810; at a fast on account of the war, 1812; on the evils of war, 1814; before the Maine missionary society, 1814.—Lord's Lempr.

BROWN, BENJAMIN, captain, a pioneer of the West, died in Athens, O., in Oct., 1821, aged 76. He was a professor of religion, much respected. He was born in Leicester, Mass., the son of Captain John, and grandson of William, a first settler of Hatfield. He was a soldier in the war, after living in various places. He died at his son's, Gen. John Brown's. His descendants are numerous.—Hildreth.

BROWN, CATHARINE, a Cherokee, died July 18, 1823, aged 23. She was born about the year 1800, at a place now called Wills-valley, in a beautiful plain of tall forest trees, within the chartered limits of Alabama, a few miles west of the Georgia line and twenty-five miles southeast of the Tennessee river. On each side of the valley rose the Raccoon and Lookout mountains. Her parents were half-breeds; their mothers only being full-blooded Cherokees. Her father's name was Yaunungyahski, which means, "the drowned by a bear;" he had also the name of John Brown, from his father. Her mother's name was Tsaluh; she was called by the whites, Sarah; and before she married Brown, she was the wife of Webber, by whom she had a son, a man of property, now called Col. Webber. Catharine's parents were ignorant of the English language, and the amount of their religion was, that there was a Creator of the world, and also a future state of rewards and punishments.

In 1801 the Moravians commenced a mission at Spring-place in the Cherokee country, about forty or fifty miles east of Wills-valley; soon afterwards Rev. Gideon Blackburn made efforts for several years to establish a school among the Cherokees. In 1816 Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, employed by the American board for foreign missions, appeared at a Cherokee council and obtained permission to establish schools. He selected, as the place for the first school, Chickamaugah, now called Brainerd, twenty or thirty miles north of Spring-place, within the limits of Tennessee. Catharine heard of this school, and though living at a distance of one hundred miles, she became a member of it in July, 1817, being then seventeen years of age. She had learned to speak English by residing at the house of a Cherokee friend, and could read in words of one syllable. Although an Indian girl of comely features and blooming, and although she had been placed amidst many temptations, yet her moral deportment had been always correct. She was modest and gentle, but withal somewhat fond of displaying the ornaments of her dress. In three months she learned to read and write. In Dec., 1817, she cherished the hope that she had experienced the power of the gospel in her heart. She was baptized Jan. 25, 1818, and admitted as a member of the church March 29th. In June, 1820, she undertook to teach a school at Creek-path, near her father's. For sweetness of temper, meekness, and gentleness she was unsurpassed. To her parents she was very dutiful and affectionate. A weekly prayer meeting was instituted by her, and she was zealous to instruct her ignorant neighbors in the great truths of the Gospel. She formed the purpose of perfecting her education, that her usefulness might be increased. But in the spring of 1823 her health declined, she had a settled consumption, and it became evident that her death was near. She said: "I feel perfectly resigned to the will of God. I know he will do right with his children. I thank God that I am entirely in his hands. I feel willing to live, or die, as he thinks best. My only wish is, that He may be glorified." Having been conveyed about fifty miles, to the house of her friend, Dr. Campbell, she there died. She was buried at Creek-path, by the side of her brother, John, who had died the preceding year in the triumphs of the same faith. Dr. Campbell remarks: "The Saviour seemed to be continually the anchor of her hope, the source of her constant and greatest happiness, and the object of her most ardent love." A pure flame of benevolence burned within her. "My heart," she says, "bleeds for my poor people; I am determined to pray for them while God lends me breath." If it be asked:

"Fair spirit, nursed in forest wild,
Where caught thy breast those sacred flames?"

The answer must be : from the beams of that Sun of Righteousness, which is the light of the world ; from that glorious Gospel, which it is the duty of Christians to communicate to all the heathen tribes of the earth. Her conversion was the means of the establishment of a mission at Creek-path, and of the conversion to the faith and hopes of Christianity of her father and of most of her family. Let any scoffer at missions contemplate this lovely child of the wilderness, won from the gloom of paganism to the joyous, lofty hopes of Christianity, and triumphing over the king of terrors, and then say, if he can, that the missionary enterprise is idle, and useless, and a waste of money. An interesting memoir of Catharine Brown was compiled by Rufus Anderson, assistant secretary of the American board for foreign missions, and published in 1825. — Anderson's Memoir.

BROWN, DAVID, a Cherokee, a brother of the preceding, died at Creek-path, Sept. 14, 1829. He followed his sister to the school at Brainerd. In Nov., 1819, he assisted John Arch in preparing a Cherokee spelling-book, which was printed. At the school he became convinced of his sinfulness, and embraced the salvation offered in the Gospel. In 1820, on going home to visit his sick father, he immediately took his Bible and began to read and interpret it to his parents, exhorting them and others to repent of their many sins and to become the followers of Jesus Christ. With his father's consent he maintained the worship of God in the family. This visit induced Mr. Brown and other chiefs to solicit the establishment of a mission at Creek-path town ; the school was opened by Rev. Mr. Buttrick, in March, 1820. May 11th, David Brown, soon after he was admitted to the church, set out for New England, to attend the foreign mission school at Cornwall, Conn., that he might be prepared to preach the gospel. His visits to Boston and other towns had a favorable effect in exciting a missionary zeal. After passing two years at the school, with Elias Boudinot and six other Cherokees, he remained a year at Andover, enjoying many advantages for improvement. In the mean time his brother, John, had become a convert and made a profession and died in peace ; his parents also and other members of his family had become pious. He returned to them in 1824, having first delivered in many of the principal cities and towns an address on the wrongs, claims, and prospects of the American Indians. His father had removed to the Arkansas, west of the Mississippi ; and there, on his arrival at Dwight, July 12, he immediately engaged in efforts to enlighten and convert his countrymen. "On the Sabbath," said he, "I interpret English sermons, and sometimes preach myself in the sweet language of Tsallakee," (the Cherokee.) He attended Indian councils and was appointed the secretary of the Indian government. But he soon revisited his people on the east of the Mississippi. His father died in Arkansas in the autumn of 1826, aged 65, having been a worthy member of the church about five years, and having the satisfaction of seeing two sons and four daughters also members of the church. In the spring of 1829, David Brown was taken ill and bled at the lungs. He wrote, June 1st : "On the bed of sickness I have enjoyed sweet communion with my Saviour." He died at the house of Rev. Mr. Potter, giving evidence that he died in the faith of the gospel.

In Sept., 1825, he wrote a letter, giving some account of the Cherokees, from which it appears that there were then about 14,000 on the east of the Mississippi, among whom were 1,277 African slaves. The northern part of the Cherokee country was mountainous ; at the south were extensive, fertile plains, watered with beautiful streams. "These plains," said he, "furnish immense pasturage, and numberless herds of cattle are dispersed over them. Horses are plenty. Numerous flocks of sheep, goats, and swine cover the valleys and hills. On Tennessee, Ustanala, and Ganasagi rivers Cherokee commerce floats. The climate is delicious and healthy ; the summers are mild. The spring clothes the ground with its richest scenery. Cherokee flowers of exquisite beauty and variegated hues meet and fascinate the eye in every direction. In the plains and valleys the soil is generally rich, producing Indian corn, cotton, tobacco, wheat, oats, indigo, sweet and Irish potatoes. Apple and peach orchards are quite common. Butter and cheese are seen on Cherokee tables. Cotton and woollen cloths are manufactured here. Schools are increasing every year ; learning is encouraged and rewarded. Our native language, in its philosophy, genius, and symphony, is inferior to few, if any, in the world. Our system of government, founded on republican principles, by which justice is equally distributed, secures the respect of the people. The legislative power is vested in what is denominated Tsallagi Tinilawigi, consisting of a national committee and council. Members of both branches are chosen by and from the people for a limited period. The Christian religion is the religion of the nation." The meaning of the last assertion is, that Christianity was approved, and the propagation of it encouraged by the national council, although thousands yet remained in the darkness of paganism. Such and still greater was the progress of the Cherokees toward civilization, under the sanction of sacred treaties with the United States, when the Georgians, greedy for the Cherokee lands and the Cherokee gold mines, determined to annoy them and compel them to sell their little remaining nook of territory, and, abandoning the graves of their fathers, to seek a new abode, offered them by the United States government in the wilderness, west of the Mississippi. We, as a nation, are chargeable with enormous injustice towards our Indian brethren. One thing is certain, that public oppression always cries to Heaven for vengeance upon the guilty nation. Nor does the bolt ever fail to strike the guilty.—Anderson's Memoir of C. Brown; Missionary Herald.

BROWN, JACOB, major-general, died in Washington, Feb. 24, 1828, aged 52. He was born in 1775, in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, where he resided until twenty years of age. Afterwards he lived two years in Ohio, engaged in surveying public lands. Settling in the city of New York, he superintended a large school and commenced the study of the law; but he soon relinquished these pursuits, and emigrated to uncultivated lands, which he had purchased on the borders of Lake Ontario. He built in the wilderness the first house at Brownville, which is now, in consequence of his adventurous spirit, a flourishing, beautiful village. In 1812 he was called into service as a militia general. His arrangements were judicious, and he repulsed an attempt of the enemy against Ogdensburg. In the spring of 1813 he was invited by Col. Backus, then in command at Sackett's harbor, when it was invested and menaced by the enemy, to assume the defence. Gen. Brown was successful, and soon afterwards received an appointment of brigadier-general in the regular army; early in 1814 he was appointed, with the rank of major-general, to the command of the army of Niagara. The four principal incidents in the Niagara campaign were the battles of Chippewa and Niagara, and the defence and sortie of fort Erie. In the two first and the last he commanded in person. The army crossed into Canada the morning of July 3d, the two brigades of regulars being commanded by Generals Scott and Ripley, and the volunteers by Gen. Porter. Fort Erie was surprised and taken. The battle of Chippewa was fought July 5th, by Scott's brigade, and the enemy were driven to their intrenchments; the American loss being 338, the British 500. On the 10th, Gen. Brown marched to Queenstown. Here, at a conference of officers, it was debated, whether the army should proceed to invest fort George or to attack Gen. Riall at Twelve-mile creek, ten or twelve miles from Queenstown. Gen. Scott was in favor of investing the fort. Gen. Ripley proposed to march in the night with his brigade and the artillery of Towson, and attack Riall in the morning, so as to break him up before he should be reinforced. He deemed it idle to invest the fort with inadequate artillery. Gen. Porter and Cols. Mc-

Ree and Wood concurred with him in opinion. But the contrary opinion of Generals Brown and Scott and Col. Gardner prevailed. From the 16th to the 23d of July the army lay before fort George, and retrograded to Chippewa on the 24th. The battle of Bridgewater or Niagara was fought with the reinforced enemy July 25th. It was commenced by Scott's brigade. Gen. Ripley advanced to his support, and arriving on the ground instantly ordered Col. Miller with the 21st regiment to carry the enemy's artillery by an attack in front, while he should lead the other regiment upon the flank of the enemy. The battery was taken, and was held by Ripley against repeated attempts to recover it. In the mean time Generals Brown and Scott were wounded; and late at night, after a murderous contest with a much superior force, Gen. Brown ordered a retreat, and gave up the command to Ripley, who returned to fort Erie and fortified it. The British loss was upwards of 1,000; the American from 600 to 700. He recovered sufficiently to be in command at the sortie from fort Erie Sept. 17th, when Gen. Ripley was dangerously wounded. Fort Erie was evacuated Nov. 5th, and our army returned to the American side of the river, whence it had proceeded three months before, having gained nothing but the honor of unavailing victories.

In his official account of the battle of Niagara, Gen. Brown forgot to give any praise to Gen. Ripley, and also censured him for not attacking the enemy the next day, to have done which with a greatly inferior force after the retreat, ordered by Gen. Brown the preceding night, would have hazarded the safety of the army. Gen. Ripley in consequence demanded a court of inquiry, which was sitting at Troy March 15, 1815, when it was dissolved by an order from the department of war, which stated as reasons: "The congress of the United States having approved his conduct by a highly complimentary resolve, and the President being pleased to express his favorable opinion of the military character of Gen. Ripley." A gold medal was voted by Congress to Gen. Brown, and also to Generals Ripley, Miller, Porter, Scott, Gaines, Macomb, Jackson, Harrison, and Shelby.

At the close of the war he and Gen. Jackson were retained in the service as the major-generals of the army; and in 1821 he was left in the sole command. From that time he resided in the city of Washington, where he died, leaving a large family.—Brackenridge's Hist. War; Holmes, ii. 464; N. Y. Statesman, Feb. 28, 1828; Balt. Patriot, June 17, 1815; Facts relative to the Campaign of the Niagara.

BROWN, DAVID L., a teacher in painting and drawing, died in London Dec. 18, 1836, aged 85, formerly of London.

BROWN, SYPHAX, a slave, died March 5, 1846, aged 115 years and 4 months. He was long the personal servant of John Randolph, of Mattoax, the father of J. R. of Roanoke.

BROWN, OLIVER, died at Haddam Feb. 8, 1853, aged 74, a graduate of Harvard in 1804. He was chaplain to the State prison of Massachusetts; then missionary to Rhode Island, sent by the society for the diffusion of knowledge. He organized a church in South Kingston, and was the minister of it fifteen years, and was at last the minister of Grassy-hill, in Lyme.

BROWN, JOHN, D. D., minister of Hadley, died March 22, 1840, aged 53. Born in Brooklyn, Conn., he graduated in 1809 at Dartmouth, and was seventeen years a minister in Cazenovia, N. Y., and two years in Pine street, Boston, and eight years in Hadley. — Boston Recorder, July 10; Observer, July 18, 1840..

BROWN, BARTHOLOMEW, died in Boston April 14, 1854, aged 81. He was born in Sterling Sept. 8, 1772, and graduated in 1799. He was a lawyer in Sterling and East Bridgewater, and had lived in Boston ten years. Having great skill in music, he edited, about twenty years, with Judge Mitchell, the Bridgewater collection of church music, which was highly esteemed, in which were many pieces of his composition. For fifty-nine years he wrote the calendars in Thomas' Farmer's almanac.

BROWN, MOSES, died at Providence Sept. 6, 1836, aged nearly 98. He was born Sept. 23, 1738, and was the youngest of four brothers: Nicholas, Joseph, and John were also enterprising, remarkable men. They founded Brown university. His early years were spent in the family of his uncle Obadiah, a wealthy merchant, whose daughter he married in 1764. In 1763 he engaged in commercial pursuits with his brothers, but retired from business in ten years. Losing his three children, he was taught to seek his happiness more entirely in God. He was a Baptist till 1773, when he became a Friend. In that year he liberated his slaves, and was one of the founders of the abolition society of Rhode Island; he was also a supporter of the Bible and peace societies. His will, made at the age of 96, evinced his desire to promote the cause of education, philanthropy, and religion.

BROWN, NICHOLAS, was born in Providence, April 4, 1769, was educated at the college, and died Sept. 27, 1841, aged 72. His ancestor, Chad. B., was the assistant of R. Williams in founding the colony of Rhode Island. His father, Nicholas, and his father's three brothers were the benefactors of the college, as was also N. B., and also his only son, John Carter Brown. Hence may be seen the propriety of the name of Brown University. He founded a professorship of oratory and erected Hope college, so called from his sister Hope, and is to be honored for other acts of munificence. His life, by C. King, is in the Lives of American merchants.

BROWN, James, died in Philadelphia April 7, 1835, aged 73. Born in Virginia, he settled as a lawyer in Tennessee, then in Natchez and New Orleans. He was U. S. attorney, a member of the senate in 1812, minister to France in 1823. He had lived a few years in Philadelphia.

BROWN, MATTHEW, D. D., died July 29, 1853, at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. Riddle, of Pittsburgh, aged 77. He was long president of Jefferson college, Pennsylvania, extensively known and esteemed.

BROWN, OBADIAH B., died in Washington May 2, 1852, aged 72, pastor of the first Baptist church from 1807 till 1850.

BROWN, JAMES, died in Watertown, Mass., March 10, 1855, aged 55; a distinguished bookseller of the house of Little, Brown & Co. in Boston. He was skilled in bibliography, and was a student in various sciences. He was at the head of American publishers. A part of his library he bequeathed to the Boston natural history society. Of large property, he was a man of becoming hospitality.

BROWN, T. S., major, died in Naples, Italy, June 30, 1855. A nephew of Gen. J. Brown, he graduated at West Point. The New York and Erie Railroad was constructed mainly under his direction as engineer-in-chief. In Dec., 1849, he went to Russia as consulting engineer of the St. Petersburg and Moscow railroad.

BROWNE, ARTHUR, an Episcopal clergyman at Portsmouth, died at Cambridge June 10, 1773, aged 73. He was a native of Drogheda in Ireland, and was the son of Rev. John Browne. He was educated at Trinity college in Dublin, and received the degree of master of arts in 1729. Being ordained by the Bishop of London for a society in Providence, Rhode Island, he went to that place, and remained there till the year 1736, when he removed to Portsmouth. He was the first incumbent of the church, consecrated in 1734. He received a salary of 75 pounds as a missionary from the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts, and continued in this station till his death. His wife, Mary, was the daughter of Thomas Cox, D. D., of Drogheda. Of his children, Marmaduke, a clergyman, died at Newport about 1771; Jane married Samuel Livermore; Ann married Mr. Saint Loc, a British officer. His church ascribed to him "good conduct, a most noble and benevolent disposition, excellent preaching, sound doctrines, and good oratory." He published a sermon on the excellency of the Christian religion, 1738; at the execution of Penelope Kenny, 1739; on the rebellion in Scotland, 1746; to the free masons, 1748; on the fast; on the doctrine of election, 1757; remarks on Mayhew's reflections on the church of England, 1763.—Alden's account of Portsmouth; Coll. Hist. Soc. x. 57, 58, 70.

BROWNE, ARTHUR, LL. D., king's professor of Greek in Trinity college, Dublin, died in 1805. He was the son of Marmaduke Browne, rector of Trinity Church, Newport, Rhode Island. He enjoyed in early life the advantages of a school, established in Newport by Dean Berkeley, and was distinguished by his talents, industry, and strong desire of improving his education in some European university. To gratify this desire, his father went to Ireland to make provision for entering his son at Trinity college; but, after having effected his object, he died soon after his return, in consequence of his sufferings during a tedious voyage of three months. His son, who went to Ireland in 1771 or 1772, continued during the remainder of his life connected with Trinity college, and was the idol of the students. He was professor of civil law in the university, and its representative in the Irish house of commons. His great powers of mind he improved by incessant study and by intercourse with the most distinguished scholars and the most able and virtuous statesmen of his day. He was always a champion of the people. He published a compendious view of civil law, being the substance of a course of lectures read in the university of Dublin, together with a sketch of the practice of the ecclesiastical courts, and some useful directions for the clergy; Hussen O'Dil, or beauty and the heart, an allegorical poem, translated from the Persian language; and miscellaneous sketches, in 2 vols., 8vo. This last work is written after the manner of Montaigne.—Monthly Anthology, II. 559-562.

BRUCE, DAVID, a Moravian missionary, died in Litchfield county, Ct., in 1749. The Indians of the Mohegan stock, with whom he was sent to reside in the same year, had received some instruction from Buttner, Rauch, and other missionaries at the neighboring station of Shacomaco in the State of New York. He lived in the house belonging to the brethren, called Gnadensee, in the village of Wachquatnach, on the River Houssatonnoe in Cornwall or Sharon. Mr. Sergeant, ten years before, had been visited for instruction in religion by a company of Indians from the same place, which he writes Wukhquautenauk, distant from Stockbridge about twenty-eight miles. Bruce also lived occasionally amongst the Indians at Pachgatgach, which perhaps was Pauquamuch at Stratfield, or with greater probability a settlement on the Houssatonnoe in the interior of Connecticut, either at Derby, or New Milford, or Kent. Mr. Brainerd in 1743 visited some Indians, living at Seaticoke, five or six miles from New Milford, and preached to them. There was still another village, which the Moravians visited, called Potatik, probably the same as Poodatook, on the river at Newtown. As Bruce was dying, he called the Indian brethren, and, pressing their hands to his breast, entreated them to remain faithful to the end. He was succeeded by Buninger.—Loskiel's History, II. 115; Brainerd's Life, 65; Hopkins' Houssatonnic Indians, 75.

BRUCE, ARCHIBALD, M. D., a physician of New York, died Feb. 22, 1818, aged 40. He was born in that city in Feb., 1777. His mother, the daughter of Nicholas Bayard, was the widow of Jeremiah Van Rensselaer. His father, William Bruce, the head of the medical department in the British army at New York, was very solicitous that he should not become a physician. After the death of his father he was educated at Columbia college, where he was graduated in 1795. The medical lectures of Dr. Nicholas Romayne gave him a taste for the study of physic. He afterwards became the pupil of Dr. Hosack. In 1798 he repaired to Europe, and in 1800 obtained a medical degree at Edinburgh. During a tour of two years in France, Switzerland, and Italy, he collected a valuable mineralogical cabinet,—his taste for the science of mineralogy having been acquired while he was a pupil of Dr. Hosack, who brought to this country the first cabinet of minerals, and in arranging it called for the assistance of his pupil, Bruce. He married in London, and came out to New York in 1803. About the year 1807 he was appointed professor of materia medica and mineralogy in the college of physicians and surgeons of New York. Upon the re-organization of the college in 1811 he was superseded by the appointment of others. Intestine feuds were alleged as the cause of the changes made. Dr. Bruce, in connection with his friend Romayne and other gentlemen, established for a while a rival medical faculty. In 1810 he commenced the journal of American mineralogy; but he published only one volume. His work was followed by Silliman's journal. After repeated attacks of severe indisposition he died of the apoplexy.—Thacker's Med. Biog.; Silliman's Journal, I. II.

BRUEN, MATTHIAS, a minister in New York, died Sept. 6, 1829, aged 36 years. He was a descendant of an early settler of New England, and was born at Newark, N. J., April 11, 1793. He dated his renovation of mind by the Divine Spirit at the age of eighteen. After graduating at Columbia college in 1812, he studied theology with Dr. Mason. In 1816 he travelled in Europe with his distinguished preceptor. About the beginning of 1819, being invited to preach in the American chapel of the oratory at Paris, he was ordained in London, and then passed six months at Paris. In 1822 he was employed as a missionary in the city of New York, but refused to receive any compensation. During his labors he collected the Bleeker street congregation. Of this people he became the stated pastor, and continued such till his death by inflammation of the bowels.

Mr. Bruen engaged earnestly in various benevolent institutions. He was agent and corresponding secretary of the domestic missionary society; and when it was changed into the American home missionary society, he still assisted by his counsels. Bible, Sunday school, tract, and foreign mission societies engaged his efforts; and in the Greek cause he cheerfully co-operated. He was accomplished in manners, in literature, and in the knowledge of mankind. Though he had high and honorable feelings, abhorring everything mean, yet he had humble views of his own acquisitions, intellectual and moral. All his distinctions he laid at his Master's feet. In the last week of his life he suffered extreme pain. It was a sudden summons to depart; yet he was calm and resigned. "I die," said he, "in peace and love with all men." Thus, after embracing his wife and two babes, and most impressively addressing his relatives, he fell asleep in Jesus.

"He lay, and a smile was on his face;
Affection over him bent, to trace
The token Mercy had left, to tell
That with the spirit all was well.
It was the smile that marks the blest;
It told, that in hope he had sunk to rest
Of a joyful rising, after his sleep,
No more to suffer, no more to weep."

He published a sermon at Paris on the death of a lady of New York; and sketches of Italy.—Cox's and Skinner's Sermon; Home Missionary Magazine; Boston Recorder, Nov. 11, 1829.

BRY, THEODORE DE, published collectiones perigrinantium in Indiam orientalem et occidentalem. America, partes 13, years 1590-1599.

BRYAN, GEORGE, a judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, died Jan. 28, 1791, aged 60. He was the eldest son of an ancient and respectable family in Dublin, Ireland, in his ode on which country, Southey exclaims with some reason:

"O land, profuse of genius and of worth."

He came to this country in early life, and lived forty years in Philadelphia. At first he engaged extensively in commercial business; but it pleased the wise Disposer of events to defeat his plans, and reduce him to a state of comparative poverty. He afterwards lived more in accordance with ancient simplicity. He was an active and intelligent man. Previously to the Revolution he was introduced into public employments. He was a delegate to the congress which met in 1765 for the purpose of remonstrating against the arbitrary measures of Great Britain. In the war, which followed, he took an open and active part.

After the Declaration of Independence he was vice-president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, and on the death of President Wharton in May, 1778, he was placed at the head of the government. When his office, by the limitation of the constitution, expired in the autumn of 1779, he was elected a member of the legislature. Here, amidst the tumult of war and invasion, when every one was trembling for himself, his mind was occupied by the claims of humanity and charity. He at this time planned and completed an act for the gradual abolition of slavery, which is an imperishable monument to his memory. He thus furnished evidence, that in opposing the exactions of a foreign power he was opposing tyranny, and was really attached to the cause of liberty. In 1780 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, in which station he continued during the remainder of his life. In 1784 he was elected one of the council of censors, and was one of its principal members till his death. When the subject of the constitution of the United States was discussed, he was conspicuous in the ranks of the opposition. He died at Philadelphia in the year 1791.

Besides the offices already mentioned, Judge Bryan engaged in various of public, literary, and charitable employments. Formed for a close application to study, animated with an ardent thirst for knowledge, and blessed with a memory of wonderful tenacity, and a clear, penetrating, and decisive judgment, he availed himself of the labors and acquisitions of others, and brought honor to the stations which he occupied. To his other attainments he added the virtues of the Christian. He was distinguished by his benevolence and sympathy with the distressed; by an unaffected humility and modesty; by his readiness to forgive injuries; and by the inflexible integrity of his conduct. He was superior to the frowns and blandishments of the world. Thus eminently qualified for the various public offices, in which he was placed; he was faithful and humble in discharging their duties, and he filled them with dignity and reputation in the worst of times, and in the midst of a torrent of unmerited obloquy and opposition. Such was his disinterestedness and his zeal for the good of others, that his own interest seemed to be overlooked. In the administration of justice he was impartial and incorruptible. He was an ornament to the profession of Christianity, which he made, the delight of his connections, and a public blessing to the State. By his death religion lost an amiable example, and science a steady friend.—Ewing's Funeral Sermon; American Museum, ix. 81-83; Dunlap's Amer. Advertiser.

BRYANT, LEMUEL, minister of Braintree, was graduated at Harvard college in 1739. He died at Hingham in 1754, and was buried at Scituate, probably because he was a native of that place. John Adams speaks of a controversy between Mr. B. and Miles, Porter, Bass, &c., "which broke out like the eruption of a volcano and blazed with portentous aspect for many years." He published a sermon on moral virtue, 1747; remarks on Mr. Porter's sermon, 1750.

BRYANT, SOLOMON, an Indian minister, died May 8, 1775, aged 80. He was ordained at Marshpee, Mass., soon after the resignation of Mr. Bourne in 1742, and he preached to his red brethren in the Indian dialect. He was a sensible man and a good minister, but not sufficiently prudent in the admission of members and rather deficient in economy. After his dismissal, occasioned by some dissatisfaction on the part of the Indians, he was succeeded by Mr. Hawley in 1758. It seems, however, that his labors were not entirely interrupted, for Mr. Hawley wrote concerning him in 1760: "He grows better as he grows older. He is near 66 years of age, has been a preacher more than forty, and continues in his usefulness to this day." Joseph Bryant, also an Indian minister at Marshpee, or in that neighborhood, died April 25, 1759. In 1698 John Bryant had been Indian teacher at Acushnet five or six years. — Mass. Hist. Coll., III. 191; x. 180; s. s. III. 16.

BRYANT, PETER, M. D., a respected physician of Cummington, died in 1820, aged 52. His widow, Sarah, the sister of Rev. Dr. Snell of Brookfield, died in 1847. In the poems of his son, William C. Bryant, there is an allusion to him — in the hymn to death.

BRYANT, JAMES C., missionary to South Africa, died at Inanda Dec. 23, 1850. From 1840 to 1846 he was the minister of Littleton, Mass. He sailed for Africa in April, 1846. He died in great peace. Mrs. B. survived him. He had made various translations into the Zulu language. His character is described in the Miss. Herald of 1851.

BRYSON, JOHN, died in 1855, aged 98, in Northumberland co., Penn. He studied theology with the blind Dr. Waddell. He was the pastor of Warrior's run and Chillisquaqua, from 1790 to 1841.

BUCHANAN, THOMAS, governor of Liberia, died at Bassa Sept. 3, 1841, in the prime of life. He was a man of high character and usefulness.

BUCHANAN, JOHN, died near Williamsport, Md., Nov. 4, 1844, aged 70, chief judge of the court of appeals.

BUCHANAN, JAMES, died near Montreal Oct. 1851, aged 80. He was British consul at New York. He published sketches of North American Indians, 2 vols., 1824.

BUCKINGHAM, THOMAS, minister of the second church in Hartford, died Nov. 19, 1731, aged 62. He was probably the son of Thomas Buckingham, the minister of Saybrook in 1669, and a descendant of Thomas B., who lived in New Haven in 1639. Stephen B., minister of Norwalk from 1697 to 1727, was probably his brother. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1690. The time of his settlement has not been ascertained. He was succeeded by Elnathan Whitman. He was one of the most eminent ministers in Connecticut, and was regarded as one of the pillars of the church. His superior abilities were under the direction of good principles. His conversation was such, as was becoming a minister of Christ. In his life he imitated his blessed Master, and, being exemplary in piety, having a pleasant temper, obliging and engaging manners, and many amiable virtues, he conciliated respect and esteem.

He published a sermon preached at the election, in 1728, entitled Moses and Aaron. The following passages from it will give some view of his sentiments, and of the times. "By the Spirit the elect are brought to possess the good which Jesus Christ hath purchased for them. By him they are convinced, awakened, humbled, converted, sanctified, led, and comforted." "If we look back upon the last year, how many appearances and indications of his anger were there to be observed therein; the unusual illuminations of the heavens by repeated and almost discontinued flashes of lightning, with dreadful peals of thunder attending, the scorching heat and drought of the summer, the pinching cold and length of the winter, stormy winds and tempests, the death of useful men, and the groaning and trembling of the earth under our feet." "Have you not heard some, who have risen from among you, speaking perverse things, blaspheming the constitution and order of your churches, denying the validity of your ordinations, and condemning your ministerial acts as so many usurpations, who unchurch the best and greatest part of Christians, and leave you with the best of your flocks to uncovenanted mercies, that is, in a state of heathenism, without God and Christ and hope in the world; and this merely for the sake of a non-agreement with them in a few unscriptural rites and notions?" — Edwards' Elect. Serm. in 1732; Trumbull, I. 498, 519.

BUCKMINSTER, JOSEPH, minister of Rutland, Mass., died Nov. 27, 1792, aged 72. He was the son of Col. Joseph Buckminster of Framingham, who died in 1780, aged 83, and whose father, Joseph, one of the earliest settlers of Framingham, died in 1740, also aged 83. The last named was a grandson of Thomas Buckminster, written in the colony records Buckmaster, who came from Wales and lived as early as 1645 in Boston, where he died Sept. 28, 1658, leaving several sons.

Mr. Buckminster was graduated at Harvard college in 1739, ordained in 1742, and was in the ministry 53 years. He was highly respected and useful. In his theological sentiments he was a sublapsarian Calvinist. Mr. Foster of Strafford having published a sermon, in which he asserted a two-fold justification, and "a remedial law, or law of grace, whose precepts are brought down to a level with the fallen sinner's abilities," Mr. Buckminster published a reply, being a paraphrase on Rom. x. 4, for which he received the thanks of an association of ministers. Other pamphlets followed by the same writers in this controversy. In his dissertations on gospel salvation Mr. Buckminster asserts, on the one hand, the doctrine of election against the Arminians, and on the other hand, against the supralapsarians, he says, "the decrees have no direct, positive influence upon us. We are determined by motives, but act freely and voluntarily. They lie in the foundation of the Divine proceedings, and compose his plans of operation. They infer the certain futurity of things, but have no influence ab extra to bring them to pass." These seem not very incorrect views on the subjects of the divine decrees and of free agency. Indeed, it is not easy to imagine how it is possible to reconcile the doctrine of Divine efficiency, or positive influence in the production of sinful volitions, with the responsibility of man or with the truth and holiness of God. The views of Mr. B. seem to accord well with those of Robert Southey, who says: "Impossible as it may be for us to reconcile the free will of man with the foreknowledge of God, I nevertheless believe in both with the most full conviction. When the human mind plunges into time and space in its speculations, it adventures beyond its sphere; no wonder, therefore, that its powers fail, and it is lost. But that my will is free, I know feelingly: it is proved to me by my conscience. And that God provideth all things, I know by his own word, and by that instinct which he hath implanted in me to assure me of his being."

Mr. B. published two discourses on family religion, 1759; ordination of E. Sparhawk; paraphrase on Rom. x. 4.; dissertations on Eph. ii. 9-11; a sermon on the covenant with Abraham. Farmer's Register; Elliot.

BUCKMINSTER, JOSEPH, D. D. minister of Portsmouth, N. H., the son of the preceding, died June 10, 1812, aged 60. He was born Oct. 14, 1751. Being the delight and hope of his parents, they were desirous that he should become a minister of the gospel. He was graduated at Yale college in 1770, and from 1774 to 1778 was a tutor in that seminary, associated in that employment with Abraham Baldwin. At this period he became temporarily attached to a lady, then of reputation and celebrity, whose character is the basis of one of the productions of Mrs. Foster. He was ordained over the north church in Portsmouth, Jan. 27, 1779, as successor of Dr. Langdon, after whose death Dr. Stiles had supplied the pulpit one or two years. After a ministry of thirty-three years, his health became greatly impaired; a depression of spirits, to which he had been subject, came upon him with new violence; spasmodic affections caused at times a suspension of reason; under these distressing complaints a long journey was thought necessary to his relief. He left home June 2, 1812, accompanied by his wife and two friends; but on the Green mountains of Vermont he was arrested by the messenger of death. He died at a solitary tavern in Reedsborough, and his remains were interred at Bennington, and a sermon preached on the occasion by Mr. Marsh. It is remarkable, that on the preceding day his eldest son, a minister in Boston, died after a week's illness. Although Dr. B. had not heard of his sickness, yet he said to his wife repeatedly a few hours before his own death, Joseph is dead! His first wife, the only daughter of Rev. Dr. Stevens of Kittery, died July 19, 1790, aged 36, leaving one son and two daughters; his second wife, the daughter of Rev. Isaac Lyman of York, died June 8, 1805, aged 39; his third wife, who survived him, was the widow of Col. Eliphalet Ladd. One of his daughters, who married Prof. Farrar of Cambridge, died in Sept., 1824. He was succeeded in the ministry by Mr. Putnam.

Dr. Buckminster was an eminently pious man. He left an unsullied reputation, and was greatly beloved and deeply lamented. His mind had been well cultivated. A brilliant imagination, his most distinguishing faculty, gave a richness to his style. He had a heart of sensibility. His voice, strong and musical, expressed the various emotions of his soul. His attitude and gestures were unaffected and impressive, while his countenance itself was eloquent. But his popularity as a preacher is to be ascribed also to the boldness and the energy with which he proclaimed the great and all-important truths of the gospel. Even the hostility of the erroneous and the wicked, which he aroused, proved that he had found a way to their conscience, for in his great meekness, humility, and benevolence they could not think that he was their enemy. They could hardly hate the man, except on account of his doctrine and the faithfulness of his warnings. Though his sermons were not systematic, they were luminous and instructive. Breaking from the confinement of a few favorite topics, he expatiated in the wide field of religious truth. The varying events of Providence were always noticed by him, and employed to some pious purpose. The tenderness of his heart made him peculiarly welcome in the house of affliction. —

In the gift of prayer, on all the occasions of prayer, he particularly excelled. As a pastor he was a bright example to his brethren; incessant in labor and delighting in his work; cherishing always most sedulously the seriousness witnessed amongst his people, and devising new plans for gaining access to their hearts; and in meetings for social prayer seeking the Divine blessing upon the means of instruction. In his preaching he dwelt much on the iniquity of the human heart, on the character and value of the atonement by the crucified Son of God, and on the necessity of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, of faith and repentance, and the holiness without which there is no admission into heaven. In his own opinion, he began to preach before he was truly a servant of God; and afterwards he ceased to preach for a time, in the persuasion that his motives were selfish and unworthy. But after a long period of distress light broke in upon his mind. A few years after his settlement, on the anniversary of his ordination, he wrote as follows: "Blush, O my soul, and be ashamed, that thou hast felt no more of thy own worth and the worth of thy fellow immortals, the infinite love and compassion of God, of thy dear Redeemer, and the excellency of the gospel. Shall God call me, who have been so great and aggravated an offender, to the high and honorable office of publishing the glad tidings of salvation, and of an ambassador for him, to woo and beseech men to be reconciled to him; and shall I be lukewarm and indifferent?" But notwithstanding the talents, the piety, the faithfulness, and the fervent zeal of Dr. Buckminster, no very remarkable effects attended his preaching; showing that, after all the skilful and diligent toil of the planter, it is God only, who, according to his sovereign pleasure, giveth the increase. On account of his catholic disposition, Dr. Buckminster possessed the regard of other denominations of Christians besides his own. In the private relations of life he was faithful, affectionate, and interesting. He published the following sermons: at the New Hampshire election, 1787; on the death of Washington, 1800; on the death of Mrs. Rowland, and Mrs. Porter; on choosing rulers, two sermons, 1796; on the fire, 1803; on baptism, 1803; at the ordination of his son, 1805; on the death of Rev. S. Haven and his wife, 1806; at the installation of J. Miltimore, 1808; of J. Thurston, 1809; three discourses, Boston, on the death of Dr. Hemminway, 1811; and a short sketch of Dr. McClintock. — Panoplist, VIII. 105–111; Adams' Ann. of Portsmouth, 353–345; Parker's Funeral Sermon; Farmer's Coll. III. 121.

BUCKMINSTER, JOSEPH STEVENS, a minister in Boston, died June 9, 1810, aged 28. He was the son of the preceding, and was born May 26, 1784. Under the cultivation of his devoted parents his talents were early developed. At the age of four years he began to study Latin grammar; at the age of twelve he was ready for admission into college. He graduated at Harvard with distinguished honor in 1800. The next four years were spent partly in the family of his relative, Theodore Lyman of Waltham, partly as an assistant in the academy at Exeter, and in the prosecution of theological studies. In Oct., 1804, he began to preach at Brattle street, Boston, where he was ordained as the successor of Dr. Thacher, Jan. 30, 1805. A severe illness immediately followed, which interrupted his labors until March. In the course of this year, the return of the epilepsy, which he had previously experienced, excited his apprehensions that his mental faculties would be destroyed. He wrote in Oct.: "The repetition of these fits must at length reduce me to idiocy. Can I resign myself to the loss of memory, and of that knowledge, I may have vainly prided myself upon? O God! enable me to bear this thought." A voyage to Europe being recommended, he sailed in May, 1806, and visited England, Holland, Switzerland and France. In Paris he spent five months; and there and in London he collected a valuable library of nearly 3,000 vols. After his return in Sept., 1807, he was occupied in the ministry about five years with occasional attacks of epilepsy, till his death. His last illness continued a week. His father died the next day.

Mr. Buckminster was a very interesting and eloquent preacher. Though of scarcely the middle size, yet a fine countenance, combining sweetness and intelligence, appropriate, and occasionally animated gestures, a brilliant imagination, and a style of winning elegance caused his hearers to hang with delight upon his lips. His power, however, would have been increased by more of fervor and passion. Deeply interested in biblical criticism, he superintended the publication of Griesbach's New Testament. In his religious sentiments, as appears from the volume of his sermons, published since his death, he differed in some important respects from his father. He did not believe the doctrine of the trinity. He did not regard the human race as originally corrupt, and utterly lost in their depravity; he did not admit that the death of Christ had any relation to the justice of God in the pardon of sin, nor did he suppose that there was any special influence of the Holy Spirit in the renewal of the heart. He quoted with approbation Paley's sermon, written when a young man, on caution in the use of Scripture language, in which he denies any agency of the Spirit of God on the human heart; yet in his latter sermons Paley expressly declares his belief, that the Scripture does teach such an agency. He imagined that men were not able to obey the Divine law, and that Christ came to redeem and has actually redeemed all men from its curse, or has disclosed a new dispensation, in which repentance is accepted instead of obedience. Justifying faith he considered as only a principle of holiness, and not as a trust in Jesus Christ for salvation. Yet his views seem utterly opposed to the doctrine of the Socinians, for he speaks of "the incarnation" of the Son of God, "the vicegerent of Jehovah," and he saw in his life a "wonderful contrast of powers — Divine greatness and mortal debility, ignominy, and glory, suffering and triumph, the servant of all and the Lord of all."

In 1808 Mr. Buckminster published a collection of hymns, in which those of Watts and others were mutilated without notice. In a review of this collection in the Panoplist, this mutilation was justly reprehended, as apparently designed to lend the authority of Watts to the suppression of important doctrines. Mr. B. suffered under the charge, for he was unwilling to confess what he recorded in his private journal, that he took the altered hymns from Kippis' collection without being aware of the alterations. He published a number of reviews in the monthly anthology and other periodicals; the right hand of fellowship at the ordination of C. Lowell, 1806; a sermon on the death of Gov. Sullivan, 1809; on the death of W. Emerson, 1811; an address to the Phi Beta Kappa society, 1809. After his death a volume of twenty-four sermons was published, with a memoir of his life and character by S. C. Thacher. — Memoir; Mass. Hist. Coll. s. s. II. 271; Christian Spectator, v. 145.

BUCKNAM, NATHAN, died Feb. 6, 1795, aged 91; minister of Medway seventy years. He was born in Malden, graduated in 1721, ordained Dec. 29, 1724. He published a sermon at the ordination of E. Morse, 1743; at ordination of E. Harding, 1749.

BUEL, MARY, wife of Dr. John B., of Litchfield, died Nov. 4, 1768, aged 90. She had thirteen children, one hundred and one grandchildren, two hundred and seventy-four great-grandchildren, and twenty-two of the next generation; total, four hundred and ten; of which three hundred and thirty-six survived her.

BUEL, JESSE, editor, removed in 1813 from the county of Ulster to Albany and established the Albany Argus, which he edited till 1821. He died at Danbury, Conn., Oct. 6, 1839, aged 62; he was on a journey to New Haven in order to deliver a lecture on agriculture, to which subject he had devoted the last years of his life. About 1833 he established the Cultivator, a monthly paper, which obtained a vast circulation. He was respected for his talents and worth.

BUEL, WILLIAM, M. D., died at Litchfield Oct. 15, 1851, aged 83.

BUELL, SAMUEL, D. D., an eminent minister on Long Island, died at East Hampton, July 19, 1798, aged 81. He was born at Coventry in Connecticut, Sept. 1, 1716. In the seventeenth year of his age it pleased his merciful Father in heaven to renew his heart and teach him those truths, which are necessary to salvation. He was impressed with a sense of his entire destitution of love to God, of the incompetency of any works, which he could perform, to justify him, of the necessity of a Saviour, and of his dependence on Divine mercy and influence. From the depression of mind, occasioned by a full conviction of sin and a clear perception of his danger, he was relieved by a view of the wonderful plan of redemption by Jesus Christ, and the gladness of his heart now was proportionate to the thickness of the gloom which before hung over his mind. This change in his character produced a change in his plans of life. His father was a rich farmer, and he had been destined to agricultural pursuits; but the belief, that it was his duty to engage in labors which would most advance the interest of religion, and to extend his usefulness as much as possible, induced him to relinquish the employments of husbandry, and to attend to the cultivation of his mind. He was graduated at Yale college in 1741. While in this seminary his application to his studies was intense, and his proficiency was such as rewarded his toils. It was here that he first became acquainted with David Brainerd with whom he was very intimate, till death separated them. Their friendship was the union of hearts attached to the same Redeemer, having the same exalted views and animated by the same spirit.

It was his intention to spend a number of years with Mr. Edwards, of Northampton, in theological studies; but the extensive revival of religion at this period rendering the zealous preaching of the truth peculiarly important, he immediately commenced those benevolent labors, which occupied and delighted him through the remainder of his life. After being licensed, he preached about two years in different parts of New England; and such was the pathos and energy of his manner that almost every assembly was melted into tears. In November, 1743, he was ordained as an itinerant preacher, in which capacity he was indefatigable and very successful. He was the instrument of doing much good, of impressing the thoughtless, of reforming the vicious, and of imparting to the selfish and worldly the genuine principles of benevolence and godliness. Carrying with him testimonials from respectable ministers, he was admitted into many pulpits, from which other itinerants were excluded. While he disapproved of the imprudence of some in those days, when religious truth was brought home remarkably to the heart, he no less reprehended the unreasonable opposition of others to the work of God. During this period his health was much impaired, and a severe fit of sickness brought him to the very entrance of the grave; but it pleased God, who holds the lives of all in His hand, to restore his health, and prolong his usefulness for many years.

He was led to East Hampton, by a direction of Providence in some respects extraordinary, and was installed pastor of the church in that place, Sept. 19, 1746. His predecessors were Thomas James, the first minister; then Nathaniel Hunting, ordained Sept. 13, 1699, and dismissed in his old age at the settlement of Mr. Buell. In this retirement he devoted himself with great ardor to his studies. Though he always felt the necessity of the special aid of the Spirit of God in preaching, yet he duly estimated the importance of diligent application of mind to the duties of the ministry. For a number of years he wrote all his sermons and preached them without notes. He was long engaged in writing a work on the prophecies, but the publication of Newton's dissertations induced him to relinquish it. He sought the acquisition of knowledge, not that he might have the honor of being reputed a learned man, but that he might increase his power of usefulness; and keeping his great object, that of doing good, constantly in view, he never suffered the pleasures of literary and theological research to detain him from the field of more active exertion. He could not shut himself up in his study, while immortal souls in his own congregation or in the neighborhood were destitute of instruction and were ready to hear the words of eternal life. He frequently preached two or three times in the course of the week, in addition to his stated labors on the Sabbath. For a number of the first years of his ministry he seemed to labor without effect. His people paid but little attention to the concerns of religion. But in 1764 he witnessed an astonishing change. Almost every individual in the town was deeply impressed, and the interests of eternity received that attention which their transcendent importance demands. He had the happiness at one time of admitting into his church ninety-nine persons, who, he believed, had been renewed, and enlightened with correct views of the gospel, and inspired with benevolent principles of conduct. In the years 1785 and 1791 also, he was favored, through the influence of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of his hearers, with great success.

Dr. Buell presents a remarkable instance of disinterested exertion for the good of others. When Long Island fell into the hands of the British in 1776, he remained with his people, and did much towards relieving their distresses. As there was at this period but one minister within forty miles able to preach, the care of all the churches fell upon him. His natural disposition inclined him to do with his might whatever his hand found to do. He was an example of all the Christian virtues. He was attached to literature and science, and was the father and patron of Clinton academy in East Hampton. His house was the mansion of hospitality. Possessing a large fund of instructive and entertaining anecdote, his company was pleasing to persons of every age. In no respect was he more distinguished, than for a spirit of devotion. He was fully convinced of the necessity and efficacy of prayer, and amid the prosperous and afflictive scenes, through which he passed, it was his delight to hold intercourse with his Father in heaven. He followed two wives and eight children to the grave. On these solemn and affecting occasions, such was the resignation and support imparted to him, that he usually preached himself. To his uncommon and long continued health, the strict rules of temperance, which he observed, without doubt much contributed. On the day, in which he was 80 years old, he rode fourteen miles to preach the gospel, and returned in the evening. In his last hours his mind was in perfect peace. He had no desire to remain any longer absent from his Saviour. He observed, as the hour of his departure approached, that he felt all his earthly connections to be dissolved. The world, into which he was just entering, absorbed all his thoughts; so that he was unwilling to suffer any interruption of his most cheering contemplations from the last attention of his friends. While they were endeavoring to prolong the dying flame, he would put them aside with one hand, while the other was raised towards heaven, where his eyes and soul were fixed. In this happy state of mind he welcomed the moment of his departure from life. His daughter Jerusha was the mother of J. L. Gardner of Gardner's Island; another daughter married Rev. A. Wentworth.

He published a narrative of the revival of religion among his people in 1764, and fourteen occasional discourses, which evince the vigor of his mind and the ardor of his piety; among which are a sermon at the ordination of Samson Occum, Aug. 29, 1759, to which is added a letter giving an account of Occum, 1761; on the death of C. J. Smith, 1770; at the ordination of Aaron Woolworth, Bridgehampton, 1788; funeral sermons on his daughter, Mrs. Conkling, 1782, and on an only son, Samuel, who died of the small pox in 1787.—Conn. Evan. Mag. II. 147-151, 179-182; Daggett's Funeral Sermon.

BUELL, ABEL, of Killingworth, Conn., began, unaided, a type foundry in 1769, and completed several fonts of long primer. He was a skilful goldsmith and jeweller. John Baine, a Scotchman, who died at Philadelphia in 1790, was the first successful type founder; and he came to this country after the war.—Thomas, I. 214; II. 547; Holmes, II. 165.

BUELL, WILLIAM, a missionary in Siam, died in Newcastle, Tenn., in 1856, aged about 40. An afflictive event recalled him from Siam.

BUFF, MICHAEL, died in Georgia in 1839, aged 101, a soldier in 1758.

BUIST, GEORGE, D. D., minister in Charleston, S. C., was born in 1770 in Fifeshire, Scotland. In the college of Edinburgh, which he entered in 1787, he became very distinguished. In classical learning he excelled, having a predilection for Grecian literature. With the Hebrew also he was familiar. In French and Italian he was skilled. The elders of the Presbyterian church in Charleston, established in 1731, sent for Mr. Buist, on the recommendation of Dr. Robertson and Dr. Blair. He arrived in June, 1793. Being appointed in 1805 principal of the college of Charleston, the seminary soon became more respectable than ever. He died Aug. 31, 1808, after an illness of a few days, aged 38 years. His predecessors in the Presbyterian church were Stuart, Grant, Lorimer, Morison, Hewatt, Graham, and Wilson. As a preacher he was impressive, oratorical, and popular, while he was also instructive and faithful. In the censure of vice he was bold and animated. A friend of benevolent institutions, his warm and eloquent appeals aroused the public feeling. He wrote various articles for the British encyclopedia. He published an abridgment of Hume for schools, 1792; a version of the psalms, 1796; a sermon on the death of Rev. Mr. Malcomson, 1805. His sermons in two vols. 8vo, were published in 1809. — Sketch prefixed to Sermons.

BULFINCH, THOMAS, M. D., a physician in Boston, died in Feb., 1802. He was the only son of Dr. Thomas B., an eminent and pious physician, who died Dec., 1757, aged 62, and whose father, Adino B., came from England in 1680. He was born in 1728, and after attending the Latin school of John Lovell, was graduated at Harvard college in 1746. He spent four years in England and Scotland in the prosecution of his medical studies, and, obtaining his medical degree in 1757, returned immediately to Boston. During the prevalence of the small-pox in 1763, his antiphlogistic treatment was eminently successful. With Drs. Warren, Gardiner, and Perkins he attempted the establishment of a small-pox hospital at Point Shirley; but prejudice defeated his efforts. During the occupation of Boston by the British troops he remained in the town and suffered many privations and losses. He continued in practice till two years before his death, which occurred in Feb., 1802. His mother was the daughter of John Colman, brother of Rev. Benjamin C. His wife was the daughter of Charles Apthorp. He left a son, the architect and superintendent of the public buildings at Washington, who married the daughter of John Apthorp; and two daughters, married to George Storer and Joseph Coolidge.

Dr. Bulfinch was distinguished for his personal appearance and elegance of manners. Like his father, he was mild and unobtrusive, cheerful, benevolent, and pious. He published a treatise on the treatment of the scarlet fever; another on the yellow fever. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

BULFINCH, CHARLES, died in Boston April 15, 1844, aged 81. He graduated at Harvard, 1781, and pursued his architectural studies in Europe, and on his return devoted himself to architecture. He drew the plan for the State-house in Boston, and for the capitol at Washington.

BULKLEY, PETER, first minister of Concord, Mass., died March 9, 1659, aged 76. He was born at Woodhill in Bedfordshire, Eng., Jan. 31, 1583. He was educated at St. John's in Camb. and was fellow of the college. He had a gentleman's estate left him by his father, Dr. Edward Bulkley of Woodhill, whom he succeeded in the ministry. For twenty-one years he continued his faithful labors without interruption; but at length, being silenced for nonconformity to some of the ceremonies of the English church, he came to New England in 1635, that he might enjoy liberty of conscience. After residing some time at Cambridge, he began the settlement of Concord in 1636 with a number of planters, who had accompanied him from England. He formed, July 5, 1636, the twelfth church which had been established in the colony, and in 1637 was constituted its teacher and John Jones its pastor. He died in Concord. His first wife was a daughter of Thomas Allen of Coldington; his second, a daughter of Sir Richard Chitwood. By these he had fourteen children, three of whom were educated for the ministry. Edward, who succeeded him about 1659, had been the first minister of Marshfield, died at Chelmsford Jan. 2, 1696, and was buried at Concord; his son, Peter, a graduate of 1660, was agent in England in 1676, was speaker of the house and assistant from 1677 to 1684, and died May 24, 1688.

Mr. Bulkley was remarkable for his benevolence. He expended a large estate by giving farms to his servants, whom he employed in husbandry. It was his custom, when a servant had lived with him a certain number of years, to dismiss him, giving him a piece of land for a farm, and to take another in his place. He was familiar and pleasant in his manners, though while subject to bodily pains he was somewhat irritable, and in preaching was at times considered as severe. So strict was his own virtue, that he could not spare some follies, which were thought too inconsiderable to be noticed. In consequence of his pressing importunately some charitable work, contrary to the wishes of the ruling elder, an unhappy division was produced in the church; but it was healed by the advice of a council and the abdication of the elder. By means of this troublesome affair, Mr. Bulkley said he knew more of God, more of himself, and more of men. He was an excellent scholar, and was distinguished for the holiness of his life and his diligent attention to the duties of the ministry. He gave a considerable part of his library to Harvard college. He was very conscientious in his observance of the Sabbath. He was averse to novelty of apparel, and his hair was always cut close. Such was his zeal to do good, that he seldom left any company, without making some serious remark, calculated to impress the mind. When, through infirmity, he was unable to teach from house to house, he added to his usual labor on the Lord's day that of catechizing and exhorting the youth, in the presence of the whole assembly. Such was his reputation among the ministers of New England, that he was appointed one of the moderators of the synod of 1737. Mr. Hooker was the other.

He published a work entitled, the gospel covenant, or the covenant of grace opened, etc., London, 1646, 4to. pp. 383. This book was so much esteemed, that it passed through several editions. It is composed of sermons preached at Concord upon Zechariah IX. 11, "the blood of the covenant." Speaking of this work, Mr. Shepard of Cambridge says, "The church of God is bound to bless God for the holy, judicious, and learned labors of this aged, and experienced, and precious servant of Jesus Christ." Mr. Bulkley also wrote Latin poetry, some specimens of which are preserved by Dr. Mather in his history of New England. — Mather's Magnalia, III. 96, 98; Neal, I. 321; Nonconformists' Memorial, last edition, II. 200; Holmes, I. 314; Coll. Hist. Soc., x. 168; Ripley's Dedication Sermon.

BULKLEY, JOHN, one of the first graduates of Harvard college, died in 1689, aged 69. He was the son of the preceding. He took his degree of A. M. in 1642. He afterwards went to England, and settled at Fordham, where he continued for several years with good acceptance and usefulness. After his ejection in 1662 he went to Wapping, in the suburbs of London, where he practised physic several years with success. He was eminent in learning and equally so in piety. Though he was not often in his pulpit after his ejection, he might truly be said to preach every day in the week. His whole life was a continued sermon. He seldom visited his patients without reading a lecture of divinity to them, and praying with them. He was remarkable for the sweetness of his temper, and his integrity and charitableness; but what gave a lustre to all his other virtues was his deep humility. He died near the tower in London. — Nonconformists' Memorial, last edition, II. 200; James' Funeral Sermon.

the brother of the preceding, died Dec. 2, 1713, aged 77. He was born in Dec., 1636, and graduated at Harvard college in 1655. About the year 1658 he succeeded Mr. Blinman as minister of New London. Here he continued till about the year 1666, when he became pastor of the church in Wethersfield, in the place of Mr. Russell, who had removed to Hadley. He was succeeded at New London by Mr. Bradstreet. Many years before his death he resigned the ministry at Wethersfield on account of his infirmities, and Mr. Rowlandson of Lancaster was received as minister. His wife was Sarah, the daughter of President Chauncy. He was a man of distinction in his day, and was particularly eminent for his skill in chemistry. From an inscription upon his gravestone, it appears that he was regarded as a man of rare abilities and extraordinary industry, excellent in learning, master of many languages, exquisite in his skill in divinity, physic, and law, and of a most exemplary and Christian life. — Trumbull, I. 319, 324, 483, 519; Mass. Hist. Coll., x. 155.

BULKLEY, JOHN, first minister of Colchester, was the son of Gershom Bulkley. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1699, was ordained Dec. 20, 1703, and died in June, 1731. His son, John Bulkley, a graduate at Yale college in 1756, eminent for learning, possessed a high reputation as a physician and lawyer, and when very young was appointed a judge of the superior court of Connecticut.

Mr. Bulkley was very distinguished as a scholar. While a member of college, he and Mr. Dummer, who was a member of the same class, were considered as pre-eminent in genius and talents. The palm was given to the latter for quickness, brilliancy, and wit; but Mr. Bulkley was regarded as his superior in solidity of judgment and strength of argument. He carried his researches into the various departments of the law, of medicine, and theology. He was classed by Dr. Chauncy in 1788 among the three most eminent for strength of genius and powers of mind, which New England had produced. The other two were Jeremiah Dummer and Thomas Walter. He wrote a preface to R. Wolcott's meditations, and published an election sermon in 1713, entitled, the necessity of religion in societies. In 1724 he published an inquiry into the right of the aboriginal natives to the lands in America. This curious treatise has within a few years been reprinted in the collections of the historical society of Massachusetts. The author contends, that the Indians had no just claims to any lands but such as they had subdued and improved by their own labor, and that the English had a perfect right to occupy all other lands without compensation to the natives. He published a sermon at ordination of J. Lewis, 1730; and one other tract, entitled, an impartial account of a late debate at Lyme, upon the following points: whether it be the will of God, that the infants of visible believers should be baptized; whether sprinkling be lawful and sufficient; and whether the present way of maintaining ministers by a public rate or tax be lawful, 1729. In this he gives some account of the rise of the anti-pedo-baptists. — Trumbull, i. 520; Mass. Hist. Coll. iv. 159; Gen. Hist. of Conn. 173.

BULL, HENRY, governor of Rhode Island, died in 1693, aged 84. Born in Wales, he was one of the early purchasers of the Island of Aquidneck, now Rhode Island. He settled with seventeen others at Newport in 1638, and was governor in 1685, and again in 1689, when Andros was imprisoned.

BULL, WILLIAM, M. D., a physician, eminent for literature and medical science, died July 4, 1791, aged 81. He was the son of Wm. Bull, lieutenant-gov. of South Carolina, who died March 1755, aged 72. He was the first native of South Carolina, and probably the first American, who obtained a degree in medicine. S. L. Knapp, in his stereotype lecture on American literature, mistakes in representing Dr. Bull as a graduate of Harvard college, and also in giving his name Bull. He was a pupil of Boerhaave, and in 1735 defended a thesis de colica pictonum before the university of Leyden. He is quoted by Van Swieten, as his fellow student, with the title of the learned Dr. Bull. After his return to this country, his services in civil life were required by his fellow-citizens. In 1751 he was a member of the council; in 1763 he was speaker of the house of representatives, and in 1764 he was lieutenant-gov. of South Carolina. He was many years in this office, and commander-in-chief. When the British troops left South Carolina in 1782 he accompanied them to England, where he resided the remainder of his life. He died in London. — Ramsay's Rev. of Med. 42, 43; Miller, i. 317, ii. 363; Gentleman's Mag. xxv. 236; Ramsay's Hist. S. C. ii. 113.

BULL, JOHN, general, a soldier of the Revolution, died at Northumberland, Penn., in Aug. 1824, aged 94. In the French wars his services were important, especially in making treaties with the Indians for the safety of the frontiers. In the war for independence he engaged with zeal. In 1776 he was a member of the assembly from the county of Philadelphia. At the age of 75 he was also a useful member of the legislature. He died with composure, trusting in the atonement of the Saviour, with assured hope of a glorious resurrection.

BULL, NORRIS, D. D., died in Lewiston, N. Y., in 1848, aged about 58. Born in Harwinton, he graduated at Yale in 1813, and commenced his labors as a teacher at Lansingburg. He was then a minister at Warsaw, and eleven years at Geneseo. He was afterwards both pastor and teacher at Wyoming and at Clarkson. In 1846 he removed to Lewiston. He published an address to the Wilson Collegiate Institute. — N. Y. Observer, Feb. 26, 1848.

BULLARD, ARTEMAS, Dr., died at Sutton May 6, 1842, aged 73. His ten children were professors of religion.

BULLARD, ARTEMAS, D. D., son of the preceding, minister of the 1st Presbyterian church in St. Louis, was killed on the railroad at Gasconade river, Nov. 1, 1855, aged 53. He had two brothers, who were ministers, and two sisters, who married ministers — Henry W. Beecher, and Lot Jones. He graduated at Amherst in 1826. He married Ann Jones, a teacher in Boston. For ten years he was the general agent of the American board of missions, residing at Cincinnati, and for eighteen years he had been a minister in St. Louis, exerting a very important influence. His new and costly church had just been finished. He was on the first railroad excursion to Jefferson city, when he and nearly thirty others were killed.

Dr. Bullard, when the Presbyterian church was split into two parts, attached himself to the New School division. He was a man of action and energy. His great and very important labors in Missouri in the formation of new churches, the providing of ministers, and the promotion of learning, and his excellent character, are described in the N. Y. Evangelist for Jan. 3, 1856. By his efforts chiefly was Webster College founded.

BULLARD, HENRY A., judge, died in New Orleans, April 17, 1851, aged 62. The son of the minister of Pepperell, he was graduated at Cambridge in 1807; having studied law, he accompanied Gen. Toledo in an expedition against Texas, but in the defeat escaped, although with difficulty, and opened an office in Natchitoches. He was district judge, and a member of congress, and judge of the supreme court; afterwards he practised law in New Orleans, and gave lectures in the law school. The fatigue of his return from Washington occasioned his death.

BULLARD, AMOS, minister of Barre, died Aug. 21, 1850, aged 43. Born in Medway, he graduated at Amherst college in 1833, was for some years assistant teacher in Leicester academy, and ordained Oct. 26, 1843. He was a good scholar and writer, and greatly excelled in metaphysics. His early death was greatly lamented. His widow became an assistant in the academy of Leicester.

BULLOCK, WILLIAM, published a work entitled, Virginia impartially examined, 1649.

BULLOCK, LYDIA, died at Rehoboth, April 26, 1853, aged 81, relict of E. Bullock, daughter of Roger Rogerson, minister of Rehoboth from 1759 to 1799. She had a cultivated mind, was intelligent, refined, dignified, affable, of rich conversation, and much-valued correspondence. Her writings gratified her friends, but were not made public. She was a specimen of the domestic intelligence and refinement, which, unknown to the world, hath blessed many a habitation of New England. For fifty years she was a devoted disciple of Christ. She was a member of a female charitable society, raising for many years an annual sum for the cause of missions.

BUNKER, BENJAMIN, minister of Malden, died Feb. 3, 1670, aged about 30. He was the son of George Bunker, who lived in Charlestown in 1634, and in 1637 was disarmed, with many others, by order of the general court, for being a follower of Wheelwright and Mrs. Hutchinson, lest in some revelation they should make an assault upon the government; from whom, or from some descendant, the name of Bunker's Hill is doubtless derived. The celebrated battle was fought on Breed's Hill, distant 120 rods S. E. from Bunker's, which is a loftier hill. Mr. Bunker was graduated at Harvard college in 1658. — Savage's Winthrop, I. 248.

BURBANK, CALEB, general, died at Millbury, Dec. 9, 1849, aged 83; extensively known as a paper manufacturer.

BURBECK, HENRY, general, died at New London, Oct. 2, 1848, aged 94, being born in Boston, June 8, 1754. His father was an officer at Castle William before the Revolution. He joined his father's company in the American army in 1775, and shared in the battles and sufferings of the war, at the close of which he held the office of major. He afterwards was engaged in the Indian wars along the western frontier; for years he commanded at Mackinaw. In the war of 1812 he served as a brigadier-general; but in 1815 retired to private life, and lived at New London till his death.

BURCH, STEPHEN B., D. D., died at Georgetown, in Sept., 1833, aged 87.

BURD, BENJAMIN, general, died Oct. 5, 1822, aged 69. He was a soldier of the Revolution. At the age of twenty-one he joined Col. Thompson's regiment of Pennsylvania riflemen, and marched as a volunteer to Boston, where he arrived Aug., 1775. He was afterwards in the battle of Long Island. In 1777, as captain in the 4th Pennsylvania regiment, he was in the battles of Trenton and Princeton, and afterwards at the battle of Brandywine. In the capacity of major he was engaged in the battles of Germantown and Monmouth. In 1779 he accompanied Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians. In all his services he was brave and active. After the war he settled down on his paternal farm at fort Littleton, where he was long known for his hospitable and gentlemanly deportment. For the ten last years of his life he resided at Bedford, Penn.; where he died of the dropsy in the chest. His wife died on the preceding day. — Farmer's Coll. II. App. 99.

BURGESS, TRISTAM, judge, died at Watchemoket farm, Providence, Oct. 13, 1853, aged 83. He was born in Rochester, Mass., Feb. 26, 1770, the son of a soldier, Lieut. John B., who died in 1791. The father and three sons were farmers and coopers. He had attended school but a few weeks before he was twenty-one; he afterwards graduated at Brown university in 1796. While teaching school and studying law, he was persuaded to buy a ticket on credit, costing 5 dollars, which drew a prize of 2000, and gave him relief in his poverty. He married the daughter of Welcome Arnold, a merchant of Providence. He had great business as a lawyer, associated with such men as Howell, Burrill, Robbins, Hunter, Bridg-ham, and Hazard. After being chief justice a short time, he was appointed professor of oratory in Brown university. He entered congress in 1825. From him Mr. Randolph received such a rebuff as from no one else, — a rebuke that silenced him: "Moral monsters cannot propagate; — we rejoice that the father of lies can never become the father of liars." In 1835 he retired to private life. He was a diligent student of the Bible. His memoirs were by H. L. Bowen. He published five orations at different times, and several speeches in congress.

BURGESS, BENJAMIN, died in Wayne, Me., June 13, 1853, aged 102, leaving 170 descendants.

BURGESS, Mrs. N. M. HALL, missionary to the Indians on the Allegheny reservation, died Dec. 30, 1851. For sixteen years she had labored with her brother, Rev. W. Hall, devoted to her work. Her end was peaceful, saying, "Dear Saviour, come quickly!" She had been married but a few weeks.

BURGESS, Mrs., missionary at Satara in India, died April 26, 1853, the wife of E. Burgess. She was at Ahmednuggur in 1849. From the time of her arrival at S., in 1851, she was devoted to her work, in the schools, with the native women, and in the church.

BURGOYNE, JOHN, a British lieutenant-general in America, died Aug. 4, 1792. He was the natural son of Lord Bingley. He entered early into the army, and in 1762 had the command of a body of troops, sent to Portugal for the defence of that kingdom against the Spaniards. After his return to England he became a privy councillor, and was chosen a member of parliament. In the American war he was with the British army in Boston, at the battle of Bunker's Hill in 1775, and in the same year was sent to Canada. In the year 1777 he was intrusted with the command of the northern army, which should rather have been given to Sir Guy Carlton, who was much better acquainted with the situation of the country. It was the object of the campaign of 1777 to open a communication between New York and Canada, and thus to sever New England from the other States. Burgoyne first proposed to possess himself of the fortress of Ticonderoga. With an army of about 4,000 chosen British troops and Germans, he left St. John's June 6, and, proceeding up lake Champlain, landed near Crown Point, where he met the Indians and gave them a war feast. He made a speech to them, calculated to secure their friendly co-operation, but designed also to mitigate their native ferocity. He endeavored to impress on them the distinction between enemies in the field and helpless, unarmed inhabitants, and promised rewards for prisoners, but none for scalps. The attempt to lay some restraint upon the mode of warfare, adopted by the savages, is honorable to the humanity of Burgoyne; but it may not be easy to justify the connection with an ally, upon whom it was well known no effectual restraints could be laid. He also published on June 29th, a manifesto, intended to alarm the people of the country, through which he was to march, and concluded it with saying: "I trust I shall stand acquitted in the eyes of God and man in denouncing and executing the vengeance of the State against the wilful outcasts. The messengers of justice and of wrath await them in the field, and devastation, famine, and every concomitant horror, that a reluctant but indispensable prosecution of military duty must occasion, will bar the way to their return."

On the first of July he proceeded to Ticonderoga, where Gen. St. Clair was stationed with about 3,000 effective rank and file, many of whom were without bayonets. The works were extensive and incomplete, and required 10,000 men for their defence. The British army was larger than had been expected. When the investment was almost complete, Gen. St. Clair called a council of war, and the immediate evacuation of the fort was unanimously advised. Preparations for the retreat were accordingly made in the night of July 5th. Burgoyne the next morning engaged in the pursuit, and with the grand division of the army in gun-boats and two frigates proceeded to the falls of Skeensborough; but, meeting with opposition in this place from the works which had been constructed, he returned to South Bay, where he landed. He followed the Americans, however, from Skeensborough to fort Edward on the Hudson river, where, after conducting his army with incredible labor and fatigue through the wilderness, he arrived July 30. Had he returned to Ticonderoga, and embarked on lake George, he might easily have proceeded to fort George, whence there was a wagon road to fort Edward. But he disliked the appearance of a retrograde motion, though it would have brought him to the place of his destination much sooner and with much less difficulty. On his approach Gen. Schuyler, who had been joined by St. Clair, passed over to the west bank of the Hudson, and retreated to Saratoga. Col. St. Leger had been destined to reach Albany from Canada by a different route. He was to ascend the St. Lawrence to Lake Ontario; and thence to proceed down the Mohawk. He had accordingly reached the head of this river, and was investing fort Schuyler, formerly called fort Stanwix, when intelligence of his operations was brought to Burgoyne, who perceived the importance of a rapid movement down the Hudson in order to aid him in his project, and to effect the junction of the troops. But this intention could not be executed without the aid of ox teams, carriages, and provisions. In order to procure them he detached Lieut. Col. Baum with about six hundred men to Bennington, a place about twenty-four miles to the eastward of Hudson's river, where large supplies were deposited for the northern American army. But Baum was defeated at Walloon creek, about seven miles from Bennington, Aug. 16th, and Col. Breyman, who had advanced to his assistance with about five hundred men, was obliged to retreat. This was the first check which the northern army received. This disaster was followed in a few days by another; for St. Leger, being deserted by his Indian allies, who were alarmed by the approach of Gen. Arnold and by a report of the defeat of Burgoyne, was obliged to raise the siege of fort Schuyler in such haste, that the artillery, with a great part of the baggage, ammunition, and provisions fell into the hands of the Americans. As he returned immediately to Canada, Burgoyne was cut off from the hope of being strengthened by a junction, and the American forces were enabled to concentrate themselves in order to oppose him. Gen. Gates arrived, to supersede Schuyler and to take the command of the northern American army, Aug. 19th; and his presence, with the recent events, procured a vast accession of militia, and inspired them with the hope of capturing the whole British army. Burgoyne was prevented from commencing his march by the necessity of transporting provisions from fort George, and every moment's delay increased the difficulty of proceeding. Having thrown a bridge of boats over the Hudson, he crossed that river Sept. 13th and 14th, and encamped on the heights and plains of Saratoga. Gates immediately advanced towards him, and encamped three miles above Stillwater. Burgoyne was not averse to battle. He accordingly approached, and on the 19th the action commenced at about three o'clock and lasted till night, when the Americans under the command of Arnold retired to their camp. The loss on the part of the Americans in killed and wounded was between three and four hundred. The loss of the British was about six hundred. Burgoyne now found that the enemy, which he had to meet, was able to sustain an attack in open plains with the intrepidity and the spirit of veterans. As he had given up all communication with the lakes, he now felt the necessity of a diversion in his favor by the British army. He accordingly wrote upon this subject in the most pressing manner to Sir William Howe and Gen. Clinton; but no effectual aid was afforded. He was also at this time deserted by his Indian allies, who had been disappointed in their hopes of plunder, and whose enthusiasm was chilled. These hordes of the wilderness, of whom in his proclamation he boasted, that "he had but to lift his arm and beckon by a stretch thereof," and they would execute his vengeance, were now "deaf to every consideration of honor, and unmoved by any representation made to them of the distress, in which their secession would involve him." Difficulties thickened around him. His army was reduced to about five thousand men, and they were limited to half the usual allowance of provision. As the stock of forage was entirely exhausted, his horses were perishing in great numbers. The American army was so much augmented, as to render him diffident of making good his retreat.

In this exigency he resolved to examine the possibility of advancing, or of dislodging the Americans, and of removing them to a greater distance, so as to favor his retreat, if he should be under the necessity of resorting to that melancholy expedient. For this purpose he detached a body of 1500 men, which he led, attended by Generals Philips, Reidesel, and Frazer. This detachment, on the seventh of October, had scarcely formed within less than half a mile of the American intrenchments, when a furious attack was made on its left, by the direction of Gates, who had perceived the movements of the British. Arnold soon pressed hard on the right under Burgoyne, which with the loss of the field pieces and great part of the artillery corps retreated to the camp. The Americans followed, and assaulted the works throughout their whole extent from right to left. The works were actually forced towards the close of the day, and Col. John Brooks, who had dislodged the German reserve, occupied the ground, which he had gained. In this action Burgoyne lost a number of his best officers, among whom were Gen. Frazer and Col. Breyman, many privates killed, and two hundred taken prisoners, with nine pieces of brass artillery and the encampment and equipage of the German brigade. After the disasters of the day he took advantage of the night to change his position, and to secure himself in the strong camp on the heights. But apprehensive of being inclosed on all sides, he the next evening commenced his retreat to Saratoga, where he arrived on the morning of the tenth. In his march all the dwelling-houses on his route were reduced to ashes. This movement had been foreseen, and a force was already stationed in his rear to be ready to cut off his retreat. No means of extricating himself from difficulty was now left him, but to abandon his baggage and artillery, and by fording the Hudson to escape to fort George through roads impassable by wagons. Of this last resource he was deprived by the precaution of Gates, who had posted strong parties at the fords, so that they could not be passed without artillery. In this dilemma, when his army was reduced to about 3,500 fighting men, and there was no means of procuring a supply of provisions, which were almost exhausted, he called a council of war, and it was unanimously agreed to enter into a convention with Gen. Gates. The troops of Burgoyne were at first required to ground their arms in their encampments and yield themselves prisoners of war; but this demand was immediately rejected, and the American general did not think it necessary to insist upon the rigorous terms proposed. The convention was signed Oct. 17th, and the British army on the same day marched out of their encampment with all the honors of war. It was stipulated, that they should be permitted to embark for England, and should not serve against the United States during the war. The whole number of prisoners was 5,752. Burgoyne's army in July had consisted of upwards of 9,000 men. The army of Gates, including 2500 sick, amounted to 13,200.

The army of Burgoyne was escorted to Cambridge, where it was kept till Nov. of the following year, when congress directed its removal to Charlottesville in Virginia. This detention of the troops was through fear, that the convention would be broken, and until a ratification of it by the court of Great Britain. Burgoyne himself had obtained permission to repair to England on parole, where he arrived in May, 1778. He met a very cool reception, and was denied admission to the presence of his sovereign. He was even ordered immediately to repair to America as a prisoner; but the ill state of his health prevented his compliance. At length he was permitted to vindicate his character; soon after which he resigned his emoluments from government to the amount of upwards of 15,000 dollars a year. In 1777 there was published at London "a reply to his letter to his constituents," doubtless written by Lord Sackville, the secretary of the American department, on whom Burgoyne had thrown the blame of the failure of the expedition. This pamphlet exhibits some of the peculiarities of the style of Junius, and furnishes one of the reasons for the belief, that Lord Sackville was the author of the letters of Junius.

majority of parliament seemed resolved to persist in the war, he joined the opposition, and advocated a motion for the discontinuance of the fruitless contest. He knew, that it was impossible to conquer America. "Passion, prejudice, and interest," said he, "may operate suddenly and partially; but when we see one principle pervading the whole continent, the Americans resolutely encountering difficulty and death for a course of years, it must be a strong vanity and presumption in our own minds, which can only lead us to imagine that they are not in the right." From the peace till his death he lived as a private gentleman, devoted to pleasure and the muses. His death was occasioned by a fit of the gout. He published a letter to his constituents, 5th ed., 1779; state of the expedition from Canada, 1780; the maid of the oaks, an entertainment; bon ton, and the heiress, a comedy, which were once very popular, and are considered as respectable dramatic compositions. — Stedman, I. 318-357; Marshall, III. 231-291, 393; Warren, II. 1-58; Holmes, II. 269-275; Ramsay, II. 27-56; Gordon, II. 476-490, 238-578; Annual Reg. for 1777, 141-176; for 1778, -195-200; *Coll. BURHANS, DANIEL, D. D., died at Poughkeepsie Dec. 30, 1853, aged 90. He was at an early period of his life an Episcopal minister in Lanesborough.

BURKE, AEDANUS, a judge of the court of chancery in South Carolina, died March 30, 1802, aged 59. He was a native of Galway in Ireland. At the beginning of the Revolution he came as a volunteer to fight for American liberty. In 1778, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court. In 1789 he was a delegate to congress. The establishment of the society of the Cincinnati was opposed by him with great zeal. He died at Charleston. He was an earnest republican; honest, yet eccentric; in the administration of justice inflexibly upright. He published an address to the freemen of the State of South Carolina by Cassius, 1783, in which he recommended a general amnesty; considerations upon the order of the Cincinnati, 1783. — Gordon, IV. 396; Warren, III. 288; Ramsay's S. C. I. 477.

BURKE, JOHN DOLY, author of a history of Virginia, was a native of Ireland and educated at Trinity college. Coming to America in 1797, he conducted for a short time a paper at Boston and afterwards at New York, where he was arrested under the sedition law. At the Boston theatre he was made the master of ceremonies. He was killed in a duel with Felix Coquebert, a Frenchman, in consequence of a political dispute, April 12, 1808. He published a history of Virginia from its first settlement to 1804, in 3 vols. An additional volume, the joint production of Mr. Jones and Mr. Girardin, was published in 1816.

He published also Bunker Hill, a tragedy; Bethlem Gabor, an historical drama, 1803; an oration, delivered March 4, 1808.

BURNABY, ANDREW, a clergyman, published Travels through the middle settlements of North America in 1759 and 1760, 4to. 1776.

BURNAP, JACOB, D. D., first minister of Merrimac, N. H., died Dec. 26, 1821, aged 73. He was born in Reading, Mass., Nov. 2, 1748, and was a descendant of Isaac, who died 1667. After graduating at Harvard college in 1770, he studied theology with Thomas Haven, of Reading, a man of profound erudition, of great mildness and gentleness, and of remarkable patience under severe trials, whose example taught his pupils much of the spirit of religion. The church of Merrimac was constituted Sept. 5, 1772, and Mr. Burnap, was ordained Oct. 14th. After a ministry of nearly fifty years he died. By his second wife, Elizabeth, sister of Gov. John Brooks, who died in 1810, he had thirteen children. Two of his sons graduated at Harvard college. With a sound judgment and vigorous powers, he diligently studied the Scriptures in the original languages. In his sentiments he escaped the extremes of orthodoxy and liberality. In his disposition he was kind and catholic. He published an oration on independence, 1808, and the following sermons: at a fast, 1799; at the election, 1801; on the death of S. Chandler, 1806; of R. M. Davidson, 1808; of R. Parker, 1809; of Sarah, Samuel, and Joanna Spaulding, 1815; of J. Kidder, 1818; at the thanksgiving, 1811; at Merrimac, 1819, and Dec. 20, 1820, two centuries from the settlement of N. E. — Farmer's Collect. II. 76-79.

BURNET, WILLIAM, governor of several of the American colonies, died Sept. 7, 1729. He was the eldest son of the celebrated Bishop Burnet, and was born at the Hague in March, 1688. He was named William after the Prince of Orange, who stood his godfather. Previously to his coming to this country, he possessed a considerable fortune; but it had been wrecked in the South Sea scheme, which reduced many opulent families to indigence. In the year 1720 he was appointed governor of New York and New Jersey in the place of Robert Hunter, who succeeded Mr. Burnet as comptroller-general of the accounts of the customs, a place worth 1200 hundred pounds per annum. He arrived at New York and took upon him the government of that province Sept. 17, 1720. He continued in this station till his removal in 1728. None of his predecessors had such extensive and just views of the Indian affairs, and of the dangerous neighborhood of the French, whose advances he was fully determined to check. He penetrated into their policy, being convinced from their possessing the main passes, from their care to conciliate the natives, and from the increase of their settlements in Louisiana, that the British colonies had much to fear from their arts and power. In his first speech to the assembly he expressed his apprehensions and endeavored to awaken the suspicion of the members. Agreeably to his desire, an act was passed at the first session, prohibiting the sale of such goods to the French, as were suitable for the Indian trade. This was a wise and necessary measure; for, by means of goods, procured from Albany and transported to Canada by the Mohawk and lake Ontario, the French were enabled to divert the fur trade from the Hudson to the St. Lawrence, and to corrupt the fidelity of the Indian allies. But, wise and necessary as this measure was, a clamor was raised against it by those, whose interests were affected. The governor, however, was not prevented from pursuing his plans for the public welfare. He perceived the importance of obtaining the command of lake Ontario, in order to frustrate the project of the French for establishing a chain of forts from Canada to Louisiana, so as to confine the English colonies to narrow limits along the seacoast. For this purpose he began the erection of a trading-house at Oswego, in the country of the Seneca Indians, in 1722. In this year there was a congress at Albany of the several governors and commissioners on the renewal of the ancient friendship with the Indians; and Governor Burnet persuaded them to send a message to the eastern Indians, threatening them with war, unless they concluded a peace with the English, who had been much harassed by their frequent irruptions.

Another circumstance, in addition to the act above mentioned, increased the disaffection of the people to the governor. As he sustained the office of chancellor, he paid great attention to its duties. Though he was not a lawyer, he in general transacted the business, which was brought before him, with correctness and ability. He had, however, one failing, which disqualified him for a station, that sometimes required a patient application of mind. His decisions were precipitate. He used to say of himself, "I act first, and think afterwards." As some cases were brought before him, in which the path of justice was not so plain as to be instantly seen, and as the establishment of the court itself without the consent of the assembly was considered as a grievance, Mr. Burnet saw a strong party rise against him. His services were overlooked and his removal became necessary. Such was his disinterested zeal in prosecuting his plan of opposition to the French, that after they had built a large storehouse and repaired the fort at Niagara in 1726, he in the following year, at his own expense, built a fort at Oswego for the protection of the post and trade. This was a measure of the highest importance to the colonies. In the government of New Jersey, which he enjoyed at the same time with that of

New York, no event of interest took place. In the session of the assembly, in the year 1721, a bill was introduced, which was supposed to have originated with the governor, entitled, "an act against denying the divinity of our Saviour Jesus Christ, the doctrine of the blessed Trinity, the truth of the holy Scripture, and spreading atheistical books;" but it was rejected.

Mr. Burnet was succeeded in his governments by John Montgomerie, to whom he delivered the great seal of the province of New York, April 15, 1728. He left New York with reluctance, for by his marriage with the daughter of Vanhorne he had become connected with a numerous family, and he had formed a strict intimacy and friendship with several gentlemen of learning and worth. Being appointed governor of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, he reached Boston July 13, 1728, and was received with unusual pomp. In his speech to the assembly, July 24, he made known his instructions to insist upon a fixed salary, and expressed his intention firmly to adhere to them. Thus the controversy, which had been agitated during the administration of his predecessor, Shute, was revived. On the one hand it was contended, that if the support of the governor depended upon an annual grant, he would be laid under constraint, and would not act with the necessary independence and regard to the rights of the king. On the other hand it was asserted, that the charter gave the assembly a full right to raise and appropriate all moneys for the support of government, and that an honorable support would always be afforded to a worthy chief magistrate, without rendering him completely independent of the people, whose interests he is bound to promote. The governor pursued the controversy with zeal, but without success; and opposition had an evident effect upon his spirits. A violent cold, occasioned by the oversetting of his carriage upon the causeway at Cambridge, when the tide was high, was followed by a fever, which terminated his life. He left two sons and a daughter. He was succeeded by Mr. Belcher.

Gov. Burnet was a man of superior talents, and in many respects of an amiable character. His acquaintance with books and his free and easy manner of communicating his sentiments made him the delight of men of letters. His library was one of the richest private collections in America. His right of precedence in all companies rendered him the more excusable in indulging his natural disposition by occupying a large share in the conversation. To the ladies he made himself peculiarly agreeable. In his conduct as a governor he discovered nothing of an avaricious spirit, though in order to procure supplies for his family he exceeded the bounds of the law in demanding fees of masters of vessels. His controversy with the assembly respected not the amount of his salary, but only the manner in which it should be secured to him. In his disposal of public offices he was sometimes generous, though he usually preferred those who would favor his cause, and displaced some who opposed him. He removed from his posts Mr. Lynde, a member of the house, whose integrity and talents were unquestioned, merely because he would not vote for a compliance with the instructions given to the governor. By this measure he lost many of his friends. It is, however, highly to the honor of Mr. Burnet, that an immoral or unfair character was in his view a complete exclusion from office; and upon this principle only he once gave his negative to the election of a member of the council.

With regard to his religion, he firmly believed the truth of Christianity, but he seems not to have possessed all the seriousness, which would have been honorable to his character, nor that constant sense of obligation to the Giver of all good, which the Christian should feel. Being invited to dine with an aged gentleman, who had been a senator under the old charter, and who retained the custom of saying grace sitting, he was asked, whether it would be more agreeable to his excellency, that grace should be said sitting or standing. The governor replied, "Standing or sitting, any way or no way, just as you please." Another anecdote is the following. One of the committee, who went from Boston to meet him on the borders of Rhode Island, was the facetious Col. Tailer. Burnet complained of the long graces which were said by clergymen on the road, and asked when they would shorten. Tailer answered, "The graces will increase in length till you come to Boston; after that they will shorten till you come to your government of New Hampshire, where your excellency will find no grace at all." The governor, though the son of a bishop, was not remarkable for his exact attendance upon public worship. Mr. Hutchinson, one of his successors, who had a keener sense of what was discreet, if not of what was right, thinks, that he should have conformed more to the customs and prejudices of New England. But he had no talent at dissimulation, and his character presented itself fully to view. He did not appear better than he really was. He sometimes wore a cloth coat lined with velvet; it was said to be expressive of his character. By a clause in his last will he ordered his body to be buried in the nearest churchyard or burying-ground, as he had no attachment to particular modes and forms.

He published some astronomical observations in the transactions of the royal society, and an essay on Scripture prophecy, wherein he endeavored to explain the three periods contained in the twelfth chapter of Daniel, with arguments to prove, that the first period expired in 1715.

BURNET, MATTHIAS, D. D., Episcopal minister at Norwalk, Conn., graduated at Princeton in 1764 and died in 1806, aged about 55. He published reflections upon the season of harvest, and evidences of a general judgment, two sermons in American preacher, II, III.

BURNET, JACOB, Judge, died at Cincinnati, May 10, 1853, aged 84. A native of Newark, N. J., he graduated at Princeton in 1791, visited Ohio in 1795, and settled at Cincinnati in 1796. He was a senator of the U. S., and a judge of the supreme court of Ohio. One of the founders of Ohio, he lived to see the few early settlers of Cincinnati increased to one hundred and thirty thousand. At the age of 80 he walked the streets erect, and he was yet interesting by his colloquial powers. Washington was a guest in his father's house. He retired from the practice of law in 1816, but was a judge of the supreme court of Ohio, 1821–1828; then a senator of the U. S. By the early purchase of lands he acquired a fortune of a half a million or more. He published, in 1847, Notes on the Northwestern Territory, instructive and very interesting.

BURNETT, WALDO J., M. D., died in Boston July 1, 1854, aged 25, a physician and naturalist, author of several tracts on medical subjects.

BURNHAM, JOHN, major, died in Derry, N. H. in 1843, aged 96: he fought at Bunker Hill.

BURNHAM, LYDIA, Mrs., died in Groton, Vt., Feb. 12, 1852, aged 104 years and 9 months. Her third husband died in 1804.

BURNHAM, ABRAHAM, D. D., died at Pembroke, N. H., Sept. 20, 1852, aged 77. He was a graduate of Dartmouth in 1804. His character is described in the Recorder, Oct. 7. He published a sermon at ordination of A. W. Burnham, 1821.

BURNSIDE, SAMUEL M., died at Worcester July 29, 1850, aged 67. A native of Northumberland, and a graduate of Dartmouth of 1805, he studied law, and was a literary man and a friend of learning, and a useful citizen. He married a daughter of Dwight Foster. He published an oration 1813, and a memoir of J. Thomas in Archæol. Am., II.

BURR, JONATHAN, minister of Dorchester, died Aug. 9, 1641, aged 37. He was born at Redgrave in Suffolk, England, about the year 1604. He gave early indications of an inquisitive, studious, and pious mind. While he was much attached to books, the Bible was peculiarly his delight, and by means of its instructions, which were familiar to him from childhood, he was made wise to salvation. Hence he was conscientious in secret prayer; his whole deportment was guarded and serious; and his Sabbaths were entirely occupied in the exercises becoming a day of holy rest. His pious parents observed with satisfaction the promising disposition of their son; and being desirous to consecrate him to the service of God and his church, determined to bestow upon him a learned education. He was accordingly sent to the university, where he continued three or four years, when the course of his academical studies was interrupted by the death of his father. Being compelled by this melancholy event to retire into the country, he undertook the instruction of a school; but he still pursued with unabating ardor his design of accomplishing himself in the various branches of knowledge. The awful providence of God, he would remark, by which he was precluded from those employments and honors in the university, of which he was very fond, produced an effect, for which he had reason to admire the Divine wisdom. It promoted in him a humility and seriousness, which rendered him more fit for the great work of turning many to righteousness.

After having preached for some time at Horning, near Bury in Suffolk, he was called to take the charge of a congregation at Reckingshal in the same county. Here he approved himself a faithful minister of the gospel. By an explicit and solemn covenant he obligated himself to the most conscientious discharge of the high duties, devolved upon him. He often and earnestly prayed, that whatever he preached to others, he might preach from his own experience. Yet he not unfrequently lamented to his friends, "alas! I preach not what I am, but what I ought to be." Being silenced in England, with many others, for resisting the impositions of the prelatical party, and apprehending that calamities were in store for the nation, he came to New England in 1639, with his wife and three children, willing to forego all worldly advantages, that he might enjoy the ordinances of the gospel in their purity. He was admitted a member of the church in Dorchester under the pastoral care of Richard Mather, Dec. 21. He was in a short time invited to settle as a colleague with Mr. Mather in the ministry; but before accepting the invitation a misunderstanding arose, which made it necessary to ask the advice of the neighboring churches. A council was accordingly called Feb. 2, 1640, consisting of Governor Winthrop and another magistrate and ten ministers. Four days were spent in examining and discussing the affair. It appeared, that Mr. Burr had been suspected of some errors, and, being directed to give his opinion in writing to Mr. Mather, the latter had reported the exceptionable expressions and the erroneous sentiments to the church, without alluding to the qualifications which they might receive from other parts of the writing. These errors Mr. Burr disclaimed. The council declared, that both these good men had cause to be humbled for their failings, and advised them to set apart a day for reconciliation. This was accordingly done. The spirit of meekness and love triumphed, the mutual affection of the ministers was restored, and the peace of the church was happily re-established. Mr. Burr, whose faith had been somewhat shaken, by means of the discussion was confirmed in the truth, and he humbled himself with many tears. He and his family were in this year taken sick with the small pox, which, as inoculation was not practised, was a very dangerous disorder; but he happily recovered. On this occasion he renewed the dedication of himself to God, resolving to act only for his glory and the good of his brethren, and not to be governed by selfishness; to live in humility and with a sense of his complete dependence upon Divine grace; to be watchful over his own heart lest his reliance should be transferred from the Creator to the creature; to be mindful, that God heareth prayer; and to bend his exertions with more diligence for the promotion of pious affections in himself and in his family. He lived afterwards answerably to these holy resolutions. The most experienced Christians in the country found his ministry and his whole deportment breathing much of the spirit of a better world. The eminent Mr. Hooker, once hearing him preach, remarked, "Surely this man will not be long out of heaven, for he preaches as if he were there already."

Mr. Burr was esteemed both in England and in this country for his piety and learning. His modesty and self-diffidence were uncommonly great. He could with difficulty imagine, that performances such as his could be productive of any good. Yet he was sometimes most happily disappointed. Having been by much importunity prevailed on to preach at a distance from home, he returned, making the most humiliating reflections on his sermon. "It must surely be of God," said he, "if any good is done by so unworthy an instrument." Yet this sermon was instrumental in the conversion of a person of eminence, who heard it, and whose future-life manifested that he was a Christian indeed. It was his custom on the Sabbath, after his public labors, to retire to his closet, where he supplicated forgiveness of the sins which had attended his performances, and implored the Divine blessing upon them. He then spent some hours in praying with his family and instructing them in the great truths of religion. When he was desired to relax his excessive exertions to do good, lest he should be exhausted, he replied: "It is better to be worn out with the work, than to be eaten out with rust." He began each day with secret prayer. He then carefully meditated on a chapter of the Bible, which he afterwards, at the time of domestic worship, expounded to his family and such neighbors as wished to be present. A similar course he pursued at evening. He generally spent some time after dinner in praying with his wife. Immediately before retiring to rest, he employed half an hour in recollecting and confessing the sins of the day, in grateful acknowledgments of Divine mercies, and in supplications to be prepared for sudden death. Previously to each celebration of the Lord's supper he kept with his wife a day of fasting and prayer, not merely as a preparative for that sacred ordinance, but as a season for imploring the blessing of God on his family and neighborhood. Absence from home was irksome to him, particularly as it deprived him of those opportunities of holding intercourse with Heaven on which he placed so great a value. But when he journeyed with his friends, he did not fail to edify them by profitable conversation; especially by instructive remarks on such objects and occurrences as presented themselves to his attention. In the recollection of these scenes he was accustomed to inquire, what good had been done or gained, what useful examples seen, and what valuable instructions heard.

While he was indefatigable in his ministerial work, he was not anxious for any other reward than what he found in the service itself. If any, who hoped that they had received spiritual benefit through his exertions, sent him expressions of their gratitude, he would pray that he might not have his portion in these things. Nor was he backward to remind his grateful friends, that whatever good they had received through him, the glory should be ascribed to God alone. It was in preaching the gospel that he found his highest enjoyment in life. In proportion to the ardor of his piety was the extent of his charity. He sincerely loved his fellow men, and while their eternal interests pressed with weight on his heart, he entered with lively sympathy into their temporal afflictions. Rarely did he visit the poor without communicating what was comfortable to the body, as well as what was instructive and salutary to the soul. When he was reminded of the importance of having a greater regard to his own interest, he replied: "I often think of those words: 'He that soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly.'" For the general interests of religion in the world he felt so lively a concern, that his personal joys and sorrows seemed inconsiderable in comparison. He was bold and zealous in withstanding everything which brought dishonor on the name of God; but under personal injuries he was exemplarily meek and patient. When informed that any thought meanly of him, his reply was: "I think meanly of myself, and therefore may well be content that others think meanly of me." When charged with what was faulty, he remarked: "If men see so much evil in me, what does God see?"

In his last sickness he exhibited uncommon patience and submission. He was perfectly resigned to the will of God. Just before his death, as his faith was greatly tried, and he endured a sharp conflict, a person who was standing by remarked: "This is one of Satan's last assaults; he is a subtle enemy, and would, if it were possible, deceive the very elect." Mr. Burr repeated the expression, "If it were possible;" and added, "but, blessed be God, there is no possibility." He then requested to be left alone for prayer. But seeing the company reluctant to depart, he prayed in Latin as long as he had strength. He then called for his wife, and steadfastly fixing his eyes upon her, said, "Cast thy care upon God, for he careth for thee." He soon afterwards expired. He left four children. His sons were Jonathan, John, and Simon; the former graduated at Harvard college in 1651, was a physician in Hingham, and died in Canada in 1690. His widow, Frances, married Richard Dummer, with whom she lived happily nearly forty years. — Mather's Magn., III. 78–81; Panoplist, Sept. 1808; Savage's Winthrop, II. 22; Harris' Hist. of Dorchester in Coll. Hist. Soc. IX. 173–175.

BURR, PETER, chief justice of Connecticut, died in 1724, aged about 54. He was the grandson of Jonathan, and graduated at Harvard in 1690. He was appointed judge in 1711, and chief justice in 1723. His son, Rev. Isaac B., was a graduate of Yale in 1717, and died in 1751.

BURR, AARON, president of New Jersey college, died Sept. 24, 1757, aged 41. He was a native of Fairfield, in Connecticut, and was born Jan. 4, 1716. His ancestors for a number of generations had lived in that colony, and were persons of great respectability. His father was Daniel, of Fairfield, a descendant of John, of Springfield and Fairfield. He was graduated at Yale college in 1735. In 1742 he was invited to take the pastoral charge of the Presbyterian church at Newark in New Jersey. Here he became so eminent as an able and learned divine and an accomplished scholar, that in 1748 he was unanimously elected president of the college, which he was instrumental in founding, as successor to Mr. Dickinson. The college was removed about this time from Elizabethtown to Newark, and in 1757, a short time before the death of Mr. Burr, to Princeton. In 1754 he accompanied Mr. Whitefield to Boston, having a high esteem for the character of that eloquent itinerant preacher, and greatly rejoicing in the success of his labors. After a life of usefulness and honor, devoted to his Master in heaven, he was called into the eternal world at a comparatively early age.

President Burr had a slender and delicate frame; yet to encounter fatigue he had a heart of steel. To amazing talents for the dispatch of business, he joined a constancy of mind that commonly secured to him success. As long as an enterprise appeared possible, he yielded to no discouragement. The flourishing state of the college of New Jersey was much owing to his great and assiduous exertion. It was in a great degree owing to his influence with the legislature, and to his intimacy and friendship with Governor Belcher, that the charter was enlarged in 1746. The first class was graduated in 1748, the first year of his presidency. When his services were requested by the trustees of the college in soliciting donations for the purchase of a library and philosophical apparatus, and for erecting a building for the accommodation of the students, he engaged with his usual zeal in the undertaking, and everywhere met with the encouragement which the design so fully deserved. A place being fixed upon at Princeton for the site of the new building, the superintendence of the work was solely committed to him. Until the spring of 1757, when the college was removed to Newark, he discharged the duties both of president and pastor of a church. Few were more perfect in the art of rendering themselves agreeable in company. He knew the avenues to the human heart, and he possessed the rare power of pleasing without betraying a design to please. As he was free from ostentation and parade, no one would have suspected his learning, unless his subject required him to display it, and then every one was surprised that a person so well acquainted with books should yet possess such ease in conversation and such freedom of behavior. He inspired all around him with cheerfulness. His arms were open to good men of every denomination. A sweetness of temper, obliging courtesies, and mildness of manners, joined to an engaging candor of sentiment, spread a glory over his reputation, and endeared his person to all his acquaintance. Though steady to his own principles, he was free from all bigotry. In the pulpit he shone with superior lustre. He was fluent, copious, sublime, and persuasive. Having a clear and harmonious voice, which was capable of expressing the various passions; and taking a deep interest in his subject, he could not fail to reach the heart. His invention was exhaustless, and his elocution was equal to his ideas. He was not one of those preachers who soothe their hearers with a delusive hope of safety, who substitute morality in the place of holiness, and yield the important doctrines of the gospel through fear of displeasing the more reputable sinners. He insisted upon the great and universal duty of repentance, as all were guilty and condemned by the Divine law. He never wished to administer consolation till the heart was renewed and consecrated unto God. When he saw the soul humbled, he then dwelt upon the riches of redeeming mercy, and expatiated upon the glories of him who was God manifest in the flesh. It was his endeavor to alarm the thoughtless, to fix upon the conscience a sense of sin, to revive the disconsolate, to animate the penitent, to reclaim the relapsing, to confirm the irresolute, and to establish the faithful. He wished to restore to man the beautiful image of God, disfigured by the apostasy. His life and example were a comment on his sermons; and by his engaging deportment he rendered the amiable character of a Christian still more attractive and lovely. He was distinguished for his public spirit. Amidst his other cares he studied, and planned, and toiled for the good of his country. He had a high sense of English liberty, and detested despotic power as the bane of human happiness. He considered the heresy of Arius as not more fatal to the purity of the gospel, than the positions of Filmer were to the dignity of man and the repose of States. But though he had much of that patriotic spirit which is ornamental even to a Christian minister, he cautiously intermeddled with any matters of a political nature, being aware of the invidious constructions which are commonly put upon the most unexceptionable attempts made by men of his profession to promote the public welfare. He was a correspondent of the Scotch society for propagating the gospel; and he thought no labor too great in the prosecution of an enterprise which promised to illuminate the gloomy wilderness with the beams of evangelical truth. Over the college he presided with dignity and reputation. He had the most engaging method of instruction and a singular talent in communicating his sentiments. While he stripped learning of its mysteries, and presented the most intricate subjects in the clearest light, and thus enriched his pupils with the treasures of learning, he wished also to implant in their minds the seeds of virtue and religion. He took indefatigable pains in regard to their religious instruction; and with zeal, solicitude, and parental affection pressed upon them the care of their souls, and with melting tenderness urged the importance of their becoming the true disciples of the holy Jesus. In some instances his pious exertions were attended with success. In the government of the college he exhibited the greatest impartiality and wisdom. Though in judgment and temper inclined to mild measures, when these failed, he would resort to a necessary severity, and no connections could prevent the equal distribution of justice. In no college were the students more narrowly inspected and prudently guarded, or vice of every kind more effectually searched out and discountenanced and suppressed. He secured with the same ease the obedience and love of his pupils.

The year after he took his first degree he resided at New Haven, and this is the period when his mind was first enlightened with the knowledge of the way of salvation. In his private papers he wrote as follows: "This year God saw fit to open my eyes, and show me what a miserable creature I was. Till then I had spent my life in a dream; and as to the great design of my being had lived in vain. Though, before, I had been under frequent convictions, and was driven to a form of religion, yet I knew nothing as I ought to know. But, then, I was brought to the footstool of sovereign grace; saw myself polluted by nature and practice; had affecting views of the Divine wrath I deserved; was made to despair of help in myself, and almost concluded that my day of grace was past. It pleased God, at length, to reveal his Son to me in the gospel, an all-sufficient and willing Saviour, and I hope inclined me to receive him on the terms of the gospel. I received some consolation, and found a great change in myself. Before this I was strongly attached to the Arminian scheme, but then I was made to see those things in a different light, and seemingly felt the truth of the Calvinian doctrines." He was unfluctuating in principle and ardent in devotion, raising his heart continually to the Father of mercies in adoration and praise. He kept his eye fixed upon the high destiny of man, and lived a spiritual life. The efficacy of his religious principles was evinced by his benevolence and charity. From the grace of God he received a liberal and generous disposition, and from his bounty the power of gratifying the desire of doing good. At the approach of death that gospel, which he had preached to others, and which discloses a crucified Redeemer, gave him support. He was patient and resigned, cheered with the liveliest hope. The king of terrors was disarmed of his sting.

Mr. Burr married in 1752 a daughter of Jonathan Edwards, his successor in the presidency of the college. She died in 1758, the year after the death of her husband, in the twenty-seventh year of her age, leaving two children, one of whom was Aaron Burr, afterwards vice-president of the United States, and the other a daughter, deceased, who was married to Judge Reeve. Mrs. Burr was in every respect an ornament to her sex, being equally distinguished for the suavity of her temper, the gracefulness of her manners, her literary accomplishments, and her unfeigned regard to religion. She combined a lively imagination, a penetrating mind, and correct judgment. When only seven or eight years of age she was brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and her conduct through life was becoming the gospel. Her religion did not cast a gloom over her mind, but made her cheerful and happy, and rendered the thought of death transporting. She left a number of manuscripts upon interesting subjects, and it was hoped they would have been made public; but they are now lost.

Mr. Burr published a treatise, entitled, the supreme deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, maintained in a letter to the dedicator of Mr. Emlyn's inquiry; reprinted at Boston in 1791. He published a sermon on ordination of D. Bostwick, 1745; a fast sermon on account of the encroachments of the French, Jan. 1, 1755; the watchman's answer to the question, what of the night? a sermon, 1756; a funeral sermon on Governor Belcher, 1757. This was preached but a few days before his own death, and his exertions in a very feeble state of health to honor the memory of a highly respected friend, it is thought, accelerated his end. — Livingston's Fun. Eulogy; Smith's Serm. and Pref. to Burr's Serm. on Belcher; Miller, II. 345; Edward's Life, app.; Green's Disc. 300-313; Savage's Winthrop, 11, 22.

BURR, HENRY, of N. J., died about the year 1772, making provision for the emancipation of all his slaves, the eldest at his death, and the younger as they reached a suitable age. Peter White of Haddonfield, who married a daughter of Burr, and died about 1744, also emancipated his slaves. These were the two earliest instances of emancipation. — Mass. Hist. Coll. s. s. VIII. 187.

BURR, AARON, vice-president of the United States, died at Staten Island Sept. 14, 1836, aged 80. He was born at Newark Feb. 6, 1756, the son of President Burr, and grandson of President Edwards. His father died in 1757, and his mother in 1758. His sister, Sarah, married Judge Reeve of Litchfield. He was graduated at Princeton in 1773. In 1775, at the age of nineteen, he joined the army at Cambridge, and accompanied Arnold in his expedition against Quebec. In 1776 he was invited to join the family of Washington, but soon lost his confidence. In 1779, bearing the rank of lieutenant-colonel, he retired from military life. He commenced the practice of law at Albany in 1782, but soon removed to New York. From 1791 to 1797 he was a member of the senate of the United States, attached to the democratic party. He and Mr. Jefferson had each seventy-three votes for president in 1800; congress on the thirty-sixth ballot elected Jefferson president, and Burr vice-president. July 12, 1804, he mortally wounded Hamilton in a duel. Arrested for treason, he was tried at Richmond in Aug., 1807, and acquitted. For the rest of his life he resided chiefly in New York, living in obscurity and neglect. Left in infancy without a father or mother, he never imitated their virtues, but was a most unprincipled, licentious, profligate man. His biographer, Mr. Davis, has stamped his character with infamy.

BURR, JOSEPH, a philanthropist, died at Manchester, Vt., without a family, April 14, 1828, aged 56, bequeathing more than 90,000 dollars to various objects of charity. He bequeathed for foreign missions 17,000 dollars, 15,000 to the Bible society, 12,000 to Middlebury college, 10,000 to the American home missionary society, 5,000 to the tract, colonization, and Vermont missionary societies each, 5,000 to the parish in Manchester, 3,000 to an education society, 1,000 to Dartmouth and Williams colleges each, 10,000 for a public seminary of learning in Manchester. He bequeathed these thousands of dollars, besides bestowing a large amount of property upon his relatives. With a small patrimony he had acquired his estate by his unfailing judgment and prudence. He was the banker of his region. He was honorable and conscientious. With correct religious views and a moral deportment, he yet avowed no hope of a spiritual renovation, until a short time before his death. On his last morning he said, "I think I am waiting for the coming of my Lord."—Missionary Herald, XXIV. 226.

BURR, JONATHAN, minister of Sandwich, died Aug. 2, 1842, aged 85. A graduate of Harvard in 1784, he succeeded A. Williams in 1787, and was dismissed Dec. 25, 1818. He was a faithful minister, receiving three hundred and thirty-five members into his church; in one year one hundred and fourteen. He was also a useful teacher of youth; respected and beloved. He may be regarded as the founder of Sandwich academy.

BURR, MARY, the last of the Punkapang Indians, died at Canton, Mass., Nov. 1, 1852, aged 101 years. There are many half and quarter bloods left of the tribe; not one full blood. She married a colored man, Semore Burr, and had many children. She had a pension for her husband's services in the Revolutionary war. Eliza Williams, her sister, died in 1848 at Stoughton, also aged 101 years. Another sister, Hannah Nuff, died at Canton, aged 99.

BURRILL, JOHN, speaker of the house of representatives of Mass., sustained this office for many years during the administration of Gov. Shute, and acquitted himself in it with great reputation. He was distinguished for his great integrity, his acquaintance with the forms of parliamentary proceedings, the dignity and authority with which he filled the chair, and for the order and decorum, which he maintained in the debates of the house. In the year 1720 he was chosen a member of the council. He died of the small pox at Lynn, Dec. 10, 1721, aged 63. Besides sustaining the offices above mentioned, he was also one of the judges of the county of Essex. To his other accomplishments there was added an exemplary piety. The morning and evening incense of prayer to God ascended from his family altar.—Henchman's Funeral Sermon; Hutchinson's Hist. of Mass. II. 234.

BURRILL, JACOB, major, died at Newbury in 1821, aged 83, a soldier in the French and Revolutionary wars. In the battle of Bunker Hill he cautioned his fellows to take good aim.

BURRILL, JAMES, a senator, was the son of James B., of Providence, R. I., died Dec. 25, 1820, aged 49. He was born about 1771. He was the descendant of George Burrill, an early settler and wealthy farmer of Lynn, Mass., who died in 1653. The genealogy is traced by Mr. Farmer in his register. He was graduated at Brown university, 1788. Having studied law, he was for many years attorney-general of the State, a member and speaker of the assembly, and chief justice. He succeeded Mr. Howell in the senate of the United States in 1816, and died at Washington. He entered earnestly into the debate concerning the admission of Missouri into the Union, vindicating the cause of freedom, only a few days before his death. His wife, Sarah, sister of J. L. Arnold, died in 1814. Two daughters were married in 1821 to Geo. Curtis and Wm. R. Greene.—Farmer's Genealogical Register.

BURROUGHS, GEORGE, one of the victims of the witchcraft delusion in 1692, was executed Aug. 19. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1670, and in 1676 was a preacher at Falmouth, now Portland, Maine. When the place was attacked by the Indians Aug. 11, he escaped to Bang's Island. He succeeded Mr. Bayley as a preacher at Salem village, in Nov., 1680. In 1683, in consequence of some dispute, he returned to Portland, where he held two hundred acres of land, which the people had some years before given to him as their minister; of this he relinquished at their request one hundred and seventy acres, and in a very disinterested spirit offered to give them twenty acres more, if they wished, without receiving, what they had offered, one hundred acres "further off." His character stood unimpeached. After the town was destroyed by the Indians in 1690, he returned to Salem village, or Danvers. In 1692 he was accused of witchcraft, and was brought to trial Aug. 5th. In his indictment it was stated, that by his wicked arts, one Mary Wolcott "was tortured, afflicted, pined, consumed, wasted, and tormented." The evidence against him was derived principally from the testimony of the afflicted persons, as those were called who were supposed to be bewitched, and from that of the confessing witches. The spectre of a little, black-haired man, it was testified, had inflicted cruel pains, and appeared as a head conjuror. Two of his wives had appeared to the witnesses, saying that he was the cause of their death, and threatening, if he denied it, that they would appear in court. Accordingly, during his trial the afflicted persons were thrown into a paroxysm of horror by the spectres of his wives, who were mindful of their engagement. The confessing witches affirmed, that he had attended witch meetings with them, and compelled them to the snarcs of witchcraft. He was also accused of performing such feats of extraordinary strength, as could not be performed without diabolical assistance, such as carrying a barrel of molasses through a difficult place, from a canoe to the shore, and putting his fore-finger into the muzzle of a large gun, and holding it out straight. He pleaded his innocence; but it was in vain. He had excited prejudices against him, while he lived in Salem, and he was now doomed to suffer with many others through the infatuation which prevailed. At his execution he made a speech, asserting his innocence, and concluded his dying prayer with the Lord's prayer, probably to vindicate his character, as it was a received opinion, that a witch could not repeat the Lord's prayer, without mistake. This last address to heaven was uttered with such composure and fervency of spirit, as drew tears from the spectators. — Neal's N. E. II. 130-134, 144; Hutchinson, II. 37, 56; *Coll. Hist. BURROUGHS, EDEN, died of the spotted fever at Hartford, Vt., May 22, 1813, aged 75. Born at Stratford, Conn., he graduated in 1757 at Yale, was settled over the third church in Killingsly in 1760, and at E. Hanover, N. H., in 1775, where his labors were greatly blessed. For forty years he was a trustee of Dartmouth.

BURROUGHS, STEPHEN, son of the preceding, died at Three Rivers in Canada, Jan. 28, 1840. His strange course of villainy made him notorious through the country. He published his own memoirs.

BURROWS, WILLIAM, a naval officer, died Sept. 5, 1813. He was born at Kenderton, near Philadelphia, Oct. 6, 1785. To the grief of his father, Col. Burrows of the marine corps, he early indicated a passion for the naval service. A midshipman's warrant was obtained in 1799. In subsequent years he served on board of different ships; in 1803 he was under Preble in the Tripolitan war; in 1807 he enforced the embargo in the Delaware. In 1812 he made a voyage to India on his private affairs. Appointed to the command of the sloop-of-war, Enterprise, he sailed from Portsmouth, and on Sunday Sept. 5, 1813, fell in with his Britannic majesty's brig, the Boxer, off Portland, between Seguin and cape Elizabeth. After an action of forty-five minutes the Boxer was captured, her commander, Blyth, being killed by a cannon-ball. At the first fire, Lieut. Burrows was wounded by a musket-ball, but refused to be carried below. When the sword of his enemy was presented to him, he exclaimed, clasping his hands, "I am satisfied — I die contented." He died at twelve o'clock at night. For his gallantry, congress awarded a gold medal to his nearest male relative. The two commanders were honorably buried in Portland on the 9th. Lieut. Burrows was cold and reserved in his manners; yet he had an irresistible vein of wit and humor. His master passion was the love of glory; and a momentary flush of triumph soothed the anguish of his last hours. He lived not to hear the applauses of his countrymen. Happy are they, who seek and obtain the unwithering glory, the everlasting honor of heaven. — Amer. Nav. Biog. 231-242.

BURT, JOHN, minister of Bristol, R. I., was graduated at Harvard college, in 1736, and was ordained May 13, 1741. He died Oct. 7, 1775, aged 58 years. His death was very singular. Capt. Wallace, a British commander, had commenced a heavy cannonade upon the town at a time when an epidemical sickness was prevailing. Those, who were able fled from the town. Mr. Burt, though weak and sick, endeavored to escape the impending destruction. He was afterwards found dead in an adjacent field, supposed to have been overcome by fatigue. No other person was injured in the attack. His wife was the daughter of Lieut. Gov. Wm. Ellery. His father was Benjamin Burt, and his mother the daughter of Rev. Mr. Cheever of Chelsea. He was a sound divine and a venerable servant of Jesus Christ, preaching the true doctrines of grace. — Account of Bristol; Warren, I. 244.

BURT, FEDERAL, minister of Durham, N. H., died Feb. 2, 1828, aged 38. He was probably a descendant of David Burt, an early settler of Northampton, Mass., who had fifteen children. He was born at Southampton March 4, 1789. As the new government under the federal constitution commenced at that time, his Christian name is to be ascribed to that circumstance. There are names in our country originating in greater caprice,—as Mr. Perserved Fish, a sound merchant of New York, and Mr. Adam Eve, who died lately in Penn., at a great age, and Mr. Pickled Ham of Maine, who has not yet turned to corruption. Mr. B. was graduated at Williams college in 1812, was ordained June 18, 1817. Settled over a small church, his faithful labors caused it to be greatly increased. He was an active and intelligent minister, and his usefulness extended to the neighboring towns. He endured with the utmost patience a most painful disease, obliging him to submit to the amputation, first of a finger, and then of an arm. In this condition he undertook to conduct the N. H. Observer, a religious paper. Many of the editorial articles he wrote when in extreme pain: he was exerting an extensive, beneficial influence in the community, when he was called away from his labors. — Chris. Mirror, Feb. 15, 1828.

BURTON, ASA, D. D., was born in Preston, now Grisworld, Conn., in 1752, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1777, ordained at Thetford in 1779, and died April 23, 1836, aged 83. In 1825 Rev. Charles White, D. D., became his colleague, and continued till 1831. The next year Rev. Elisha G. Babcock became his colleague: he died in 1848, and was succeeded by Rev. Timothy F. Clary in 1849. When Dr. B. was settled, there were only sixteen church members. In half a century he had admitted four hundred and ninety members. The village is called Thetford Hill, two miles west of a railway station on the Connecticut River. The academy has three hundred youth of both sexes. In 1824 Dr. B.'s essays were published, on the Taste Scheme, in opposition to Emmons' Exercise Scheme. He published a sermon at the ordination of T. Clark, 1800; of C. J. Tenney, 1804; of B. White, 1811; before the Phi Beta Kappa Soc., 1800.

BUSHE, BENJAMIN, died in Greensborough, Vt., March 21, 1845, aged 115. He was a native of Swanzea, Mass.

BUSHNELL, DAVID, inventor of submarine navigation, died in 1824, aged about 70. He was a native of Saybrook, Conn., and probably a descendant of Henry B. of Guilford, in 1650. He was graduated at Yale college in 1775. In the Revolutionary war he invented a machine for submarine navigation, by which a magazine was to be carried to the bottom of ships, for blowing them up, when the conductor was at a safe distance. He attempted to put it in operation in the harbor of New York, but with little success. Great alarm however was excited among the British; which occasioned the humorous poetical narrative of "the battle of the kegs," by Francis Hopkinson. Dr. Dwight, in his "Greenfield Hill," speaks of Bushnell's genius, and alludes to

"His mystic vessel, plung'd beneath the waves, Gliding through dark retreats and coral caves."

An account of this machine is contained in Siliman's journal, 1820. It was under the management of Capt. Ezra Lee, a good officer, of daring enterprise, who died at Lyme in 1821, aged 72. At the close of the war Bushnell himself was a captain in the army. Gen. Heath relates that, Oct. 9, 1776, the enemy captured a sloop in the Hudson with the machine on board, and sunk it to the bottom, and he remarks, "its fate was truly a contrast to its design."—Heath, 69.

BUSINELL, Mrs., wife of A. Bushnell, missionary in West Africa, died Feb. 25, 1850, aged 39. She was a native of Salem, West Chester Co., N. Y. As a teacher of the Methodist Board, she sailed for Africa in 1837, and in 1839 married W. Stocker, of the Methodist Mission in Liberia. After his death she joined the Mission of the American Board at Gaboon, and in 1845 married Mr. Bushnell. She had gladly toiled thirteen years for Africa, and met death in perfect peace, saying, "Jesus is precious, O how precious!"

BUSHNELL, BENJAMIN, died in Saybrook, April 28, 1855, aged 89. His brothers died, Daniel, aged 90; Ethan, 86; Eber, 82: his grandfather died aged 100.

BUSHNELL, CAMPBELL, a lawyer of Hudson, and New York, died in Dec., 1839, aged 47. He was a native of Salisbury, the son of Gideon B. He was a member of the Mercer-street church. His death was peaceful. To his son he said, "I bequeath you my Bible; take it, study it, love it." Being asked, if he feared death, he replied—"Death! I shall not die: I shall live the life everlasting!"—Observer, Jan 4, 1840.

BUSHNELL, JEDEDIAH, died in Cornwall, Vt., about 1846. He was an early and very useful missionary in our new settlements.

BUSHYHEAD, JESSE, chief justice of the Cherokees, received some English education, and became a good speaker in English, an orator in Cherokee. He was a correct interpreter and translator.

BUSS, JOHN, a physician, officiated for many years as a preacher of the gospel. In Sept., 1672, a contract was made with him by the people of Wells, Me. He preached there at least ten years. The preachers before him were Joseph Emerson, Jeremiah Hubbard, and Robert Payne. His successors were Percival Green, Richard Marten, Samuel Emery Samuel Jefferds, Gideon Richardson, Benjamin White, and Jonathan Greenleaf. Until 1701, no church was formed. Probably Mr. Buss was not ordained. About 1682 he removed to Oyster River, now Durham, N. H., where he preached thirty-three years, and was also a practitioner of physic. His house and valuable library were burnt by the Indians in 1694. He ceased preaching about 1715, and was succeeded by Hugh Adams, the first minister: a late minister of Durham was Federal Burt. Mr. Buss died in 1736, aged 95. Mr. Belknap and others erroneously make his age 108, for in a petition to the governor and legislature in 1718 he stated his age as then 78.—Farmer's Reg.; Hist. Coll., II. 291; Maine Hist. Coll. I, 264; Belknap's N. H. III. 250.

BUSSEY, BENJAMIN, died in Roxbury Jan. 13, 1842, aged 84, a soldier of the Revolution. With a capital of ten dollars he commenced business as a silversmith in Dedham: he became a rich merchant in Boston, worth about 350,000 dollars, which he bequeathed after the death of three persons to Harvard college for agricultural, law, and divinity schools.

BUTLER, RICHARD, major-general, an officer of the Revolutionary army, in the latter part of the war had the rank of colonel and was distinguished on several occasions. About 1787 he was agent for Indian affairs in Ohio. In the expedition against the Indians in 1791 he accompanied St. Clair and commanded the right wing. Our troops, encamped a few miles from the Miami villages, were attacked in the morning of Nov. 4th. The militia, who were in advance, were thrown into confusion, and rushed through the first line, commanded by Gen. Butler. The action was now severe; the Indians lying on the ground, and pouring a deadly fire upon the whites. Gen. Butler, in an heroic charge with the bayonet, drove them back three or four hundred yards. But resistance was ineffectual. In a short time six hundred, of the army of twelve hundred, were killed and wounded, and the rest at nine o'clock fled with precipitation. Gen. Butler was wounded and carried to a convenient place to have his wounds dressed; but an Indian broke in upon him and tomahawked and scalped him, ere he himself was killed by our troops. Major Ferguson was another victim. In one of the charges Maj. Butler was dangerously wounded. A son of Gen. B. distinguished himself at fort Meigs, under Harrison, in April 1813. — Holmes, II. 388; Marshall, v. 329-334.

BUTLER, THOMAS, colonel, a brave officer during the Revolutionary war, died Sept. 7, 1805, aged 51. He was a brother of the preceding. Three other brothers fought in the service of their country. In the year 1776 he was a student at law with judge Wilson of Philadelphia; but early in that year he quitted his studies, and joined the army as a subaltern. He soon obtained the command of a company, in which he continued till the close of the Revolutionary contest. He was in almost every action, that was fought in the middle states during the war. At the battle of Brandywine, Sept. 11, 1777, he received the thanks of Washington on the field of battle, through his aid de camp, Gen. Hamilton, for his intrepid conduct in rallying a detachment of retreating troops, and giving the enemy a severe fire. At the battle of Monmouth, June 28, 1778, he received the thanks of Wayne for defending a defile in the face of a heavy fire from the enemy, while Col. Richard Butler's regiment made good their retreat. At the close of the war he retired into private life as a farmer, and continued in the enjoyment of rural and domestic happiness till the year 1791, when he again took the field against the savages, who menaced our western frontier. He commanded a battalion in the disastrous battle of Nov. 4, in which his brother fell. Orders were given by Gen. St. Clair to charge with the bayonet, and Maj. Butler, though his leg had been broken by a ball, yet on horseback led his battalion to the charge. It was with difficulty, that his surviving brother, Capt. Edward Butler, removed him from the field. In 1792 he was continued on the establishment as major, and in 1794 he was promoted to the rank of lieut.

colonel commandant of the fourth sub-legion. He commanded in this year fort Fayette at Pittsburg, and prevented the deluded insurgents from taking it, more by his name than by his forces, for he had but few troops. In 1797 he was named by Washington as the officer best calculated to command in the State of Tennessee, when it was necessary to dispossess some citizens, who had imprudently settled on the Indian lands. Accordingly, in May he marched with his regiment from the Miami on the Ohio, and by that prudence and good sense, which marked his character through life, he in a short time removed all difficulties. While in Tennessee he made several treaties with the Indians. In 1802, at the reduction of the army, he was continued as colonel of a regiment on the peace establishment. The close of his life was embittered. In 1803 he was arrested by the commanding general at fort Adams on the Mississippi, and sent to Maryland, where he was tried by a court martial, and acquitted of all the charges, except that of wearing his hair. He was then ordered to New Orleans, where he arrived to take the command of the troops Oct. 20. He was again arrested the next month. — Louisiana Gaz.; Polyanthos, I. 13-17; Marshall, v. 332.

BUTLER, JOHN, colonel, a tory infamous for the massacre at Wyoming, for which the name of Brant has been unjustly branded with infamy, removed from Connecticut and settled at Wyoming under a grant from that colony, though within the bounds of Pennsylvania. Early after the beginning of the war he espoused the cause of the enemy. In Aug., 1777, he and Daniel Claus signed an address to the inhabitants of Tryon county, exhorting the people to lay down their arms, and sent it by Walter Butler and a party of white and red men to the German Flats. The messenger was imprisoned for his pains. Gen. Arnold issued a counter proclamation at German Flats, Aug. 20th.

In 1778 there were eight townships on the Susquehanna in the vale of Wyoming, each five miles square, namely: Lackawana, Exeter, Kingston, Wilkesbarre, Plymouth, Nanticoak, Huntington, and Salem. There were one thousand families, from which one thousand soldiers had been furnished to the army, besides the garrisons of four forts at Lackawana, Exeter, Kingston, and Wilkesbarre. July 1, 1778, Col. Butler, with about sixteen hundred men, three hundred of whom were Indians and the rest tories painted like Indians, approached the upper fort; and a skirmish ensued, in which ten of the inhabitants were killed. July 2, Exeter fort, garrisoned by tories, was given up to them, and Lackawana fort was taken. Mr. Jenkins and his family were barbarously killed; and most of the women and children were captured. July 3 he defeated Col. Zebulon Butler and destroyed most of his men, amounting to four hundred by one account and three hundred by another. July 4, he invested fort Kingston, commanded by Col. Nathan Dennison, who went to fort Exeter with a flag, to learn the terms which would be granted. Col. John Butler replied, — "the hatchet!" The next morning, Sunday, July 5th, Col. Dennison, his men being nearly all killed or wounded, surrendered at discretion. He was seen surrounded by the enemy, and was doubtless murdered. Some of the prisoners were taken away; the rest were shut up in the houses, and consumed with them. The enemy immediately crossed the river to fort Wilkesbarre, which surrendered. About seventy of the soldiers were inhumanly butchered; and the rest, with the women and children, were shut up in the houses, which were set on fire and all perished. Every building, except what belonged to Tories, in all these settlements was destroyed. Capt. James Bedlock, his body stuck full of splinters of pine knots, was burned, and Capts. Robert Durgée and Samuel Ranson were held down in the fire with pitchforks. There were other horrors, which cannot be described. The fugitives who escaped were many of them two or three days without provisions.

In Sept. about one hundred houses were destroyed by the enemy at German Flats. Dec. 11, 1778, Cherry Valley was destroyed and women and children massacred. Dr. Dwight represents, that the party of five hundred Indians and whites was commanded by a son of Butler, and by Brant; but the anecdote, he gives, of the death of Butler needs correction, for he was not killed till a subsequent year. At this time Col. Ichabod Alden, who had two hundred and fifty men in the fort, was surprised, when imprudently out of it, and killed. Of the inhabitants, one hundred and eighty were left without a house. Dr. Dwight relates, that Butler on entering a house ordered a woman in bed with her infant child to be killed; but Brant said, "What, kill a woman and child? No, that child is not an enemy to the king, nor a friend to the congress. Long before he will be big enough to do any mischief, the dispute will be settled." Thus Brant, the red man, was the man of humanity; and the white man was the savage. About the middle of Oct., 1781, Capt. Walter Butler, a son of Col. Butler, was killed in an action on the Mohawk, when Maj. Ross and his party of six hundred, of whom one hundred and thirty were Indians, were routed by Col. Willett and driven into the wilderness. Willett had in his army sixty Oneida Indians. On being shot by one of them, Butler asked for quarter; the Indian cried out with a terrible voice, Sherry Valley! and tomahawked him. Thus the white savage had his retribution. Col. Butler about the year 1796 was English agent with reference to the six nations, and lived in Upper Canada. This office was worth 500 pounds sterling a year; he had also a pension of 200 or 300; and had received five thousand acres of land for himself and the same for his children. Thus was he rewarded for his barbarities. Marshall, III. 557; Dwight's Trav. III. 204; Mass. Hist. Coll. II. 220; Griffin's Remains; Almon's Amer. Remembrancer, 1777, p. 395; Thacher's Mil. Journ. 141, 294.

BUTLER, ZEBULON, a soldier of the Revolution, was one of the early settlers at Wyoming, said to be the cousin of Col. John Butler, but this has been recently denied by his grandson. He fought bravely in the old French war. In the war of the Revolution he was the second in command at Wyoming, when that beautiful vale was desolated by the ferocious John Butler; he marched July 3, 1778, from Wilkesbarre, where a small guard was left, to the neighboring fort of Kingston with four hundred men. On being summoned to surrender in two hours he demanded a parley, and a place in Kingston was appointed for the meeting; he proceeded thither with his troops, and on approaching a flag, seen at the foot of a mountain, he was drawn thus treacherously into an ambush, and the enemy rose upon him in great numbers. He fought bravely three quarters of an hour, when one of his men cried out, that he had ordered a retreat. This interrupted their fire, and a total route ensued. Many were lost in the river, when endeavoring to cross it, the enemy pursuing them with fury. Only seventy escaped to Wilkesbarre. On this day two hundred women were made widows. July 4, the enemy, with a summons to surrender, sent one hundred and ninety-six scalps into fort Kingston, where Col. Dennison commanded. In the evening Col. Butler left the fort with his family and proceeded down the river in safety. Such is the account, written or published at Poughkeepsie July 20th, and published in Almon's Remembrancer, and which was followed by Gordon, Marshall, and others, excepting, that Marshall reduces the number escaping July 3d to twenty, instead of seventy. But this account of the affair has been recently contradicted by E. D. Griffin, whose mother was the daughter of Col. Butler. According to his statement, his grandfather was compelled to fight prematurely by the rash vehemence of his men, who could not brook the delay requisite for obtaining information concerning the enemy; but, ambushed, he rode amongst his ranks, exposing himself with the utmost coolness to the whole fire of the enemy, in the vain hope of sustaining the courage of his men; and of three hundred only four escaped, of which number he was one. Such an incautious, rash attack of the enemy under Brant, by the troops of Goshen, issued the next year in a similar defeat at Minisink; Col. Tusten being compelled to march by the brave flourish of a subordinate officer.

Col. Butler received marks of confidence from Washington. Mr. Griffin, about the year 1816, visited the grave of his grandfather, the patriarch of Wyoming, and found some uncouth rhymes chiselled on his monument. Had Thomas Campbell resided one winter at Wyoming, ere he wrote his Gertrude, a beautiful poem, he never would have associated the objects of tropical scenery with the vale of the Susquehanna; he never would have made the crocodile to swim in that river; nor caused the red flamingo and the huge condor of the rock to spread their wings there; nor planted on its banks the aloes, the high magnolia, and the palm tree. — Almon's Amer. Rememb. 1779, p. 51-55. Gordon, III. 188; Thacher's Mil. Jour. 141; Marshall, III. 557; Griffin's Remains.

BUTLER, WILLIAM, colonel, an officer of the Revolution, after the destruction of Wyoming by John Butler and the Indians July 5, 1778 was immediately detached in command, as lieutenant-col. of the fourth Pennsylvania regiment, for the assistance of the frontiers. He marched from Schoharie and penetrated into the Indian country in October with great difficulty, crossing high mountains and deep waters, and destroyed the towns Unadilla and Anaguaga, the latter being the head quarters of Brant, lying on both sides the Susquehanna, where it is two hundred and fifty yards wide. Many farm houses and about four thousand bushels of grain were destroyed. His account of the expedition was published. It is believed that he is the Col. Butler who was distinguished in the expedition of Sullivan against the Indians in 1779. — Marshall, III. 562; Almon's Remem., 1779, 253.

BUTLER, WILLIAM, major-general, an officer of the Revolution, was the son of James Butler, who in the command of a party of whigs was surprised and taken prisoner near Cloud's creek, South Carolina, by a party of Cunningham's horse, and after his surrender perished with the other prisoners, who were marched out one by one and cut to pieces. This treacherous murder, by the hand of the royalist leader, gave a keen edge to the spirit of the son. At the head of a body of cavalry he, with Capt. Michael Watson of the mounted rangers, attacked with great gallantry and dispersed double the number of the enemy in Dean's swamp, though Watson fell in the action. In 1800 he was a representative in congress. In the war of 1812 he commanded the forces of South Carolina, employed in the defence of the State. He died in Edgefield district Nov. 15, 1821, aged 67. His wife, who survived him many years, was a remarkable woman. Her name was Behethland Moore. In the necessary absence of her husband from home the care of the family and of the plantation fell upon her, with the chief moral training of her children; of whom Col. James died in 1821; Maj. George at the age of 33; William was a surgeon in the navy; Judge A. P. Butler was a senator of the United States; Col. P. M. Butler was the governor of the State, and fell at the head of the South Carolina troops in Mexico, one of the many victims to a needless and therefore wicked war. The only daughter, Emmala, married Waddy Thompson.

BUTLER, PERCIVAL, general, a soldier of the Revolution, was with the army at the siege and capture of York, Oct. 19, 1781. He died at Port William, Kentucky, Sept. 11, 1821, aged 61.

BUTLER, PEIRCE, a senator, was of the family of the Dukes of Ormond in Ireland. Before the Revolution he was a major in a British regiment in Boston. He afterwards attached himself to the republican institutions of America. In 1787 he was a delegate from South Carolina to congress; in 1788 a member of the convention, which framed the constitution of the United States. Under the constitution he was one of the first senators from South Carolina, and remained in congress till 1796. On the death of Mr. Calhoun in 1802, he was again appointed; but resigned in 1804. In his political views he was opposed to some of the measures of Washington's administration. Jay's treaty he disapproved, while he approved of the war of 1812. He died at Philadelphia Feb. 15, 1822, aged 77. His wife, a daughter of Col. Middleton of Charleston, whom he married in 1768, died in 1790.

BUTLER, WILLIAM, died in Philadelphia in June, 1838, aged 108.

BUTLER, EZRA, governor of Vermont, died at Waterbury July 19, 1838, aged 77.

BUTLER, JAMES D., died in Rutland, Vt., in 1842, aged 76, an early settler. He served in various offices, was an efficient officer of temperance and other charitable societies, and an eminent Christian.

BUTLER, DAVID, D. D., died at Troy July 10, 1842, aged 80, the oldest Episcopal clergyman in the State of New York.

BUTLER, WILLIAM, died at Northampton March 9, 1831, aged 68. He established one of the earliest papers in western Massachusetts, — the Hampshire Gazette, at Northampton Sept. 6, 1786, and conducted it nearly thirty years. It is now the oldest paper in the western part of the State. There was a paper four years sooner in Springfield; but it was soon discontinued. There being no post-office in Northampton, he was obliged to send to Springfield every week for his news. He married Huldah, a daughter of Col. John Brown, distinguished in the war of the Revolution; and she yet survives in venerated old age. — Holland's West. Mass. I. 453.

BUTLER SIMEON, an enterprising bookseller and publisher, died in Northampton Nov. 7, 1847, aged 77. A native of Hartford, he had lived in Northampton more than fifty years. He published the first volume of the Massachusetts Reports and two or three hundred thousand other volumes of valuable books. With his brother Asa he established in Suffield a manufactory of paper, and made, it is believed, the first American letter paper used in the senate of the United States.

BUTLER, JOSIAH, judge, died at Deerfield, N. H., Oct. 29, 1864, aged 74. A graduate of Harvard in 1803, he was in congress in 1817-1823, and judge of the supreme court of New Hampshire in 1725.

BUTLER, CALEB, died at Lowell Oct. 7, 1854, aged 78. A native of Pelham, N. H., he graduated at Dartmouth in 1800, and was eleven years preceptor of Groton academy, and twenty years post-master. He published a history of Groton, 8vo.; also a masonic oration, 1816; facts, etc., as to affairs in Groton, 1827; review reviewed, 1850. — Nightingale's Sermon.

BUTLER, CYRUS, died at Providence Aug. 22, 1849, aged 82 years. He was worth from three to four millions of dollars. He gave some years before his death 40,000 dollars to the Butler hospital for the insane in Providence. His father, Samuel, a shoemaker from Edgartown, became a large ship owner at Providence, and left his son a large fortune, which he increased by frugality and wide commercial operations.

BUTLER, MANN, the historian of Kentucky, was killed in Nov., 1855, by the railroad disaster in Missouri, with Dr. Bullard and others.

BUTRICK, DANIEL, died June 8, 1851. He was thirty years a missionary to the Cherokees.

BUTTERWORTH, CATHARINE, Mrs., died at Dubuque Aug. 30, 1748, aged 114, a native of Ireland.

BUTTNER, GOTTLIEB, a Moravian missionary to the Mohegan Indians in New York, died Feb. 23, 1745, aged 28. He arrived in this country Oct., 1741. In the preceding year C. H. Rauch had commenced the mission at Shekomeko, or Shacomaco, a village of a few Mohegan-Indians, thirty miles from Poughkeepsie, about twenty-five miles east of the Hudson river, near the borders of Connecticut, and close by the Stissik mountain. In Feb., 1742, Count Zinzendorf, at Oly in Pennsylvania, ordained Butler a deacon. The count, with his daughter Benigny, visited Shacomaco in August, and constituted the first Moravian congregation of Indians, consisting of ten persons, among whom were Shabash, Seim, Kiop, Tschoop, and Kermelok. Buttner, with his wife, arrived at Shacomaco in October and entered upon his labors, preaching in Dutch or English, and having an interpreter for the Indians. In 1742 the number of the baptized was thirty-one. The Lord's supper was first administered March 13, 1743, and again July 27. A monthly prayer meeting was established, at which accounts were read concerning the progress of the gospel in the world. During the year 1743 Buttner experienced much persecution, being summoned several times to Poughkeepsie to answer to charges brought against him. He was accused of teaching without authority, and of refusing to take the oath of allegiance, deeming an oath unlawful. The other missionaries were soon withdrawn from Shacomaco on account of the persecution, and in 1746 ten families of the Indians, in all forty-four persons, emigrated to Pennsylvania. For them two hundred acres of land were purchased at the junction of the rivers Mahony and Lecha, beyond the blue mountains, and the new town was called Gnadenhutten or tents of grace. Other Mohegan emigrants from Shacomaco and Connecticut soon followed. The mission of Sergeant at Stockbridge was earlier than this. — Loskiel's Hist. Morav. Miss., II. 58, 63.

BUTTRICK, ELIZABETH, missionary among the Cherokees, died at Dwight Aug. 3, 1847, aged 67. She was the daughter of Jonathan Proctor of Ipswich, Mass. Having been a teacher in New England, she went among the Cherokees in Georgia, as a teacher, in 1823; in 1827 she married Daniel S. Buttrick, who had been a missionary nine years. Their labors were among the Indians on the east side of the Mississippi till 1838, and afterwards on the west, at Fairfield and Mount Zion. In her last hours "all was peaceful and joyful." She had toiled faithfully twenty-four years among a dark-minded people.

BYFIELD, NATHANIEL, judge of the vice admiralty, and member of the council of Massachusetts, died June 6, 1733, aged 79. He was the son of Richard Byfield, pastor of Long Ditton in Sussex, England, who was one of the divines in the Westminster assembly. His mother was the sister of Bishop Juxon. He was born in the year 1653, and was the youngest of twenty-one children, sixteen of whom sometimes accompanied at the same time their pious father to the house of worship. He arrived at Boston in the year 1674. Being an eminent merchant, whose property was very considerable, soon after Philip's war he was one of the four proprietors and the principal settler of the town of Bristol in Rhode Island. He lived in this place till the year 1724, when on account of his advanced age he returned to Boston, where he died. He possessed very considerable abilities, which fitted him for the stations which he occupied. He held a variety of offices both civil and military. He was speaker of the house of representatives; was for thirty-eight years chief justice of the court of common pleas for Bristol county, and two years for Suffolk; was many years a member of the council; and was judge of the vice-admiralty from the year 1703. His spirit was active and vigorous, his courage unshaken by any danger, and his constancy such as was not easily discouraged by difficulties. He was well formed for the exercise of authority, his very looks inspiring respect. He possessed a happy elocution. He loved order, and in his family the nicest economy was visible. He was conspicuous for piety, having a liberal, catholic spirit, and loving all good men, however they differed from him in matters of small importance. For forty years he constantly devoted a certain proportion of his estate to charitable purposes. In one year he was known to give away several hundreds of pounds. He had a steady and unshaken faith in the truths of the gospel; and he died in the lively hope of the mercy of God through the glorious Redeemer. He published a tract, entitled an account of the late revolution in New England, with the declaration of the gentlemen, merchants, and inhabitants of Boston, &c., 1689. — Chauncy's Fun. Sermon; Weekly News Letter, No. 1533; Hutchinson, II. 211.

BYLES, JAMES, died at Oysterbay Jan., 1839, aged about 118; a native of France and a soldier under Wolfe.

BYLES, MATHER, D. D., minister of Boston, died July 5, 1788, aged 82. He was descended from a respectable family, and was born in that town March 26, 1706. His father was a native of England, and died within a year after the birth of his son. By his mother's side he descended from Richard Mather, of Dorchester, and John Cotton, of Boston. In early life he discovered a taste for literature, and he was graduated at Harvard college in 1725. After pursuing his literary and theological studies for some time, he commenced preaching. He was ordained the first pastor of the church in Hollis street, Boston, Dec. 20, 1733. It was not long before he attained considerable eminence in his profession, and he became known by his publication of several pieces in prose and verse. His poetical talents he considered only as instruments of innocent amusement, and never permitted them to withdraw his attention from more serious and profitable objects. He never attempted any great production in verse, but sounded his lyre only in compliance with occasional inclination. He continued to live happily with his parish in the useful discharge of ministerial duties until the late revolution began to create distrust and animosity between the different parties that existed in the country prior to the war. Falling under the imputation of being a tory, he was in 1776 separated from his people by the jealousy and violence of the times, and he was never afterwards re-united to them. He was accused of attachment to Great Britain. The substance of the charges against him was, that he continued in Boston with his family during the siege; that he prayed for the king and the safety of the town; and that he received the visits of the British officers. In May 1777 he was denounced in town meeting as a person inimical to America; after which he was obliged to enter into bonds for his appearance at a public trial before a special court on the second of June following. He was pronounced guilty, and sentenced to confinement on board a guard-ship, and in forty days to be sent with his family to England. When brought before the board of war, by whom he was treated respectfully; his sentence seems to have been altered, and it was directed that he should be confined to his own house, and a guard placed over him there. This was accordingly done for a few weeks, and then the guard was removed. A short time afterwards a guard was again placed over him, and again dismissed. Upon this occasion he observed in his own manner, that he was guarded, regarded, and disregarded. He was not again connected with any parish. In the year 1783 he was seized with a paralytic disorder, and he died at the great age of eighty-two years. He was twice married. His first wife was the niece of Gov. Belcher, and his second the daughter of Lieut.-Gov. Tailer. His son, Mather Byles, D. D., was a minister of New London, in Connecticut, but was dismissed in 1768, and was then an Episcopal minister several years in Boston till the Revolution, and afterwards at St. John's, New Brunswick, where he died March 12, 1814. His grandson, Mather Brown, historical and portrait painter, artist to George IV., died at London May 25, 1831.

Dr. Byles was in person tall and well proportioned. He possessed a commanding presence, and was a graceful speaker. His voice was strong, clear, harmonious, and susceptible of various modulations, adapted to the subject of his discourse. He was remarkable for the abundance of his wit in common conversation, and for the smartness of his repartees. He possessed an uncommon talent in making puns, some of which are at the present day frequently repeated in social circles. His imagination was fertile, and his satire keen. His wit was a dangerous instrument, in the use of which he was not always prudent, and it is thought that he was not sufficiently regardful of the consequences of the severe remarks in which he sometimes indulged himself.

His literary merit introduced him to the acquaintance of many men of genius in England; and the names of Pope, Lansdowne, and Watts are found among his correspondents. From the former he received a copy of an elegant edition of the Odyssey in quarto. Dr. Watts sent him copies of his works, as he published them. His poetry evinces a rich fancy, and the versification is polished. The following extract from "the Conflagration" relates to the effect on the earth of the flames of the last day:

"Yet shall ye, Flames, the wasting globe refine,
And bid the skies with purer splendor shine,
The earth, which the prolific fires consume,
To beauty burns, and withers into bloom;
Improving in the fertile flame it lies,
Fades into form and into vigor dies;
Fresh-dawning glories blush amidst the blaze,
And nature all renews her flowery face."

In his preaching he was generally solemn and interesting, though sometimes his sermons gave indications of the peculiar turn of his mind. On being asked why he did not preach politics, he replied: "I have thrown up four breastworks, behind which I have intrenched myself, neither of which can be forced. In the first place I do not understand politics; in the second place you all do, every man and mother's son of you; in the third place, you have politics all the week, pray let one day out of seven be devoted to religion; in the fourth place, I am engaged in a work of infinitely greater importance. Give me any subject to preach on of more consequence than the truths I bring to you, and I will preach on it the next Sabbath."

The following extracts from one of his sermons will show what were the religious sentiments which he embraced and enforced upon his hearers. "We perceive," said he, "that conversion is out of our own power. It is impossible for us to convert ourselves, or for all the angels in heaven to do it for us. To convince you of this, let the natural man make the experiment. Try this moment. Try and see whether you can bring your hearts to this, to renounce all happiness in everything but the favor of God; to let God order for you; to have no will of your own; to be swallowed up and ravished with his will, whatever it is. Can you renounce every mortal idol? Can you leave this world and all the low delights of it, and go to a world where you will have none of them; but the love of God will swallow you up? These things are so far distant from an unrenewed heart, that they look like wild paradoxes to it." "The enmity between God and us is irreconcilable, but by Christ. Out of him God is a consuming fire. False notions of the Divine justice and mercy could never bring us truly to him; and true ones would only drive us farther from him. So that set Christ aside, and there can be no conversion. We learn also the honors of the Holy Ghost. He is the agent who performs this work. One reason, that men fall short of this saving change, is the not acknowledging him as they ought. Did men regard the operation of the Holy Spirit more, there would be more frequent converts. Men are apt to trust to their own strength when they set about the work of conversion. They rob the Spirit of God of his glory, and so it all comes to nothing. He it is who makes this great change in men. He must be the Almighty God then; and we should honor him as so."

He published a number of essays in the New England weekly journal, which are marked by one of the letters composing the word CELOIZA; a poem on the death of George I., and the accession of George II., 1727; a poetical epistle to Gov. Belcher, on the death of his lady, 1736. A number of his miscellaneous poems were collected and printed in a volume, in 1744. Among the sermons, which he published, are the following: the character of the upright man, 1729; on the nature and necessity of conversion, 1732; flourish of the annual spring, 1739; at the artillery election, 1740; on setting our affections on things above, 1740; before an execution, 1751; on Mrs. Dummer, 1752; on William Dummer, 1761; on J. Gould, 1772; at the lecture, 1751; on the earthquake, 1755; at the thanksgiving for the success of the British arms, 1760; on the present vileness of the body and its future glorious change, second edition, 1771.—Polyanthos, IV. 1-10; Spec. Amer. Poetry, I. 124-133.

BYRD, WILLIAM, colonel, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, died about 1743, at an advanced age. He was a member of the council about 1682. When in 1699 about three hundred of the persecuted French protestants arrived in the colony, he received them with the affection of a father and gave them the most liberal assistance. His generous charity to the poor foreigners is particularly described by Beverly. He had received a liberal education in England, and was distinguished for his literary taste and his patronage of science. He had one of the largest libraries on the continent. In 1723 he was one of the commissioners for establishing the line between North Carolina and Virginia. He was a fellow of the royal society, as were also Mather, Boylston, Dudley, Silas Taylor of Virginia, and others. Having a large property, his munificence and his style of living were unrivalled in the colony. He wrote, it is believed, the anonymous work, the history of the dividing line between Virginia and North Carolina, 1728; also, for the philosophical transactions, an account of a negro boy, dappled with white spots. A colonel Wm. Byrd, probably his son, was a commissioner to treat with the Indians in 1756, and accompanied Forbes in the expedition against fort du Quesne in 1758. He was a member of the council at the beginning of the Revolution; but he was deceased before Jan. 5, 1781, when Arnold debarked at Westover, the residence of his widow.—Beverly, IV. 13; Mil-ler, II. 61; Burk.

CABELL, SAMUEL J., colonel, a Revolutionary soldier, died at his seat in Nelson county, Va., Sept. 4, 1818, aged 61. Being in college at the beginning of the war, he joined the first armed corps, raised in Virginia, and soon attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the continental army, serving with reputation in all the northern campaigns, till the fall of Charleston, May 12, 1780, when he became a prisoner. The close of the war restored him to liberty. For many years he was a member of the assembly, also a member of congress.

CABELL, WILLIAM H., governor of Virginia, died at Richmond Jan. 17, 1853. He was president of the court of appeals.

CABOT, JOHN, a Venetian, who first discovered the continent of America, was perfectly skilled in all the sciences requisite to form an accomplished mariner. He had three sons, Lewis, Sebastian, and Sanctius, all of whom he educated in a manner best calculated to make them able seamen. Encouraged by the success of Columbus, who returned in 1493 from his first voyage, he was determined to attempt the discovery of unknown lands, particularly of a northwest passage to the East Indies. Having obtained a commission from King Henry VII., empowering him and his three sons to discover unknown lands, and to conquer and settle them, and giving him jurisdiction over the countries which he should subdue, on condition of paying the king one fifth part of all the gains, he sailed from Bristol with two vessels, freighted by the merchants of London and Bristol with articles of traffic, and with about three hundred men, in May, 1497. He sailed towards the northwest till he reached the latitude of 58 degrees, when the floating ice and the severity of the weather induced him to alter his course to the southwest. He discovered land June 24, which, as it was the first that he had seen, he called Prima Vista. This is generally supposed to be a part of the island of Newfoundland, though in the opinion of some it is a place on the peninsula of Nova Scotia, in the latitude of 45 degrees. A few days afterward a smaller island was discovered, to which he gave the name of St. John, on account of its being discovered on the day of John the Baptist. Continuing his course westerly, he soon reached the continent, and then sailed along the coast northwardly to the latitude of 67 1-2 degrees. As the coast stretched toward the east, he turned back and sailed toward the equator, till he came to Florida. His provisions now failing, and a mutiny breaking out among the mariners, he returned to England without attempting a settlement or conquest in any part of the new world. In this voyage Cabot was accompanied by his son Sebastian, and to them is attributed the honor of first beholding the continent of North America; for it was not till the following year, 1498, that the continent was seen by Columbus. But this circumstance is of little importance; for, as Irving remarks, "when Columbus first touched the shore of the western hemisphere, he had achieved his enterprise, he had accomplished all that was necessary to his fame; the great problem was solved; the New World was discovered. — Belknap's Amer. Biog. i. 149-154; Holmes; Purchas, i. 737, 738; Robertson, Book IX. 16, 17; Prince Introd. 80; Irving's Columbus.

CABOT, SEBASTIAN, an eminent navigator, the son of the preceding, died about 1557, aged 80. He was born at Bristol. When about twenty years of age he accompanied his father in the voyage of 1497, in which the continent of the new world was discovered. About the year 1517 he sailed on another voyage of discovery, and went to the Brazils, and thence to Hispaniola and Porto Rico. Failing in his object of finding a way to the East Indies, he returned to England. Having been invited to Spain, where he was received in the most respectful manner by King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, he sailed in their service on a voyage of discovery in April, 1525. He visited the coast of Brazil, and entered a great river, to which he gave the name of Rio de la Plata. He sailed up this river one hundred and twenty leagues. After being absent on this expedition a number of years, he returned to Spain in the spring of 1531. But he was not well received. He made other voyages, of which no particular memorials remain. His residence was at the city of Seville. His employment in the office of chief pilot was the drawing of charts, on which he delineated all the new discoveries made by himself and others; and, by his office, he was entrusted with the reviewing of all projects for discovery. His character is said to have been gentle, friendly, and social, though in his voyages some instances of injustice towards the natives and of severity towards his mariners are recorded. In his advanced age he returned to England and resided at Bristol. He received a pension from Edward VI., and was appointed governor of a company of merchants, associated for the purpose of making discoveries. He had a strong persuasion that a passage might be found to China by the northeast. By his means a trade was commenced with Russia, which gave rise to the Russian company. The last account of him is, that in 1556, when the company were sending out a vessel for discovery, he made a visit on board. "The good old gentleman, master Cabota," says the journal of the voyage in Hakluyt, "gave to the poor most liberal alms, wishing them to pray for the good fortune and prosperous success of our pinnace. And then at the sign of St. Christopher, he and his friends banqueted, and for very joy, that he had to see the towardness of our intended discovery, he entered into the dance himself among the rest of the young and lustly company; which being ended, he and his friends departed, most gently commending us to the governance of Almighty God." He was one of the most extraordinary men of the age in which he lived. There is preserved in Hakluyt a complete set of instructions, drawn and signed by Cabot, for the direction of the voyage to Cathay in China, which affords the clearest proof of his sagacity. It is supposed that he was the first who noticed the variation of the magnetic needle, and he published "Navigatione nelle parte settentrionale," Venice, 1583, folio. He published also a large map, which was engraved by Clement Adams, and hung up in the gallery at Whitehall; and on this map was inscribed a Latin account of the discovery of Newfoundland.—Belknap's Amer. Biog. i. 149–158; Mass. Mag. ii. 467–471; Hakluyt, i. 226, 268, 274; Campbell's Admirals, i. 419; Rees' Cyclopaedia.

CABOT, GEORGE, a senator, was born in Salem, Mass., in 1752; the name was perhaps originally Cobbett. His early employment was that of a shipmaster; but his visits to foreign countries were made subservient to the enlargement of his knowledge. At the age of twenty-five he was a member of the provincial congress at Concord, in which body he opposed the project of establishing by law a maximum of prices, and contended for entire freedom of commerce. He was also a member of the State convention for considering the constitution of the United States. Being appointed, a few years afterwards, a senator of the United States, he co-operated in the financial views of Hamilton and assisted him by his extensive commercial knowledge. May 3, 1798, he was appointed the first secretary of the navy, but declining it, B. Stoddart received the appointment. Of the eastern convention, assembled at Hartford in 1814, during the war, Mr. Cabot was the president. He died at Boston April 18, 1823, aged 71. Destitute of the advantages of a public education, Mr. Cabot was yet distinguished for his intelligence and almost unequalled for the eloquence of his conversation, especially on the topic of the French Revolution. He was master of the science of political economy. In the party divisions of his day he was a decided federalist, the friend of Ames and Hamilton. He had enjoyed also the confidence of Washington. His fellow citizens entrusted him with various offices, evincing their reliance on his wisdom and integrity. In private life he was most amiable, courteous, and benevolent. He was a professor of religion in the church, of which the minister was Dr. Kirkland, who, after his death, married his daughter.—Lord's Lempr.; Encycl. Americana.

CADWALLADER, THOMAS, M. D., a physician of Philadelphia, died Nov. 14, 1779, aged 72. He was the son of John C., and completed his medical education in Europe. From 1752 till his death he was one of the physicians of the Pennsylvania Hospital. His dissections for Dr. Shippen were among the earliest made in this country. Dr. John Jones was his pupil. In his disposition he was equable and benevolent; in his manners courteous. His life was once saved by his courteousness. A provincial officer, weary of his life, had determined to shoot the first person, whom he should meet, in order that justice might bring him to the gallows. An easier method of reaching his end would have been to shoot himself. However, with his resolution and his gun he sallied forth. He met first a pretty girl; but her beauty vanquished his intent. He next met Dr. C., whose courteous "Good morning, sir; what sport?" also conquered him. He then went to a tavern, and shot a Mr. Scull, for which he was hung. He published an essay on the Iliac passion, entitled, an Essay on the West India Dry Gripes, 1745, in which he recommended the use of opiates and mild cathartics, instead of quicksilver, then employed. This was one of the earliest American medical treatises. Boylston had written before on the small pox, and Harwood a treatise on pharmacy, and, at a far earlier period, Thacher on the small pox and measles.—Ramsay's Rev. 36; Thacher's Med. Biog.

CADWALLADER, JOHN, general, a soldier of the Revolution, died Feb. 10, 1786, aged 43. He was born in Philadelphia, and was a member of the Pennsylvania convention in 1775. He was appointed by congress a brigadier-general, Feb. 1777. In the battles of Princeton, Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth he participated; and in the attack on the enemy at Trenton Washington intrusted him with one of the divisions of the army; but he could not cross the river, on account of the ice, until the day after the battle. He fought a duel with Gen. Conway, in consequence of the intrigue of the latter against Washington. After the war he was a member of the assembly of Maryland. He was a relative of John Dickenson, and a gentleman of great fortune. He published a reply to Gen. J. Reed's remarks, etc., 1783.—Marshall, iii. 139.

CADWALLADER, THOMAS, major-general, died in Philadelphia Oct. 26, 1841, aged 61; a lawyer, and an officer in the war of 1812.

CAINES, GEORGE, reporter of the supreme court of New York, died at Catskill July 10, 1825, aged 54. He published Lex mercatoria, Americana, 1802; cases in the court for trial of impeachment and correction of errors, 2 vols. 1805–7; forms of the supreme court of New York, 1808.

CALDWELL, JAMES, minister in Elizabethtown, N. J., descended of a Huguenot family, and born in Virginia, was graduated at Princeton in 1759. He was killed at Elizabethtown Point by an American soldier, named Morgan, Nov. 24, 1781, aged about 40. The man was tried and executed for murder. It was thought, he was bribed to the deed by British gold. Mr. C. had gone to the Point to conduct to his house a Miss Murray, who came from New York under a flag-of-truce. Her bundle of clothing the American sentinel challenged as "contraband;" and at the same moment Morgan, who was not then acting as sentinel, shot him. It is a memorable event, that Mrs. Caldwell, daughter of John Ogden of New York, married to Mr. C., in 1763, had been previously deliberately shot, June 7, 1780, by a renegade British soldier. The parsonage and church had been burnt Jan. 25, 1780; for Mr. C. was an earnest and zealous patriot of the day. He acted as chaplain in New Jersey; his powerful eloquence was employed in the cause of freedom. He was popular, and high in the confidence of Washington. A price being set on his head, he sometimes preached with his pistols by his side. A monument was raised to the memory of Mr. and Mrs. C., in 1846, with addresses by Dr. Miller and Wm. L. Dayton.

God raised up friends to the nine bereaved children, the principal of whom was Mrs. Noel of Elizabethtown. Lafayette took the son, John E. C., with him to France, where he was educated, and who edited in New York one of the first religious periodicals of our country. Elias Boudinot C., was another son. A daughter, Esther, a most pious woman, married Rev. Robert Finley, and died at Lebanon, Ill., in 1844, aged 71.

CALDWELL, RACHEL, wife of Rev. D. C., died in 1825, was the daughter of Rev. Alexander Craighead, of the Sugar Creek congregation in North Carolina. She married Dr. C. in 1766. In the war the British offered 200 pounds for the apprehension of her husband. Once the enemy turned her out of her house, and burnt her husband's books and valuable manuscripts. When her husband was taken prisoner, and the enemy were about to lead him away with a pile of plunder, a woman's wit saved him: Mrs. Dunlap stepped behind him, and whispered in his ear — just loud enough for a soldier to hear her — "Is it not time for Gillespie and his men to be here?" As the name of Gillespie was the terror of the loyalists, this caused the tories to flee in confusion, leaving their prisoner behind them. Once, as the enemy was plundering her house, she wished to save a valuable article, and made the eloquent appeal: "Have none of you a wife or daughter, for whose sake you will do me this favor?" A small man immediately stepped up and said, "he had a wife, and a fine little wife she was too! and for her sake he would protect her. — Caruther's Life of Dr. C.

CALDWELL, DAVID, D. D., a minister, died at Guilford court-house, North Carolina, Aug. 19, 1824, aged 99 years and 5 months. He was born in March 1725, in Lancaster county, Penn. He was a patriot of the Revolution; also an eminent teacher. His widow, an admirable woman, Rachel, daughter of Rev. A. Craighead, died in 1825, aged 86.

CALDWELL, ELIAS BOUDINOT, clerk of the supreme court of the United States, son of Rev. James C., graduated at Princeton in 1796, and died at Washington, in May 1825, gladdened by the promises of the religion which he professed. He zealously assisted in forming and conducting the American colonization society, of which he was the corresponding secretary. In honor of him the managers of the society gave the name of Caldwell to a town in their African colony. Mr. C., in order to bring religious instruction to the untaught in the country near Washington, obtained a license to preach from the presbytery, and was accustomed to preach on the Sabbath. — African Repos. i. 126; Mis. Her. 22: 81.

CALDWELL, JOSEPH, D. D., president of the university of North Carolina, died at Chapel Hill Jan. 27, 1835.

CALDWELL, CHARLES, M. D., died in Louisville, Ky., July 9, 1853, aged 90, celebrated as a medical teacher and writer. In 1818 he was invited to the Transylvania school of medicine, and more recently was a professor at Louisville. He was very temperate. He wrote on physical education, phrenology, the unity of the human race, and on the theory of animal heat; also on malaria, quarantines, the yellow fever, and cholera; and the life of Ames, in Rees' Encyclopedia.

CALDWELL, MERRITT, professor of metaphysics and political economy in Dickinson college, Carlisle, died at Portland June 6, 1848, aged 41; he was a graduate of Bowdoin in 1828.

CALEF, ROBERT, a merchant of Boston, died at Roxbury, April 13, 1719. He was distinguished about the time of the witchcraft delusion by his resistance to the infatuation. After Cotton Mather had published Wonders of the Invisible World, from which it appears that he was by no means incredulous with regard to the stories then in circulation, Mr. Calef published a book on the opposite side, entitled, More wonders of the Invisible World, London, 1700. This was reprinted at Salem in 1796. Dr. Increase Mather, president of Harvard college, in 1700, ordered the book to be burned in the college yard. The members of the old north church published a defence of their pastors, the Mathers, in a pamphlet entitled, "Remarks upon a scandalous book, etc.," with the motto, "Truth will come off conqueror." And so it was, for the witchcraft sorcery was soon vanquished. The judges and jury confessed their error, and the deluded people opened their eyes. As he censured the proceedings of the courts respecting the witches at a time, when the people of the country in general did not see their error, he gave great offence. But he is thought to be faithful in his narration of facts. — Hutchinson, II. 54; Mas. Hist. Coll.; III. 300; Eliot.

CALEF, JONATHAN, minister of Lyman, Me., died April 24, 1845, aged 83.

CALHOUN, PATRICK, a patriot of the Revolution, died in 1796. He was born in Ireland in the year 1727. His father emigrated in 1733 to Pennsylvania, where he resided many years, and afterwards to the western part of Virginia. The settlement, after the defeat of Braddock, was broken up by the Indians, and Mr. C., with his three older brothers and a sister, emigrated in 1756 to Long Cane, Abbeville, in the interior of South Carolina, then an uninhabited wilderness, and settled on the immediate confines of the Cherokee Indians. The settlement was shortly after, in the war, which commenced in 1759, attacked and destroyed by the Cherokees, and half of the males were killed in the desperate engagement. The remnant retired to the older settlements below, where they remained till the peace of 1763, when they returned and re-occupied their former settlement. After the destruction of the settlement, Mr. Calhoun was appointed by the provincial government to take command of a body of rangers, raised for the defence of the frontiers, in which service he encountered great danger, and displayed much enterprise and intrepidity. Shortly after the peace, he was elected a member of the provincial legislature, being the first individual ever elected from the upper county of the State. He continued a member of that, and afterwards of the State legislature, till his death, with the intermission of a single term. In the war of the Revolution he took an early, decided, and active part in favor of his country. He was self-taught, having never been at school more than six months; yet, though being continually on the frontiers he was without opportunity to acquire knowledge, such was his thirst for information, that he made himself a good English scholar, and an accurate land-surveyor. He acquired also a competent knowledge of the lower branches of mathematics, and an extensive knowledge of history. His moral character well harmonized with his love of knowledge and strength of intellect. He passed a long and active life without a blemish; a sincere Christian, a good citizen, an upright magistrate, a kind neighbor, and an affectionate husband and father. His son was vice president, J. C. Calhoun.

CALHOUN, JOHN EWING, a senator, the nephew of Patrick, died Nov. 26, 1802, aged 52. He was born in 1749. His father died while he was young; and his mother marrying again shortly after, his uncle, then a widower, took John under his care. Such was the anxiety of his uncle to give him every advantage to acquire an education, which the country afforded, that, shortly after the restoration of the settlement in the year 1763, he sent him to a grammar school in North Carolina, more than one hundred miles from home, and afterwards to Princeton college, where he graduated in 1774. He afterwards studied law, in which profession he became distinguished. After being for many years in the State legislature of South Carolina, he was elected in 1801 as successor of Mr. Read, a senator in congress, in which body he took his seat the year, which brought Mr. Jefferson into power. Though a decided republican and supporter of Mr. Jefferson, he proved his independence in resisting strenuously the passage of the bill, introduced by Mr. Breckenridge, to abolish the office of the judges who had been appointed, when Mr. Adams went out of power. He stood alone among the republicans on the occasion, delivering a speech, which did credit not only to his talents, but more especially to his independence of thought and resolution. In the political divisions of our country, when many seem willingly to surrender their own intelligence and conscience to the leaders of their party, or to be merely the dupes and slaves of those, who reap the profit of the delusion and the conflict, it is refreshing to fix the eye upon a man of clear views, and strong powers of elocution, and great firmness and integrity of character, who dared to secede alone from his party, and to oppose singly a popular measure, because it appeared to him to be unconstitutional and perilous in its consequences. He was on the select committee, to whom the bill was referred, with instructions to report a modification of the judiciary system of the United States. But the committee were, on motion of Mr. Breckenridge, Feb. 3, 1802, discharged from that service. On the same day the final question was taken, sixteen to fifteen. Mr. Calhoun voted with Hillhouse, Morris, Tracy, and other political opponents. Before the next session of congress, he died in Pendleton district.

CALHOUN, JOHN CALDWELL, LL. D., died in Washington March, 31, 1850, aged 68. His father, Patrick, came from Ireland: his mother was a Miss Caldwell of Charlotte county, Va. Born in Abbeville district, S. C., March 18, 1782, at the age of 13 he was put under the care of his brother-in-law, Dr. Waddell in Columbia county, Geo. He entered Yale college in 1802, and graduated in 1804; then prosecuted his law studies at Litchfield law school. He was in congress from 1811 to 1817, when he became Secretary of war and continued in office seven years. In 1825 and 1829 he was chosen vice-president, while Jackson was president; and then a senator. In 1843 he was secretary of State. From 1845 he was a senator until his death. His eloquence, as described by Webster, "was plain, strong, terse, condensed, concise; sometimes impassioned, still always severe." His power consisted "in the closeness of his logic and in the earnestness and energy of his manner." "His colloquial talents were singular and eminent." Although educated at the North, he seems never to have breathed the air of freedom, and not to have caught a particle of the abhorrence of slavery, which was felt and expressed by such illustrious southern men as Washington, Jefferson, Henry, and Randolph. Perhaps no man ever did more to extend and strengthen the inhuman slavery of his fellow men. His political doctrines he unfolds in his book, published since his death, called a discourse on the constitution and government of the United States, as he had previously briefly stated them in his speeches. His teaching is briefly this. Our general government is not National but Federal; federal because constituted by a league or compact between sovereign States, written out in the constitution of the United States. Each State is the judge whether the compact is at any time broken by any act of the general government, and may nullify such act. The same general doctrines were set forth by him in his Resolutions in the Senate Jan. 22, 1833, and in his speech Feb. 16th. His theory and scheme were opposed by Mr. Webster Feb. 16th in a speech of unanswerable argument and invincible power, denying that our political system is a compact, of which the States as sovereign communities are parties, and that they have any right to judge of the violation of the constitution and to change the mode and measure of redress; he set himself with all the energies of his mighty mind against the doctrines of Nullification and Secession. "What is a constitution?" asked he. "Certainly not a league, compact, or confederacy, but a fundamental law," ordained and established by the people,— "the Government of the United States." In his discussion no thought seems to have entered the mind of Mr. Calhoun that slavery is an evil, much less an immorality and sin. He complains of the ordinance of 1787, by which the Northwestern Territory, now constituting the States of Ohio &c., was devoted to freedom, as an encroachment on the rights of southern slaveholders. He speaks of the difficulties and dangers which have sprung up from the Missouri compromise, excluding slavery from north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude; and doubtless it has been through the influence of his teaching, that the slaveholders have repealed that compromise, and that the border ruffians of Missouri have attempted to drive off by fire and sword the free settlers from New England, who had planted themselves in the territory of Kansas. Mr. C. represents the South as the weaker section of the country; whereas in fact it has had almost the entire control of the government by union among themselves and by the aid of office seekers and partisans of the North: as in the case of the Missouri compromise itself, allowing Missouri to be a slave State, and granting all the territories south of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes to slavery, by the votes of three Eastern members of congress. Mr. C. proposes as a remedy for the evils the grant of a negative to the weaker section, the south, and the abolition of a single presidency, and the creation of two presidents, one for the North, and one for the South, in office at the same time. His disciples in this year, 1856, are proceeding a little further, and propose or threaten a division of the Union, taking for the South all the tiers of new States west of Missouri to the Pacific, and in good time including Mexico and Cuba, in which case the slave property of the South will be doubled in value. This plan is indignantly exposed by Francis P. Blair, himself a slaveholder, in his ample and patriotic letter of Sept. 17, 1856. A new claim is now set up by the South, that every slaveholder may carry his slave with him into any territory, the slave being a part of "the institutions" of the South. In the present state of things, the great question comes to the intellect and conscience of every Northern freeman, whether as all compromises are now broken up—compromises which ought never to have been made—he is not bound to adopt the fixed and right principle, that there shall never be another Slave State in the American Union? As to existing slavery, its removal must be by the respective States, in which it exists. As Mr. Blair says, "Nature's code, written in the heart, will, with the progress of Christianity and civilization, work out a happy result." His speeches, including his discourse already referred to, were published in four vols. in 1853 and 1854.

CALL, DANIEL D., died at Richmond May 20, 1840, aged about 75, a brother-in-law of judge Marshall. He published six vols. of law reports.

CALLENDER, ELISHA, minister of the first Baptist church in Boston, died March 31, 1738. He was the son of Ellis Callender, who was a member as early as 1669, and minister of the same church from 1708 till 1726. In early life the blessings of Divine grace were imparted to him. He was graduated at Harvard college in the year 1710. At his ordination, May 21, 1718, Increase and Cotton Mather and Mr. Webb, though of a different denomination, gave their assistance. He was very faithful and successful in the pastoral office. He was succeeded by Mr. Condy. A few days before his death he said; "When I look on one hand, I see nothing but sin, guilt, and discouragement; but when I look on the other, I see my glorious Saviour, and the merits of his precious blood, which cleanseth from all sin. I cannot say, that I have such transports of joy as some have had; but through grace I can say, I have gotten the victory over death and the grave." The last words, which fell from his lips, were, "I shall sleep in Jesus." His life was unspotted; his conversation was always affable, religious, and dignified; and his end was peaceful and serene.—Backus' Hist. of N. E. III. 124; Boston Evening Post April 3, 1738.

CALLENDER, JOHN, an eminent Baptist minister and writer in Rhode Island, died Jan. 26, 1748, aged 41. He was a nephew of Elisha Callender, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1723. He was ordained colleague with elder Peckum as pastor of the church at Newport Oct. 13, 1731. This was the second Baptist church in America. It was founded in the year 1644. He was a man of very considerable powers of mind, and was distinguished for his candor and piety. He collected many papers relating to the history of the Baptists in this country, which were used by Mr. Backus. A century after the deed of Rhode Island was obtained of the Narragansett Indians, he delivered at Newport, March 24, 1738, a sermon on the history of the colony, which was published in 1739, with additions. This historical discourse brings down the history of Rhode Island and Providence plantations from 1637 to the end of the first century. This is but a small work; yet it is the only history of Rhode Island, which has been written, and it is honorable to its author. He published also a sermon at the ordination of Jeremiah Condy, 1739, and a sermon on the death of Mr. Clap of Newport, 1745.—Backus' Hist. of N. E. III. 229.

CALLENDER, JAMES THOMPSON, editor of the Recorder, died at Richmond, Va., in July 1803, being drowned in James River, in which he was accustomed to bathe. He was the author of the Prospect before us, and of other assaults on the administration of Washington and Adams. Mr. Jefferson paid him repeatedly 50 and 100 dollars: the circumstances are explained in Jefferson's letters. Afterwards Callender proclaimed to the world, in hostility to Mr. Jefferson, the patronage or charity, which he had enjoyed. He was a man of talents, with an energetic style, and in severity of invective unequalled. He published political progress of Britain, 3d. ed. 1795; political register, 1795; sketches of the history of America, 1798.—Coll. Cent. July 30, 1803.

CALLIERES, CHEVALIER DE, governor of Canada, died May 26, 1703. He was appointed governor of Montreal in 1684. He enclosed the town with palisades. In 1689 he went to France to suggest the project of the conquest of New York. In the enterprise he was to have been commander in chief; but it failed. After the death of count de Frontenac in 1698, he acted as governor till his appointment in 1699. Without the birth and rank of his predecessor, he was free also from his haughtiness, prejudice, and violence. His known abilities and valor made him acceptable to the colony. He had various negotiations with the Indians. In signing a treaty Sept. 8, 1700, the Onnontagueuse and Tsonnonthouans delineated a spider; the Goyagouins a calumet; the Onneyouths a piece of cleft wood with a stone in it; the Agniers a bear; the Hurons a beaver; the Abénaquis a kid; and the Outaouais a hare. In endeavoring to unite all the Indian tribes in a permanent peace, and to attach them to the French interest, he had enlarged views and adopted wise measures; but in the midst of his toils he died, and was succeeded by Vaudreuil.—Charlevoix; Univ. Hist. XL. 127-144.

CALVERT, GEORGE, Baron of Baltimore, founder of the province of Maryland, died at London April 15, 1632, aged 50. He was descended from a noble family in Flanders, and was born at Kipling, in Yorkshire, England, in 1582. After taking his bachelor's degree at Trinity college, Oxford, in 1597, he travelled over the continent of Europe. At his return to England in the beginning of the reign of James I., he was taken into the office of Sir Robert Cecil, secretary of State, by whose favor he was made clerk of the privy council, and received the honor of knighthood. In 1619 he was appointed one of the principal secretaries of State, in the place of Sir Thomas Lake. His great knowledge of public business, and his diligence and fidelity, conciliated the regard of the king, who gave him a pension of a thousand pounds out of the customs. In 1624 he became a Roman Catholic, and having disclosed his new principles to the king, resigned his office. He was continued, however, a member of the privy council, and was created Baron of Baltimore in the kingdom of Ireland, in 1625, at which time he represented the university of Oxford in Parliament.

While he was secretary of the State he was constituted, by patent, proprietor of the southeastern peninsula of Newfoundland, which he named the province of Avalon. He spent 25,000 pounds in advancing his plantation, and visited it twice in person; but it was so annoyed by the French, that, though he once repulsed and pursued their ships and took sixty prisoners, he was obliged to abandon it. Being still inclined to form a settlement in America, whither he might retire with his family and friends of the same religious principles, he made a visit to Virginia, the fertility and advantages of which province had been highly celebrated, and in which he had been interested as one of the adventurers. But meeting with an unwelcome reception on account of his religion, and observing that the Virginians had not extended their plantations beyond the Patowmac, he fixed his attention upon the territory northward of this river, and, as soon as he returned to England, obtained a grant of it from Charles I. But owing to the tedious forms of public business, before a patent was completed he died. After his death the patent was again drawn in the name of his eldest son, Cecil, who succeeded to his honors, and it passed the seals June 20, 1632. The country was called Maryland, in honor of Henrietta Maria, the queen consort of Charles I. From the great precision of this charter, the powers which it confers upon the proprietor, and the privileges and exemptions which it grants to the people, it is evident that it was written by Sir George himself. The liberal code of religious toleration, which is established, is very honorable to him, and was respected by his son, who carried his design into execution. Sir George was conspicuous for his good sense and moderation. All parties were pleased with him. Not being obstinate in his opinions, he took as much pleasure in hearing the sentiments of others, as in delivering his own. In his views of establishing foreign plantations, he thought that the original inhabitants, instead of being exterminated, should be civilized and converted; that the governors should not be interested merchants, but gentlemen not concerned in trade; and that every one should be left to provide for himself by his own industry, without dependence on a common interest. He published carmen funebre in D. Hen. Untonum, 1596; parliamentary speeches; various letters of state; the answer of Tom Tell Troth, the practice of princes and the lamentation of the kirk, 1642.—Belknap's Amer. Biog. II. 363-368; Biog. Brit.; Rees; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. I. 566; Keith, 142.

CALVERT, LEONARD, first governor of Maryland, died in 1676. He was the brother of Cecilus Calvert, the proprietor, who sent him to America as the head of the colony in 1633. After a circuitous voyage he arrived, accompanied by his brother, George Calvert, and about two hundred persons of good families and of the Roman Catholic persuasion, at Point Comfort, in Virginia, Feb. 24, 1634. On the third of March he proceeded in the bay of Chesapeake to the northward, and entered the Patowmac, up which he sailed twelve leagues, and came to an anchor under an island, which he named St. Clement's. Here he fired his cannon, erected a cross, and took possession "in the name of the Saviour of the world and of the King of England." Thence he went fifteen leagues higher to the Indian town of Patowmac, on the Virginia side of the river, now called New Marlborough, where he was received in a friendly manner by the guardian regent, the prince of the country being a minor. Thence he sailed twelve leagues higher to the town of Piscataway, on the Maryland side, where he found Henry Fleet, an Englishman, who had resided several years among the natives, and was held by them in great esteem. This man was very serviceable as an interpreter. An interview having been procured with the Werowance, or prince, Calvert asked him whether he was willing that a settlement should be made in his own country. He replied: "I will not bid you go, neither will I bid you stay; but you may use your own discretion." Having convinced the natives that his designs were honorable and pacific, the governor now sought a more suitable station for commencing his colony. He visited a creek on the northern side of the Patowmac, about four leagues from its mouth, where was an Indian village. Here he acquainted the prince of the place, with his intentions, and by presents to him and his principal men, conciliated his friendship so much, as to obtain permission to reside in one part of the town until the next harvest, when, it was stipulated, the natives should entirely quit the place. Both parties entered into a contract to live in a friendly manner. After Calvert had given a satisfactory consideration, the Indians readily yielded a number of their houses, and retired to the others. As the season for planting corn had now arrived, both parties went to work. Thus, March 27, 1634, the governor took peaceable possession of the country of Maryland, and gave to the town the name of St. Mary's, and to the creek on which it was situated the name of St. George's. The desire of rendering justice to the natives by giving them a reasonable compensation for their lands, is a trait in the character of the first planters, which will always do honor to their memory. The colony had brought with them meal from England; but they found Indian corn in great plenty, both at Barbadoes and Virginia, and by the next spring they were able to export one thousand bushels to New England and Newfoundland, for which they received in return dried fish and other provisions. The Indians also killed many deer and turkeys, which they sold to the English for knives, beads, and other small articles of traffic. Cattle, swine, and poultry were procured from Virginia. The province was established on the broad foundation of security to property, and of freedom in religion. Fifty acres of land were granted in absolute fee to every emigrant, and christianity was established without allowing pre-eminence to any particular sect. This liberal policy rendered a Roman Catholic colony an asylum for those who were driven from New England by the persecutions which were there experienced from Protestants. The same toleration, or rather perfect freedom, was also established by R. Williams in Rhode Island. The governor built him a house at St. Mary's, for himself and his successors, and superintended the affairs of the country till the civil war in England, when the name of a papist became so obnoxious, that the parliament assumed the government of the province, and appointed a new governor. Cecilius Calvert, the proprietor, recovered his right to the province upon the restoration of King Charles II, in 1660, and in the same year appointed his son, Philip, the governor, and his son, Charles, in 1662. He died far in years and high in reputation, and was succeeded by his son, Charles, by whom an assembly was called, which passed a law prohibiting the importation of convicts. In 1676 there were in the colony only three clergymen of the church of England.—Belknap's Amer. Biog. II. 372-380; Holmes, II. 386; Univ. Hist. XL. 468; Brit. Emp. in America, I. 324-330.

CALVERT, BENEDICT, governor of Maryland, died June 1, 1732. He was succeeded in 1727 by Charles C., who had been governor from 1720. He was induced to resign from ill health in 1732, and died on his passage to England. His brother, Edward Henry Calvert, president of the council, died at Annapolis April 24, 1730, aged 28. His wife was the daughter of the Earl of Litchfield, and sister of the wife of Edward Young.—Lord's Lempr.; Savage's Winth. I. 139.

CALVERT, FREDERIC, Baron of Baltimore, and proprietor of Maryland, succeeded Charles, Lord Baltimore, in 1751, and died at Naples Sept. 30, 1771, leaving his property in Maryland to his son, Henry Harford. He published a tour in the east, 1764; and Gaudia Poetica, Latina, Anglica, et Gallica, &c.

CAMERON, JAMES, M. D., died at New York, Dec. 12, 1851, aged 60, a physician of eminence, a native of Scotland, for thirty years in practice in New York. He was a worthy member of a Presbyterian church.

CAMMERHOF, FREDERIC, a Moravian bishop, came to this country in 1746 to assist Bishop Spangenberg. In 1748 he visited the establishment at Shomokin, on the Susquehannah; in 1750 he repaired to Onondago to promote the introduction of the gospel amongst the Iroquois. He died at Bethlehem, his usual place of residence, April 28, 1751, greatly deplored. During four years he had baptized eighty-nine Indians. There was so much sweetness and benevolence in his character, as to impress even the savages with respect for him. His mild and friendly behaviour once turned the heart of an Indian, enraged by his reproofs, who had resolved to kill him.—Loskiel.

CAMMOCK, THOMAS, proprietor of Black Point, obtained a patent Nov. 1, 1631, from the Plymouth company of fifteen thousand acres in Scarborough, in Maine, extending from Black Point river to the Spurwink and back one mile from the sea. He was a nephew of the earl of Warwick, and as early as 1631 resided at Piscataqua. In 1633 he was at Black Point. March 21, 1636, he was one of Georges' commissioners, or a member of the court of New Somersetshire, at Saco, with Jocelyn and others; but not being in commission Sept. 2, 1639, he may have died before that time. He died in the West Indies.—Sullivan, 128; Maine Hist. Coll. I. 18, 41; Savage, I. 90.

CAMPBELL, JOHN, first minister of Oxford, Mass., was born in Scotland and educated at Edinburgh. He came to this country in 1717. He was ordained pastor of Oxford, a town settled by French protestants, March 11, 1721. He faithfully discharged the duties of his office, until his death, March 25, 1761, aged 70, and was succeeded by Joseph Bowman, who had been a missionary among the Mohawk Indians.—Whitney's Hist. of Worcester, 84.

CAMPBELL, lieutenant-colonel, in the battle of Eutaw, Sept. 8, 1781, was ordered to charge the enemy at the head of the Virginia troops, with Col. Williams, commanding the Maryland continentals. In this successful exploit, which broke the British line, he received a ball in his breast and dropped speechless on the pommel of his saddle. Being borne in the rear, he expired the moment he was taken from his horse. Dr. Holmes relates, that on being told, that the British were flying, he said, "I die contented;" but Lee, who was present, says, he uttered not a word.—Lee, II. 292; Holmes, II. 327.

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER, attorney of the United States for the district of Virginia, received his appointment from Washington, and was a man of eloquence. He died in July, 1796. His father resided in Virginia; and his uncle, Archibald Campbell,—a Scotch gentleman, the father of Thomas Campbell, the poet,—also resided there in his youth.

CAMPBELL, JOHN P., a minister at Chillicothe, Ohio, died about Dec., 1814, aged 46. He was the author of a manuscript history of the western country. He published the doctrine of justification considered; strictures on Stone's letters, 1805; Vindex, in answer to Stone's reply, 1806.

CAMPBELL, SAMUEL, colonel, an officer of the Revolution, died Sept. 12, 1824, aged 86. He was born in Londonderry, N. H., in 1738, and in 1745 removed with his father to Cherry Valley, then a wilderness. In the French war his services were useful; he was a brave officer of the militia in the war of the Revolution, and fought in most of the actions on the frontier. He was particularly distinguished at the battle of Oriskany, under Gen. Herkimer. He was engaged also in Nov., 1778, in the conflict at Cherry Valley, when the village was destroyed and many of the people massacred by the enemy under Butler and Brant. At this time his buildings were burnt, his personal property carried off, and his wife and all his children, but his eldest son, led into captivity. The captives were marched down the Susquehanna river to its junction with the Tioga; thence up that river, and to Geneva and Niagara; and thence to the neighborhood of Montreal. At length, owing to the exertions of Gov. Clinton, Mrs. Campbell was exchanged for the wife of Col. Butler, and the children were with difficulty, at the same time rescued from captivity. In 1783, when Gen. Washington and Gov. Clinton were on their exploring tour, they honored him with a visit for one night, and commended warmly his patriotic zeal. After the war he was a member of the legislature and an earnest republican. So firm had been his health, that he was engaged in personal labor the day before he died. His widow, Jane Cannon, died in 1836, aged 93, a happy Christian. Of her sons, William was surveyor-general of New York, James S. was a judge, and Robert a lawyer of Cooperstown. Among his numerous descendants were some of the chief citizens of Cherry Valley. His character through life was irreproachable; and for many years he had been a consistent professor of religion. — Cherry Valley Gaz. Sept. 14, 1824.

CAMPBELL, JENNY, Miss, died in Orange county, Va., Dec. 6, 1855, aged 115.

CAMPBELL, GEORGE W., died at Nashville, Feb. 17, 1848, aged 80. He was minister of United States to Russia. He had been representative in 1803-9, senator 1811-14, 1815-18, and secretary of the treasury.

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER, D. D., died at New Orleans May 6, 1855, aged 63. He was a reformer among the Baptists, abjuring religious creeds, and forming a new sect, which prevailed in Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. In a debate with Dr. Rice, he boasted of having two hundred thousand followers, not all in this country. He published the Millennial Harbinger, a monthly work. — N. Y. Observer, March 16, 1850.

CAMPBELL, WILLIAM, surveyor-general of New York, died at Cherry Valley Oct. 27, 1844, aged 77. He was the son of Colonel C., and the only member of a family, who escaped captivity or death in the massacre of Nov., 1778.

CAMPBELL, JOHN M., missionary to western Africa, sailed from Boston Jan. 1, 1844, and died at Cape Palmas of the acclimating fever, April 19, 1844, saying: "Though one instrument should be taken away, the cause of Christ would go forward."

CAMPBELL, MARIA, a daughter of Gen. Hull, the wife of Edward F. C., died in Augusta, Geo., in 1845. She had talents, cultivated by study, and a heart benevolent and pious. Many feeble hours she devoted to teaching her slaves the principles of the gospel. She finished before her death a work on the Revolutionary services of her father.

CAMPBELL, DANIEL, minister of Orford, N. H., died Oct. 1, 1849, aged 70, bequeathing 20,000 dollars to the American board of missions, and to the home missionary, bible, and tract societies. Born in Lebanon, he graduated at Dartmouth in 1801, and was settled in Kennebunk, then in Orford. He died suddenly in bed, having retired in usual health.

CAMPBELL, HARVEY M., a missionary, died in Arracan, where he had been only two years, Feb. 22, 1852. He was a graduate of Hamilton college.

CANER, HENRY, D. D., minister of king's chapel in Boston, died in 1792, aged 92. He was graduated at Yale college in 1724. In the following year he began to read prayers in an Episcopal church at Fairfield. In 1727, he went to England for ordination, and was appointed missionary for that town. His occasional services at Norwalk promoted the interest of the church; and it was not long before he had a respectable congregation there, as well as at Fairfield. He was a man of talents and agreeable manners, highly esteemed by his people. Having been chosen rector of the first Episcopal church in Boston, he was inducted into this office April 11, 1747. Here he continued, till the commencement of the American Revolution obliged him to retire from Boston. He left the church March 17, 1775. From this period he resided in England till his death in Long Ashton. A daughter married Mr. Gore of Boston. He published a sermon on Matthew VII, 28, 29, entitled: "The true nature and method of Christian preaching." Jonathan Dickinson, in his vindication of God's sovereign, free grace, replies to some sentiments in the sermon. Mr. Caner published also funeral sermons on the death of Charles Apthorp, 1758; of Frederic, Prince of Wales, 1751; of Rev. Dr. Cutler, 1765; of George II., 1761; of Timothy Cutler, 1765; a thanksgiving sermon for the peace, 1763; perhaps also a vindication of the society for propagating the gospel, 1764. — Chandler's Life of Johnson, 62; Coll. Hist. Soc. III. 260; Columb. Centinel, Feb. 13, 1793.

CANNON, JAMES SPENCER, D. D., died in New Brunswick July 25, 1852, aged 76, of the Dutch reformed church. For 26 years he was professor of metaphysics in Rutgers college, and of theology and ecclesiastical history in the theological seminary. For strong powers of mind, urbanity, and fervent piety he was distinguished.

CANONICUS, an Indian chief of Narragansett, died June 4, 1647, aged about 85. He was the eldest of three brothers and his father's heir. Miantunnomu, son of his youngest brother, was "his marshal and executioner," but did nothing without his uncle's consent. Ninnegrad was the other uncle of Miantunnomu. In 1622, the second year after the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth, Canonicus, having about five thousand fighting men, sent as a challenge a bundle of arrows tied with a snake-skin; this skin was returned filled with powder and ball. Peace was preserved by this defiance and by a discreet negotiation.

When Roger Williams, driven from Massachusetts, sought a retreat at Narragansett, the king, Canonicus, generously made him and his companions a present of all the neck of land between Pawtucket and Moshasuck rivers, that they might own it forever. On this neck they settled. Here was an act of kindness, which even at the present day demands a requital from the whites toward the remains of the Indian tribes. About fifty years afterwards, Williams gave a deposition, in which he says: "I declare to posterity, that were it not for the favor that God gave me with Canonicus, none of these parts, no, not Rhode Island, had been purchased or obtained, for I never got anything of Canonicus but by gift." "And I desire posterity to see the gracious hand of the Most High, that when the hearts of my countrymen and friends and brethren failed me, his infinite wisdom and merits stirred up the barbarous heart of Canonicus, to love me as his own son, to his last gasp." Once, in a solemn oration, the sachem said to Williams "I have never suffered any wrong to be offered to the English since they landed, nor never will. Wunnaumwagean Englishman (that is, If the English speak true, if he mean truly), then shall I go to my grave in peace." When Williams replied that he had no cause to distrust the Englishman's Wunnaumwageanck, faithfulness, the old Indian took a stick and broke it into ten pieces, and related ten instances, laying down a stick to every instance, which awakened his fears. He proved himself at all times the friend of the English. The Indian deed of Rhode Island bears date March 24, 1638. The deed of Providence is dated the same day. In 1632 there was a war between the Narragansetts and Pequots concerning the territory between Paucatuck river and Weepaug brook on the east, ten miles wide, and fifteen or twenty in length, which was claimed by Canonicus, as having conquered it many years before. After three years' war the land was obtained, and given to Sossoa or Sochso, a renegade Pequot, who had fought valorously for Canonicus. However, the Pequots very soon recovered it. On losing his son, Canonicus, after burying him, burned his own palace and all his goods in it.

When an embassy was sent to him in 1637 from Massachusetts, he received the ambassadors in his best style. In the royal entertainment which he provided, he gave them boiled chestnuts for white bread; also boiled puddings, made of pounded Indian corn, well filled with a "great store of black berries, somewhat like currants."

His audience chamber was a house fifty feet wide, made of long poles stuck in the ground, covered with mats, save a hole in the roof to let out the smoke. Seated on a mat, his nobility were around him, with their legs doubled under them, their knees touching their chins. He agreed to favor the English rather than the Pequots, and to the latter he gave his faithful advice, designed to hush the tempest of war, which was ready to break out. But in a short time the Pequots forgot his wise counsels, and plunged into a fatal war with the English, and were destroyed by Mason. In the war with Uncas, in 1643, Miantunnomu was taken prisoner and killed. April 19, 1644, Pessacus and Canonicus by deed submitted to the English king for protection. In 1645, the sons of Canonicus having excited a war with some neighboring Indians, troops were sent from Massachusetts under Gibbons, who quelled the disturbance. After Miantunnomu, a sachem, called Mecumeh, was associated with Canonicus. Pessacus, also, was a powerful sachem. Roger Williams calls him "A wise and peaceable prince." Wise he must have been, compared with most princes, since he was peaceable. In about thirty years Philip and his race fell victims to war, which he enkindled.—Prince, 392; Mass. Hist. Coll. III. 215, 238; v. 237; s. s. IV. 42; VII. 75; IX. 169; Holmes, I. 177, 286; Savage's Winthrop, II. 308.

CAONABO, a Carib chief, called by the Spaniards the lord of the golden house, in 1493 captured the fortress of La Navidad in Hispaniola, and massacred the Spaniards. The next year he unsuccessfully besieged Ojeda, though he had with him ten thousand warriors. Soon afterwards Ojeda made him prisoner by stratagem, pretending to honor him by putting on him a pair of manacles of burnished steel, resembling silver, and mounting him in state on his own horse. Thus he galloped off with his prize, the victim of vanity. In 1496 he was put on board a vessel to be conveyed to Spain; but he died in the passage. His death is ascribed to the deep melancholy of his proud spirit. At first a simple Carib warrior, he became the most powerful cacique in the populous island of Hayti. But being made a prisoner, he died in obscurity. Thus sinks away all the glory of human greatness.—Irving's Columbus, II.

CAPEN, JOSEPH, a poet and minister of Topsfield, Mass., was the son of John C., who lived in Dorchester in 1634, and died in 1692, aged 79. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1677, ordained June 4, 1684, and died June 30, 1725, aged 66. He published, about 1682, an elegy on the ingenious mathematician and printer, John Foster, which concludes with the following lines, doubtless suggested by Woodbridge's elegy on John Cotton:

"Thy body, which no activeness did lack,
Now's laid aside, like an old almanac;
But for the present only's out of date:
'Twill have, at length, a far more active state.
Yea, though with dust thy body soiled be,
Yet, at the resurrection, we shall see
A fair edition, and of matchless worth,
Free from erratas, new in heaven set forth;
'Tis but a word from God, the great Creator,
It shall be done, when he saith 'Imprimatur.'"

CAPERS, WILLIAM, D. D., Methodist bishop, died in South Carolina Jan. 29, 1855, aged 65.

CARDELL, WILLIAM S., a useful writer, died at Lancaster, Pa., Aug. 10, 1828; his usual residence had been in the city of New York. He was a man of talents and active benevolence. He projected an American academy of belles lettres, which had a momentary existence, but soon expired. He published a new system of grammar, and other useful books for youth.

CAREY, JOHN L., died at New Orleans Dec. 14, 1838. He was editor of the Daily Crescent four years, and previously of the Baltimore American, and the author of popular works on political economy.

CARÉY, MATTHEW, died at Philadelphia Sept. 17, 1839, aged 79. He was born in Ireland Jan. 28, 1760, and was early apprenticed to a printer and bookseller. In 1783 he set up "The Freeman's Journal." After being prosecuted for a libel, he came to Philadelphia in 1784 with scarce a dozen guineas in his pocket. He established the Pennsylvania Herald in 1785, and afterwards, the Columbian Magazine and the American Museum. By printing and bookselling he amassed an ample fortune. He wrote and published the Olive Branch, 1814, of which he sold ten thousand copies; Vindiciæ Hibernicæ, 1829; and fifty-nine pieces in favor of the Protective System of American Industry. His last publication was the Philosophy of Common Sense. He promoted the interests of education and the charities of the day. To the young and deserving he took pleasure in lending a helping hand. His life was written by G. A. Ward, in Lives of American merchants.

CARHEIL, ÉTIENNE DE, a Jesuit missionary, visited the Iroquois in 1668. For more than sixty years he toiled amongst the Indians in Canada, with little success; in 1721 Charlevoix left him in Canada, still full of vigor and vivacity. Though he spoke the Huron and Iroquois languages better than his own, and was regarded by the savages as a saint and a genius of the first order, yet he made but few converts, and for his little success he humbled himself before God. Charlevoix remarks, that the history of Carheil may well teach missionaries that it is the prerogative of God to renew the heart, and that their toils are never in vain, if they themselves become saints.

guished British officer in America, died in 1808, in England, aged 83. He was appointed a brigadier-general in this country in 1776. He was made major-general in 1772. At the close of the year 1774 a commission passed the seals, constituting him captain-general and governor of Quebec. When Canada was invaded by Montgomery in 1775, Carleton was in the most imminent danger of being taken prisoner upon the St. Lawrence after the capture of Montreal; but he escaped in a boat with muffled paddles, and arrived safely at Quebec, which he found threatened by an unexpected enemy. Arnold, though he had been repulsed by Col. Maclean, was yet in the neighborhood of the city, waiting for the arrival of Montgomery previously to another attack. General Carleton, with the skill of an experienced officer, took the necessary measures for the security of the city. His first act was to oblige all to leave Quebec, who would not take up arms in its defence. When Montgomery approached, his summons was treated with contempt by the governor, whose intrepidity was not to be shaken. By his industry and bravery Carleton saved the city. After the unsuccessful assault of the last of December, in which Montgomery was killed, he had nothing more immediately to apprehend. In May, 1776, he obliged the Americans to raise the siege, and it was not long before he compelled them to withdraw entirely from Canada. In October he recaptured Crown Point; but, as the winter was advancing, he did not attempt the reduction of Ticonderoga, but returned to St. John's. In the beginning of the next year he was superseded in his command by Burgoyne, who was intrusted with the northern British army. Carleton's experience, and abilities, and services were such as rendered him worthy of the command, which was given to another. Though he immediately asked leave to resign his government, he yet contributed all in his power to secure the success of the campaign. In the year 1782 he was appointed, as successor of Sir Henry Clinton, commander-in-chief of all his majesty's forces in America. He arrived at New York with his commission in the beginning of May. After the treaty was signed, he delayed for some time the evacuation of the city from regard to the safety of the loyalists; but Nov. 25, 1783, he embarked, and withdrew the British ships from the shores of America. He was a brave and able officer, and he rendered important services to his country. Though he was not conciliating in his manners, and possessed the severity of the soldier, yet his humanity to the American prisoners, whom he took in Canada, has been much praised. In excuse for the little attention which he paid to the honorable burial of Montgomery, it can only be said that he regarded him as a rebel. — Stedman, 1.; Annual Reg. xvii. 189, XIX. 2-16; XX. 2; Warren's Hist. Rev. II. 2, 3; III. 217, 252, 311.

CARLTON, OSGOOD, a teacher of mathematics and navigation, resided chiefly in Mass., but died in Litchfield, N. H., in June 1816. He published valuable maps of Mass., and of the district of Maine; also the American navigator, 1801; the South American pilot, 1804; a map of the U. S., 1806; practice of arithmetic, 1810.

CARMAN, captain, a brave seaman, sailed from New Haven Dec., 1642, in a vessel of 180 tons with clapboards for the Canaries, being earnestly commended by the church at New Haven to the Lord's protection. Near the Island of Palma he was attacked by a Turkish pirate of three hundred tons, with two hundred men and twenty-six cannon, he having only twenty men and seven serviceable cannon. The battle lasted three hours, the Turk lying across his hawse, so that he had to fire through his own "hoodings." At last he was boarded by 100 men; but a shot killing the Turkish captain, and the tiller of his ship being broken, the Turk took in his ensign and fell off, leaving behind fifty men. These Carman and his crew assaulted hand to hand and compelled all, who were not killed, to leap overboard. He had many wounds on his head and body, and several of his men were wounded; but only one was killed. At the island he was courteously entertained. He arrived at Boston July 2, 1643. In Nov. 1645 he sailed from Boston for Malaga, in company with a new ship of four hundred tons; but both vessels ran aground in the night on the coast of Spain, and Carman, Dr. Pratt, and seventeen others were drowned. There were on board the large vessel several ship masters as passengers: but, says Hubbard, "according to the old proverb, the more cooks the worse broth, and the more masters the worse mariners." The lights in the castle of Cadiz had been seen; but were mistaken for lights in enemies' vessels.—2. Hist. Coll. VI. 525; Savage's Winth. II. 124, 239.

CARMICHAEL, WILLIAM, chargé d' affaires at the court of Spain, died early in 1795. He was a native of Maryland. At the beginning of the Revolution he was in London, and thence he proceeded to Paris on his way to America with despatches from A. Lee. At Paris he was detained by sickness. On the arrival of Mr. Deane in June 1776, he aided him in his correspondence and the transaction of business. In Oct., at the suggestion of the Prussian minister he went to Berlin, by way of Amsterdam, to communicate to the king intelligence concerning American commerce. Returning to Paris, he was employed more than a year by the American commissioners. He arrived at Boston in May, 1778; in Nov., he took his seat in congress as a delegate from Maryland, though he had been appointed secretary to the commissioners in France. The next year he was appointed secretary of legation to Mr. Jay in his mission to Spain, and accompanied him and remained with him during his residence in Madrid. When Mr. Jay went to Paris in June 1782, Mr. Carmichael was left as chargé d' affaires, and after the peace was commissioned in that character by congress, and continued as such at the court of Spain about fifteen years. In March 1792 William Short was joined with him in a commission to negotiate a treaty with Spain. The attempt was unsuccessful. Soon afterwards Mr. Carmichael returned to the United States. His correspondence makes a part of the 9th vol. of diplomatic correspondence, edited by J. Sparks.—Dipl. Cor. IX. 3, 4.

CARNES, THOMAS P., a judge of Georgia, was born and educated at Maryland; removing to Georgia, he there attained to a high rank as a lawyer. He was successively solicitor-general, attorney-general, and judge of the supreme court; and he was also a member of congress. He died at Milledgeville May 8, 1822, aged 60.

CARNEY, DANIEL L., died in Campbell county, Ky., Aug. 1, 1856, aged 76; one of the early settlers of Cincinnati, and editor of the Western Spy.

CARPENTER, REBECCA, widow, died at Rehoboth June 23, 1837, aged 67, bequeathing 1000 dollars to be divided among five of the leading charitable societies.

CARR, ROBERT, Sir, died June 1, 1667. He was appointed by Charles II., in 1664, a commissioner, with Col. Nicolls, Cartwright, and Maverick, with extensive powers in New England. It was designed to repress the spirit of liberty. Clarendon said, "they are already hardened into republics." In the summer he and Maverick arrived at Piscataqua. Aug. 27, 1664, Nicolls and Carr, with four frigates, and three hundred men, captured from the Dutch New Amsterdam, and called it New York in honor of the Duke of York and Albany, the brother of the king. Sept. 24th the garrison at fort Orange capitulated, and the place was called Albany. Carr forced the Dutch and Swedes on Delaware bay to capitulate Oct. 1. Thus New Netherlands, including New Jersey, was subjected. The commissioners, excepting Nicolls, repaired to Boston in Feb., 1665. Their proceedings are narrated by Hutchinson. When they arrived in Maine in June, 1665, they assumed all the powers of government, so that the authority of Massachusetts there was suspended. By special commission from them a court was held at Casco by Jocelyn and others in July 1666. The government, thus created by the commissioners, expired in 1668, the people looking to Massachusetts for a firmer administration of affairs. In the mean time Carr had returned to England, where he died at Bristol, the day after he landed.—Holmes, I. 333; Hutchins, I. 211-229.

CARR, DABNEY, a distinguished member of the assembly of Virginia, moved and eloquently supported the resolution for appointing a committee of correspondence in consequence of the British encroachments, which was adopted March 12, 1773. But he died in about two months, at Charlottesville, May 16th, aged 30. He married Martha, the sister of Mr. Jefferson, who in his works has delineated his character, as marked by a sound judgment and inflexible firmness, combined with fancy and eloquence, softness and kindness. His eldest son, Peter Carr, died about 1808.—Jefferson's Works.

CARR, DABNEY, died Jan. 8, 1837, at Culpepper, Va., aged 63. He was a man of distinction; a judge of the court of appeals; a man of talents, industry, learning, and of colloquial powers.

CARRIER, THOMAS, remarkable for longevity, died at Colchester, Conn., May 16, 1735, aged 109 years. He was born in the west of England and removed thence to Andover, Mass. He married in 1664 Martha Allen, who fell a victim to the witchcraft infatuation at Salem village, with Mr. Burroughs, Aug. 19, 1692,—one of her own daughters, aged 7, being allowed to testify against her, as making her a witch, and appearing like a black cat, the cat saying, she was her mother. Hutchinson has preserved her testimony. He lived at Colchester about twenty years, and was a member of the church in that town. His head in his last years was not bald, nor his hair gray. Not many days before his death he travelled on foot six miles, to see a sick man and the very day before he died he was visiting his neighbors.—New Eng. Week. Jour. June 9, 1735; Hutchinson, II. 47; Farmer's Coll. II. 69.

CARRIGAIN, PHILIP, a distinguished physician, died in Aug. 1806. He was born in New York in 1746, and was the son of a Scotch physician, who died in that city. After studying with Dr. Bricket of Haverhill, Mass., he settled in 1768 at Concord, N. H., where he rose to eminence as a physician and surgeon. His practice was for years more extensive than that of any other physician in the State. His son of the same name, a lawyer, and secretary of State, published in 1816 a large and beautiful map of New Hampshire.—Moore's Annals of Concord, 62; Bouton's Cent. Disc. 94.

CARRINGTON, PAUL, a patriot of the Revolution, died at his seat in Charlotte county, Va., June 22, 1818, aged 85. He was probably older than any surviving Virginian patriot who took an active part in the councils of the country in the first struggles for liberty and independence.

CARRINGTON, EDWARD, an officer of the Revolution, died Oct. 28, 1810, aged 61. He was an active quarter-master-general under Greene, in the campaign at the south; and served also in the north. He was a representative in congress from Virginia after the peace. When Aaron Burr was tried for high treason, he was foreman of the jury.—Lord's Lempr.; Lee, I. 296.

CARRINGTON, PAUL, judge of the general court of Virginia, died at his seat in Charlotte county, Virginia, Jan. 8, 1816, aged 52. In his youth he was distinguished as a soldier in the actions at Guilford court-house and Green Spring. On the return of peace he completed his studies at William and Mary college. At the age of twenty-two he was a member of the house of delegates, afterwards of the senate; from which body he was transferred to the bench of the superior court. He died, expressing the hope of a happy immortality through the merits of the Saviour.—Christian Visitant.

CARROLL, JOHN, D. D., L. L. D., first Catholic bishop in the United States, died Dec. 3, 1815, aged 80. He was born at Upper Marlborough in Maryland, in 1734, and sent for education at the age of thirteen to Flanders. From St. Omer's, where he remained six years, he was transferred to the colleges of Liege and Bruges. Having been ordained a priest and become a Jesuit, in 1770 he accompanied the son of an English Catholic nobleman on a tour through Europe. In 1773 he was appointed a professor in the college of Bruges. On the suppression of the Jesuits by the pope, he retired to England, and acted as secretary of the fathers; in 1775 he returned to America, and engaged in the duties of a parish priest. By request of congress he accompanied Franklin, C. Carroll, and S. Chase in their mission to Canada, in order to recommend neutrality to the Canadians. Appointed Catholic vicar-general in 1786, he settled at Baltimore. In 1790 he was consecrated in England Catholic bishop of the United States, and he returned with the title of the bishop of Baltimore. A few years before his death he was created archbishop. He was the brother of Charles Carroll, the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence. Bishop C. was venerable, dignified, and learned. In Latin, Italian, and French he conversed with ease. He was mild, and courteous, and free from intolerance, living in friendly intercourse with persons of other sects. His end was peaceful. In his last illness he said to a Protestant minister, who alluded to his approaching death: "My hopes have always been on the cross of Christ." Encycl. Americana; American Quar. Rev. I. 19-24.

CARROLL, CHARLES, last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence, died at Baltimore Nov. 14, 1832, aged 95. He was born at Annapolis, of an Irish family, Sept. 20, 1737, and inherited a very large estate. Of the Catholic religion, he was educated at St. Omer's; and studied the civil and common law in France and in London. In 1766 he was a delegate to congress from Maryland; in 1789 he was a senator. He signed the Declaration of Independence, though not present when the vote was taken, on account of his mission to Canada. In 1810 he retired to private life. He was learned and refined, of great vivacity and courtesy, made happy in domestic and social intercourse. His grand-daughter, Miss Caton, married Mr. Patterson; afterwards, in 1825, Richard, the marquis of Wellesley.

CARROLL, DANIEL L., D. D., died in Philadelphia Nov. 23, 1851, aged 53. He graduated at Jefferson college, and succeeded Dr. Beecher for two years as the minister of Litchfield; and then was pastor seven years in Brooklyn. For three years he was president of Hampden Sidney college. Then was five years pastor in Philadelphia; afterwards secretary of the New York colonization society. He was buried at Greenwood, near New York. In his last hours he referred to man's sinfulness and the power of Christ to save. N. Y. Observer, Dec. 4.

CARTER, THOMAS, first minister of Woburn, Mass., died in 1684, aged 73. He came to this country in 1635, and lived several years at Dedham and Watertown. He was ordained at Woburn Nov. 12, 1642; the church had been gathered Aug. 14th. This was a lay ordination. The church having no elder, or minister, to impose hands, and apprehending a precedent, leading to the "dependence of churches and a presbytery," two of its members performed that solemnity, although several ministers were present. When they had imposed hands for the church, and said, we ordain thee pastor of this church, a prayer was made by an elder of a neighboring church. There are a few undoubted instances of such ordinations, recorded in the early history of this country. — Savage's Winthrop, II. 91, 253; 2 Hist. Coll. VII. 42; Chickering's Hist. Woburn.

CARTER, ROBERT, president of the council of Virginia in 1726, was succeeded next year as the head of the State by Gov. Wm. Gouch. He died Aug. 4, 1732, aged 69. Of great wealth, he was the proprietor of three hundred thousand acres of land and one thousand and one hundred slaves.

CARTER, ROBERT, of Nominy, Virginia, a member of the executive council, probably a descendant of the preceding, died before 1813. He was rich, having seven or eight hundred slaves. Believing that the toleration of slavery indicates very great depravity, he gradually emancipated the whole. Another account mentions, that he emancipated four hundred and forty-two slaves, at a sacrifice of 100,000 dollars. He was fourteen years a regular Baptist; then became an Arminian; and afterwards a follower of the bewildered enthusiast, Swedenborg. He removed to Baltimore to find a society of the same faith. — Benedict, II. 278; Rippon's Reg.

CARTER, EZRA, a respectable and benevolent physician, was born in South Hampton, N. H., and settled about 1740 in Concord, where he died Sept. 17, 1767, aged 48. He several times narrowly escaped being killed by the Indians. In one of his visits to a sick and poor family in Bow, something was said concerning the payment of his bill. The man and his wife plead their deep poverty; but the doctor replied: "You have property enough to satisfy me, and I will have my pay before I leave your house." Then, seizing a kitten from the floor, he said: "I told you I should have my pay; I have got it. Good-by, and God bless you." Just before his death he signed receipts to the bills against all poor persons, with directions to his executors to deliver them. — Moore's Ann. of Concord, 35.

CARTER, NATHANIEL HAZELTINE, a scholar and traveller, died Jan 2, 1830, aged 42. He was the son of Joseph Carter, and was born in Concord, N. H., about the year 1788. In 1811 he was graduated at Dartmouth college, and afterwards studied law. When the charter of the college was amended by the legislature in 1817, he was appointed professor of languages in Dartmouth university, and officiated in that capacity two or three years. In 1820 he became the proprietor and editor of the Albany Register, the name of which he changed, May 16, to that of the New York Statesman. He removed to the city of New York Jan. 1822, and united his paper with another, entering into partnership with Mr. G. W. Prentiss. He zealously espoused the interests of Dewitt Clinton. From 1825 to 1827 he was abroad, travelling upon the continent of Europe as the companion and guide of a young gentleman of New York, whose father confided in his good judgment. During this absence he enriched his paper with letters from Europe, which on his return he collected and published in two large 8vo. volumes, entitled, Letters from Europe, comprising the journal of a tour through Ireland, England, Scotland, France, Italy, and Switzerland, 1827. These writings, the production of a classical scholar and a zealous friend of the republican institutions of America, as well as of a believer in the simple and pure religion of the gospel, are well calculated to promote in the reader the love of country. The exposure of the civil and religious tyranny, under which the greater part of Europe groans, is doing good service to the cause of liberty. Mr. Carter's health becoming impaired, he spent the winters of 1827 and 1828 in Cuba. When he visited Concord in Nov., 1828, he addressed a few lines to his "Native Stream," in which he alludes to his wanderings by other streams:

"Along the Shannon, Doon, and Tay,
I've sauntered many a happy day,
And sought beside the Cam and Thames
Memorials of immortal names;
Or mingled in the polished train
Of fashion on the banks of Seine.
And I have seen the azure Rhone
Rush headlong from his Alpine throne;
Green Mincius and the silver Po
Through vine-clad vales meand'ring flow;
Sweet Arno, wreath'd in summer flowers,
Linger amidst Etrurian bowers;
And the old Tiber's yellow tide
Roll to the sea in sullen pride.
In climes beneath the burning zone,
Mid tangled forests, deep and lone,
Where fervid skies forever glow,
And the soft trade-winds whispering blow,
My roving footsteps too have prest
The loveliest island of the west.
There Yumuri winds deep and calm,
Through groves of citron and of palm;
There on the sluggish wave of Juan
My little boat hath borne me on;
Or up Canimar's silent floods,
Strewn with the blossoms of its woods."

His partner, Mr. Prentiss, died in March, 1829. In the same year he relinquished his interest in the Statesman, and for the benefit of his very enfeebled health proceeded again to France. But a fatal consumption terminated his life a few days after his arrival at Marseilles. His funeral was attended by many Americans and British. Mr. Carter was a very upright and amiable man, and an accomplished scholar. He was a poet, as well as a writer of prose; his longest poetical piece is entitled the Pains of Imagination, delivered at Dartmouth college. His hymn for Christmas is preserved in Specimens of American Poetry. — Boulton's Cent. Disc. 95; Spec. III, 113.

CARTER, SAMUEL, M. D., died in Brooklyn, N. Y., Nov. 22, 1853, aged 74, for many years a physician in old Saybrook, Conn. He was an eminent Christian, and died in the triumphs of faith.

CARTER, JAMES G., died at Chicago in July, 1849, a graduate of Harvard in 1820. He lived in Lancaster, and had the confidence of his fellow citizens in public life. He did much in the cause of education. While on a tour at the west he was seized with a fatal bilious fever.

CARTERET, GEORGE, Sir, one of the proprietors of New Jersey, died in Nov., 1682. He obtained with Lord Berkeley from the Duke of York a grant of New Jersey, June 23, 1664, the duke having received from the king a larger patent, March 12. The name of New Jersey was given, because Carteret's family were from the Isle of Jersey. Elizabethtown is said to have been named from his wife. Philip Carteret was governor of New Jersey, with some interruption, from 1665 till his death. After 1676, when the division of the country was made by Berkeley and Carteret, he governed East Jersey. — Holmes, II, 333.

CARTIER, JACQUES, a French navigator, who made important discoveries in Canada, was a native of St. Malo. After the voyage of the Cabots the French learned the value of their discoveries, and in a few years began the cod-fishery upon the banks of Newfoundland. The Baron de Levi is said to have discovered a part of Canada about 1518. In 1524 John Verrazana, a Florentine, in the service of France, ranged the coast of the new continent from Florida to Newfoundland. From a subsequent voyage in 1525 he never returned, and it is supposed that he was cut to pieces and devoured by the savages. His fate discouraged other attempts to discover the new world, till the importance of having a colony in the neighborhood of the fishing banks induced Francis I. to send out Cartier in 1534. The king said: "The kings of Spain and Portugal are taking possession of the new world, without giving me a part; I should be glad to see the article in Adam's last will, which gives them America." Cartier sailed from St. Malo April 20, with two ships of sixty tons and one hundred and twenty-two men. On the tenth of May he came in sight of Bonavista, on the Island of Newfoundland; but the ice obliged him to go to the south, and he entered a harbor at the distance of five leagues, to which he gave the name of St. Catherine. As soon as the season would permit, he sailed northward and entered the straits of Belleisle. In this voyage he visited the greater part of the coast which surrounds the gulf of St. Lawrence, and took possession of the country in the name of the king; he discovered a bay, which he called Baye des Chaleurs, on account of the sultry weather which he experienced in it; he sailed so far into the great river, afterwards called the St. Lawrence, as to discover land on the opposite side. August 15, he set sail on his return, and arrived at St. Malo on the fifth of September.

When his discoveries were known in France, it was determined to make a settlement in that part of America which he had visited. Accordingly, in the following year he received a more ample commission and was equipped with three vessels. When he was ready to depart, he went to the cathedral church with his whole company, and the bishop gave them his benediction. He sailed May 19, 1535. He experienced a severe storm on his passage, but in July he reached the destined port. He entered the gulf, as in the preceding year, being accompanied by a number of young men of distinction. He sailed up the St. Lawrence and discovered an island, which he named Bacchus, but which is now called Orleans, in the neighborhood of Quebec. This island was full of inhabitants, who subsisted by fishing. He went on shore and the natives brought him Indian corn for his refreshment. With his pinnace and two boats he proceeded up the river as far as Hochelaga, a settlement upon an island, which he called Mont-royal, but which is now called Montreal. In this Indian town were about fifty long huts, built with stakes, and covered with bark. The people lived mostly by fishing and tillage. They had corn, beans, squashes, and pumpkins. In two or three days he set out on his return, and arrived Oct. 4 at St. Croix, not far from Quebec, now called Jacques Cartier's river. Here he passed the winter. In Dec., the scurvy began to make its appearance among the natives, and in a short time Cartier's company were seized by the disorder. By the middle of Feb., of one hundred and ten persons, fifty were sick at once, and eight or ten had died. In this extremity he appointed a day of humiliation. A crucifix was placed on a tree, a procession of those who were able to walk was formed, and at the close of the devotional exercises Cartier made a vow, that "if it should please God to permit him to return to France, he would go in pilgrimage to our lady of Roquemado." The sick were all healed by using a medicine which was employed with success by the natives. This was a decoction of the leaves and bark of a tree. The liquor was drank ever other day, and an external application was made to the legs. Charlevoix says the tree was that which yielded turpentine, and Dr. Belknap thinks it was the spruce pine. In May he set sail on his return to France, carrying off with him Donnacona, the Indian king of the country, and nine other natives, all of whom, but a little girl, died in France. He arrived at St. Malo July 6, 1536.

At the end of four years a third expedition was projected. François de la Roque, Lord of Roberval, was commissioned by the king as his lieutenant governor in Canada; and Cartier was appointed his pilot, with the command of five ships, his commission, which may be seen in Hazard's collections, being dated Oct. 17, 1540. He sailed, however, May 23, 1540, to Newfoundland and Canada. Aug. 23, he arrived at the haven of St. Croix, in the river St. Lawrence; about four leagues above that place, on a cliff, at the east side of the mouth of a small river, he built a fort, which he called Charlesbourg. This was near Quebec. In the spring of 1542 he determined to return to France, and accordingly in June arrived at Saint John's, in Newfoundland, on his way home. Here he met Roberval, who did not accompany him in his voyage, and who had been detained till this time. He was ordered to return to Canada, but he chose to pursue his voyage to France, and sailed out of the harbor privately in the night. Roberval attempted to establish a colony, but it was soon broken up, and the French did not establish themselves permanently in Canada till after the expiration of half a century.

Cartier published memoirs of Canada after his second voyage. The names which he gave to islands, rivers, &c., are now entirely changed. In this work he shows that he possessed a good share of the credulity or the exaggeration of travellers. Being one day in the chase, he says that he pursued a beast which had but two legs, and which ran with astonishing rapidity. This strange animal was probably an Indian, clothed with the skin of some wild beast. He speaks also of human monsters of different kinds, of which accounts had been given him. Some of them lived without eating.—*Belknap's Amer. CARTWRIGHT, GEORGE, colonel, was one of King Charles' commissioners to New England, with Nicolls, Carr, and Maverick, in 1664. When the commissioners, on their arrival at Boston, informed the general court that they should next day sit and hear a cause against the governor and company, the court published "by sound of trumpet" its disapprobation of this proceeding, and prohibited all persons from abetting it. Thus early and boldly was the note of liberty sounded. The commissioners, finding that they had to do with stiff-necked men, soon went away in displeasure. In Cartwright's voyage to England in 1665, he was taken by the Dutch, and lost his papers, and hardly escaped with his life. Hubbard says they put into his mouth a gag, which he had "threatened to some in New England, that pleased him not." The loss of his papers was deemed a benefit to the colonies, as his prejudices were strong against them, and as the papers would have been employed for purposes of mischief.—Holmes, I. 338; Hist. Coll. VI. 579.

CARVER, JOHN, first governor of Plymouth colony, died in April, 1621, only about four months after the landing of the pilgrims. He was a native of England, and was among the emigrants to Leyden, who composed Mr. Robinson's church in that place. When a removal to America was contemplated, he was appointed one of the agents to negotiate with the Virginia company in England for a suitable territory. He obtained a patent in 1619, and in the following year came to New England with the first company. Two vessels had been procured, the one called the Speedwell and the other the Mayflower, which sailed from Southampton, carrying one hundred and twenty passengers, Aug. 5, 1620. As one of the vessels proved leaky, they both put into Dartmouth for repairs. They put to sea again Aug. 21; but the same cause, after they had sailed about one hundred leagues, obliged them to put back to Plymouth. The Speedwell was there pronounced unfit for the voyage. About twenty of the passengers went on shore. The others were received on board the Mayflower, which sailed with one hundred passengers, besides the ship's officers and crew, Sept. 6. During the voyage the weather was unfavorable, and the ship being leaky, the people were almost continually wet. One young man died at sea, and a child was born, the son of Stephen Hopkins, which was called Oceanus. Nov. 9, they discovered the white, sandy shores of Cape Cod. As this land was northward of Hudson's river, to which they were destined, the ship was immediately put about to the southward; but the appearance of breakers and the danger from shoals, together with the eagerness of the women and children to be set on shore, induced them to shift their course again to the north. The next day the northern extremity of the cape was doubled; and, on the second day after the discovery of land the ship was safely anchored in the harbor of Cape Cod. As they were without the territory of the south Virginia company, from whom they had received the charter, which was thus rendered useless, and as they perceived the absolute necessity of government, it was thought proper, before they landed, that a political association should be formed, intrusting all powers in the hands of the majority. Accordingly, after solemn prayers and thanksgiving, a written instrument was subscribed, Nov. 11, 1620, by forty-one persons out of the whole number of passengers of all descriptions on board. Mr. Carver's name stood first, and he was unanimously elected governor for one year. Among the other names were those of Bradford, Winslow, Brewster, Allerton, Standish, Alden, Fuller, Warren, Hopkins, White, Rogers, and Cook. Government being thus regularly established on a truly republican principle, sixteen armed men were sent on shore the same day to procure wood and make discoveries. They returned at night, having seen no house nor a human being. The next day, Sunday, was observed as a day of rest. While they lay in this harbor, during the space of five weeks, several excursions were made by the direction of the governor. In one of them Mr. Bradford's foot was caught in a deer-trap, which was made by bending a young tree to the earth, with a noose under ground, covered with acorns. But his companions disengaged him from his unpleasant situation. An Indian burying-ground was discovered, and in one of the graves were found a mortar, an earthen pot, a bow and arrows, and other implements, all of which were carefully replaced. A more important discovery was a cellar, filled with seed-corn in ears, of which they took as much as they could carry away, after reasoning for some time upon the morality of the action, and resolving to satisfy the owners when they should find them. In other expeditions a number of bushels of corn were obtained, the acquisition of which, at a time when it was much needed, they regarded as a peculiar favor of Divine providence. In six months the owners were remunerated to their entire satisfaction.

On Wednesday, Dec. 6, governor Carver himself, with nine of the principal men, well armed, and the same number of seamen, set sail in the shallop to make further discoveries. The weather was so cold, that the spray of the sea froze on their coats, till they were cased with ice, like coats of iron. They coasted along the cape, and occasionally a party was set on shore. At the dawn of day on Friday, Dec. 8, those who were on the land were surprised by the sudden wariness of the natives, and a flight of arrows. They immediately seized their arms, and on the first discharge of musketry the Indians fled. Eighteen arrows were taken up, headed either with brass, deer's horns, or bird's claws, which they sent as a present to their friends in England. As they sailed along the shore, they were overtaken by a storm, and the rudder being broken, and the shallop driven into a cove full of breakers, they all expected to perish. By much exertion, however, they came to anchor in a fair sound under a point of land. While they were divided in opinion with respect to landing at this place, the severity of the weather compelled them to go on shore. In the morning of Saturday they found themselves on a small uninhabited island, which has ever since borne the name of Clarke's island, from the mate of the ship, the first man who stepped upon it. As the next day was the Christian Sabbath, they appropriated it to those religious purposes for which it was set apart. On Monday, Dec. 11, they surveyed the bay, and went ashore upon the main land, at the place which they call Plymouth; and a part of the very rock, on which they first set their feet, is now in the public square of the town, and is distinguished by the name of the "Forefathers' rock." The day of their landing, Dec. 11th, in the old style, was many years ago by mistake adjudged to be Dec. 22d, in our new style, by the addition of eleven days instead of ten: and Dec. 22d has been celebrated as an annual festival. But probably hereafter the true day, Dec. 21st, will be celebrated. As they marched into the country they found cornfields, and brooks, and an excellent situation for building. With the news of their success they returned to their company, and, Dec. 16, the ship came to anchor in the harbor. The high ground on the southwest side of the bay was pitched upon as the site of the contemplated town, and a street and house lots were immediately laid out. It was also resolved to plant their ordinance upon a commanding eminence, that overlooked the plain. Before the end of Dec., they had erected a storehouse with a thatched roof, in which their goods were deposited under a guard. Two rows of houses were begun, and as fast as they could be covered, the people, who were classed into nineteen families, came ashore, and lodged in them. On the last of Dec., the public services of religion were attended for the first time on the shore, and the place was named Plymouth, both because it was so called in Capt. Smith's map, published a few years before, and in remembrance of the kind treatment which they had received from the inhabitants of Plymouth, the last port of their native country from which they sailed. The severe hardships to which this company were exposed in so rigorous a climate, and the scorbutic habits, contracted by living so long on board the ship, caused a great mortality among them, so that before the month of April near one half of them died. Gov. Carver was himself dangerously ill in January. On the 14th of that month, as he lay sick at the storehouse, the building took fire by means of the thatched roof, and it was with difficulty that the stock of ammunition was preserved. By the beginning of March he was so far recovered of his first illness, that he was able to walk three miles to visit a large pond, which had been discovered from the top of a tree by Francis Billington, whose name it has since borne. None of the natives were seen before the sickness among the planters had abated. The pestilence, which raged in the country four years before, had almost depopulated it. March 16th, a savage came boldly into the town alone, and to the astonishment of the emigrants addressed them in these words, "Welcome, Englishmen! Welcome, Englishmen!" His name was Samoset, and he was lord, or sagamore of Moratiggon, distant five days' journey to the eastward. He had learned broken English of the fishermen in his country. By him the governor was informed, that the place where they now were was called Patuxet, and, though it was formerly populous, that every human being had died of the late pestilence. This account was confirmed by the extent of the deserted fields, the number of graves, and the remnants of skeletons lying on the ground. Being dismissed with a present, he returned the next day with five of the Indians, who lived in the neighborhood, and who brought a few skins for trade. He was sent out again in a few days, and, March 22d, returned with Squanto, the only native of Patuxet then living. Having been carried off in 1614 by a Captain Hunt of Smith's fleet, who in his voyage from Virginia to Malaga visited Plymouth and treacherously seized him and twenty-six others of the natives, he escaped the pestilence, which desolated the country. They were sold at Malaga at 20 pounds a man. As several of these Indians were rescued from slavery by some benevolent monks at Malaga, Squanto was probably thus set at liberty. He had learned the English language at London, and came back to his native country with the fishermen. They informed the planters, that Massasoit, the sachem of the neighboring Indians, was near with his brother and a number of his people; and within an hour he appeared on the top of a hill over against the English town with a train of sixty men. Mutual distrust prevented for some time any advances upon either side; but Mr. Winslow being sent to the Indian king with a copper chain and two knives, with a friendly message from the governor, the sachem was pleased to descend from the hill, accompanied by twenty men unarmed. Capt. Standish met him at the brook at the head of six men with muskets, and escorted him to one of the best houses, where three or four cushions were placed on a green rug, spread over the floor. The governor came in, preceded by a drum and trumpet, the sound of which greatly delighted the Indians. After mutual salutations, the governor kissing his majesty's hand, refreshments were ordered. A league of friendship was then agreed on, which was inviolably observed for above fifty years. The articles of the treaty were the following, "that neither he nor his should injure any of ours; that, if they did, he should send the offender, that we might punish him; that if our tools were taken away, he should restore them; and if ours did any harm to any of his, we would do the like to them; that if any unjustly warred against him, we would aid him, and if any warred against us he should aid us; that he should certify his neighbor confederates of this, that they might not wrong us, but be comprised in the conditions of peace; that, when their men came to us, they should leave their bows and arrows behind them, as we should leave our pieces, when we came to them; that in doing thus king James would esteem him as his friend and ally." After the treaty, the governor conducted Massasoit to the brook, where they embraced each other and parted.

The next day, March 23, a few laws were enacted, and Mr. Carver was confirmed as governor for the following year. In the beginning of April, twenty acres of land were prepared for the reception of Indian corn, and Samoset and Squanto taught the emigrants how to plant, and dress it with herrings, of which an immense quantity came into the brooks. Six acres were sowed with barley and peas. While they were engaged in this labor in April, the governor came out of the field at noon, complaining of a pain in his head, caused by the heat of the sun. In a few hours it deprived him of his senses, and in a few days put an end to his life, to the great grief of the infant plantation. He was buried with all the honors which could be paid to his memory. The men were under arms, and fired several volleys over his grave. His feeble wife, Catherine, overcome by her loss, survived him but six weeks. In one of his letters to Gov. C., Robinson says, concerning her, "Your good wife, my loving sister." Whether he meant only a Christian sister is not known. When he arrived, there were eight persons in his family; but he left no son nor daughter; and consequently there are no descendants. The Mr. C., who died in Mansfield, aged 102, might have been the grandson of a brother.

Governor Carver was distinguished for his prudence, integrity, and firmness. He had a good estate in England, which he spent in the emigration to Holland and America. He exerted himself to promote the interests of the colony; he bore a large share of its sufferings; and the people confided in him as their friend and father. Piety, humility, and benevolence were eminent traits in his character. In the time of the general sickness which befell the colony, after he had himself recovered, he was assiduous in attending the sick and performing the most humiliating services for them, without any distinction of persons or characters. He was succeeded in the office of governor by Mr. Bradford. The broadsword of Gov. Carver is deposited in the cabinet of the Massachusetts historical society in Boston. A town in the county of Plymouth is named Carver. Other pilgrim fathers have been thus honored, as Bradford and Brewster. — Belknap's American Biog. II. 179-216; Prince, 66-104; Holmes, I. 161, 168; Purchas, v. 1843-1850; *Univ. CARVER, JONATHAN, an enterprising traveller, died in 1780, aged 48. He was a native of Connecticut and was born in 1732. He lost his father, who was a justice of the peace, when he was only five years of age. He was intended for the profession of medicine, which he quitted for a military life. In the French war he commanded an independent company of provincials in the expedition, carried on across the lakes against Canada. He served with reputation till the peace of 1763. After this he formed the resolution of exploring the most interior parts of North America and of even penetrating to the Pacific ocean, over that broad part of the continent which lies between the forty-third and the forty-sixth degrees of north latitude. As the English had come in possession of a vast territory by the conquest of Canada, he wished to render this acquisition profitable to his country, while he gratified his taste for adventures. He believed, that the French had intentionally kept other nations ignorant of the interior parts of North America. He hoped to facilitate the discovery of a northwest passage, or of a communication between Hudson's bay and the Pacific ocean. If he could effect the establishment of a post on the straits of Annian, he supposed he should thus open a channel for conveying intelligence to China and the English settlements in the East Indies with greater expedition than by a tedious voyage by the cape of Good Hope, or the straits of Magellan.

With these views he set out from Boston in 1766, and in September of that year arrived at Michillimackinac, the most interior English post. He applied to the governor, Mr. Rogers, to furnish him with a proper assortment of goods, as a present for the Indians living on the track which he intended to pursue. Receiving a supply in part, it was promised, that the remainder should be sent to him, when he reached the falls of St. Anthony in the river Mississippi. In consequence of the failure of the goods he found it necessary to return to la Prairie du Chien in the spring of 1767, having spent the preceding winter among the Naudoussee of the plains, on the river St. Pierre, fourteen hundred miles west of Michillimackinac. Being thus retarded in his progress westward, he determined to direct his course northward, that, by finding a communication between the Mississippi and lake Superior, he might meet the traders at the grand portage on the north-west side of the lake. Of them he intended to purchase the goods which he needed, and then to pursue his journey by the way of the lakes la Pluye, Dubois, and Ouinipique to the heads of the river of the west. He reached lake Superior, before the traders had returned to Michillimackinac, but they could not furnish him with goods. Thus disappointed a second time, he continued some months on the north and east borders of lake Superior, exploring the bays and rivers, which empty themselves into that large body of water, and carefully observing the natural productions of the country, and the customs and manners of the inhabitants. He arrived at Boston in Oct., 1768, having been absent on this expedition two years and five months, and during that time travelled near seven thousand miles.

As soon as he had properly digested his journal and charts, he went to England to publish them. On his arrival he presented a petition to his majesty in council, for a reimbursement of the sums which he had expended in the service of government. This was referred to the lords commissioners of trade and plantations, by whom he was examined in regard to his discoveries. Having obtained permission to publish his papers, he disposed of them to a bookseller. When they were almost ready for the press, an order was issued from the council board, requiring him to deliver into the plantation office all his charts and journals, with every paper relating to the discoveries which he had made. In order to obey this command he was obliged to repurchase them from the bookseller. It was not until ten years after, that he published an account of his travels. Being disappointed in his hopes of preferment, he became clerk of the lottery. As he sold his name to a historical compilation, which was published in 1779, in folio, entitled the New Universal Traveller, containing an account of all the empires, kingdoms, and States in the known world, he was abandoned by those whose duty it was to support him, and he died in want of the common necessaries of life. His wife lived at Montague in 1767. He published a tract on the culture of tobacco, and travels through the interior parts of North America in the years 1766, 1767, and 1768, London, 8vo. 1778. An edition of this work was published at Boston in 1797. — Introduction to his Travels; New and General Biographical Dictionary; Watkins.

CARY, THOMAS, minister in Newburyport, Mass., died Nov. 24, 1808, aged 63. He was the son of Samuel Cary, of Charlestown, and was born Oct. 18, 1645, and graduated at Harvard college in 1761. While preparing for the sacred office, he resided in Haverhill, where he enjoyed the instructions of Mr. Barnard, whom he respected and loved. He was ordained as successor of Mr. Lowell, pastor of the first church in Newburyport, May 11, 1768. One third of the church and congregation, being dissatisfied with the choice of Mr. Cary, were formed into a separate society. For nearly twenty years he was enabled to perform all the duties of the ministerial office; but in the forty-third year of his age it pleased God, by a paralytic stroke, to remove him from his public labors. After this event Mr. Andrews was ordained as his colleague, Dec. 10, 1788. From this period until about two years before his death, Mr. Cary was so far restored to health, as to be able occasionally to perform the public offices of religion. He possessed a strong and comprehensive mind, which was highly cultivated by reading, observation, reflection, and prayer. His sermons were plain, forcible, sententious, and altogether practical. He was not ashamed to be called a rational Christian. Though he read writers on all sides of theological questions, yet those were his favorite authors, who treated the doctrines and duties of Christianity in a rational manner. Candid toward those who differed from him in opinion, he sincerely respected the free and honest inquirer after truth. His feelings were keen and his passions strong; but it was the great business of his life, and the subject of his earnest prayers, to reduce them to the government of reason and the gospel. In the various relations of life he conciliated respect and esteem. To his brethren in the ministry he was a generous friend, a wise counsellor, and a most pleasant and improving associate. He excelled in the charms of conversation. He was held in very high esteem for his public labors, for sound and fervent devotion, for judicious, impressive, pathetic, and edifying discourses. Between him and his people there subsisted an uncommon harmony and affection. During his long debility the religion which he preached was his support and solace. In the leisure which was now afforded him, he took a peculiar interest in attending to the ecclesiastical history of his country; and the fruits of his studies were conspicuous in his conversation. As his disorder increased upon him, he sunk into a state of insensibility, and without a struggle his spirit returned to God, who gave it. He published two sermons on the importance of salvation; a sermon from Matthew XII. 20; at the funeral of S. Webster, 1796; the right hand of fellowship at the ordination of J. Beattie; the charge at the ordination of A. Moore; a sermon on the last day of assembling in the old meeting-house, Sept. 27, 1801. — Andrews' Funeral Sermon; Panoplist, Dec. 1808.

CARY, SAMUEL, minister in Boston, the son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1804, and was settled as the colleague of Dr. Freeman at the stone chapel, Jan. 1, 1809. He died in England Oct. 22, 1815, aged 30. He published a review of English's "Grounds of Christianity examined," 1813; also the following sermons: before Merrimac humane society, 1806; at his ordination, 1809; on the fast, 1813; at Thursday lecture, 1814; on death of S. Bulfinch, 1815.

CARY, LOTT, an African minister, died Nov. 10, 1828. He was born a slave about thirty miles below Richmond, Va., on the estate of Wm. A. Christian. In 1804 he was hired out in Richmond as a common laborer. He was profane and much addicted to intoxication. But about the year 1807 it pleased God to bring him to repentance, and he became a member of the Baptist church, of which his father was a pious member. As yet he was not able to read. But having a strong desire to read the third chapter of John, on which he had heard a sermon, he procured a New Testament, and commenced learning his letters in that chapter. He learned to read and write. Being employed in a tobacco warehouse, and for his singularly faithful and useful services receiving a liberal reward, and being also assisted by a subscription, he was able, soon after the death of his first wife in 1813, to ransom himself and two children for 850 dollars. He soon became a preacher, and was employed every Sabbath among the colored people on plantations near Richmond. His desire to promote the cause of religion in Africa induced him to accompany the first band of emigrants to Africa, sent out by the colonization society in 1821. He made sacrifices for this object, for in 1820 he received a salary for his services in Richmond of 800 dollars; and this would have been continued to him. It was probably his resolution, that at an early period prevented the abandonment of the colony of Montserado. In the battles of Nov. and Dec., 1822, he bravely participated. He said: "There never has been a minute, no, not when the balls were flying around my head, when I could wish myself again in America." He was health officer and general inspector. During the prevalence of the disease of the climate he acted as a physician, the only one at the time, having obtained some medical information from Dr. Ayres, and made liberal sacrifices of his property for the poor, the sick, and afflicted. In March, 1824, he had one hundred patients. About 1815 he had assisted in forming in Richmond an African missionary society. In Africa he did not forget its objects, but most solicitously sought access to the native tribes, that he might instruct them in the Christian religion. Through his agency a school was established about seventy miles from Monrovia. Before he sailed for Africa a church was formed at Richmond of eight or nine persons, of which he became the pastor. In Sept., 1826, he was elected vice-agent of the colony. Mr. Ashmun, who had perfect confidence in his integrity, good sense, public spirit, decision, and courage, cheerfully committed the affairs of the colony to his hands, when ill health compelled him to withdraw. For six months he was the able and faithful chief of Liberia.

The following were the melancholy circumstances of his death: The natives robbed a neighboring factory of the colony, and, refusing redress, Mr. Cary called out the militia to enforce his claim or to prevent such encroachments. In the evening of Nov. 8, 1828, he and others were engaged in making cartridges in the old agency house, a candle was upset, which set the powder on fire. This explosion caused the death of Mr. Cary and seven others, though he survived till the 10th. Perhaps Mr. C. did wrong, when he was so ready to light up the torch of war. In resolute self-defence against unprovoked attack, the heroism of 1822 is to be commended; but the resolution to march an army against the natives, because they had plundered a small factory, was a purpose of questionable wisdom and propriety. The accomplishment of the purpose might have issued in the destruction of the colony. It needed the calm of peace, that its roots might strike deep and its branches spread out wide on the African coasts. Besides, the spirit of war is in every respect hostile to the religion of Christ, which, it is hoped, the Liberian colony will recommend to all the natives, with whom they have intercourse. If this last act was an error of judgment on the part of Mr. Cary, yet will he deserve a perpetual remembrance in the colony, whose foundation he assisted in laying.

"Thy meed shall be a nation's love!
Thy praise the freeman's song!
And in thy star-wreathed home above
Thou mayst the theme prolong;
For hymns of praise from Afric's plains
Shall mingle with seraphic strains."

Some of the letters of Mr. Cary are published in the African Repository for Sept., 1828. — African Repos. I. 233; IV. 162, 209; V. 10, 64.

CARY, J. ADDISON, died in Columbus in 1852, aged 39, principal of the deaf and dumb asylum.

CARY, JOHN, a colored man, died at Washington June 2, 1843, aged 113 years. He was born in Virginia in Aug., 1729, and was Washington's servant at Braddock's defeat, and also during the war of the Revolution. He lived for the last twenty-eight years in Washington, where he was a member of the first Baptist church.

CASAS, BARTHOLOMEW LAS, bishop of Chiapa, died in 1566 at the age of 92. He was born at Seville in 1474, and was of French extraction. His father, Antonio, who went to Hispaniola with Columbus in 1493, and returned rich to Seville in 1498, made him a present of an Indian slave, while he was pursuing his studies at Salamanca. All the slaves being sent back to their country by the command of Isabella, Las Casas became deeply interested in their favor. In 1502 he accompanied Ovando to Hispaniola, and, witnessing the cruel treatment experienced by the natives, he devoted his whole subsequent life, a period of more than sixty years, to the vindication of their cause and the melioration of their sufferings. As a missionary he traversed the wilderness of the new world. As the champion of the natives he made voyages to the court of Spain, and vindicated their cause with his lips and his pen. He was made bishop of Chiapa in 1544, and returned to Spain in 1551. After a life of apostolic intrepidity and zeal he died, and was buried at Madrid at the church of the Dominican convent of Atocha, of which fraternity he was a member. He has been justly reproached for lending his encouragement to the slavery of the Africans in 1517. The traffic existed before that period; in 1511 Ferdinand had ordered many Africans to be transported from Guinea to Hispaniola, since one negro could perform the work of four Indians. It was to spare the Indians, undoubtedly, that Las Casas recommended to Cardinal Ximenes the introduction of negro slaves, the number being limited to four thousand. In this he trespassed on the grand rule, never to do evil for the sake of supposed good. He published "a brief relation of the destruction of the Indians," about 1542. There was published at London, in 1656, Tears of the Indians, being a translation from Las Casas. A French version of his Voyages of the Spaniards appeared in 1697. J. A. Llorente has published a memoir of Las Casas, prefixed to the collection of his works. The most important work of Las Casas is a general history of the Indies, from their discovery in 1520, in 3 vols., in manuscript. It was commenced in 1527 at fifty-three years of age, and finished in 1559, at eighty-five. This work, which was consulted by Herrera and Mr. Irving, exists only in manuscript, the publication of it never having been permitted in Spain, on account of its too faithful delineation of Spanish cruelty. — Irving's Columbus, iv.

CASE, MARY, died at Chatham, N. Y., in 1852. She was the daughter of Cornelius C., a Quaker. She had extraordinary talents and a poetic mind. She wrote for several periodicals. Mr. Woodbridge, in his autobiography, has delineated her character and published several of her letters.

CASS, JONATHAN, major, a soldier of the Revolution, died in August, 1830, aged 77. He was born in Salisbury, Mass., and was a descendant of Joseph Cass, who lived in Exeter in 1680. He removed to New Hampshire in early life. He was living at Exeter at the period of the battle of Lexington, and entered the army the day after as a private soldier. He served during the whole Revolution, and attained the rank of captain. He was in the battles of Bunker Hill, of Saratoga, of Trenton, of Brandywine, of Monmouth, of Germantown, and was engaged in the most active and trying scenes of the Revolutionary struggle. In the memorable winter when the British occupied Philadelphia, he held a command upon the lines, under Col. Allen McLane, of Delaware, and fully participated in all the dangers and sufferings of that critical period. He was also with Sullivan in his Indian expedition. At the termination of the war, he established himself at Exeter, where he married and resided, till his appointment in 1790 as captain in the army then organizing for the defence of the western frontier. He joined the army, and continued to serve with it till 1800, when he resigned, having the rank of major, and settled upon the bank of the Muskingum, in Ohio, about fifteen miles from Zanesville. Here he resided till his death. He was a man of strong natural powers, and of great purity of purpose; one of that band of patriots who were born for the times in which they lived. He met death in his chamber, as he had faced it in the field, and observed upon its approach, "this, then, is death." He died with the faith of a Christian, and with those hopes and assurances which Christianity only can impart. Lewis Cass is his son.

Espana, 1692. His True history of Mexico was republished in Salem, 2 vols. 1803.

CASTLE, ANGELINA, wife of S. N. Castle, missionary at Honolulu, died in Feb., 1841, aged 30. She was the daughter of Levi Tenney, of Plainfield, N. Y., and entered upon her missionary labors in 1836. She said on her sick bed, "Tell my parents I do not regret having devoted myself to the missionary work."

CASTIN, SAINT, a French baron, was a captain in the regiment of Carignan, which was sent from Hungary to Canada in 1665. He lived at Penobscot, at what is now the town of Castine, in 1687. The next year his trading-house was pillaged by the English in his absence. He married one of the Abénaquis Indians. In 1696 he led two hundred savages, which Charlevoix calls Canibas and Malecites, against Pemaquid, associated with Iberville, the French commander, and was successful in the capture of the fort. Capt. Chubb, who had fifteen cannon and ninety men, did not make a brave defence. In 1706 Castin assisted in the defence of Port Royal, and again 1707, when he was wounded. His son, the baron de St. Castin, who succeeded him in the command of the Penobscot Indians, was taken by surprise in Dec. 1721, and carried a prisoner to Boston, but soon released. His last days were spent in France, where he had an estate. — Charlevoix; Hutchinson; Hist. Coll.

CASTNER, JACOB R., minister of Mansfield, N. J., died March 19, 1848, aged 62 years. A graduate of Princeton, he was ordained at German Valley in 1813, but soon removed to M. He was a man of influence and usefulness. In one year, 1836, eighty persons were added to his church. He was meek and humble, yet bold and resolute for the truth and the right.

CASWELL, RICHARD, governor of North Carolina, died at Fayetteville Nov. 20, 1789. He received an education suitable for the bar, and was distinguished as a friend to the rights of mankind. Whenever oppressed indigence called for his professional assistance, he afforded it without the hope of any other reward than the consciousness of having exerted himself to promote the happiness of a fellow man. Warmly attached to the liberties of his country, he was appointed a member of the first congress in 1774, and he early took arms in resistance to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. He was at the head of a regiment in 1776, when it became necessary to oppose a body of loyalists, composed of a number of the ignorant and disorderly inhabitants of the frontiers styling themselves regulators, and of emigrants from the highlands of Scotland. This party of about fifteen hundred men was collected in the middle of Feb., under Gen. M'Donald. He was pursued by Gen. Moore, and on the 27th he found himself under the necessity of engaging Col. Caswell, who was intrenched with about one thousand minute-men and militia directly in his front, at a place called Moore's creek bridge. This was about sixteen miles distant from Wilmington, where M'Donald hoped to join Gen. Clinton. But he was defeated and taken prisoner by Caswell, with the loss of seventy men killed and wounded, and fifteen hundred excellent rifles. This victory was of eminent service to the American cause in North Carolina. Col. Caswell was president of the convention which formed the constitution of North Carolina in Dec., 1776, under which constitution he was governor from 1777 to the year 1780, and from 1785 to 1787. At the time of his death he was president of the senate, and for a number of years he had held the commission of major-general. In his character the public and domestic virtues were united. Ever honored with some marks of the approbation of his fellow citizens, he watched with unremitting attention over the welfare of the community, and anxiously endeavored also to promote the felicity of its members in their separate interests. While the complacency of his disposition and his equal temper peculiarly endeared him to his friends, they commanded respect even from his enemies. Of the society of freemasons he had been grand master. — Martin's Funeral Oration; Gaz. of the U. S. i. 307, 340; Marshall, i. 380; Gordon, ii. 209; Ramsay, i. 254.

CATESBY, MARK, F. R. S., an eminent naturalist, died in London, Dec. 24, 1749, aged 70. He was born in England in 1679. Having an early and a strong propensity to the study of nature, he determined to gratify his taste by exploring a part of the new world. As some of his relations lived in Virginia, he was induced first to visit that province, where he arrived April 23, 1712. Here he remained seven years, observing and admiring the various productions of the country, and occasionally sending dried specimens of plants to his correspondents in Great Britain, and particularly to Dr. Sherard. His collections, however, as yet had no reference to the work, which he afterwards published. On his return to England in 1719, he was encouraged by the assistance of several of the nobility, and of some distinguished naturalists, to revisit America with the professed design of describing, delineating, and painting the most curious objects of nature. He arrived at South Carolina, which was selected as the place of his residence, May 23, 1722; and, having first examined the lower parts of the country in occasional excursions from Charleston, he afterwards went into the interior and resided for some time at fort Moore upon Savannah river, three hundred miles from the sea. From this place he made several visits to the Indians, who lived still higher up the river in the more mountainous regions; and he also extended his researches through Georgia and Florida. In his travels he generally engaged one of the savages to be his companion, who carried for him his box, containing conveniences for painting, and the specimens of plants which he collected. Having spent near three years upon the continent, he visited the Bahama Islands at the invitation of the governor, and, residing in the isle of Providence, prosecuted his plan, and made various collections of fishes and submarine productions.

Returning to England in 1726, he was well received by his patrons; but the great expense of procuring engravings induced him to learn from Joseph Goupy the art of etching. He then retired to Hoxton, where he devoted his time to the completion of his great work, which he published in numbers of twenty plants each. The figures were etched by himself from his own paintings, and the colored copies were done under his own inspection. Although his attention was principally devoted to plants, yet most of his plates exhibit some subject of the animal kingdom. The first number appeared in 1730, and the first volume, consisting of one hundred plates, was finished in 1732; the second in 1743; and the appendix of twenty plates in 1748. Of each number a regular account, written by Dr. Cromwell Mortimer, secretary of the royal society, was laid before the society, as it appeared, and printed in the philosophical transactions. The whole work is entitled, the natural history of Carolina, Florida, and the Bahama Islands, in French and English, containing the figures of birds, beasts, fishes, etc., colored after the life, and a map of the countries. It contains descriptions of many curious and important articles of food, medicine, domestic economy, and ornamental culture; and was one of the most splendid works of the kind, which had ever been published. The principal defect of the work is the want of a separate delineation of all the parts of the flower. For the Latin names, Mr. Catesby was indebted to Dr. Sherard. He did not live to see a second impression. He died leaving a widow and two children, whose dependence for support was entirely upon the profits of his work. He was esteemed by the most respectable members of the royal society, of which he was a fellow, for his modesty, ingenuity, and upright behavior. His name has been perpetuated by Dr. Gronovius, in the plant, called Catesbæa.

The second edition of Catesby's natural history was published in 1754, and the third, 1771, to which a Linnæan index was annexed. The colorings, however, of this edition are wretchedly executed; those which passed under the inspection of Catesby himself have most of life and beauty, though even these cannot vie with the splendid figures, which are now presented to the lovers of natural history. He was the author of a paper, printed in the forty-fourth volume of the philosophical transactions, on birds of passage; in which he proves, that they emigrate in search of proper food, from a variety of observations which he had an opportunity of making during his voyages across the Atlantic. In 1767 there was published under his name, hortus Americanus, a collection of eighty-five curious trees and shrubs from North America, adapted to the soil of Great Britain, colored, folio. — Preface to his Nat. Hist. ; Rees' Cycl. ; Miller, II. 365; Pulteney's Sketches of the Prog. of Botany in England, II. ch. 44.

CATHCART, JAMES LEANDER, died at Washington Oct. 6, 1843, aged 76.

CATHRALL, ISAAC, M. D., a physician in Philadelphia, studied in that city and in London, Edinburgh, and Paris, and returned home in 1793. During the prevalence of the yellow fever in that year, and in 1797, 1798, and 1799, he remained at his post, and even dissected those who died of the disease. In 1816 he was seized with a paralytic affection. He died of the apoplexy Feb. 22, 1819, aged 55. He was a judicious physician; a skillful anatomist and surgeon; a man of rigid morality and inflexible integrity; and truly estimable in the relations of a son, husband, and father. In his religious views he was a Quaker. He published remarks on the yellow fever, 1794; Buchan's domestic medicine, with notes, 1797; memoir on the analysis of the black vomit, showing that it might be safely tasted, 1800, in fifth volume of the transactions of the American philosophical society; and a pamphlet on the yellow fever, in conjunction with Dr. Currie, in 1802. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

CATLIN, JACOB, D. D., minister of New Marlborough, Mass., a native of Harwinton, Conn., was graduated at Yale college in 1784, and ordained July 3d or 4th, 1787. His predecessors were Thomas Strong, who was ordained in 1744, and died in 1777, and Caleb Alexander. After a ministry of nearly forty years, he died April 12, 1826, aged 68. Industry, patience, frankness, and meekness were his characteristics. He was a plain, faithful preacher. During his ministry about two hundred and fifty persons were added to the church. He published a compendium of the system of the divine truth, 12mo. 2d ed. 1825. — Hist. of Berkshire, 298.

CATON, RICHARD, died in Baltimore May 19, 1845, aged 83. A native of Lancashire, England, he married a daughter of Charles Carroll, and was the father of the Marchioness of Wellesley, the Duchess of Leeds, and Lady Stafford. He was a man of wealth, having large landed estates; and was a zealous Catholic.

CAZNEAU, MARGARET, Mrs., died in Wrentham, in April, 1769, aged 97, a Huguenot, born in Rochelle. Her daughter, Elizabeth, who married Col. John Boyle of Boston, died Oct. 22, 1846, aged 90.

CHABERT, M. DE, published Voyage dans l'Amerique Septent., 1750 et 1751, 4to. 1753.

CHALKLEY, THOMAS, died in 1741. He was a preacher among the Quakers of Pennsylvania; removed from England to that colony about the year 1701, and lived there upwards of forty years, excepting when the necessary affairs of trade, or his duties as a preacher, called him away. In 1705 he visited the Indians at Conestoga, near the river Susquehannah, in company with some of his brethren, to secure their friendship and impart to them religious instruction. He died at the Island of Tortola, while on a visit there for the purpose of promoting what he believed to be the truth. He was a man of many virtues, and was endeared to his acquaintance by the gentleness of his manners. The library of the Quakers in Philadelphia was commenced by him. His journal and a collection of his writings was published at Philadelphia, 1749, and New York, 1808. — Proud, I. 463.

CHALMERS, LIONEL, M. D., a physician of South Carolina, died in 1777, aged 62. He was born about the year 1715 at Cambleton in the west of Scotland, and came when very young to Carolina, where he practised physic more than forty years. He first practised in Christ church, but soon removed to Charleston. Affecting no mystery in his practice, he employed the knowledge, which he had acquired, for the good of mankind. He left behind him the character of a skilful, humane physician, and of a worthy, honest man. He wrote in 1754 useful remarks on opisthotonos and tetanus, which were published in the first volume of the medical society of London. His work on fevers was published at Charleston, 1767, in which he gave the outlines of the spasmodic theory, which had been taught by Hoffman, and which was afterwards more fully illustrated by Cullen. Besides several smaller productions he also published a valuable work on the weather and diseases of South Carolina, 2 vols. London, 1776. — Miller, I. 319; II. 364; Ramsay's Rev. of Med. 42, 44; List. of South Carolina, II. 112, 451.

CHALMERS, GEORGE, died in London in June, 1825, aged 82. In early life he practised law in Maryland. He published, with other works, political annals of the United Colonies, 4to. 1780; estimate of strength of Britain, 1782; opinions on subjects of law and policy, arising from American independence, 1784; opinions of lawyers on English jurisprudence, 2 vols. 1814; life of Mary, queen of Scots, 1822.

CHAMBERLAIN, LEVI, for twenty years the secular superintendent of the mission at the Sandwich Islands, died at Honolulu July 29, 1849, aged nearly 57. Born in Dover, Vt., he was trained as a merchant in Boston and acquired a good property; but his prosperous business he relinquished, in his zeal to aid the mission, with which he became connected in 1823. His various toils were incessant and most important, as he had judgment, caution, prudence, economy, and self-denial. Once in ill health he revisited Boston, making a voyage around the world. His end, peaceful and triumphant, is described in the Missionary Herald, Dec., 1849. His wife was Maria Patten of Pequea, Pa.

CHAMBERS, JOHN, chief justice of New York, was a member of the executive council in 1754, when he attended, as one of the commissioners, the congress at Albany June 14th. He was soon afterwards appointed judge, and died at New York April 10, 1765.

CHAMBERS, WILLIAM, a physician of New York, died in that city July 23, 1827. A short time before his death he acquired considerable celebrity by the invention of a medicine for the cure of intemperance. The effect was produced by the strong association of what is nauseous and insufferable with the taste of ardent spirits.

CHAMBERS, DAVID, colonel, died in Cranberry, N. J., Sept., 1842, aged 94, a soldier of the Revolution, highly respected through life.

CHAMBERS, JOHN, died at Newburgh Sept. 26, 1854, aged 77. He was an estimable citizen, president of the bank, and treasurer of the city. He loved the Bible, and the house of God, and lived in daily prayer; but he never ventured to come to the Lord's table. — N. Y. Observer, Oct. 12.

CHAMBERS, JOHN, governor of Iowa about 1841, died near Paris, Kentucky, Sept. 21, 1852, aged 73. Born in New Jersey, he emigrated to Kentucky. He was a lawyer and soldier, and a friend of Harrison. As superintendent of Indian affairs and governor of Iowa, he manifested great prudence and ability. At several times he was a member of congress.

CHAMBLY, DE, captain, gave his name to the fort in Canada, which he built of wood, in 1665, but which was afterwards constructed of stone, with four bastions. The fort of Sorel was built at the same time by Capt. De Sorel. Both Chambly and Sorel were officers in the regiment of Carignan-Salieres, which, after fighting in Hungary against the Turks, was sent to Canada in 1665 to fight against the Iroquois. Chambly owned the land in the neighborhood of the fort. About the year 1673 he was appointed as successor of Grandfontaine, to the command of the fort at Penobscot; but, Aug. 10, 1674, he was taken prisoner by an Englishman; and at the same period the fort at St. John's was also surprised. In 1680 he was nominated governor of Acadia; but in a short time was promoted to the government of Grenada. — Charlevoix, I. 381, 462.

CHAMPE, JOHN, sergeant-major of Lee's legion cavalry in the Revolutionary war, was born in Loudon county, Virginia. In 1776 he entered the army, at the age of 20. Immediately after the treason of Arnold, he was sent by Lee, at the request of Washington, as a spy to New York, for two purposes: to ascertain whether another American general was also a traitor, as has been suggested in some papers in the hands of Washington; and, if possible, to bring off Arnold to the American head-quarters, that he might be tried and punished, and thus Andre be saved. It was with a daring spirit of patriotism, that Champe undertook this enterprise. He feared not the danger; but the ignominy of desertion and of enlisting in the army of the enemy, he apprehended, would destroy his hope of promotion, should he live to return. He was assured, that his character should be protected at a proper time. At eleven o'clock the same night Champe took his cloak, valise, and orderly book, drew his horse from the picket, and fled, as a deserter, from the American camp near Tappan. In half an hour the desertion was reported to Lee, who made all the delay in his power, and then ordered a pursuit about twelve. At about day-break, a few miles north of the village of Bergen, the pursuing party beheld from the summit of a hill the deserter half a mile in front. Champe now put spurs to his horse, and the pursuit was hot; he passed through Bergen, to reach the British galleys a few miles west, at Elizabethtown point. Getting abreast of the galleys, having lashed his valise on his shoulders, with his drawn sword in his hand, he dismounted, and running through the marsh plunged into the river and called to the galleys for help. This was afforded, for a boat was sent to take him up. The horse was carried back to the camp. To Washington the success of Champe was very acceptable intelligence. Champe was taken to New York and examined by Sir Henry Clinton, and by him sent to Arnold, who offered him the place of sergeant-major in a legion he was raising. On the last day of Sept., he was appointed one of Arnold's recruiting sergeants. He enlisted, because that step was necessary, in order that he might gain access to the traitor. Two days afterwards Andre was tried, and, the intelligence from Champe not promising any immediate success in carrying off Arnold, the sentence was executed Oct. 3d. In a few days Champe sent ample evidence of the innocence of the accused general, who probably was Gates, so that Gen. Washington dismissed all his suspicions. Oct. 20, the general expressed his approbation of Champe's plan for taking Arnold, of whom he wished to "make a public example," and pledged himself to bestow the promised rewards on Champe and his associate. The plan was this:

to seize Arnold, when in his garden, whither he went at a late hour every night; to gag him; and to drag him between two men, as a drunken soldier, to a boat on the Hudson, and to deliver him to a party of horse on the Jersey shore. The night was fixed, and the intelligence communicated to Lee, who repaired to Hoboken with a party of dragoons and three led horses for Champe, his associate, and the prisoner; but after waiting in vain for hours near the river shore, he retired, as the day broke, and returned to the army with deep chagrin. It appeared, that on the eventful day Arnold removed his quarters, in order to superintend the embarkation of troops; and the American legion, to which Champe belonged, was transferred to the fleet of transports, and landed in Virginia. After the junction of Cornwallis with Arnold at Petersburg, Champe escaped and rejoined the American army in North Carolina. When his story was known, he secured the respect and love of every officer and soldier. Greene furnished him with a horse and money, and sent him to Washington, who granted him a discharge, lest, falling into the enemy's hands, he should die on a gibbet. When Washington was called by President Adams, in July 1798, to the command of the army then raised, he sent to Lieut.-Col. Lee to inquire for Champe, determined to place him at the head of a company of infantry; but he had removed to Kentucky, where he soon afterwards died. — Lee's Memoir's, II. 159–187.

CHAMPION, GEORGE, missionary to Africa, died at Santa Cruz Dec. 17, 1841. Born in Colchester, Conn., June 3, 1810, he graduated at Yale in 1831, at Andover 1834. He embarked for Cape Town in Dec., 1834, and commenced a mission among the Zulus. He returned in 1839 in consequence of the illness of his wife, Susan Larned of Webster, but was hoping to go again to Africa. He devoted his strength and his property, with which providence had liberally supplied him, to the African mission.

CHAMPLAIN, SAMUEL DE, the founder and Governor of Quebec, died in Dec., 1635. He was of a noble family of Brouage, in the province of Saintonge, in France. He commanded a vessel, in which he made a voyage to the East Indies about the year 1600, and acquired a high reputation as an able and experienced officer. After an absence of two years and a half he returned to France, at a time when it was resolved to prosecute the discoveries which had been commenced in Canada by Cartier. The Marquis de la Roche, and Chauvin, governors of Canada, had endeavored to establish a colony, and the latter was succeeded by De Chatte, who engaged Champlain in his service in 1603. Champlain sailed March 16, accompanied by Pontgravé, who had made many voyages to Tadoussac, at the entrance of the Saguenay into the St. Lawrence. After their arrival at this place, May 25th, he left his vessel, and in a light batteau ascended the St. Lawrence to the falls of St. Louis, which bounded the discoveries of Cartier in 1535. This was in the neighborhood of Hochelaga; but that Indian settlement was not now in existence. After making many inquiries of the natives, and exploring much of the country along the St. Lawrence, he sailed for France in August. On his arrival in Sept., he found that De Chatte was dead, and his commission as lieutenant-general of Canada given to the Sieur De Monts. This gentleman engaged him as his pilot in another voyage to the new world.

Champlain sailed on his second voyage March 7, 1604, and arrived at Acadie May 6. After being employed about a month in the long boat, visiting the coast in order to find a proper situation for a settlement, he pitched upon a small island about twenty leagues to the westward of St. John's river, and about half a league in circumference. To this island De Monts, after his arrival at the place, gave the name of St. Croix. It lies in the river of the same name, which divides the United States from the British province of New Brunswick. During the winter, Champlain was occupied in exploring the country, and he went as far as Cape Cod, where he gave the name of Malebarre to a point of land, on account of the imminent danger of running aground near it with his bark. In the next year he pursued his discoveries, though he did not pass more than ten or twelve leagues beyond Malebarre.

In 1607 he was sent out on another voyage to Tadoussac, accompanied by Pontgravé. In July, 1608, he laid the foundation of Quebec. He was a man who did not embarrass himself with commerce, and who felt no interest in the traffic with the Indians, which proved so profitable to many that were engaged in it. Being intrusted with the charge of establishing a permanent colony, he examined the most eligible places for settlement, and selected a spot upon the St. Lawrence, at the confluence of this river and the small river of St. Charles, about three hundred and twenty miles from the sea. The river in this place was very much contracted, and it was on this account that the natives called it Quebec. Here he arrived July 3. He erected barracks, cleared the ground, sowed wheat and rye, and laid the foundation of the capital of Canada. The toil of subduing the wilderness was not very acceptable to all his company, for some of them conspired to put their leader to death, and to embark at Tadoussac for France. The attempt to destroy him was to be made by poison and by a train of gunpowder; but, the apothecary having discovered the scheme, one of the conspirators was hanged, and others condemned to the galleys. During the winter his people were afflicted with the scurvy. Champlain sought after the medicine which had been so successfully used by Cartier; but the tree, which was called Ammedda, was not now to be found. From this circumstance it was concluded that the tribe of Indians with which Cartier was acquainted, had been exterminated by their enemies.

In the summer of the year 1609, when the Hurons, Algonquins, and others were about to march against their common enemy, the Iroquois, Champlain very readily joined them, for he had a keen taste for adventures, and he hoped by a conquest to impress all the Indian tribes with the power of the French, and to secure an alliance with them. He did not foresee, that he should force the Iroquois who lived in what is now the State of New York, to seek the protection of the English and Dutch. He embarked on the river Sorel, which was then called the Iroquois, because these savages usually descended by this stream into Canada. At the falls of Chambly he was stopped, and was obliged to send back his boat. Only two Frenchmen remained with him. He ascended with his allies in the Indian canoes to the lake, to which he gave his own name, which it retains at the present day. The savages, whom he accompanied, hoped to surprise the Iroquois in their villages, but they met them unexpectedly upon the lake. After gaining the land, it was agreed to defer the battle till the next day, as the night was now approaching. In the morning of July 30 Champlain placed a party with his two Frenchmen in a neighboring wood, so as to come upon the enemy in flank. The Iroquois, who were about two hundred in number, seeing but a handful of men, were sure of victory. But as soon as the battle began, Champlain killed two of their chiefs, who were conspicuous by their plumes, by the first discharge of his firelock, loaded with four balls. The report and execution of fire-arms filled the Iroquois with inexpressible consternation. They were quickly put to flight, and the victorious allies returned to Quebec with fifty scalps.

In Sept., 1609, Champlain embarked with Pontgravé for France, leaving the colony under the care of a brave man, named Peter Chavin. But he was soon sent out again to the new world. He sailed from Honfleur April 8, 1610, and arrived at Tadoussac on the 26th. He encouraged the Montagnez Indians, who lived at this place, to engage in a second expedition against the Iroquois. Accordingly, soon after his arrival at Quebec, they sent to him about sixty warriors. At the head of these and others of the allies he proceeded up the river Sorel. The enemy were soon met, and after a severe engagement, in which Champlain was wounded by an arrow, were entirely defeated. He arrived at Quebec from Montreal June 19, and landed at Rochelle Aug. 11. After the death of Henry IV. the interest of De Monts, in whose service Champlain had been engaged, was entirely ruined, and the latter was obliged to leave a settlement which he was commencing at Mont Royal, or Montreal, and to go again to France in 1611. Charles de Bourbon, being commissioned by the queen regent governor of New France, appointed Champlain his lieutenant, with very extensive powers. He returned to Canada in 1612, was engaged again in war with the Iroquois, and made new discoveries. His voyages across the Atlantic were frequent. He was continued lieutenant under the prince of Conde and Montmorenci. In 1615 his zeal for the spiritual interests of the Indians induced him to bring with him a number of Jesuit fathers, some of whom assisted him in his warfare. He penetrated to Lake Ontario, and, being wounded while assisting the Hurons against their enemies, was obliged to pass a whole winter among them. When he returned to Quebec in July, 1616, he was received as one risen from the dead. In July, 1629, he was obliged to capitulate to an English armament under Sir David Kertk, or Kirk. He was carried to France in an English ship; and there he found the public sentiment much divided with regard to Canada; some thinking it not worth regaining, as it had cost the government vast sums without bringing any returns, others deeming the fishery and fur trade great national objects, especially as a nursery for seamen. Champlain exerted himself to effect the recovery of this country, and Canada was restored by the treaty of St. Germain's in 1632, with Acadie and Cape Breton.

In 1633 the company of New France resumed all their rights, and appointed Champlain the governor. In a short time he was at the head of a new armament, furnished with a fresh recruit of Jesuits, inhabitants, and all kinds of necessaries for the welfare of the revived colony. His attention was now engrossed by the spiritual interests of the savages, whom it was his principal object to bring to the knowledge of the Christian religion. The number of ecclesiastical missionaries, exclusive of lay brothers, was now fifteen, the chief of whom were Le Jeune, De Noue, and Masse, and Brebeuf. A mission was established among the Hurons; the colony was gaining an accession of numbers and strength; and an attempt was just commencing to establish a college in Quebec, when the governor died, and was succeeded the next year by De Montmagny.

Champlain merited the title of the father of New France. Though he was credulous, he possessed an uncommon share of penetration. His views were upright, and in circumstances of difficulty no man could make a better choice of measures. He prosecuted his enterprises with constancy, and no dangers could shake his firmness. His zeal for the interests of his country was ardent and disinterested; his heart was tender and compassionate towards the unhappy; and he was more attentive to the concerns of his friends, than to his own. He was a faithful historian, a voyager who observed everything with attention, skilful in geometry, and an experienced seaman. He appears to have been fond of good cheer, for in the early period of his residence in Canada he established with his associates an order "de bon temps," which contributed not a little to the gratification of the palate. By this order every one of the same table was in his turn to be both steward and caterer for a day. He was careful by hunting to make a suitable provision, and at supper, when the cook had made everything ready, he marched at the head of the company with a napkin over his shoulder, having also the staff of office, and wearing the collar of his order, and was followed by his associates, each of whom bore a dish. At the close of the banquet he pledged his successor in a bumper of wine and resigned to him the collar and staff. It may not be easy to justify Champlain in taking an active part in the war against the Iroquois. It is even supposed by some, that his love of adventures led him to arouse the spirit of the Hurons and to excite them to war. His zeal for the propagation of religion among the savages was so great, that he used to say, "that the salvation of one soul was of more value than the conquest of an empire; and that kings ought not to think of extending their authority over idolatrous nations, except for the purpose of subjecting them to Jesus Christ."

He published an account of his first voyages in 1613, in 4to., and a continuation in 1620, in 8vo. He published an edition of these in 1632, in one volume, entitled, Les voyages de la Nouvelle France occidentale, diete Canada, 4to. This work comprises a history of New France from the first discoveries of Verazzani to the year 1631. There is added to it a treatise on navigation and the duty of a good mariner, and an abridgment of the Christian doctrine in Huron and French. — Champlain's Voyages; Charlevoix, Fastes Chronol., xxviii-xxx; i. 111, 141-198; Belknap's American Biography, i. 322-345; Universal History, xxxix. 410-426; Purchas, i. 933; v. 1605-1645; Harris's Voyages, i. 811-815; Holmes, i.; Chalmers, i. 586; Churchill, iii. 798-815.

CHAMPLIN, CHRISTOPHER, a senator of the United States, died at Newport, R. I., March 18, 1840, aged 74; a graduate of Harvard in 1786. He was in congress 1797-1801, and senator 1809-11.

June 17, 1790, aged 64. He was a native of Woodstock, Conn., and was graduated at Yale college, in 1745. There was with many, in the year 1748, an expectation of an Episcopal establishment in this country, when men of talents could indulge the hope of becoming dignitaries in the church. The bait of preferment was at this time offered to Dr. Stiles. Whether the circumstances of the times had an insensible influence over the mind of Mr. Chandler or not, it was in the year 1748, that he was proselyted to Episcopacy. He went to England in 1751, and took orders in the established church. On his return to this country he became rector of St. John's church at Elizabethtown, N. J., where he long maintained a high character both for erudition and talents. During the last ten years of his life he was afflicted with a disorder, which made trial of all his patience. But he was resigned to the will of God. His hope of final deliverance from sin, and from the evils connected with it, rested upon the incarnation and sufferings of the eternal Son of the Father. He was even cheerful under the heavy troubles which were laid upon him. He was a zealous friend of the Episcopal church, and he wrote much in favor of it. He was engaged in a controversy on the subject with Dr. Chauncey of Boston. He published an appeal to the public in behalf of the church of England in America, 1767; a defence of his appeal, 1769; a further defence of his appeal, 1771; a sermon, preached before the corporation for the relief of the widows and children of Episcopal clergymen, 1771; an examination of the critical commentary on Secker's letter to Walpole, concerning bishops in America, 1774. He also prepared for the press a life of Dr. Johnson; but the Revolution arrested its publication. It was printed at New York in the year 1805. — Miller, ii. 356; Beach's Funeral Sermon; Gen. Hist. of Conn., 158; Memoirs of T. Hollis, i. 435, 436.

CHANDLER, PETER, died in Mexico, N. Y., in 1848. He bequeathed 5,000 dollars to each of five societies, namely: the education, foreign mission, home mission, bible, and tract.

CHANDLER, JOHN, general, died while on a visit in New York, Sept., 1846, aged 75. His residence was Augusta, Me. He took part in the war of 1812, a friend of Dearborn. For some years he was the collector of Portland.

CHANDLER, ABIEL, died in Walpole, N. H., March 22, 1851, aged 73. A native of Concord, N. H., he graduated at Cambridge in 1806, and became a merchant in Boston. He bequeathed 50,000 dollars to Dartmouth college for a scientific school, and provided for the gratuitous instruction of worthy students. To the asylum for the insane in New Hampshire he bequeathed 1,600 dollars and the surplus of his estate. He was a widower without children.

CHANLER, ISAAC, a Baptist minister, was born in Bristol, England, in 1701, and came to South Carolina in 1733. He settled as pastor of a Baptist church on Ashley river in 1736, where he continued till his death, Nov. 30, 1749, aged 48. He was succeeded by Oliver Hart, who remained till 1780, when he removed to New Jersey. Mr. Chanler published a sermon on establishment in grace, preached at Charleston in 1740, by the desire of Mr. Whitefield, at the commencement of a course of lectures by ministers of different denominations; also, the doctrines of glorious grace unfolded, and practically improved; a treatise on original sin; and a sermon on the death of Rev. Wm. Tilly, 1744. — Miller, ii. 364; Buckus' Abridgment, 248; Benedict, ii. 126.

CHANNING, HENRY, died of apoplexy in N. Y., Aug. 27, 1840, aged 81, formerly a minister in New London, the uncle of Dr. W. E. Channing.

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY, D. D., minister in Boston, died in Bennington, Vt., Oct. 2, 1842, aged 62. He was born at Newport, R. I., April 7, 1780, and was the son of William Channing, an eminent lawyer. His mother was the daughter of William Ellery, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. After graduating at Harvard in 1798, he resided a year as a teacher in the family of David M. Randolph, of Richmond, Va. He was ordained the pastor of the church in Federal street, Boston, June 1, 1803, as the successor of Mr. Popkin. In 1822 he visited Europe. The winter of 1830 he spent in St. Croix. His colleague, Mr. Gannett, was settled in 1824. In 1840 he was released from his pastoral services. In 1842 he passed some weeks in Berkshire county, chiefly at Lenox. While on his journey, in his proposed return to Boston, he died at Bennington. One, who lived half a century ago in the neighborhood of Boston, must remember the amazing interest created by the two young, eloquent, and unequalled preachers, Buckminster and Channing; of whom the latter, not less scholarly, had less of polished oratory and display, and more of unction and heart-touching address, than the former. Both always attracted hearers, and were heard with deep interest. No ministers did more in promoting the Unitarian doctrines in this country. Mr. Buckminster soon died, and Mr. Channing was left as the acknowledged head of Unitarianism; and, as such, it is an inquiry of much interest, what were his prominent religious doctrines? In his last address, which was made at Lenox, were these words: "The doctrine of the Word made flesh shows us God uniting himself intimately with our nature, manifesting himself in a human form, for the very end of making us partakers of his own perfection." He says also, elsewhere: "In Jesus Christ our nature has been intimately united with the Divine." Was he, then, a Swedenborgian, who believed that God assumed a human form in Christ? Probably not, for in his other writings, he asserts explicitly that "Christ is one mind, one being,—distinct from the one God;" and that he was sent of God, and received all his powers from God. He also says: "We believe that God dwelt in him, manifested himself through him, taught men by him, and communicated to him his spirit without measure;" "so that when Christ came, God visited the world and dwelt with men more conspicuously, than at any former period." If he was not a Swedenborgian, was he a Socinian? In answer to this inquiry, let the following words be considered: "We say that he, who was sent into the world to save it, cannot be the living God, who sent him." "He is first of the Sons of God." "First of all the ministers of God's mercy and beneficence." "Who came into the world, not to claim supreme homage for himself," &c. "God sent his Son." Some may construe these words as meaning only, that Christ was miraculously born of the Virgin Mary; and it is remarkable that Dr. Channing, in his writings, nowhere speaks of the pre-existence of Christ, or of God's creating the world by him, or uses any expression which proves that he was not a Socinian. Therefore, some may be disposed to ask, if he believed in a doctrine of such vast importance as the pre-existence and glorious attributes of the Son of God, possessed by him before the creation, why did he not teach it clearly and unequivocally? Was he not then a Socinian, or one unsettled on the subject of Socinianism? As to his views on the great doctrine of an atoning sacrifice for sin, they seem obscure or adverse to any such doctrine. He is clear enough in denying the notion of an infinite atonement: "I see in it no impression of majesty, or wisdom, or love, nothing worthy of God; and, when I compare it with that nobler faith, which directs our eyes and hearts to God's essential mercy as our only hope, I am amazed, that any should ascribe to it superior efficacy as a religion for sinners, as a means of filling the soul with pious trust and love." He nowhere in his writings dwells upon Christ's propitiatory offering up of himself for the sins of the world; nowhere explains the relation of the Jewish sacrifices to Christ's sacrifice; nowhere alludes to Isaiah's prediction of his atoning death; nor to Paul's teaching of justification through faith in his blood, nor to the song of the heavenly host—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, and hath redeemed us to God by his blood." Instead of teaching, that God sent his Son from heaven to die on the cross to atone for sin, that "he might be just and the justifier of him who believeth," he seems to regard the death of Christ as having no relation to God's justice, or holy government, or God's universe of moral beings, but only as in some way influencing the character of the sinner; for in his last address he says, "Come, Friend and Saviour of the race, who didst shed thy blood upon the cross to reconcile man to man, and earth to heaven." His vehement assaults on Trinitarianism and Calvinism are chiefly contained in his sermons at the ordination of J. Sparks, 1819, and at the dedication of a Unitarian church in New York, in 1826. His monument at Mount Auburn was designed by his brother-in-law, Mr. Allston. He published a volume of his discourses, reviews, etc., in 1830. His works have been published in six volumes, and in several editions.

CHANNING, EDWARD T., LL. D., the brother of the preceding, died in Boston, Feb. 7, 1856, aged 65. He was appointed professor of rhetoric at Harvard college in 1819.

CHAPIN, SETH, deacon, an officer in the Revolutionary war, died at Mendon, Nov. 15, 1833, aged 79. His grandfather, Joshua, came from Lancashire with a brother Gershom, who settled at Springfield. From these have sprung many ministers.

CHAPIN, WALTER, minister of Woodstock, Vermont, died July 22, 1827, aged 48. He was an efficient friend of various benevolent societies. For several years he was the editor of a small religious paper, which was discontinued in 1824. He published a valuable compilation, the Missionary Gazetteer.

CHAPIN, JOEL, died in Bainbridge, N. Y., in 1845, aged 84. A soldier of the Revolution, then a graduate of Dartmouth in 1791, he settled as a minister in the wilderness on the Susquehanna, and was faithful as a preacher of the gospel.

CHAPIN, STEPHEN, D. D., died at Washington, Oct. 1, 1845, aged 67. He published two sermons at Mount Vernon, N. H., 1809; at an ordination, 1825.

CHAPIN, CALVIN, D. D., born in Springfield, died at Rocky Hill in Wethersfield, March 17, 1851, aged 87. He died in his chair. He often said of Christ: "I desire to see him as he is." He lived contented on a salary of 333 dollars, was a most faithful and excellent minister, a good scholar, a wise man of incessant industry, a good farmer, a good mechanic, a skilful bookbinder, of never-failing cheerfulness and good humor, enjoying great happiness even in his old age, never leaving his beloved home except at the call of public duty. Interesting recollections of him are in the Recorder of July 17, 1856, probably by Dr. Brace. His wife, whom he loved, Jerusha, daughter of Dr. Edwards, died Dec. 4, 1847, aged 71. Of his college class of 1788 only two are alive; one is Daniel Waldo, aged 94, now chaplain of congress. He was a founder and promoter of missionary and other important societies; for thirty-two years secretary of the American board. He published an extraordinary essay, recommending, — in his zeal for temperance, — the substitution of water for wine in the Lord's Supper. Probably his mistaken advice was never followed. He published sermons at the ordination of S. Whittlesey, 1807; of H. Beckley, 1808; on the death of President Dwight, 1817; of Dr. Marsh, 1821; on Christian morals. — N. Y. Observer, March 27, 1851.

CHAPLIN, EBENEZER, minister of Millbury, Mass., was ordained Nov. 14, 1764, and after about thirty years dismissed, and was succeeded by Mr. Goffe. He died at Hardwick, Dec. 13, 1822, aged 89. He published a sermon on the death of Mr. Webb, Uxbridge, 1772; discourse on political affairs, 1773; result of a council, 1793; a treatise on the sacraments, 12mo. 1802.

CHAPLIN, DANIEL, D. D., minister of Groton, Mass., was a descendant of Hugh Chaplin of Rowley, who came to this country as early as 1638. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1772, and died in May, 1831, aged 87. His son, Dr. James P. Chaplin, a very respectable and useful physician of Cambridgeport, died Oct. 12, 1828, aged 46. He published the character of Rev. Mr. Wright, 1802; convention sermon, 1808; before a charitable society, 1814; before another, 1815.

CHAPLIN, JEREMIAH, D. D., president of Waterville college, Maine, died in May, 1841. Born in Rowley, Jan. 2, 1776, a descendant of Hugh C., one of the first settlers, he graduated at Brown in 1799; preached as a Baptist minister in Danvers till 1818; was then President of Waterville college till 1833, when he resigned, preaching afterwards in Rowley, and in Hamilton, N. Y.

CHAPMAN, ASA, judge of the supreme court of Conn., was graduated at Yale college in 1792, and in a few years commenced the practice of the law at Newtown, rising to the first rank in his profession. In 1818 he was appointed to the bench of the supreme court, in which station he was upright and impartial, while he was profound and learned as a jurist. He died at New Haven Sept. 24, 1825, aged 54.

CHARDON, PETER, a Jesuit missionary, was employed for many years among the Indians upon lake Michigan. He began his labors as early as 1697, and continued them for twenty-five or thirty years. He presided over the mission at the village of Pouteautamis, upon the river St. Joseph, and he labored also among the Sakis at the southern extremity of Green Bay, or baye des Puans, as it was called by the French. He was acquainted with almost all the languages of the Indians, who lived on the lakes. — Charlevoix, III, 392, 295; Lettres édif. et Curieuses, XI. 372-378.

CHARLEVOIX, PETER FRANCIS XAVIER DE, a historical writer, who lived a number of years in Canada, died in 1761, aged 78. He was born at St. Quintin in France in 1684, and, entering into the society of Jesuits, taught the languages and philosophy with great reputation. Before the year 1720 he had resided some time in Quebec, and was connected, it is believed, with the college in that place. By order of the king he made a voyage to Canada in 1720, where he arrived in September. From Quebec he passed up the St. Lawrence, and through the lakes to Michillimackinac; thence down lake Michigan, and the Illinois and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans, from which place he returned, touching at St. Domingo, to France in 1722. During this period he collected facts for his history of Canada, and kept a journal, which he afterwards published, annexed to his history. After his arrival in his native country, he had a principal concern for twenty-four years in the journal des Trévoux. He published in French the history of Christianity in Japan, 8 vols. 1715, 8vo.; the life of Mary, 1624, 12mo.; the history of St. Domingo, 2 vols. 1731, 4to.; the history and general description of Japan, 2 vols. 1736, 4to., and 9 vols. 12mo., comprising all that is valuable in Kœmpfer's history of that country; a general history of New France, 3 vols. 1744, 4to., and 6 vols. 12mo.; and a history of Paraguay, 3 vols. 1756, 4to. His works were well received; but the history of New France, or Canada, is deemed peculiarly valuable, as he himself visited the country which he described, and paid particular attention to the manners and customs of the Indians. He has added something upon botany and other parts of natural history; but on these subjects a perfect confidence is not placed in his accuracy. His style is deficient in precision. — Now. Dict. Historique, edit. 1804; Aikin's and Nicholson's General Biography.

CHASE, SAMUEL, a judge of the supreme court of the United States, died June 19, 1811, aged 70. He was the son of Thomas Chase, an Episcopal minister, who came from England, and was born in Somerset county, Maryland. Under his father, who removed to Baltimore in 1743, he received his early education. He studied law at Annapolis and there settled in the practice, and "his talents, industry, intrepidity, imposing stature, sonorous voice, fluent and energetic elocution raised him to distinction." In the colonial legislature he vehemently resisted the stamp act. He was a delegate to the general congress at Philadelphia in Sept., 1774, and served in that body several years. It was he who denounced Mr. Zully, the delegate from Georgia, as a traitor, and compelled him to flee. By the congress he was early in 1776 sent with Franklin and Carroll on a mission to Canada, with the design of conciliating the good will of the inhabitants. When the proposition for independence was before congress, as he had been prohibited from voting for it by the convention of Maryland, he immediately traversed the province and summoned county meetings, which should address the convention. In this way that body was induced to vote for independence; and with this authority Mr. Chase returned again to congress in season to vote for the declaration. In 1783, being invited, at Baltimore, to attend a debating club of young men, the indication of talents by Wm. Pinckney, then clerk to an apothecary, induced him to patronize the young man, who afterwards rose to great eminence. In the same year he went to England as the agent of the State of Maryland, to reclaim a large amount of property, which had been intrusted to the bank of England. At a subsequent period the State recovered 650,000 dollars. In England he became acquainted with Pitt, Fox, and Burke. In 1786 he removed to Baltimore at the request of Col. Howard, who presented him with a square of ten lots of land, on which he built a house. In Annapolis he had been the recorder of the city, and performed his duties highly to the acceptance of his fellow-citizens. In 1788 he was appointed the presiding judge of a court for the county of Baltimore. In 1790 he was a member of the convention in Maryland for considering the constitution of the United States, which he did not deem sufficiently democratical. In 1791 he was appointed chief justice of the general court of Maryland. His characteristic firmness was manifested in 1794, when, on occasion of a riot and the tarring and feathering of some obnoxious persons, he caused two popular men to be arrested as ring-leaders. Refusing to give bail, he directed the sheriff to take them to prison; but the sheriff was apprehensive of resistance. "Call out the posse comitatus, then," exclaimed the judge. "Sir," said the sheriff, "no one will serve." "Summon me, then," cried the judge; "I will be the posse comitatus, and I will take them to jail." This occurred on Saturday. He demanded assistance from the governor and council. On Monday the security was given; but on that day the grand jury, instead of finding a bill against the offender, presented the judge himself for holding what they deemed two incompatible offices, those of judge in the criminal and general courts. But the judge calmly informed them that they touched upon topics beyond their province.

In 1796 he was appointed an associate judge of the supreme court of the United States, in which station he continued fifteen years. Yet in 1804, at the instigation of John Randolph, he was impeached by the house of representatives, accused of various misdemeanors in some political trials, as of Fries, Callender, &c. His trial before the senate ended in his acquittal March 5, 1805. On five of the eight charges a majority acquitted him; on the others a majority was against him, but not the required number of two-thirds. His health failed in 1811, and he clearly saw that he was approaching the grave. A short time before his death he partook of the sacrament, and declared himself to be in peace with all mankind. In his will he prohibited any mourning dress on his account, and requested a plain inscription on his tomb of only his name and the date of his birth and death. His widow, Hannah Kitty, died in Baltimore in 1848, aged 93. Judge Chase was a man of eminent talents and of great courage and firmness. But, unhappily, he was irascible and vehement. More of humility and more of mildness would have preserved him from much trouble. Yet was he a zealous patriot and a sincere and affectionate friend, and notwithstanding some of the imperfections of man, his name deserves to be held in honor. A report of his trial was published. — Goodrich's Lives; Encyc. Americana.

CHASE, HANNAH, widow of Stephen Chase, a Quaker, died in Unity, Me., June 21, 1845, aged 106 years. She was born in Swanzy. She left ten children, sixty-six grandchildren, one hundred and sixty great-grandchildren, and twelve of the fifth generation. At her funeral one hundred and fifty descendants were present; one hundred and thirty walked in the funeral train.

CHASE, DUDLEY, died in Randolph, Vt., in 1846, a graduate of Dartmouth in 1799. He was many years a senator of the United States. In 1817 he was chief justice of Vermont.

CHASE, PHILLANDER, D. D., bishop of Illinois, died at Peoria Sept. 20, 1852, aged 76. Born in Cornish, N. H., he graduated at Dartmouth in 1796, and was ordained in 1799, being rector at Poughkeepsie, New Orleans, and Hartford. He was bishop of Ohio twelve years, of Illinois seventeen years; and he also was president of Jubilee college. He previously, in 1827, laid the corner stone of Kenyon college and seminary in Ohio, of which he was president. He published Plea for the West, 1826; Star of Kenyon college, 1828; Defence of Kenyon college, 1831.

CHASE, HENRY, pastor of the Mariner's church, New York, died July 8, 1853, and was buried at Middletown. On the preceding Sabbath he preached from the text, "I would not live away."

CHASE, STEPHEN, professor, died at Hanover Jan. 7, 1851, aged 37. A graduate in 1832, he was chosen professor of mathematics in 1838.

CHASSE, PIERRE DE LA, a Jesuit missionary, in 1710 conducted to Quebec a party of Abénaquis Indians from Maine. Their presence was acceptable to Vaudreuil, the governor. For many years before this he had been a missionary. About 1720 he was superior-general of missions. In July, 1721, he wrote a letter to the governor of Massachusetts concerning the detention of some Indians as prisoners in Boston, threatening reprisals. After the death of Rale, La Chasse requested of the superior of the seminary, that prayers might be made for the repose of his soul; the old man replied, in the words of Augustin, that a martyr did not need prayers. With the characteristic policy of the Jesuits, he represented to the governor that some measures were requisite to attach the Indians in Maine to the French — that grace often needed the co-operation of men, and that temporal interest often served as the vehicle of faith. — Charlevoix, II.

CHASTELLUX, F. J. MARQUIS DE, was a member of the French academy, and field marshal of France. He served in America in the Revolutionary war. His travels in North America in 1780–1782 were published at Paris in 1786, and translated, in two vols, 1787. He published also a work on public happiness, and a translation of a poem by Humphreys.

CHAUMONOT, JOSEPH, a Jesuit missionary among the Indians of North America, was an Italian. He labored with indefatigable zeal for more than half a century among the natives of Canada. He was among the Hurons, who lived north of Lake Erie, as early as 1642, and in the following year spent some time with a tribe to the southeast, which was called the neutral nation, because they did not then engage in the war between the Iroquois and the Hurons. From the latter they derived their origin. In the year 1655, when he was the oldest missionary in New France, he visited the Onondagas at their request, and made a number of converts, some of whom were the principal men of the tribe. This mission, however, was soon abandoned, though it was afterwards resumed. About the year 1670 he established the mission of Loretto, three leagues northeast from Quebec, where he collected a number of Indians of the Huron tribe. The Hurons resided originally northward of lake Erie, and it was in consequence of the wars, in which they were engaged with other tribes, that they were induced to go down the St. Lawrence. The name of Hurons was given them on account of the manner in which they dressed their hair. As they cut it for the most part very short, and turned it up in a fantastical way, so as to give themselves a frightful appearance, the French cried out, when they first saw them, "quelles hures!" What wild boars' heads! They were afterwards called Hurons. Champlain calls them Ochasteguins; but their true name is Yendats, with the French pronunciation. Their descendants, the Wyandots, on the southwestern side of Lake Erie, were in 1809 under the care of Joseph Badger, a missionary from New England, who had been with them two or three years with the most flattering prospects of rescuing them from barbarism. Chaumonot composed a grammar of the Huron language. — Charlevoix, I.; Universal History; xxxix. 457; Lettres édif. Et cur. xxiii. 213–216.

CHAUNCEY, ISAAC, commodore, died at Washington June 27, 1840. He was one of the senior officers of the navy; president of the board of navy commissioners.

CHAUNCEY, CHARLES, LL. D., died at Burlington, N. J., Aug. 30, 1849, aged 73. A graduate of Yale in 1792, he was an eminent lawyer in Philadelphia. In his age he retired to B.

CHAUNCY, CHARLES, the second president of Harvard college, died Feb. 19, 1672, aged 81. He was born in Hertfordshire, England, in 1589, and was the son of Geo. Chauncy. He was at Westminster school, which adjoined to the parliament house, at the time of the gunpowder plot, and must have perished, if the scheme had been executed. After leaving Westminster, he was admitted a student of Trinity college, Cambridge, and attained the degree of bachelor of divinity. He was soon chosen professor of Hebrew; but the vice chancellor, Dr. Williams, wishing to bestow this office upon a kinsman, Mr. Chauncy was chosen professor of Greek. He went from the university an eminent preacher of the gospel. He was first settled in the ministry at Marstow, but afterwards became vicar of Ware in the beginning of 1627, in which place his success in the conversion and edification of souls was remarkably great. He had at this time serious objections to the discipline, and to some of the articles of the established church, and in about two years he began to suffer for his nonconformity to the inventions of man in the worship of God. In 1629 he was charged with asserting in a sermon, that idolatry was admitted into the church; that the preaching of the gospel would be suppressed; and that much atheism, popery, arminianism, and heresy had crept into the church; and, after being questioned in the high commission court, his cause was referred to Dr. William Laud, the bishop of London, his ordinary, who required him to make a submission in Latin. He was again brought before the same court in 1635, when Laud was archbishop of Canterbury. The crime, of which he was now accused, was opposing the making of a rail around the communion-table of his church, as an innovation and a snare to men's consciences. He was pronounced guilty of contempt of ecclesiastical government and of raising a schism, and was suspended from his ministry till he should make in open court a recantation, acknowledging his great offence, and protesting that he was persuaded in his conscience, that kneeling at the sacrament was lawful and commendable, and that the rail set up in the chancel, with the bench for kneeling, was a decent and convenient ornament, and promising never to oppose either that or any other laudable rite or ceremony prescribed in the church of England. He was sentenced to pay the costs of suit, which were great, and to imprisonment till he complied with the order of court. His fortitude failed him in the midst of his sufferings, and contrary to his conscience he made the recantation Feb. 11. For his weakness and folly he ever reproached himself. He soon repented of his submission, and before he came to New England made a solemn retraction, which was afterwards printed in London. In the preface of his last will he particularly laments, as "still fresh before him, his many sinful compliances with and conformity unto vile human inventions, will-worship, superstition, and patcheries stiteth into the service of the Lord, which the English mass book, the book of common prayer, and the ordination of priests, etc., are fully fraught withal." He proceeds to charge his posterity with the greatest warmth of zeal and solemnity of language, as they would answer for their conduct at the tribunal of Christ, "not to conform, as he had done, to rites and ceremonies in religious worship of man's devising and not of God's appointment." Being silenced for refusing to read the book of sports, he determined to seek the peaceable enjoyment of the rights of conscience in New England. He accordingly came to this country, and arrived at Plymouth a few days before the great earthquake of June 1, 1638. He continued in that town about three years, assisting Mr. Reyner in his public labors; but, being invited to take the pastoral charge of the church at Scituate, he was again ordained, and continued in that place about twelve years, faithfully performing the duties of the sacred office. The ecclesiastical state of England had now assumed a new appearance, and, as his maintenance at Scituate was so disproportionate to the necessities of his family that he was sometimes unable to procure bread, he resolved to accept the invitation, which he received from his people in Ware, to return to them. One cause of his difficulties was the opposing influence of Mr. Vassall, which issued in the establishment of the second church. At this period Mr. Chauncy's worldly wealth consisted of a house and about sixty acres of land. His predecessor at Scituate was John Lathrop. He went to Boston to embark for Great Britain, but the presidentship of Harvard college being at that time vacant by the resignation of Mr. Dunster, he was requested, Nov. 2, 1654, to accept that office. As he was of opinion that the baptism of infants and adults should be by immersion, and that the Lord's supper should be celebrated in the evening, the overseers of the college desired him to forbear disseminating his peculiar sentiments. He had no difficulty in yielding to their wishes. He was inducted into the office of president Nov. 27, 1654, and continued in this station till his death. He left behind him six sons, all of whom were graduated at Harvard college, and were preachers. They were, Isaac, a graduate of 1651, who was pastor of Berry Street church, London, and had for his assistant Dr. Watts in 1698, and by him was succeeded in 1701; Ichabod, a graduate of 1651, who was chaplain of a regiment at Dunkirk; Barnabas, a graduate of 1657; Nathaniel, a graduate of 1661, minister of Windsor, who removed to Hatfield 1672 and died Nov. 4, 1685; Elnathan, a graduate of 1661, a physician in Boston; and Israel. His daughter, Sarah, married G. Bulkley. All, who bear the name of Chauncy in America, are probably his descendants.

President Chauncy was a distinguished scholar, being intimately acquainted with the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages. He enjoyed an opportunity of perfecting his knowledge of the former by living one year in the same house with a Jew. He was well versed also in the sciences, especially in theology, which was his favorite study. To his other acquisitions he added some skill in physic, and thus he was enabled to prescribe for bodily diseases, as well as to cure those of the mind. He presided over the college with dignity and reputation, and some of the most eminent men in the country, as Increase Mather, Willard, Stoddard, and Judge Sewall, were educated under his care. To those students, who were destined for the ministry, he addressed these words: "When you are yourselves interested in the Lord Jesus Christ and his righteousness, you will be fit to teach others." When he attended prayers in the college hall in the morning, he usually expounded a chapter of the old testament, which was first read from the Hebrew by one of his pupils, and in the evening a chapter of the new testament, read from the Greek. On the mornings of the Lord's day, instead of an exposition, he preached a sermon of about three quarters of an hour in length. Once a fortnight in the forenoon his labors were enjoyed by the congregation of Cambridge. As a preacher he was animated and learned, yet remarkably plain, being mindful of the importance of accommodating himself to the understandings of all his hearers. In a letter to a brother in the ministry he advised him not to use any dark, Latin words, or any derived from Latin, lest he should not be understood; and enjoined it upon him to be much in prayer to God, as the surest way to success in his labors. The subjects, which he thought important to be preached, are the misery of the natural state of man, the necessity of union with Christ, and the fruits of justifying faith in love and good works. He believed that Jesus Christ, by suffering the full punishment due to the sins of the elect, made satisfaction to divine justice, and that faith justifies by receiving the righteousness of the Saviour, which is imputed to believers. He was exceedingly solicitous to exclude works from any share in the antecedent condition of justification; yet few insisted more upon their necessity in all the justified.

He was an indefatigable student, making it his constant practice to rise at four o'clock in the morning; but his studies did not interrupt his intercourse with heaven, for he usually devoted several hours in the course of the day to secret prayer. Immediately after he rose from bed, at eleven o'clock, at four in the afternoon, and at nine, he retired from the world to commune with the Father of mercies. He kept a diary, in which, under the heads of sins and mercies, he recorded his imperfections, and the blessings which were imparted to him. His temper was passionate, but he endeavored to subdue it; and, such was his conscientiousness and self-inspection, that, when his better resolutions were overcome by the warmth of his feelings, he would immediately retire to humble himself before God and to seek his mercy. He kept many days of fasting and prayer, sometimes alone, and sometimes with his family and a few of his pious neighbors. Such was his attention to those whose religious instruction was more peculiarly his duty, that, every morning and evening, after he had expounded a chapter of the Bible in his family, he would endeavor by suitable questions to impress the truths presented, upon the minds of his children and servants.

This venerable man, when he had travelled beyond the boundaries of fourscore, was yet able to preach and to superintend the concerns of the college. His friends at this period observed to him, as he was going to preach on a winter's day, that he would certainly die in the pulpit; but he pressed more vigorously through the snow-drift, replying, "How glad should I be if this should prove true!" He was induced, on account of the infirmities of age, to address to his friends a farewell oration on the day of commencement in 1671, after which he sent for his children and blessed them. He now waited for his departure. When he was stretched on the bed of death, and the flame of life was almost extinct, he was desired by Mr. Oakes to give a sign of his hope and assurance of future glory. The speechless old man accordingly lifted up his hands towards heaven, and his spirit soon rushed forth, and entered eternity.

He published a sermon on Amos ii. 11, preached in the college hall in 1655, entitled, God's mercy showed his people in giving them a faithful ministry, and schools of learning for the continuance thereof. In this sermon he speaks of the wearing of long hair, particularly by students and ministers, with the utmost detestation, and represents it as a heathenish practice, and as one of the crying sins of the land. In this sentiment he was supported by some of the most distinguished men of that day. He takes occasion at the same time to reprehend the criminal neglect of the people with regard to the suitable maintenance of ministers. He published also the election sermon, 1656; and a volume of twenty-six sermons on justification, 1659, 4to. He published in 1662 the Antisynodalia Americana, in opposition to the result of the Synod of 1662, which made a perilous innovation by admitting to baptism the children of those who did not partake of the Lord's supper. In his resistance he had the aid of Mr. Davenport and Increase Mather. On the other side were Mr. Allen of Dedham, who answered the Antisynodalia, Richard Mather, and Mr. Mitchell. President Chauncy's manuscripts fell into the hands of the widow of his son, Nathaniel Chauncy of Hatfield; and, as she married a Northampton deacon, who subsisted principally by making and selling pies, these learned and pious writings were not suffered to decay. Being put to the bottom of the pies, they rendered good service by shielding them from the scorching of the oven! By reason of this sad fate of his ancestor's manuscripts Dr. Chauncy resolved to burn his own; but he failed to do it. — Mather's Magnalia, III. 133–141; IV. 128; Coll. Hist. Soc. IV. 111.; X. 31, 171–180; s. s. IV. 246. Rushworth's Hist. Coll. II. 34, 316; Neal's N. E., I. 387–390; Hutchinson, I. 259; Holmes, I. 363, 364.

CHAUNCY, NATHANIEL, minister of Hatfield, died Nov. 4, 1686. He was the son of President Chauncy, a graduate of 1661. After being for some time the minister of Windsor, he removed to H. in 1672. His widow married Mr. Pomeroy of Northampton.

CHAUNCY, CHARLES, died June 13, 1695. A grandson of President C., he graduated in 1686, and was settled in 1695 at Poquannock, made up partly of Stratford and Fairfield, the society being called Stratfield.

CHAUNCY, Israel, minister of Stratford, Conn., the son of President Chauncy, was graduated at Harvard college in 1661, and ordained at Stratford in 1665. At his ordination, Elder Brinsmead, one of the lay brethren, assisted in imposing hands, and wore his mittens; on which account the Episcopals called the induction "the leather-mitten ordination." It is probable, that elders or ministers also imposed their hands on him, and that this was not, as in the case of Mr. Carter, a purely lay ordination. He died March 14, 1703, aged 58, leaving two sons, Charles and Isaac, whose posterity are in England.

CHAUNCY, ISAAC, minister of Hadley, Mass., son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1693, ordained Sept. 9, 1696, and died May 2, 1745, aged 74. His second wife was the widow of Rev. Joseph Metcalf of Falmouth, Mass. His daughter married Rev. Mr. Graham of Southbury, of whom Rev. Dr. Chauncy Lee was a grandson. Two other daughters married ministers, Estabrook and G. Rawson. His successor was C. Williams. He published a sermon on the death of John Williams of Deerfield, June 12, 1729, which displays very considerable learning and taste, uncommon for the time.

CHAUNCY, NATHANIEL, minister of Durham, Conn., died Feb. 10, 1787, aged 82, in the 60th year of his ministry. He was the son of Nathaniel Chauncy, minister of Windsor and Hatfield. He was in the first class at Yale college, all of whom were ministers, and graduated in 1702. He was ordained Feb. 7, 1711, and died Feb. 1, 1756. His successor was Elizur Goodrich. From 1746 to 1752 he was a trustee of the college. He published the election sermon in 1719, also in 1734. — Trumbull, I. 520.

CHAUNCY, CHARLES, D. D., minister in Boston, was born in that town Jan. 1, 1705, and was a descendant of President Chauncy. He was the son of Mr. Charles C., a merchant of Boston, who died about 1712. His father was the eldest son of Rev. Isaac Chauncy of London. Entering Harvard college at twelve years of age, he received his first degree in 1721. He was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Foxcroft, Oct. 25, 1727, and enjoyed for a few years the assistance of Dr. Clarke. He was eminent for his learning, and for the spirit of independence, which marked his inquiries. Being placed by Divine Providence in a situation which afforded him much leisure, he was diligent in his search after truth. He formed the resolution to see for himself, to understand, if possible, all the articles of his creed, and not to teach for the doctrines of Christ the commandments of men. The result of his inquiries in some instances did not correspond with the opinions embraced generally by his brethren in the ministry; but he adopted them after patient investigation, and he believed them himself to be founded on the Scriptures. His favorite authors were Tillotson and Baxter. Soon after Mr. Whitefield came to this country, when his preaching was attended with very remarkable effects, and many disorders accompanied the reformation produced, Dr. Chauncy stood forth in opposition to him. He could not easily admit, that any good could be done by an itinerant preacher, "who played the bishop in another man's parish," as he rendered I. Peter, IV. 12, "and who went out of his proper line of things." Believing that the welfare of the churches was endangered, he travelled several hundred miles to collect facts, and published in 1743 his seasonable thoughts on the state of religion in New England, in which he gives a faithful picture of the uncharitableness, enthusiasm, and confusion, which prevailed in different parts of the country. He attacked what was worthy of reprehension; but, like most men of strong passions, by dwelling constantly upon the picture which he was drawing, he almost forgot that different and more pleasant objects might be presented to the eye. Such men as Colman, Sewall, Prince, Cooper, Foxcroft, and Eliot, agreed with him in reprehending and opposing the extravagances which he had witnessed; but they had different views of the general religious state of the country, and thought it their duty to express "their full persuasion, that there had been a happy and remarkable revival of religion in many parts of the land through an uncommon Divine influence." Dr. Chauncy in his work endeavors to distinguish the nature of true religion. He represents the new creation as wrought in the minds of sinners by the Spirit of God in different ways; sometimes as accompanied by terror, and sometimes as exciting little agitation; but as always evincing itself by the fruits of holiness. As a remedy for the evils which he recorded, he enforces it upon his brethren as their most sacred duty, to discourage and oppose all itinerant preaching in places where ministers were settled. He recommends also a more strict examination of candidates for the ministry, and the revival of discipline in the churches. In regard to Mr. Whitefield, than whom there was never a more disinterested man, it was suggested, that vanity might have been the cause of his incessant travels in Great Britain and America, and that in soliciting subscriptions he might have had "a fellow feeling with the orphans in Georgia."

Dr. Chauncy was ardently attached to the civil and religious liberties of his country. After the death of Dr. Mayhew he followed in his steps in withstanding the schemes of Episcopalians. He published in 1767 remarks upon a sermon of the bishop of Landaff; in which pamphlet he expressed his fears, that the appointment of bishops of America, as was projected, would be followed by attempts to promote Episcopacy by force. He then adds, "It may be relied on, our people would not be easy if restrained in the exercise of that liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free; yea, they would hazard everything dear to them,—their estates, their very lives,—rather than suffer their necks to be put under that yoke of bondage, which was so sadly galling to their fathers, and occasioned their retreat into this distant land, that they might enjoy the freedom of men and Christians." A controversy on the subject with Dr. Chandler succeeded, and in his reply to him he observes, "it is with me past all doubt, that the religion of Jesus will never be restored to its primitive purity, simplicity, and glory, until religious establishments are so brought down, as to be no more." In 1771 he published his complete view of Episcopacy from the fathers, a work, which does him great honor, and which in the opinion of many has settled the controversy.

He was an honest patriot, and at the commencement of the Revolution he entered warmly into those measures which were considered necessary to vindicate our rights, and which were founded in justice and dictated by wisdom. During the war he was a most incurable whig. So firmly was he convinced of the justice of our cause, that he used to say, he had no doubt, if human exertions were ineffectual, that a host of angels would be sent to assist us. When a smile was excited, and some doubts were expressed respecting the possibility of such an ally, he persisted in his assertion, adding, that he knew it. His mind was indeed of a peculiar stamp. In conversation he was apt to be vehement and extravagant; a little opposition would easily kindle a flame; but in his writings he appears more calm and collected. He was respected for the excellence of his character, being honest and sincere in his intercourse with his fellow men, kind, and charitable, and pious. Dissimulation, which was of all things most foreign to his nature, was the object of his severest invective. His language was remarkably plain and pointed, when he spoke against fraud, either in public bodies or individuals. Paper money, tender acts, and every species of knavery met his severest reprehension, both in his public discourses and in private conversation. No company could restrain him from the honest expression of his sentiments. In the latter part of his life he appeared to those, who were near him, to be almost wholly engaged in devotional exercises.

Dr. Chauncy's publications are numerous. The following is a list of them: Funeral sermons from 1731 to 1769, on Sarah Byfield, Elizabeth Price, Nathaniel Byfield, Jonathan Williams, Lucy Waldo, Cornelius Thayer, Anna Foxcroft, Edward Gray, Dr. Mayhew, Mr. Foxcroft, and Dr. Sewall; sermons at the ordination of Thomas Frink, Joseph Bowman, Penuel Bowen, and Simeon Howard: a sermon before the artillery company, 1734; on religious compulsion, 1739; on the new creature; on an unbridled tongue; on the gifts of the Spirit to ministers, 1742; on the outpouring of the Holy Ghost; against enthusiasm; account of the French prophets in a letter to a friend, 1742; seasonable thoughts on the state of religion in New England, 8vo., 1743; a convention sermon, 1744; a thanksgiving sermon on the reduction of Cape Breton, 1745; a letter to George Whitefield; a second letter to the same; a sermon on the rebellion in favor of the pretender, 1746; election sermon, 1747; a sermon for encouraging industry, 1752; on murder, 1754; on the earthquake, 1755; an account of the Ohio defeat, 1755; a particular narrative of the defeat of the French army at lake George, 1755; sermon on the earthquakes in Spain, etc., 1756; the opinion of one, who has perused Clark's summer morning's conversation, 1758; a Duddleian lecture on the validity of Presbyterian ordination, 1762; twelve sermons on seasonable and important subjects, particularly referring to the Sandemanian doctrines, 8vo., 1765; a thanksgiving sermon on the repeal of the stamp act, 1766; on trust in God the duty of a people, etc.; on all things in common 1773; on the accursed thing, 1778; remarks on the bishop of Landaff's sermon, 1767; answer to Dr. Chandler's appeal, 1768; reply to Dr. Chandler's appeal defended, 1770; a complete view of Episcopacy from the fathers, 8vo., 1771; five sermons on the Lord's supper, 1772; a just representation of the sufferings and hardships of the town of Boston, 1774; the mystery hid from ages, or the salvation of all men, 8vo., 1784; this has been answered by Dr. Edwards; the benevolence of the Deity considered, 8vo., 1785; five dissertations on the fall and its consequences, 8vo., 1785; a sermon on the return of his society to their house of worship, after it had undergone repairs. — Clarke's Fun. Serm.; Miller, II. 368.

CHAUNCY, CHARLES, LL. D., a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, died at New Haven April 18, 1823, aged 75. He was a descendant of President Chauncy, and was born in Durham, Conn., June 11, 1747. Without the advantages of a public education he studied law with J. A. Hillhouse, and was admitted to the bar in 1768. In 1789 he was appointed judge; but in 1793 he resigned his seat on the bench, and retired from the business of the courts, though he afterwards gave lectures to a class of students at law. He was also delightfully employed in educating his children. His thirst for knowledge was unquenchable. In legal science his investigations were profound, and he was well skilled in various departments of literature, history, civil policy, and theology. Having thoroughly studied the evidences of Christianity, he obtained a settled conviction, that the Bible is the word of God. In searching the Scriptures he was led to embrace the tenets, in which most of the Protestant churches are agreed. He early made a profession of religion. As he advanced in years, he had serene anticipations of the future, commingled with grateful recollections of the past. His was not a querulous old age. With deep emotion, as he approached the grave, he reviewed and acknowledged the divine goodness to himself and his family, and then sunk to rest with the hope of awakening to the ineffable glories of heaven. — Christ. Spectator, v. 335, 336.

CHECKLEY, JOHN, Episcopal minister at Providence, died in 1753, aged 73. He was born in Boston in 1680. His parents came from England. In 1724, he was fined 50 pounds for publishing a libel; this was a reprint in 1723 of Leslie's "Short and easy method with the deists," with the addition written by himself, of a "Discourse concerning Episcopacy, in defence of Christianity and the church of England against the deists and dissenters, London, 1723." In this he rudely attacked the clergy and people of New England, with some unloyal allusions to the family on the throne. In 1727 he went to England for orders, intending to settle at Marblehead; but the Bishop of London refused to ordain him, in consequence of letters from Mr. Barnard and Mr. Holyoke, describing him as without a liberal education, a non-juror, and a bitter enemy to Christians of other persuasions. Bishop Gibson said, he would never ordain an uncatholic, unloyal man, so obnoxious to the people of New England. Afterwards the Bishop of Exeter ordained him and sent him to Narragansett. He went to Providence in 1739, and preached also once a month at Warwick and Attleborough. He was a wit, a classical scholar, skilful also in Hebrew and Narragansett Indian; but he was more remarkable for the eccentricities of his temper and conduct, than for piety and learning. He published choice dialogues about predestination, 1715; this was answered by Tho. Walter, who defended the Calvinistic doctrine; it was republished, "with an answer by a stripling," 1720. The modest proof of the order of the churches, 1727, which introduced the Episcopal controversy in Massachusetts, and which was answered by Wigglesworth and Martin Mar Prelate, is supposed to have been written by him. He published his speech upon his trial, etc., 2d. edit. 1728, and the same in London, 1738, probably to promote his views as to ordination. — List. Coll. VIII. 77; Eliot.

CHECKLEY, SAMUEL, minister in Boston, was graduated at Harvard college in 1715. He was ordained the first minister of the new south church in Summer street, Nov. 22, 1719, and died Dec. 1, 1769, in the fifty-first year of his ministry, aged 73. His colleague, Mr. Bowen, who was settled in 1766, survived him, but was dismissed in 1772. In the following year Mr. Howe was ordained his successor. Mr. Checkley's son, Samuel, was minister of the old north church from 1747 to 1768. In his preaching he was plain and evangelical. The great subject of his discourses was Jesus Christ, as a Divine person, and as the end of the law for righteousness to all that believe. He frequently dwelt upon the fall of man, the necessity of the influences of the Spirit of God, the freeness and richness of Divine grace, the necessity of regeneration, justification by faith, and faith as the gift of God. He was careful also to insist upon the importance of the Christian virtues. These he exhibited in his own life. Discountenancing all parade in religion, it gave him pleasure to encourage the humble and diffident. As he did not consider it of little importance what principles were embraced, he was tenacious of his sentiments. During his last sickness he enjoyed the supports of religion, and anticipated the blessedness of dwelling with his Saviour, and with his pious friends, who had been called before him into eternity. Renouncing his own righteousness, he trusted only in the merits of Christ. He published a sermon on the death of King George I., 1727; of Wm. Waldron, 1727; of Lydia Hutchinson, 1748; at the election, 1755. — Bowen's Funeral Sermon; Coll. Hist. Soc. III. 361.

CHEESBOROUGH, WILLIAM, died at Fleming, near Auburn, N. Y., in 1840, aged 95, a native of Stonington, Conn., a venerable Christian.

CHEESHAITEAUMUCK, CALEB, the only Indian who ever graduated at Harvard college, received his degree in 1665, and died at Charlestown in 1666, aged 20.

CHEETHAM, JAMES, editor of the American Citizen at New York, died Sept. 19, 1810, aged 37. He published a reply to Aristides, 1804; the life of Thomas Paine, 1809.

CHEEVER, EZEKIEL, an eminent instructor, died Aug. 21, 1708, aged 93. He was born in London Jan. 25, 1615, and came to this country in June, 1637, for the sake of the peaceable enjoyment of Christian worship in its purity. He was first employed as a schoolmaster at New Haven for twelve years; then at Ipswich, Mass., eleven years; and afterwards at Charlestown nine years. He removed to Boston Jan. 6, 1671, where he continued his labors during the remainder of his life. Most of the principal gentlemen in Boston had been his pupils, and took pleasure in acknowledging their obligations and honoring their old master. He was not only an excellent teacher, but a pious Christian. He constantly prayed with his pupils every day, and catechized them every week. He also took frequent occasions to address them upon religious subjects. Being well acquainted with divinity, he was an able defender of the faith and order of the gospel. In his old age his intellectual powers were very little impaired. The following extracts from an elegy upon him by Cotton Mather, one of his pupils, will show the esteem in which he was held, and may serve also as a specimen of the poetry of the age.

“ A mighty tribe of well-instructed youth
Tell what they owe to him, and tell with truth.
All the eight parts of speech, he taught to them,
They now employ to trumpet his esteem.
Magister pleased them well because 't was he;
They say that bonus did with it agree.
While they said amo, they the hint improve
Him for to make the object of their love.

No concord so inviolate they knew,
As to pay honors to their master due.
With interjections they break off at last,
But, ah is all they use, wo, and alas!”

He published an essay on the millennium, and a Latin accidence, which passed through twenty editions. — Mather's Funeral Sermon and Elegy; Hutchinson, II. 175; Hist. Coll. VIII. 66.

CHEEVER, SAMUEL, the first minister of Marblehead, died in 1724, aged 85. He was the son of the preceding, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1659. In Nov., 1668, he first visited the town, in which he was afterwards settled, when the people were few. He continued preaching with them sixteen years before his ordination. Higginson, Hubbard, and Hale assisted in ordaining him, Aug. 13, 1684. He received Mr. Barnard as his colleague in 1716. He possessed good abilities, and was a constant and zealous preacher, a man of peace and of a catholic mind. Never was he sick. For fifty years he was not taken off from his labors one Sabbath. When he died, the lamp of life fairly burned out. He felt no pain in his expiring moments. He published the election sermon, 1712. — Coll. Hist. Soc. VIII. 65, 66; X. 168.

CHEEVER, ABIAH, M. D., died at Saugus, April 21, 1843, aged 84; a graduate of 1779. He studied with Dr. Warren, served several years in the army and navy, then had extensive practice and high reputation in Boston. He was a man of integrity and honor, frank, and social.

CHEEVER, CHARLOTTE, Mrs., died at her son's, Rev. Henry T. C., at Greenport, L. I., Jan. 17, 1854, aged 76, formerly of Hallowell, mother of Rev. George B. C. of New York. She was an eminent Christian. — Observer, April 13.

CHENEY, SETH, a skillful artist, died at Manchester, Conn., Sept. 10, 1856, aged about 55. He had retired to M., where, with his brother John, the eminent engineer, he had built a studio, and proposed to devote himself to painting. His crayon drawings are chiefly portraits of the size of life, and of rare excellence. There are great dignity and beauty and purity in his ideal pieces. It is remarkable that he never would take the likeness of one, whom he did not respect. Were all artists of this character, they would find very little employment among a host of the great men of the earth.

CHENEY, MOSES, a Baptist minister, died in Sheffield, Vt., Aug. 9, 1856, aged 79. He was long known as an earnest and faithful preacher in Vermont and New Hampshire. He suffered long in sickness, but held an unshaken faith in the gospel.

CHERRY, CHARLOTTE, missionary, died at Chavagacherry, Ceylon, Nov. 4, 1837, aged 26. Her husband was Henry Cherry; her name, Charlotte H. Lathrop of Norwich.

CHESTER, LEONARD, the head of the Chester family in New England, died Dec. 11, 1648, aged 39. He was the son of John, of Leicester county, England, and of Dorothy Hooker, the sister of the famous Thomas Hooker. He was one of the first settlers of Wethersfield; but his eldest son, John, was born in Watertown in 1635.

CHESTER, JOHN, colonel, died at Wethersfield Sept. 11, 1771, aged 68, a soldier of the Revolution. His father and grandfather each bore the name of John; the preceding ancestor was Leonard. He had four sons and two daughters. His son Leonard married Sarah, daughter of Col. William Williams of Pittsfield, also Miss Welles, and had sons and daughters.

CHESTER, JOHN, colonel, an officer in the army of the Revolution, died Nov. 4, 1809, aged 60. He was graduated at Yale college in 1766. He was among the brave men who fought in the battle of Bunker Hill in 1775. In August, 1801, after the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency, he was removed from the office of supervisor of Connecticut. He lived at Wethersfield, the residence of his ancestors. His sons were Rev. John C. of Albany, Henry, a lawyer of Philadelphia, and William, a minister,—and his daughters married as follows: Elizabeth to Eleazer F. Backus of Albany, Mary to Ebenezer Welles of Brattleborough, Hannah to Charles Chauncey of Philadelphia, and Julia to Matthew C. Ralston of Philadelphia.

CHESTER, JOHN, D. D., died at Philadelphia Jan. 12, 1829, aged about 43. Son of the preceding, he graduated in 1804, and became the minister of the 2d Presbyterian church in Albany, in Nov., 1815. His wife was the daughter of Robert Ralston of Philadelphia. He was an earnest preacher; and published several single sermons.

CHEVERUS, LEFEBURE DE, cardinal, died at Bourdeaux July 19, 1836, aged 68. He was born at Mayenne Jan. 28, 1768, came to this country in 1796, and was the first Catholic bishop in Boston in 1810. Returning to France, he was bishop of Montauban in 1832, archbishop of Bourdeaux in 1826, and cardinal in 1835. He spoke Latin, and was well versed in Greek and Hebrew. In Boston he was held in great affection and respect. Few preachers were equal to him in pulpit eloquence.

CHEW, SAMUEL, chief justice of Newcastle, etc., in Pennsylvania, was a Quaker and a physician, and died June 16, 1744. Of great influence over the Quakers, his death was deemed a great loss to the province. His speech to the grand jury of Newcastle, on the lawfulness of defence against an armed enemy, was published in 1741, and republished in 1775. For this he was reproached in a Philadelphia paper as an apostate and a time-server, and as having been "hired by Balak to curse Israel." He replied with becoming dignity and spirit.

CHEW, BENJAMIN, chief justice of Pennsylvania, died Jan. 20, 1810, aged 87. He was the son of the preceding, and born in Maryland Nov. 29, 1722. He studied law with Andrew Hamilton; also in London. On his return he settled on the Delaware, and in 1754 removed to Philadelphia. Of this city he was recorder from 1755 to 1772; also register of wills. The office of attorney-general he resigned in 1766. In 1774 he succeeded William Allen as chief justice; but, being opposed to the Revolution, he retired from public life in 1776. Appointed in 1790 president of the high court of errors and appeals, he continued in that station till the abolition of the court in 1806. His first wife was Mary, daughter of Samuel Galloway of Maryland; his second was a daughter of Mr. Oswald; she died about 1809, aged 85. One of his daughters married in 1768 Alexander Wilcox. — Jennison.

CHICKERING, JOSEPH, minister of Woburn, died Jan. 27, 1844, aged 63. He was the son of Rev. Jabez C. of Dedham, who died in 1812. A graduate of 1799, he was ordained in 1804, having studied theology with Prof. Tappan at Cambridge. He was a zealous, faithful minister, the earnest supporter of various charitable societies, making to them bequests. He was the father of Rev. Dr. C. of Portland. He published a dedication sermon, 1809; before education society, 1817. — Christian Mirror, Feb. 29.

CHICKERING, JONAS, died at Boston Dec. 8, 1853, aged 56. He was so much respected as a citizen, that his funeral was the largest ever known in Boston. He descended from Dr. John C. of Charlestown, who was the son of Henry of Dedham as early as 1635. One act of his beneficence is gratefully recorded by Richard Storrs Willis, who, after his graduation at college, meeting with Mr. C. and explaining, at his request, his projects in life and his wish to study music, Mr. C. instantly offered him 500 dollars a year for four years to support him in his studies abroad. Mr. W. was in 1854 editor of "The N. Y. Musical World." Mr. C.'s life, by J. L. Blake, is in Lives of American Merchants.

CHICKERING, JESSE, a physician, was born in Dover, graduated in 1818, and practiced ten years in Boston. He died at Jamaica Plain May 29, 1855, aged 57. He published in 1846 a work on the population of Mass., from 1765 to 1840; a work on immigration, 1846; reports on the census of Boston, 1851; and a letter on slavery, 1855.

CHILD, ROBERT, a physician, was educated at Padua, and came to Massachusetts as early as 1644. His object was to explore the mines of this country. In 1646 he and others caused disturbance in the colony by a petition, supposed to have originated with William Vassall, in which he complained, that the fundamental laws of England were disregarded, and that free-born Englishmen, if not members of one of the churches, were denied civil privileges, and debarred from Christian ordinances. He prayed for redress, and threatened to apply to parliament. He was summoned before the court, accused of "false and scandalous passages," etc., and fined 50 pounds. His trial is related by Winthrop. When he was about to proceed to England with his complaints, he was apprehended, and suffered a long imprisonment. His brother, Maj. John Child of England, in his indignation, published a pamphlet, entitled, New England's Jonas cast up at London, containing Child's petition to the court, etc., 1647.

This, which is reprinted in 2 Hist. Coll. iv., was answered by Winslow, in the "Salamander," alluding to Vassall, "a man never at rest, but when he was in the fire of contention." The reason of the title of "Jonas" was this, as we learn from the paper: when the ship, in which Vassall proceeded to England in 1646, was about to sail, Cotton in his Thursday lecture said, that writings, carried to England against this country, would be as Jonas in the ship, and advised the ship-master, in case of a storm, to search the chests and throw over any such Jonas. There was a storm: a good woman at midnight entreated Thomas Fowle, if he had a petition, to give it to her. He accordingly gave her, not the petition to parliament, but a copy of the petition to the general court. This was thrown overboard; yet a copy of the same and a petition to parliament were safely cast up at London. — Winthrop; 2 Hist. Coll. iv. 107–120.

CHILDS, TIMOTHY, M. D., a physician of Pittsfield, Mass., and a patriot of the Revolution, died Feb. 25, 1821, aged 73. He was born at Deerfield in Feb., 1748, and passed several years at Harvard college. Having studied physic under Dr. Williams, he commenced the practice at Pittsfield in 1771. In the political controversy with Great Britain he engaged with zeal. In 1774 he was chairman of a committee of the town to petition the justice of the court of common pleas, to stay all proceedings till certain oppressive acts of parliament should be repealed. When the news of the battle of Lexington was received, he marched to Boston with a company of minute-men, in which he was enrolled in the preceding year. Being soon appointed surgeon of Col. Patterson's regiment, he accompanied the army to New York and thence to Montreal. In 1777 he returned to his practice in Pittsfield, in which he continued till his death. For several years he was a representative in the general court, and also a senator. In his politics he warmly supported the republican party, which came into power with the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency in 1801. Till within a few days of his death he attended to the active duties of his profession, in which he was eminent. Great and general confidence was reposed in his skill. He had always been the supporter of religious institutions, though not a professor of religion; in his last sickness he earnestly besought the Divine mercy, and spoke of the blood and righteousness of Christ as the only hope of a sinner. His son, Henry H. Childs, succeeded him as a physician. — Thacher's Med. Biog.; Hist. Berkshire, 380.

CHILDS, THOMAS, brigadier-general, died of the yellow fever at Tampa Bay, Oct. 8, 1853. He was the son of Dr. Timothy Childs, one of the first settlers of Pittsfield, Mass. His mother, a daughter of Col. Easton of P., died in 1852, aged 92. In the Mexican war he commanded under Taylor the artillery battalion in several battles. Afterwards he was with the army of Scott, who spoke of his "often-distinguished" Col. Childs. He commanded at Puebla, where he was endeared to his soldiers by his humane conduct in all circumstances.

CHIPMAN, JOHN, colonel, a soldier of the Revolution, was an officer in the regiment of Col. Seth Warner; was engaged in the battles of Bennington and Hubbardton, and subsequently commanded fort George, which he was compelled to surrender to a superior force of Tories, Indians, and British. He felled the first tree in Middlebury, Vt., in 1767; and there he died in Sept., 1829, aged 87.

CHIPMAN, NATHANIEL, LL. D., died at Timbmouth, Vt., Feb. 15, 1843, aged 90. He was born in Salisbury, Conn., in 1752; was graduated at Yale in 1777; in 1786 was judge of the supreme court of Vermont, and chief justice in 1789. In 1791 he was appointed judge of the district court of the United States. He was senator from 1797 to 1803.; and again chief justice in 1813 and 1814; in 1815 professor of law in Middlebury college. He revised the laws of Vermont in 1826. He enjoyed a high reputation for literature and science; and was a man of faithfulness and integrity. He published reports of judicial decisions and dissertations in 1 vol.; principles of government, and 2d edit. in 1833.

CHIPMAN, WARD, judge of the supreme court of New Brunswick, and president of the province, was a native of Mass., and graduated at Harvard college in 1770. He died at Frederickton Feb. 9, 1824. Mrs. Gray of Boston was his sister.

CHIPMAN, DANIEL, died in Ripton, Vt., April 23, 1850, aged 85. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1788, and studied law with his brother, Nathaniel. He was a member of congress; the first reporter of the decisions of the supreme court; the author of a work on the law of contracts, which is highly commended.

CHIPMAN, WARD, chief justice of New Brunswick from 1834 to 1851, died at St. John Nov. 26, 1851, aged 65. A native of N. B., he graduated at Harvard 1805, and was the son of Ward C., a graduate of 1770.

CHISHOLM, JAMES, died of the yellow fever in Portsmouth, Va., Sept. 15, 1855, aged 39, a graduate at Harvard in 1836. He was a useful Episcopal minister. A memoir by Rev. Mr. Conrad has been published. — Boston Advertiser, July 16, 1856.

CHITTENDEN, THOMAS, first governor of Vermont, died Aug. 24, 1797, aged 67. He was born at East Guilford, Conn., in 1730. His mother was sister of Rev. Dr. Johnson. He received a common school education, which at that period contributed but little to the improvement of the mind. Agreeably to the custom of New England, he married early in life, when in his twentieth year, and soon removed to Salisbury. Here he commanded a regiment. He many years represented the town in the general assembly, and thus acquired that knowledge of public business, which afterward rendered him eminently useful in Vermont. The office of a justice of peace for the county of Litchfield made him acquainted with the laws of the State, and the manner of carrying them into effect. Though destitute of learning, his good sense, affability, kindness, and integrity gained him the confidence of his fellow-citizens; and the highest honors, which a retired town could bestow, were given him. His attention was principally directed to agriculture, and he labored personally, in the field. With a numerous and growing family, a mind formed for adventures, and a firmness which nothing could subdue, he determined to lay a foundation for the future prosperity of his children by emigrating to the New Hampshire grants, as Vermont was then called. He accordingly in 1774 removed to Williston, on Onion river. An almost trackless wilderness now separated him from his former residence. Here he settled on fine lands, which opened a wide field for industry, and encouraged many new settlers. In the year 1776, the troubles occasioned by the war rendering it necessary for him to remove, he purchased an estate in Arlington, and continued in that town until 1787, when he returned to Williston. In the controversy with New York he was a faithful adviser and a strong supporter of the feeble settlers. During the war of the Revolution, while Warner, Allen, and many others were in the field, he was assiduously engaged in the council at home, where he rendered essential service to his country. He was a member of the convention which, January 16, 1777, declared Vermont an independent State, and was appointed one of the committee to communicate to Congress the proceedings of the inhabitants, and to solicit for their district an admission into the union of the American States. When the powers of government were assumed by this State, and a constitution was established in 1778, the eyes of the freemen were immediately fixed on him as their governor, and in that arduous and difficult office he continued, one year only excepted, until his death.

From the year 1780 till the conclusion of the war, during a period in which the situation of Vermont was peculiarly perplexing, he displayed a consummate policy. The State was not acknowledged by the congress, and they were contending on the one hand for independence, and on the other hand they were threatened by the British forces from Canada. A little management was necessary to promote the interests of this district. A correspondence was opened with the enemy, who were flattered for several years with the belief that the people of Vermont were about to subject themselves to the king of England; and thus a meditated invasion of the territory was averted, and the prisoners were restored. At the same time, the possibility that Vermont would desert the cause of America was held up to congress, and by this means probably the settlers were not required to submit to the claims of New York. Such was the politic course which he thought it necessary to pursue. He enjoyed very good health until about a year before his death. In Oct., 1796, he took an affecting leave of his compatriots in the general assembly, imploring the benediction of Heaven on them and their constituents.

Governor Chittenden, though an illiterate man, possessed great talents. His discernment was keen, and no person knew better how to effect great designs than himself. Though his open frankness was sometimes abused, yet when secrecy was required in order to accomplish his purposes, no misplaced confidence made them liable to be defeated. His negotiations during the war were master-strokes of policy. He possessed a peculiar talent in reconciling the jarring interests among the people. The important services which he rendered to his country, and especially to Vermont, make his name worthy of honorable remembrance. He lived to see astonishing changes in the district, which was almost a wilderness when he first removed to it. Instead of a little band of associates, he could enumerate one hundred thousand persons whose interests were intrusted to his care. He saw them rising superior to oppression, braving the horrors of a foreign war, and finally obtaining a recognition of their independence, and an admission into the United States of America. He was conspicuous for his private virtues. In times of scarcity and distress, which are not unfrequent in new settlements, he displayed a noble liberality of spirit.

His granary was open to all the needy. He was a professor of religion, believing in the Son, to the glory of God the Father. Several of his letters to congress and to General Washington were published.—Monthly Anthology, I. 490-492; Williams' Vermont, 233-277; Graham's Sketch of Vermont, 135-137.

CHITTENDEN, MARTIN, governor of Vermont, died Sept. 5, 1840. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1789, he was in congress 1803-13 and governor 1813-14.

CHOULES, JOHN O., D. D., Baptist minister in Newport, died at New York Jan. 5, 1856, aged 55. He edited Neal's Puritans.

CHOUTEAU, PIERRE, died at St. Louis July 2, 1849, aged 90. He was one of the founders of the city.

CHOVET, ABRAHAM, M. D., died at Philadelphia March 24, 1790, aged 86. He came from Jamaica in 1770. He was an eminent physician and anatomist, and was a professor in the college of Philadelphia, for the aid of which he procured several thousand pounds in Jamaica. Good imitations in wax of all parts of the body were made by him.

CHRISTMAS, JOSEPH S., minister at Montreal, died March 14, 1830, aged 27. When he was in college, he had a passion for painting, to which art he intended to devote his life; but, becoming religious, he resolved to be occupied in more important and useful toils. His father was very solicitous that he should be a physician, and made all the arrangements for his entering upon the study of physic. The son was constrained by a sense of religious duty to disappoint the paternal hopes. He studied theology at Princeton. In 1824 he went to Canada and was ordained as the first minister of the American Presbyterian society in Montreal. Here he labored amidst many difficulties with considerable success for upwards of three years, when his ill health compelled him in 1828 to ask a dismission. In that year he addressed to his people a farewell letter, affectionate, faithful, and able, dated at Danbury, Conn. In 1829 he was called to drink deep in the cup of affliction; for first he lost both his children, and then, Aug. 9th, his wife, Louisa Jones, also died, leaving him singularly desolate in respect to the world, yet joyful in God, his Saviour. He had the consolation of knowing, that his wife, though through much tribulation, as is usually the lot of the righteous, departed in Christian peace. "O, beware of the world!" was her counsel. "How deeply am I convinced that the worldly intercourse of professing Christians is utterly wrong! It cuts out the very heart of piety. Seek not the things which are your own, but things which are Jesus Christ's." This bereavement was perhaps the means of preparing him for heavenly bliss. October 14, 1829, he was installed the pastor of Bowery church in the city of New York. But here he was allowed to toil in the cause of his Master only a few months; for after an illness of only three or four days he died. He was a faithful and able preacher of the gospel. Two revivals of religion occurred during his ministry at Montreal. His vigorous intellect and cultivated taste were controlled and directed by ardent piety. While rising high in the public esteem, he was snatched away from his toils. Of his wife an interesting sketch appeared in the New York Observer. His own life was written by Eleazer Lord. He published Valedictory admonitions, or a farewell letter to his society in Montreal, 1828.—Boston Recorder, Sept. 16, 1829.

CHURCH, BENJAMIN, distinguished by his exploits in the Indian wars of New England, died Jan. 17, 1718, aged 77, at Little Compton. He was born at Duxbury, Mass., in 1639, and was the son of Richard, who came over in 1630 and married Elizabeth, daughter of Richard Warren, who was a carpenter, and with J. Tomson built the first church in Plymouth, dying at Dedham in 1668. Benjamin Church commenced the settlement at Saconet or Sekonit, since called Little Compton. His life, which was frequently exposed to the greatest dangers, was by Divine Providence remarkably preserved. In the year 1676, when in pursuit of King Philip, he was engaged with the Indians in a swamp. With two men by his side, who were his guard, he met three of the enemy. Each of his men took a prisoner, but the other Indian, who was a stout fellow, with his two locks tied up with red and a great rattlesnake's skin hanging from his hair behind, ran into the swamp. Church pursued, and as he approached him presented his gun, but it missed fire. The Indian, being equally unsuccessful in his attempt to discharge his gun, turned himself to continue his flight, but his foot was caught in a small grape vine, and he fell on his face. Church instantly struck him with the muzzle of his gun, and dispatched him. Looking about he saw another Indian rushing towards him with inexpressible fury; but the fire of his guards preserved him from the danger. After the skirmish his party found they had killed and taken one hundred and seventy-three men. At night they drove their prisoners into Bridgewater pound, where, having a plenty of provisions, they passed a merry night. Col. Church commanded the party which killed Philip in August, 1676. When it was known that the savage monarch was shot, the whole company gave three loud huzzas. Church ordered him to be beheaded and quartered, and gave one of his hands to the friendly Indian, who shot him. The government of Plymouth paid thirty shillings a head for the enemies killed

In Sept., 1689, he was commissioned by Hinkley, president of the Plymouth colony, as commander-in-chief of an expedition against the Eastern Indians; and commissioned also by Danforth, president of the province of Maine, and by Bradstreet, governor of Massachusetts. He soon embarked and proceeded to Casco with two hundred and fifty men, partly Saconet and Cape Indians. He arrived at a critical moment, for several hundred French and Indians were then on an island, having come in eighty canoes. The next day he repulsed their attack on the town, with the loss of ten or twelve men. He afterwards visited all the garrisons at Black Point, Spurwink, and Blue Point, and went up the Kennebec. On the approach of winter he returned to Boston. In May following Casco fell into the hands of the enemy, one hundred persons being captured. The whole country was desolated.

He proceeded on a second expedition in Sept., 1690, and, landing at Maquoit, went to Pegypscot fort, in Brunswick, and thence up the river forty or fifty miles to Amerasegen fort, near the great falls, where he took a few prisoners, and destroyed much corn. He put to death several of the prisoners, women and children, strange as it may seem in the present age, "for an example!" The wives of Hakens of Pennacook and of Wumbo were spared. He returned to Winter Harbor, and thence went again to Pegypscot plain to obtain a quantity of beaver, hid there. At Perpodack he had an engagement with the Indians. In his third expedition in 1692 he accompanied Phipps to Pemaquid. He also went up the Kennebec and destroyed the Indian fort and the corn at Taconoc. In his fourth, in 1696, he went to the Penobscot and to Passamaquoddy. The French houses at Chignecto were burnt; for which he was blamed. He was soon superseded by Col. Hawthorne of Salem. His fifth and last expedition was early in 1704. The burning of Deerfield in Feb., awakened the spirit of this veteran warrior; and he took his horse and rode seventy miles to offer his services to Gov. Dudley in behalf of his country. He did much damage, in this expedition, to the French and Indians at Penobscot and Passamaquoddy. After Philip's war he lived first at Bristol; and then at Fall River, now Troy; and lastly at Saconet. In his old age he was corpulent. A fall from his horse was the cause of his death. He was buried with military honors. He was a man of integrity and piety. At the gathering of the church in Bristol by Mr. Lee he was a member, and his life was exemplary. His wife, Alice, daughter of Constant Southworth and Elizabeth Collier, died in 1719, aged 71. He had sons Thomas, Constant, Benjamin, and Edward; and of his descendants, some lived in Little Compton and Boston. His son Thomas compiled from his minutes and under his direction a history of Philip's war, which was published in 1716; a 2d edition, 1772; a 4th, with notes, by S. G. Drake, 1827. — Church's Narrative; Account of Church annexed to it; Holmes.

CHURCH, BENJAMIN, a physician in Boston, regarded as a traitor to his country, was graduated at Harvard college in 1754, and having studied with Dr. Pyncheon, rose to considerable eminence as a physician and particularly as a surgeon. He had talents, genius, and a poetic fancy. About the year 1768 he built him an elegant house at Raynham, on the side of Nippahonsit pond, allured perhaps by the pleasures of fishing. Perhaps it was thus that he created a pecuniary embarrassment, which led to his defection from the cause of his country. In the earnest discussions, which preceded the war of the Revolution, he was a zealous whig and the associate of the principal whigs in Boston. In 1774 he was a member of the provincial congress, and was suspected of communicating intelligence to Gov. Gage and of receiving a reward of his treachery. One of his students, who kept his books, and knew his embarrassment, could not otherwise account for his sudden acquisition of some hundreds of "new British guineas." In Boston he was in frequent intercourse with Capt. Price, a half-pay British officer, and with Robinson, one of the commissioners. A few days after the battle of Lexington in April, 1775, when he was at Cambridge with the committee of safety, he suddenly declared his resolution to go into Boston the next day: he went to the house of Gen. Gage. At length his treachery was detected. A letter, written in cipher, to his brother in Boston, was intrusted by him to a young woman, with whom he was living in crime. The mysterious letter was found upon her; but, the doctor having opportunity to speak to her, it was only by the force of threats that the name of the writer was extorted from her. When Gen. Washington charged him with his baseness, he never attempted to vindicate himself. He was convicted by court martial Oct. 3, of which Washington was president, "of holding a criminal correspondence with the enemy." He was imprisoned at Cambridge. Oct. 27, he was called to the bar of the house of representatives and examined. His defence was very ingenious and able: that the letter was designed for his brother, but that, not being sent, he had communicated no intelligence; that there was nothing in the letter but notorious facts; that his exaggerations of the American force could only be designed to favor the cause of his country; and that his object was purely patriotic. He added: "The warmest bosom here does not flame with a brighter zeal for the security, happiness, and liberties of America, than mine." His eloquent professions did not avail him. He was expelled from the house; and congress afterwards resolved, that he should be confined in jail in Connecticut and "debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper." In 1776 he was released and allowed to sail for the West Indies; but the vessel was never again heard of. His own well-written account of his examination and defence is in the first vol. of Historical Collections. It is very possible, that his sole motive was the supply of his pecuniary wants, occasioned by his extravagance, and that he communicated nothing very injurious to his country; but, that he held correspondence with the enemy, there can hardly be a doubt. Nor is the patriotism of any man to be trusted, who lives in the flagrant violation of the rules of morality.

He was the best of the poetic contributors to the "Pietas et Gratulatio Cantabrigiensis apud Novanglos," on the accession of George III., 4to., 106 pages. Among the other writers were Sam. Cooper, Judge Lowell, and Stephen Sewall. He published also an elegy on the times, 1765; elegy on Dr. Mayhew, 1766; elegy on the death of Whitefield, 1770; oration on the 5th March, 1773. — Gordon, II. 134; Hist. Coll. I. 84; v. 106; Eliot; Thacher's Med. Biog.

CHURCH, JOHN H., D. D., died at Pelham, N. H., June 13, 1840, aged 68. Born in Rutland, he was a graduate of Harvard in 1797, and was for forty years a useful minister and an able counsellor in the churches. Out of a salary of 100 pounds he gave annually 50 dollars to charitable objects. He published a sermon on the settlement of N. E., 1810; one before the pastoral association, 1829. — Boston Recorder, July 10, Aug. 28.

CHURCH, EDWARD, died in Lexington, Ky., April 22, 1845, of inflammation of the lungs, aged 66; a native of Boston and descendant of Capt. Church of the war with King Philip. He left Boston when a child, was educated in England, and was the first to establish steamboats in France, Germany, and Italy. He lived during some of his last years in Northampton.

CHURCH, SAMUEL, chief justice of Conn., was born in Salisbury in Feb., 1785, graduated at Yale in 1803, and died at Newtown Sept. 12, 1854, aged 69. A lawyer in his native town, he was a representative, senator, and judge of probate; in 1833 a judge of the superior court; in 1847 chief justice. He had removed to Litchfield in 1845. He was distinguished as a jurist, and honored as a Christian. H. Waite was his successor. He died at the house of his son-in-law, Rev. Mr. Stone. He published an address at Salisbury centennial jubilee, 1841.

CHURCHILL, SILAS, minister of New Lebanon, N. Y., died March 1, 1854, aged 84. He was an excellent pastor from 1776 for forty-two years.

CHURCHMAN, JOHN, a Quaker and a native of Maryland, published a magnetic atlas and explanation, Philadelphia, 1790; also, at London, magnetic atlas, or variation charts of the globe. He died at sea July 24, 1805. — Lord's Lempr.

CILLEY, JOSEPH, general, an officer of the Revolution, died in Aug., 1799, aged 64. He was born at Nottingham, N. H., in 1745, of which place his father, Capt. Joseph C., was one of the first settlers in 1727. With but little education he became a self-taught lawyer, in consequence of living amongst a litigious people. Early in 1775, before the war, he with other patriots dismantled the fort at Portsmouth and removed the cannon. Immediately after the battle of Lexington he marched at the head of one hundred volunteers. Congress nominated him a major in the army in May, 1775, and afterwards colonel. At Ticonderoga he commanded a regiment in July, 1777. He fought at the storming of Stony Point under Wayne, and at Monmouth. After the war he was appointed first major-general of the militia, June 22, 1786; and he served the State in various departments of the government. From this time he advised the people to compromise their law-suits. He was a man of temperance, economy, and great industry. His judgment was sound. With strong passions he was yet frank and humane. In politics he was a decided republican, a supporter of the administration of Mr. Jefferson. — Bellnap, I. 370.

CLAGETT, HENRY, Dr., died in Leesburg, Va., May 20, 1842, aged 70, a distinguished physician.

CLAIBORNE, WILLIAM C. C., governor of Mississippi and Louisiana, died at New Orleans Nov. 23, 1817. He was born in Virginia in 1773, and was probably a descendant of Wm. C., an early settler in Virginia and distinguished in the history of that colony from about 1630 to 1651. Being bred a lawyer, he settled in Tennessee. He assisted in forming the constitution of the State in 1796, and was afterwards a member of congress. His appointment of governor of the Mississippi Territory he received from Mr. Jefferson in 1802, in the place of Sargeant. After the purchase of Louisiana he was appointed in 1804 its governor; and to that office, under the constitution, he was also chosen by the people from 1812 to 1816. James Villere succeeded him. Elected a senator of the U. S., he did not live to take his seat. As chief magistrate he was upright and popular, and esteemed in private life. — Salem Reg.; Lord's Lempr.

CLAIR, ARTHUR ST., general, died at Laurel Hill, Pennsylvania, Aug. 31, 1818, aged 84. He was born at Edinburgh, and came to this country with Admiral Boscawen in 1755. He served as a lieutenant under Wolfe. After the peace he was intrusted with the command of fort Ligonier in Pennsylvania. Here he settled as a citizen. In the Revolutionary war he espoused the American cause. In 1776 he accompanied the troops to Canada, and afterwards was in the battle of Trenton. He was appointed by congress brigadier-general in Aug., 1776, and major-general Feb. 19, 1777. Commanding at Ticonderoga, when Burgoyne approached, he evacuated that post July 6, 1777. A court of inquiry honorably acquitted him of charges of cowardice and treachery. He had not troops enough to man the lines. Had he listened to the counsels of rash heroes, his army would have been sacrificed. He afterwards joined the army of Greene at the south. On the occurrence of peace he returned to Pennsylvania, from which State he was sent a delegate to congress in 1784. In 1787 he was chosen president of congress. Of the territory northwest of the Ohio he was appointed governor in Oct., 1789, and held the place till 1802. In 1791 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces, to be employed against the Indians. He proceeded to the neighborhood of the Miami villages and encamped, Nov. 3, with fourteen hundred men. The next morning, soon after the men were dismissed from the parade, the Indians commenced the attack and instantly put to flight the militia, who were encamped a little in advance. The regular troops fought bravely several hours, repeatedly charging with the bayonet; but the Indians still poured in a deadly fire. Several officers had fallen, among whom was Gen. Butler and Maj. Ferguson; half the army had been killed or wounded; and the terror became so great, that St. Clair found it necessary to retreat. They were pursued only four miles, when the Indians returned to plunder the camp; but the troops fled precipitately thirty miles, and then continued the retreat to fort Washington. The loss was thirty-eight officers killed and five hundred and ninety-three men, twenty-one officers wounded and two hundred and forty-two men. The Indian force was supposed to be from one thousand to fifteen hundred. The Indians said they had four thousand men and lost fifty-six. There was no ground of censure on St. Clair for this defeat. He was ready for the attack. Eight balls passed through his clothes. The next year he resigned his military commission, and Gen. Wayne succeeded him.

Ohio was erected into an independent State in 1802. As the election of governor approached, in an address to the people, Dec. 8, 1802, St. Clair declined being a candidate for governor. He said that for fourteen years, since the first institution of the territorial government, in which lived only thirty men, he had endeavored to extend the liberty and promote the happiness of the people, neglecting his own private affairs. He reprobated the act of congress, imposing certain conditions, as allowing but one member of congress, and called upon the people to make a constitution in their own way, and to imitate the spirit of Vermont. This address was probably offensive to Mr. Jefferson, who removed him from his office of territorial governor.

By a statement made in 1825, it appears that St. Clair advanced in Oct., 1776, to Maj. Wm. Butler, of the Pennsylvania troops, 1800 dollars, to aid in the re-enlistment of soldiers. This claim was barred by the statute; but it was adjusted in 1817 by the payment only of 2000 dollars, on condition of releasing congress from all claims. The penniless general submitted. There was granted him also the half-pay of a major-general, or 60 dollars per month, which he enjoyed but a short time, being then eighty-three years old. The annuity of 2500 dollars for life to Baron Steuben, and the payments to the daughters of Count de Grasse and to Lady Stirling, were honorable to congress. An obelisk monument was erected to his memory by the masonic society, in 1832, at Greensburg, Penn., over his remains.—New York Spectator, Jan. 26, 1803; Lord's Lempr.

CLAP, ROGER, one of the first settlers of Dorchester, Mass., died in Boston Feb. 2, 1691, aged 81. He was born in England April 6, 1609, and came to this country with Warham and Maverick in 1630. At this time there were only a few settlers at Plymouth, Salem, and Charlestown. Mr. Clap, with others of the company, began a plantation at Dorchester. The hardships endured at first were very considerable, as there was a great want of the necessaries of life; the Indians, however, who brought baskets of corn for traffic, afforded great assistance. The people were glad to procure clams, and muscles, and fish; and often they had nothing but samp, or hominy. Mr. Clap sustained several civil and military offices. He was a representative of the town, and in August, 1665, he was appointed by the general court the captain of castle William. This trust he discharged with great fidelity, and continued in command till 1686, when he resigned. During his residence at the castle he officiated as chaplain, always calling in the soldiers to family prayer. He constantly attended the lectures in Boston. While he was remarkably pious, very meek and humble, and of a quiet and peaceable spirit, there was a dignity in his deportment which commanded respect. He possessed also a pleasant and cheerful disposition. In 1686 he removed from the castle into Boston. Among his sons are the names of Preserved, Hopestill, and Desire, and one of his daughters was named Wait. Mr. Preserved Clap was one of the early settlers of Northampton, and died Sept. 20, 1720, aged about 77 years. Capt. Clap wrote memoirs of himself, in which he gives a sketch of the early history of New England, and leaves some excellent advice to his descendants. These memoirs were published in a small pamphlet by Mr. Prince in 1731, and they were republished in 1807, with an appendix by James Blake.—Clap's Memoirs; Coll. Hist. Soc. ix. 149, 150.

CLAP, NATHANIEL, minister of Newport, R. I., died Oct. 30, 1745, aged 77. He was the son of Nathaniel Clap and grandson of Deacon Nicholas C., a settler of Dorchester in 1636. He was born Jan., 1668, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1690. In 1695 he began to preach at Newport; and he continued his labors under many discouragements till a church was formed, of which he was ordained pastor Nov. 3, 1720. In a few years, however, a popular young man, whom he disapproved, drew away a majority of his people; in consequence of which a new church was formed, of which Mr. Clap was the pastor for the remainder of his life. He preached in Newport nearly fifty years. In 1740, when Mr. Whitefield arrived at Newport from Charleston, he called upon Mr. Clap, and he speaks of him as the most venerable man he ever saw. "He looked like a good old Puritan, and gave me an idea of what stamp those men were who first settled New England. His countenance was very heavenly, and he prayed most affectionately for a blessing on my coming to Rhode Island. I could not but think that I was sitting with one of the patriarchs. He is full of days, a bachelor, and has been a minister of a congregation in Rhode Island upwards of forty years." Dean Berkley, who esteemed him highly for his good deeds, said: "Before I saw father Clap, I thought the bishop of Rome had the gravest aspect of any man I ever saw; but really the minister of Newport has the most venerable appearance." His colleague, Jonathan Helyer, who was ordained June 20, 1744, died a few months before him, May 27, 1745.

Mr. Clap was eminent for sanctity, piety, and an ardent desire to promote true godliness in others. The powers of his mind and his learning were above the common level, but he made no attempt to display himself and attract attention. Though he had some singularities, yet his zeal to promote the knowledge of Jesus Christ and the interests of his gospel spread a lustre over all his character. He was zealously attached to what he considered the true doctrines of grace, and to the forms of worship which he believed to be of Divine institution; but his charity embraced good men of all denominations. He had little value for merely speculative, local, nominal Christianity, and a form of godliness without its power. He insisted chiefly upon that faith by which we are justified and have peace with God through our Lord Jesus, and that repentance toward God and new obedience, which are the necessary effect and evidence of regeneration, and the proper exercise of Christianity. In his preaching he dwelt much upon the evil of sin and the worth of the soul, the influence of the Divine Spirit in restoring us to the image of God, and the necessity of constant piety and devotion. He addressed his brethren with the affectionate earnestness which a regard to their welfare and a full conviction of the great truths of the gospel could not but inspire. He abounded in acts of charity, being the father and guardian of the poor and necessitous, and giving away all his living. He scattered many little books of piety and virtue, and put himself to very considerable expense, that he might in this way awaken the careless, instruct the ignorant, encourage the servants of Christ, and save the sinner from death. He was remarkable for his care with regard to the education of children, and his concern for the instruction of servants. He knew by experience the advantages of a pious education, and, fully aware of the consequences of suffering the youthful mind to be undirected to what is good, he gave much of his attention to the lambs of his flock. His benevolent labors also extended to the humble and numerous class of slaves, to whom he endeavored with unwearied care to impart the knowledge of the gospel. Thus evincing the reality of his religion by the purity and benevolence of his life, he was an honor to the cause of the Redeemer, in which he was engaged. He departed this life in peace, without those raptures which some express, but with perfect resignation to the will of God and with confidence in Jesus Christ, who was the sum of his doctrine and the end of his conversation. He published advice to children, 1691; a sermon on the Lord's voice crying to the people in some extraordinary dispensations, 1715. — Callender's Funeral Sermon; Hist. Coll. ix. 182, 183; Backus' Abridgm. 157, 168; Whitefield's Journal of 1749; 39-45; Eliot.

CLAP, THOMAS, president of Yale college, died at New Haven Jan. 7, 1767, aged 63. He was born at Scituate, Mass., June 26, 1703, the son of Stephen, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1722. He was the descendant of Thomas Clap, the brother of Nicholas Clap of Dorchester, who died at Scituate in 1684; the early impressions, made upon his mind by Divine grace, inclined him to the study of divinity. He was settled in the ministry at Windham, Conn., Aug. 3, 1726, the successor of Samuel Whiting, whose daughter he married. His second wife was Mary, daughter of John Haynes, and widow of Rosewell Saltonstall; he married her in 1741. From this place he was removed in 1739 to the presidency of Yale college, as successor of E. Williams. This office he resigned Sept. 10, 1766. He was succeeded by Dr. Daggett. In his last years a clamor was raised against him: it was represented that he was attached to antiquated notions and averse to improvements in education. Men less evangelical than he in their religious views were his enemies. He possessed strong powers of mind, a clear perception, and solid judgment. Though not very eminent for classical learning, he had a competent knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. In the higher branches of mathematics, in astronomy, and in the various departments of natural philosophy he had probably no equal in America, excepting Prof. Winthrop of Cambridge. He appears to have been extensively and profoundly acquainted with history, theology, moral philosophy, the canon and civil law, and with most of the objects of study in his time. The labors of his office left a most contemplative mind only a few hours for reading; but he employed what time he could devote to study, in a most advantageous method. He always pursued his researches systematically, with an arrangement which had respect to some whole. A large library before him he treated as a collection of reports, books delivering the knowledge and reasonings of the learned world on all subjects of literature. He seldom read a volume through in course. Having previously settled in his mind the particular subjects to be examined, he had recourse directly to the book, or the parts of a book, which would give him the desired information, generally passing by what did not relate to the object of his inquiry, however attracting and interesting. He thus amassed and digested a valuable treasure of erudition, having investigated almost all the principal subjects in the whole circle of literature. He was indefatigable in labors both secular and scientific for the institution over which he presided. He was the means of building a college edifice and chapel; and he gave frequent public dissertations in the various departments of learning.

As a preacher he was solid, grave, and powerful; not so much delighting by a florid manner, as impressing by the weight of his matter. His religious sentiments accorded with the Calvinism of the Westminster Assembly. He had thoroughly studied the Scriptures, and had read the most eminent divines of the two preceding centuries. Though in his person he was not tall, he yet appeared rather bulky. His aspect was light, placid, and contemplative; and he was a calm and judicious man, who had the entire command of his passions. Intent on being useful, he was economical and lived by rule, and was a rare pattern of industry. He had no fondness for parade. As he was exemplary for piety in life, so he was resigned and peaceful at the hour of death. When some one in his last illness observed to him, that he was dangerously sick, he replied that a person was not in a dangerous situation who was approaching the end of his toils. By some means he acquired a prejudice against Mr. Whitefield. He was apprehensive, that it was the design of that eloquent preacher to break down our churches, and to introduce ministers from Scotland and Ireland. He therefore opposed him, though it is believed that they did not differ much in their religious sentiments. He had a controversy with Mr. Edwards of Northampton respecting a conversation which passed between them in reference to Mr. Whitefield. He seems to have misapprehended Mr. Edwards. Mr. Clap constructed the first orrery, or planetarium, made in America. His manuscripts were plundered in the expedition against New Haven under Gen. Tyron. He had made collections of materials for a history of Connecticut. He published a sermon at the ordination of Ephraim Little, Colchester, Sept. 20, 1732; letter to Mr. Edwards, respecting Mr. Whitefield's design, 1745; the religious constitution of colleges, 1754; a brief history and vindication of the doctrines, received and established in the churches of New England, with a specimen of the new scheme of religion, beginning to prevail, 1755; this scheme he collects from the writings of Chubb, Taylor, Foster, Hutcheson, Campbell, and Ramsay; and in opposing it he vindicates the use of creeds, and contends for the doctrines of the Divinity and satisfaction of Christ, original sin, the necessity of special grace in regeneration, and justification by faith. He published also an essay on the nature and foundation of moral virtue and obligation, 1765; a history of Yale college, 1766; and conjectures upon the nature and motion of meteors which are above the atmosphere, 1781. — Holmes' Life of Stiles, 263, 393-396; Annals, II. 151; Miller, II. 360; Daggett's Funeral Sermon; *Hist. CLAPP, ASA, died in Portland May 17, 1848, aged 86; a successful merchant, regarded as the richest man in Maine. Judge Woodbury married his daughter. His life, by J. A. Lowell, is in Lives of American merchants.

CLAPP, PHEBE, widow of Benjamin, died in Easthampton May 30, 1847, aged 97. There followed her to the grave, fifteen children, of whom thirteen were heads of families, one a daughter 79 years old. She had seventy grand-children and seventy great-grand-children. She was one of the seventy-three original members of the church sixty-three years before.

CLARK, JOHN, a physician, died in Boston in 1664, aged 66. He was born in England, came to Newbury in 1638, and lived there till 1651, when he removed to Boston. His picture, with appropriate symbols of his profession, is in the Massachusetts historical society library; a print in Coffin's history of Newbury.

CLARK, JOHN, a physician in Boston, was the eldest son of John C., a physician, who died in 1690, and the grandson of John C., also a physician, who arrived in this country about 1650. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1687. For several years he was the speaker of the house of representatives, and a member of the council. In the controversy with Shute he was a strong opponent. He died Dec. 6, 1728, aged 59. His third wife, Sarah Leverett, survived him and married Dr. Colman. His son John, a physician in Boston, died April 6, 1768, aged 69, being the father of Elizabeth, the wife of Dr. Mayhew, and the father of John Clark, also a physician, who died in 1788. This last was the father of John, a physician, who died at Weston, April, 1805, aged 27, leaving no male issue. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

CLARK, DANIEL, the head of the families of Clarks, died at Windsor, Ct., of which he was an early settler, Aug. 12, 1710, aged 87. His wife, by whom he had ten children, was Mary Newberry, daughter of Thomas of Dorchester. He was an attorney and a magistrate. As the town of Windsor had a "great pew," which was wainscotted, for the sitting of the magistrates, the town appointed him to sit in that pew. Goodwin gives the names of two hundred and twenty-three of his descendants.

CLARK, PETER, minister of Danvers, Mass., was graduated at Harvard college in 1712, and was ordained pastor of the first church in Salem village, now Danvers, June 5, 1717. Here he continued more than half a century. He died June 10, 1768, aged 75. He was highly respected as a minister of the gospel, and there were few who were more universally venerated. He was very plain and faithful in his admonitions, and he applied himself diligently to sacred studies. Possessing an inquisitive genius, he read all the modern books of any note which came in his way. By conversing much with some of the best and most celebrated, he had formed a style somewhat superior to that of most of his contemporaries. He was warmly attached to the sentiments generally embraced in the New England churches. He published a sermon at the ordination of W. Jennison, Salem, 1728; two letters on baptism, 1732; the necessity and efficacy of the grace of God in the conversion of the sinner, 1734; at the artillery election, 1736; at the election, 1739; at a fast, occasioned by the war, Feb. 26, 1741; before the annual convention of ministers, 1745; a defence of the divine right of infant baptism, 8vo. 1752; spiritual fortitude recommended to young men, 1757; the Scripture doctrine of original sin stated and defended in a summer morning's conversation, 1758; this was in answer to the "winter evening's conversation;" a defence of the principles of the summer morning's conversation, 1760; a Dudleian lecture, 1763. — Barnard's Fun. Serm.

CLARK, ABRAHAM, a patriot of the Revolution, was born Feb. 5, 1726, at Elizabethtown,

New Jersey, and was bred a farmer, but gave his chief attention to surveying, conveyancing, and the imparting of gratuitous legal advice to his neighbors. Being appointed a member of congress, he voted for the Declaration of Independence and affixed his name to that instrument. After the adoption of the constitution he was chosen a member of the second congress. He died in consequence of a stroke of the sun, in Sept., 1794, aged 67, and was buried at Rahway. During the war several of his sons, officers in the army, fell into the hands of the enemy and were shut up in the memorable prison-ship Jersey. The sufferings of one of them were such, that congress ordered a retaliation. — Goodrich's Lives; Biog. Signers of Dec. Independence.

CLARK, JONAS, minister of Lexington, Mass., was born at Newton, Dec. 25, 1730, was graduated at Harvard college in 1752, and ordained as successor of Mr. Hancock Nov. 5, 1755. Having through the course of half a century approved himself an able and faithful minister of the gospel, he died in much peace Nov. 15, 1805, aged 74. His daughter, Lydia, wife of Benjamin Greene of Berwick, died in 1830. He was wholly devoted to the duties of his sacred calling. His public discourses consisted not of learned discussions on speculative or metaphysical subjects, nor yet of dry lectures on heathen morality; but of the most interesting truths of the gospel, delivered with uncommon energy and zeal. In the times preceding the American Revolution he was not behind any of his brethren in giving his influence on the side of his country, in opposition to its oppressors. It was but a few rods from his own door, that the first blood was shed in the war. On the morning of April 19, 1775, he saw his parishioners most wantonly murdered. During the struggle, which then commenced, the anniversary of this outrage was religiously observed by him and his people. He published a sermon and narrative on Lexington battle, 1776. This was the first anniversary. Successive preachers on the occasion, whose sermons were published, were S. Cooke, J. Cushing, S. Woodward, J. Morrill, H. Cumings, P. Payson, and Z. Adams. He published also a sermon at the artillery election, 1768; at the election, 1781. — Panopl. i. 324; Columbian Cent. Dec. 31, 1805.

CLARK, JAMES, colonel, a descendant of Daniel, died in Lebanon in 1826, aged 96. An officer in the army, he fought at Bunker Hill.

CLARK, DANIEL, died in Brooklyn, Conn., April 14, 1854, aged 101. He was born at Chatham. His father lived to the age of 94; his grandfather to that of 99. The three were deacons.

CLARK, JOHN, Dr., died at Utica in 1822, aged nearly 94, a graduate of Yale in 1749. His widow, who died in 1823, aged 92, was Jerusha, daughter of Jabez Huntington, of Windham, and of Elizabeth Edwards, who was the daughter of Rev. Timothy E. They had twelve children.

CLARK, JABEZ, judge, died at Windham in 1836, aged 83. He served in the Revolutionary war in the quartermaster's department, and was judge of the county court. He had ten children.

CLARK, WILLIAM, governor, died at the residence of his son, Meriwether L. Clark, in St. Louis, Sept. 1, 1838, aged 68. He arrived at St. Louis in 1803, and with Meriwether Lewis performed the first journey across the continent to the mouth of the Columbia. After being governor of Missouri he was superintendent of Indian affairs for the west till his death. Well understanding the Indian character, he had their entire confidence. Lewis and Clark's expedition was published in 2 vols., 1814.

CLARK, DANIEL A., died of apoplexy in New York March 3, 1840, aged 60; he was buried in New Haven. A native of Rahway, N. J., and a graduate of Princeton in 1808, he was first settled as a minister near Boston; afterwards at Bennington, Southbury, and Amherst; and was known as an able preacher and writer. He published a sermon July 4, 1814; at Amherst, 1820; a tract, the rich believer bountiful; a sermon, the church safe; and 3 vols. of sermons. — Holland's Hist. II. 168.

CLARK, WILLIS GAYLORD, died at Philadelphia in June, 1841, aged 32, editor of the Philadelphia Gazette. He was a poet, and a man of talents, of an amiable and exemplary character. He was born in Otisco, N. Y., to which place his father, Capt. Eliakim Clark, a native of Northampton, Mass., and brother of Bohan C., emigrated. His sister is the wife of Gen. Pomeroy, one of the leaders of the free settlers of Kansas in their struggle against the Missouri ruffians in Nov., 1855.

CLARK, JOHN A., D. D., died Nov. 27, 1843, editor of the Episcopal Recorder. A successful preacher, he toiled in New York, Providence, and Philadelphia.

CLARK, JOSIAH, minister of Rutland, Mass., died in 1845, aged 60. A native of Northampton, he graduated at Williams college in 1809, and was for a few years principal of Leicester academy, in which station he was highly respected, for he was a scholar, and had ready sympathies and kind feelings, which gained the attachment of his pupils. His son was afterwards preceptor in the English and Latin departments. He was a popular preacher, and in his parish a willing counsellor and faithful friend. — Washburn's Sketch of Leicester Academy.

CLARK, JOHN, major, died in Powhatan Co., Va., May 17, 1844, aged 78, a Revolutionary soldier, and a distinguished mechanic, who built the Virginia armory.

CLARK, EBENEZER, died at Rye, N. Y., Sept. 11, 1847, aged 78. In his town he built two churches at his own expense, and liberally contributed for the continued preaching of the gospel in both. At his death he manifested a deep humility united with a strong faith and hope.

CLARK, MARSTON G., general, died in Indiana July 25, 1846, aged 74, and was one of twenty-nine brothers and two sisters by the same father and mother. He was born in Lunenburg county in Va. He held various civil and military offices. He was aid to Harrison in the battle of Tippecanoe, also Indian agent.

CLARK, JAMES, governor of Iowa, died near Burlington July 28, 1850, aged 38. He published in 1837 the Territorial now State Gazette. He was territorial governor in 1845 and 1846.

CLARK, ENOCH W., died at Philadelphia in Aug., 1856, leaving 15,000 dollars to several charities. He was formerly of Northampton, and since 1841 had acquired in money and exchange brokerage a million of dollars.

CLARKE, JOHN, one of the first founders of Rhode Island, died at Newport April 20, 1676, aged about 56. He was a physician in London, before he came to this country. Soon after the first settlement of Massachusetts he was driven from that colony with a number of others, and, March 7, 1638, they formed themselves into a body politic and purchased Aquetneck of the Indian sachems, calling it the Isle of Rhodes, or Rhode Island. The settlement commenced at Pocasset, or Portsmouth. The Indian deed is dated March 24, 1638. Mr. Clarke was soon employed as a preacher, and in 1644 he formed a church at Newport and became its pastor. This was the second Baptist church which was established in America. In 1649 he was an assistant and treasurer of Rhode Island colony. In 1651 he went to visit one of his brethren at Lynn, near Boston, and he preached on Sunday, July 20; but, before he had completed the services of the forenoon, he was seized, with his friends, by an officer of the government. In the afternoon he was compelled to attend the parish meeting, at the close of which he spoke a few words. July 31, he was tried before the court of assistants and fined twenty pounds, in case of failure in the payment of which sum he was to be whipped. In passing the sentence Judge Endicot observed: "You secretly insinuate things into those who are weak, which you cannot maintain before our ministers; you may try and dispute with them." Mr. Clarke accordingly wrote from prison, proposing a dispute upon the principles which he professed. He represented his principles to be that Jesus Christ had the sole right of prescribing any laws respecting the worship of God, which it was necessary to obey; that baptism, or dipping in water, was an ordinance to be administered only to those who gave some evidence of repentance towards God and faith in Jesus Christ; that such visible believers only constituted the church; that each of them had a right to speak in the congregation, according as the Lord had given him talents, either to make inquiries for his own instruction, or to prophesy for the edification of others, and that at all times and in all places they ought to reprove folly and open their lips to justify wisdom; and that no servant of Jesus Christ had any authority to restrain any fellow servant in his worship, where injury was not offered to others. No dispute, however, occurred, and Mr. Clarke, after paying his fine, was soon released from prison and directed to leave the colony. His companion, Obadiah Holmes, shared a severer fate; for, on declining to pay his fine of thirty pounds, which his friends offered to do for him, he was publicly whipped in Boston.

In 1651 Mr. Clarke was sent to England with Mr. Williams to promote the interests of Rhode Island, and particularly to procure a revocation of Mr. Coddington's commission as governor. Soon after his arrival he published a book, giving an account of the persecutions in New England. In Oct., 1652, the commission of Mr. Coddington was annulled. After the return of Mr. Williams, Mr. Clarke was left behind, and continued in England as agent for the colony, till he obtained the second charter, July 8, 1663, to procure which he mortgaged his estate in Newport. He returned in 1664, and continued the pastor of his church till his death. Some years passed before he obtained from the assembly a repayment of his expenses during his absence, though a considerable reward was voted him. The Quakers about this time occasioned much trouble in New England, and Mr. Clark and his church were obliged in Oct., 1673, to exclude five persons from their communion for asserting, "that the man Christ Jesus was not now in heaven, nor on earth, nor anywhere else; but that his body was entirely lost." Mr. Clarke died, resigning his soul to his merciful Redeemer, through faith in whose name he enjoyed the hope of a resurrection to eternal life.

His life was so pure, that he was never accused of any vice which has left a blot on his memory. His sentiments respecting religious toleration did not indeed accord with the sentiments of the age in which he lived, and exposed him to some trouble; but at the present time they are almost universally embraced. His exertions to promote the civil prosperity of Rhode Island must endear his name to those who are now enjoying the fruits of his labors. He possessed the singular honor of contributing much towards establishing the first government upon the earth which gave equal liberty, civil and religious, to all men living under it. In Maryland, too, during the administration of Charles Calvert, appointed governor in 1662, an act was passed allowing all Christians to settle in the province.

He left behind him a writing, which expressed his religious opinions. He believed, that all things, with their causes, effects, circumstances, and manner of being, are decreed by God; that this decree is the determination from eternity of what shall come to pass in time; that it is most wise, just, necessary, and unchangeable, the cause of all good, but not of any sin; that election is the decree of God, choosing, of his free love, grace, and mercy, some men to faith, holiness, and eternal life; that sin is the effect of man's free will, and condemnation an effect of justice, inflicted upon man for sin and disobedience. It was not in these opinions, but in his sentiments respecting baptism, that he differed from the ministers of Massachusetts.

In his last will he left his farm in Newport to charitable purposes; the income of it to be given to the poor and to be employed for the support of learning and religion. It has produced about 200 dollars a year, and has thus been promoting the public interests ever since his death.

The title of the book, which he published in London in 1652, is: All news from New England, or a narrative of New England's persecution; wherein it is declared, that while Old England is becoming New, New England is becoming Old; also four proposals to parliament and four conclusions, touching the faith and order of the gospel of Christ, out of his last will and testament, 4to., pp. 76. This work was answered by Thomas Cobbett of Lynn.—Backus' Church Hist. of N. E. III. 227, 228; Backus' Abridg. 84, 86, 109–116.

CLARKE, RICHARD, an elegant classical scholar, came to this country from England before the middle of the last century. He was for some time rector of St. Philip's church in Charleston. He returned to England in the year 1759, and in 1768 was curate of Cheshunt in Hertfordshire. He published several pieces on the prophecies, and on universal redemption. The following are the titles of them: An essay on the number seven, wherein the duration of the church of Rome and of the Mahometan imposture, the time of the conversion of the Jews, and the year of the world for the millennium and for the first resurrection are attempted to be settled, 1769; a warning to the world, or the prophetic numbers of Daniel and John calculated; a second warning to the world, 1762; glad tidings to the Jews and Gentiles, 1763; the gospel of the daily service of the law preached to the Jew and Gentile, 1768. He seems to have been tinctured with the mystical doctrines of William Law and Jacob Behmen.—Miller's Retrospect, II. 365; Ramsay's Hist. S. C. II. 452–454.

CLARKE, GEORGE ROGERS, general, a Revolutionary officer, died Feb. 13, 1808, aged 66. He resided on the western border of Virginia, and had all the hardihood and energy necessary for a soldier. After the massacre at Wyoming in 1778 he took the command of a body of troops, designed to operate against the Indians, for the protection of the frontiers. He descended the Monongahela with between two and three hundred men for the purpose of capturing the British post at Kaskaskias, on the Mississippi, whither the Indians were accustomed to resort for the reward of their barbarities. So secret was the approach of Clarke, that the fort and town were taken without the escape of a man to spread the alarm. In this expedition his scanty provisions were consumed, and his men for one or two days subsisted on roots found in the woods. He now mounted a detachment on horses, and reduced three other towns higher up the river, and sent the principal agent of the enemy a prisoner to Virginia. At this period the county of Illinois was organized; and new troops ordered to be raised for the protection of the west. In the mean time Col. Clarke was informed that Hamilton, the governor of Detroit, was about to attack him in the spring of 1779 and to lay waste the settlements of Kentucky. He resolved therefore to anticipate this movement, and to surprise the British commander. Having garrisoned Kaskaskias, he proceeded across the country with one hundred and fifty brave companions. When within a few miles of the enemy, he was five days wading, frequently breast-high in water, through the drowned lands of the Wabash. Feb. 23d he came in sight of Vincennes. The attack was commenced in the evening, and the next day Clarke was in possession of the fort, with Hamilton and the garrison prisoners. He also intercepted a convoy of goods and provisions, coming from Detroit, valued at 10,000 pounds, and took forty prisoners at the same time. Hamilton and his officers were sent to Williamsburg. In this year he built fort Jefferson on the western bank of the Mississippi, below the Ohio. An expedition against Detroit was projected, but not executed. When Arnold invaded Virginia in 1780, Col. Clarke, then at Richmond, joined Baron Steuben in an expedition against the traitor. Being detached with two hundred and forty men, he drew a party of the enemy into an ambuscade, killing and wounding thirty men. In 1781 he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general. Being commander of the post at Kaskaskias, he was restrained to defensive measures, and was obliged to abandon the long meditated project of capturing Detroit. In Aug., 1782, he was in command at the falls of Ohio. After the war he settled in Kentucky with a small band of associates, and was regarded by his fellow-citizens as the protector and father of the western country. John Randolph called him the American Hannibal, who, by the reduction of Vincennes, obtained the lakes for the northern boundary at the peace of Paris. He died at Locust Grove, near Louisville. It is related in the Notes of an old officer, that at the treaty of fort Washington, where the troops were only seventy men, all the Indians in council appeared peaceable, excepting three hundred Shawahances, whose chief made a boisterous speech, and then placed on the table his belt of black and white wampum, to intimate that he was prepared for either peace or war, while his three hundred savages applauded him by a whoop. At the table sat Commissary-general Clarke and Gen. Richard Butler. Clarke with his cane coolly pushed the wampum from the table; then rising, as the savages muttered their indignation, he trampled on the belt, and with a voice of authority bid them instantly quit the hall. The next day they sued for peace.—Marshall, III. 565; Jennison, Enc. Amer.

CLARKE, JOHN, D. D., minister in Boston, died April 2, 1798, aged 42. He was born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, April 13, 1755. While a member of Harvard college, at which he was graduated in 1774, he was distinguished by his improvements in literature and science, by a strict obedience to the laws, and by irreproachable morals. He afterwards engaged in the instruction of youth; but in his leisure hours he pursued with assiduity his theological studies. In the office of preceptor he was gentle and persuasive, beloved by his pupils, and esteemed by their friends. He was ordained pastor of the first church in Boston, as colleague with Dr. Chauncy, July 8, 1778. With him he lived in the most intimate and respectful friendship about nine years, and afterwards labored alone in the service of the church, until April 1, 1798, when, as he was addressing his hearers, he was seized by apoplexy and fell down in his pulpit. He expired the next morning. He was of a mild and cheerful temper, easy and polite in his manners, and endeared to all his acquaintance. Though fond of literary and philosophical researches, he yet considered theology as the proper science of a minister of the gospel. To this object he principally devoted his time and studies, and was earnestly desirous of investigating every branch of it, not merely to gratify curiosity, but that he might be able to impart instruction. He was habitually a close student. His public discourses bore the marks of penetration, judgment, perspicuity, and elegance. In the private offices of pastoral friendship he was truly exemplary and engaging. In the various relations of life his deportment was marked with carefulness, fidelity, and affection. His successor was W. Emerson.

He published the following sermons: on the death of S. Cooper, 1784; of C. Chauncey, 1787; of N. W. Appleton, 1796; before the humane society, 1793; also, an answer to the question, why are you a Christian? 8vo. 1705, and several other editions; letters to a student at college, 12mo. 1796. After his death a vol. of sermons was published, 1799; and discourses to young persons, 1804.—Thacher's Fun. Ser.; Hist. Coll. VI. I-IX.

CLARKE, JABEZ, judge, died at Windham, Conn., Nov. 11, 1836, aged 83; chief justice of the county court. In the Revolutionary war he was quartermaster-general. He was an excellent citizen and an exemplary Christian.

CLARKE, JAMES D., died in Newcastle, Penn., Dec. 2, 1854, aged 40, worthy of honorable remembrance for his labors for years as a tract distributor. He was qualified for his work, being fluent, entertaining, affectionate, earnest, fervent in his addresses,—going into ignorant families and melting the occupants into tears.

CLARKE, JAMES, died at Burlington, Iowa, July 28, 1850, editor of the Iowa Gazette. He had been governor of the State.

CLARKE, MATTHEW ST. CLAIR, died at Washington May 6, 1852, aged 59; many years clerk of the house of representatives, and auditor of the treasury; highly respected.

CLARKE, DR. THADDEUS, died at New Brighton, Pa., Feb. 15, 1854, aged 83. He was a descendant of President Edwards, and imbibed his faith, and was a man of piety and benevolence. He lived in Lebanon till 1821; then removed to Pompey, N. Y.; and thence in 1843 to New Brighton for the sake of a more favorable climate: in all these places he was an eminent physician. In his last hours the songs of Zion as sung by his daughter-in-law refreshed him: "Jerusalem, my happy home," etc. For more than fifty years he was a Christian professor. He had eleven children. His daughter, Sarah Jane, born in 1823, in Pompey, N. Y., known as a writer with the signature of "Grace Greenwood," married Mr. Lippincott, of Philadelphia.

CLARKSON, GERARDUS, M. D., an eminent physician of Philadelphia, was the son of Matthew C., a merchant of New York, who died in 1770, and a descendant of David C., an English non-conforming minister of distinction, who died in 1686. Dr. Clarkson was a practitioner as early as 1774, and he died Sept. 19, 1790, aged 53. Rev. Dr. Finley married his sister in 1761. John Swanwick wrote a poem on his death.

CLARKSON, MATTHEW, general, a soldier of the Revolution, was distinguished in the war of Independence for his courage, talents, and integrity. He acted as aid-de-camp to Gen. Gates in the battle of Stillwater, in which, as he was carrying an order to the officer of the left wing, by passing in front of the American line when engaged, he received a severe wound in his neck. In his last years he was vice-president of the American Bible Society, and much of his time was devoted to the meetings of the managers. He died at New York, after an illness of five days, April 22, 1825, aged 66 years. Amiable, frank, affectionate, pure, and beneficent, his character was crowned by an exalted piety.

CLAVIGERO, ABBE, was the author of a history of Mexico, which was published in 2 vols. 4to. London, 1787.

CLAY, JOSEPH, a judge and a minister, was born at Savannah in 1764, and graduated at Princeton in 1784. His father, Joseph Clay, a Revolutionary patriot and soldier, judge of the county court, and an exemplary Christian, died at Savannah, Dec., 1804, aged 63. He was appointed the judge of the district court of Georgia in 1796, and resigned the office in 1801. Becoming in 1803 a member of the Baptist church in Savannah, he was ordained the next year as colleague with Mr. Holcombe, the pastor. Having visited New England, he was invited to settle as colleague with Dr. Stillman, a Baptist minister in Boston, and was installed Aug. 19, 1807. In Nov., 1808, he visited Savannah, and, finding his health declining, he asked a dismissal from his people. But, anxious to be in the bosom of his family, he returned in 1810 to Boston, where he died Jan. 11, 1811. His daughter married William R. Gray of Boston. Mr. Clay was highly respected for his learning, talents, piety, and benevolence. In college he was the most distinguished of his class. With an ample fortune he yet determined to live a life of toil in the best of causes. The circumstance of his relinquishing the office of a judge for that of a minister probably drew after him some hearers of the legal profession. After hearing him at Providence, Mr. Burrill, a lawyer, exclaimed to a friend, "See what a lawyer can do." The reply was, "See what the grace of God can do with a lawyer." He published his installation sermon, 1807.—Benedict, I. 403.

CLAY, ELIZABETH, mother of Henry, was the daughter of George Hudson of Hanover, Va., born in 1750. In her fifteenth year she married John Clay, a Baptist preacher, and became the mother of eight children. Her second husband was Henry Watkins, by whom also she had eight children. She was a faithful mother, with her hands full. In 1792, Mr. W. removed to Woodford county, Ky. She died in 1827, a Baptist professor. In 1848 only two children by each husband survived. Her son, Rev. Porter Clay of Camden, Ark., died 1850, aged 70.

CLAY, HENRY, died at Washington, June 29, 1852, aged 75. He was born April 12, 1777, in Hancock county, Va., the seventh son of Rev.

John Clay, a Baptist minister. Admitted to the bar at twenty, he removed to Lexington and soon had extensive practice. In 1808 he was guilty of the folly and wickedness of engaging in a duel with Humphrey Marshall. He was in the senate of the United States in 1806, and again in 1809. In 1811 he was in the house and was chosen speaker. In 1814 he was a commissioner at Ghent. In 1825 he was secretary of State under Mr. Adams. Again he was chargeable with the madness of fighting a duel; it was with John Randolph. He was re-elected to the senate in 1831, also in 1836; but he resigned his seat in 1842. He was re-chosen in 1849. Although a slaveholder himself, he said in debate in the senate: "I never can, and never will vote, and no earthly power will ever make me vote, to spread slavery over territory, where it does not exist." The passage of the Missouri compromise was much owing to his efforts; but he did not live to see its repeal, for the purpose of opening to slavery the immense territory west of Missouri, and this sacrifice of freedom to the slave-power introduced and supported in the senate by a northern aspirant to the presidency, yet a slaveholder, as a means of securing to himself the votes of the south. For the office of president, he was a candidate in 1832, and again in 1844; doubtless to such a man it was a deep-felt grief to be defeated. But the race is not to the swift. In ill health he visited Havana in 1850-51, but with no relief; he returned to Washington, but only to die. The death of three such aspirants to the presidency as Calhoun, Webster, and Clay may well teach the men of like claims what vanities they pursue. He was an earnest supporter of the colonization society. His wife, and three sons of his twelve children, survived him. In person he was tall and slender, and he stooped somewhat. His countenance expressed great placidity and suavity; his manners were somewhat elaborate; his eloquence was most varied, energetic, and persuasive. His life and times, in 2 vols. 8vo., second edition, was published by Calvin Colton in 1816.

CLAYPOOLE, David C., an editor, died at Philadelphia in 1849, aged 92, one of the proprietors of the Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser, the first daily newspaper, set up in 1775. The firm was Dunlap and C. The paper afterwards passed into the hands of Poulson. The records of the debates of congress from 1783 to 1799 are found in his paper.

CLAYTON, JOHN, an eminent botanist and physician of Virginia, died Dec. 15, 1773, aged 87. He was born at Fulham, in Great Britain, and came to Virginia with his father in 1705, aged about twenty years. His father was an eminent lawyer, and was appointed attorney-general of Virginia. Young Clayton was put into the office of Peter Beverly, who was clerk or prothonotary for Gloucester county, and, succeeding him in this office, filled it fifty-one years. During the year preceding his decease, such was the vigor of his constitution, even at his advanced period, and such his zeal in botanical researches, that he made a botanical tour through Orange county; and it is believed that he had visited most of the settled parts of Virginia. His residence was about twenty miles from the city of Williamsburg. His character stands high as a man of integrity, and as a citizen. He was a strict, though not ostentatious, observer of the worship of the church of England, and he seemed constantly piously disposed. He was heard to say, while examining a flower, that he could not look into one, without seeing the display of infinite power and contrivance, and that he thought it impossible for a botanist to be an atheist. He was a member of some of the most learned literary societies of Europe, and corresponded with Gronovius, Linnæus, and other able botanists. As a practical botanist he was perhaps inferior to no botanist of his time.

He left behind him two volumes of manuscripts, nearly prepared for the press, and a hortus siccus of folio size, with marginal notes and directions for the engraver in preparing the plates for his proposed work. This work, which was in the possession of his son, when the Revolutionary war commenced, was sent to William Clayton, clerk of New Kent, as to a place of security from the invading enemy. It was lodged in the office with the records of the county. An incendiary put a torch to the building; and thus perished not only the records of the county but the labors of Clayton.

Several of his communications, treating of the culture and different species of tobacco, were published in numbers 201, 204, 205, and 206, of the philosophical transactions; and in number 454 is an ample account of medicinal plants, which he had discovered growing in Virginia. He is chiefly known to the learned, especially in Europe, by his Flora Virginica, a work published by Gronovius at Leyden, in 8vo., 1739—1743, and again in 4to., in 1762. This is frequently referred to by Linnæus, and by all the succeeding botanists, who have had occasion to treat of the plants of North America. It is to be regretted, however, that they so frequently refer to the flora as the work of Gronovius, though its greatest value is derived from the masterly descriptions, communicated to the Leyden professor by Mr. Clayton.—Barton's Med. and Phys. Journal, II. 139-145; Rees' Cycl. American edit.; Miller, I. 142; II. 368.

CLAYTON, JOSHUA, a physician, was the president of Delaware from 1729 to 1793, and governor under the present constitution from 1793 to 1796, when he was succeeded by G. Bedford. In 1798 he was elected to the senate of the United States. He died in 1799. During the war, when the Peruvian bark was scarce, he substituted for it successfully in his practice the poplar, liriodendron tulipifera, combined with nearly an equal quantity of the bark of the root of the dogwood, cornus florida, and half the quantity of the inside bark of the white oak tree. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

CLAYTON, THOMAS, judge, died at Newcastle, Aug. 21, 1854, aged 76. He was a senator of the United States from 1823 to 1826, and from 1837 to 1847; and chief justice of the Delaware superior court.

CLEAVELAND, MOSES, the founder of a large family, came from Ipswich, England, a carpenter's apprentice; became a freeholder in Woburn, Mass., in 1643; married Ann Winn, 1648, and died in 1702. They had seven sons and three daughters. These all married and all had children. From them are doubtless descended all in this country, who bear the name of Cleaveland and Cleveland, as the name is variously written.

CLEAVELAND, AARON, a minister, died in Philadelphia in 1757, aged 42. Born at Cambridge, Mass., he was a grandson of Aaron, the third child of Moses of Woburn. He graduated at Harvard in 1735. He was a prodigy of physical strength and agility. In 1739 he was ordained over the Congregational church in Haddam, Conn., where he stayed seven years. From 1747 to 1750 he was pastor in Malden, Mass. His next move was to Halifax, N. S., where he became an Episcopalian. In 1755 he went to England, and returned as an Episcopal missionary to certain parts of Delaware. Two years afterward, while on a journey to visit his family in New England, he was taken sick in Philadelphia, and died in the house of his friend, Dr. Franklin. In early life, he was an admirer of Whitefield, and a zealous as well as able preacher. There is no reason to think that his denominational change impaired his ardor or efficiency. It is much, that the great Franklin honored and praised him. It is more and better, that the people of his charge loved him and mourned for him. He married Susanna, daughter of Rev. Aaron Foster of Medford, and left a large family. Of these, his daughter, Susanna Cleaveland, married Stephen Higginson, a distinguished Boston merchant. Rev. Thomas W. Higginson of Worcester, and Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng of New York, are her grandsons.

CLEAVELAND, JOHN, minister of Ipswich, Mass., died April 22, 1799, aged 77. He was born in Canterbury, Conn., April 22, 1722. He was graduated at Yale college in 1745, and while a member of that institution he exhibited that independence and courage in the cause of truth, for which he was ever distinguished. While at home during a vacation in 1744, he attended a separate meeting, for which, on his return to college, he was required to make a confession. He justified himself on the ground, that he was a member of the church, and attended the meeting with his father and a majority of the church. The same defence was made by Ebenezer Cleaveland, also of Canterbury, who was involved in the same difficulty. They were both expelled from college. This act of persecution, especially as Episcopalians were tolerated in their own worship, awakened the public indignation. Distinguished men, among whom was Dr. E. Wheelock, advised him to petition the Connecticut assembly for redress, and assured him of their aid. About twenty years afterwards Rector Clap sent him his degree, and the catalogue dates it in 1745, with his class, — with whom he spent three years in successful study. He was a descendant of Moses; his grandfather, Josiah, was a pioneer settler of Canterbury; his parents were Josiah and Abigail. Having obtained a license to preach, he ministered to a Separatist society in Boston, in that Huguenot church in School street, where Daillé and Le Mercier had before preached to the expatriated Bowdoin and Amorys. Declining an invitation to settle there, he accepted a call from the parish of Chebacco in Ipswich, now the town of Essex. Here his earnest ministry of fifty-two years ended only with his life, after a short and painful illness. In 1758 he went as the chaplain of Col. Bagley's regiment, in Abercrombie's ill-starred expedition. His journal, kept daily on the spot, and letters to his "dear and loving wife," present a lively image of the scenes through which he passed. His brother chaplains of the provincial forces were all respectable clergymen, good and faithful ministers, as well as true patriots. During their long encampment at fort George, it was their custom to meet twice a week, under some tent or booth, to strengthen each other by mutual converse, prayer, and exhortation. To these scenes of Christian labor, as depicted by Mr. C., Mr. Bancroft alludes in the narration of the time. In the following year, he went in the same capacity and the same regiment to Louisburg, already in British hands. The year 1763 was made joyful to him by a great revival of piety among his people. In the controversies, which about this time sprung up with his mother country, he took a warm interest. Espousing heartily the American side, he devoted to it a ready tongue and a ready pen. With the first sound of war he was again in the field. He served as chaplain at Cambridge — while in the same camp were two of his brothers, and all four of his sons. In 1776 he was with the army, for a time, in Connecticut and New York. These occasional absences from his flock seem but to have endeared him to them the more. An enlarged acquaintance with men and things undoubtedly widened and liberalized his views, without abating the fervor of his piety. It appears that after a few unhappy years of religious dissension, the two congregations in Chebacco re-united under him and went on in harmony. He was a man of strong constitution and ardent temperament. An earnest spirit, an unpolished energy, and a sincerity, which none could question, characterized him in the pulpit. His familiarity with the Scriptures was proverbial. His general learning was respectable. His writings, though often forcible and fervid, could lay no claim to elegance. He was not afraid of controversy, and more than once ventured into the camps of polemic, as well as those of natural war. In his dispute with Dr. Mayhew, several ponderous pamphlets appeared on both sides. Mr. C. had blue eyes, and a florid complexion, was nearly six feet high, erect and muscular; his voice was heavy and of great compass, and his gestures were appropriate. In his preaching he was not confined to written sermons. Dr. Emmons said of him, that he was "a pattern of piety and an ornament to the Christian and clerical profession." His faithful labors were crowned with great success; at one period, in about six months, one hundred persons were added to his church. He died in peace and hope on his seventy-seventh birth-day. His first wife was Mary, daughter of Parker Dodge, and great-granddaughter of John Choate of Ipswich. They reared four sons and three daughters. She died in 1768. He next married Mary Neale Foster, widow of Capt. John F. She survived him eleven years. In both connections he was eminently happy. It was his custom to devote particular days to private fasting and prayer.

He published a narrative of the work of God at Chebacco in 1763 and 1764; an essay to defend some of the most important principles in the protestant reformed system of Christianity, more especially Christ's sacrifice and atonement, against the injurious aspersions cast on the same by Dr. Mayhew in a thanksgiving sermon, 1763; a reply to Dr. Mayhew's letter of reproof, 1765; a treatise on infant baptism, 1784. — Parish's Fun. Ser.; Mass. Miss. Mag. II. 129-133; Backus, III. 241; Pan. XII. 49.

CLEAVELAND, EBENEZER, brother of the preceding, the minister of Gloucester, now Rockport, Mass., died July 4, 1805, aged 79. His parents were Josiah and Abigail. Expelled from Yale college with his brother John in 1744 and for the same reasons, he yet after some years obtained his degree, and is mentioned in the catalogue as a graduate of 1748, which was the time of the graduation of his class. He went to Rockport, then called Sandy Bay, in 1751, and was settled in 1755 in a new church, remaining the minister for twenty years. He was chaplain in the French war of 1758, and in the triumphant Canada expedition in 1759. In the Revolutionary war, he also served as a chaplain. After being some years in Landaff, Randolph, and Amesbury, he returned to Rockport. His lot was cast in hard places and in hard times; and he had a large family and domestic causes of uneasiness, so that his life was that of a worthy man struggling with adversity. His son Ebenezer was a captain in the continental service. His daughter Mary married professor John Smith of Dartmouth college. She was the mother of two daughters, still living in 1856; Abby Smith, widow of Dr. Cyrus Perkins, of New York, formerly professor in the Medical School at Dartmouth, and Mary Cleaveland Smith, married to John Bryant, a prosperous merchant of Boston, one of the eight or ten wealthiest men of that city.

CLEAVELAND, PARKER, a physician and patriot of the Revolution, the son of John, died in Feb., 1826, aged 74. He was born in Ipswich in 1751, and settled as a physician at Byfield, a parish of Rowley, at the age of 19. During the first year of the war he was the surgeon of a regiment. He was frequently a representative of Rowley in the legislature. As a physician he was intelligent and skilful. But the glory of his character was his religion. He read much in theology. After much investigation he embraced and earnestly supported the orthodox doctrines; and he exhibited also "the best affections and graces of the Christian character. He was benevolent, humble, and devout. Emphatically might he be called a man of prayer." At different periods of revivals of religion he exerted a pious and useful influence. In affliction and adverse circumstances he was resigned and cheerful; and from every earthly care he found a relief in the love of his Redeemer. His sons, who have long been men of distinction, are Professor Parker C., of Bowdoin college, and Rev. Dr. John P. C., of Lowell. — Boston Recorder, March 3, 1826.

CLEAVELAND, BENJAMIN, colonel, removed before the Revolution from Culpepper co., Va., to Wilkes co., N. C. During the war he was commander of a militia regiment in Wilkes, and he was one of the five partisan colonels who achieved the victory of King's Mountain. His sons, Absalom and John, were officers in the same service. The latter as capt. of dragoons was in the battle of Camden. Col. Cleaveland removed afterwards to South Carolina. His descendants are numerous and respectable.

CLEAVELAND, STEPHEN, captain, son of Rev. Aaron C., died in Salem in 1801, aged 61. Born in East Haddam, he was left destitute by his father's death, and went to sea at the age of fourteen. In the French war of 1756 he was seized by a British press-gang in Boston and detained in service until the peace of 1763. Soon after the Declaration of Independence he received a commission as captain from congress, bearing the names of Benjamin Franklin, Benjamin Harrison, and Robert Morris, which is still preserved. This is believed to have been the first naval commission issued by our government, after we became an independent people. Capt. C. sailed soon after from Salem in the small brig Despatch, laden with sperm oil, fish, potash, &c., for Bordeaux. After a long delay in that port, during which he carried on a correspondence with Silas Deane, Arthur Lee, and Dr. Franklin, he obtained the material of war, for which he had been sent, and brought the welcome freight safely into Boston. Before he sailed he had been promised the command of one of the three frigates, then in the process of construction. But in consequence of his long delay in France, others got the appointments, and his ambitious spirit would not suffer him to accept an inferior post. His wife was Margaret, daughter of James Jeffrey. Their eldest child, Richard Jeffrey, still living in Salem, has also been a man of various adventure. His well written narrative of his own "Voyages and commercial enterprises," published in two volumes, has been read by thousands. It is a work full of interest, and one which leaves on the mind a most agreeable impression of its author. From 1829 to 1834, Capt. R. J. Cleveland was U. S. vice consul at Havana.

CLEAVELAND, AARON, minister of Royalton, Vt., and missionary, died in New Haven Sept. 21, 1815, aged 71. He was the son of Rev. Aaron C., of Haddam. He was preparing for college, when his father died. This event compelled him to learn a trade. He became a hatter, and followed the business for many years in Norwich and in Guilford, Conn. During this period he was more than once an active and intelligent member of the State legislature. At this time he held the doctrine of the Universalists, and was a leader among them. Other views at length took possession of his mind. He became a decided Calvinist, and soon resolved to preach the faith which he had so long derided. He was settled for a year or two in Royalton, Vt., and labored as a missionary. His last days were spent in New Haven, Conn. He was a man of more than ordinary powers. To plain good sense, he added a fine poetic taste and ready wit. He was twice married. By his first wife, Abiah Hyde of Norwich, he had ten children. By the second wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Clement Breed, he had five more children. The venerable Rev. Charles Cleveland, as he writes his name, for many years past a faithful missionary among the poor of Boston, traversing its streets at the age of 83 or 84, was his third child. Mrs. Abiah Hyde Cox, wife of Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Cox, was the thirteenth on the list. In the third generation may be enumerated the late Rev. Richard F. Cleveland, son of William, Rev. A. Cleveland Cox of Baltimore, and Professor Charles Dexter Cleveland, son of Charles, of Philadelphia. A host of Clevelands, Pratts, Smiths, Dodges, and Coxes, who trace their descent from Aaron Cleaveland, have no reason to be ashamed of their ancestor. He published some political poetic satires, also a poem in blank verse on slavery, 1775.

CLEAVELAND, JOHN, minister of Stoneham, Mass., died at North Wrentham in 1818, aged 68. He was the eldest son of Rev. John C., of Ipswich. He was fitted for college, but was prevented from entering by ill health. When the war began he enlisted in the Revolutionary army. He soon obtained a lieutenant's commission, and remained in the service during the war. His thoughts had long been turned towards the ministry. In 1785, he settled at Stoneham, near Boston, where he remained about ten years. He was subsequently settled at North Wrentham. He was a man of respectable talents and of rare piety. At Wrentham, Dr. Emmons of Franklin was his near neighbor and intimate friend. To his fidelity as a pastor, Dr. E., in the funeral discourse, paid a just and affectionate tribute. He was twice married. His first wife was his cousin, Abigail Adams of Canterbury, Conn. The second wife was Elizabeth Evans of Stoneham, who survived him, and became the wife of Rev. Dr. Harris of Dunbarton, N. H. He had no children.

CLEAVELAND, MOSES, general, died in Canterbury, Conn., in 1806, aged 52. He was the son of Col. Aaron C., the brother of John and Ebenezer, who died after sixty fits of the palsy and apoplexy, April 14, 1785, aged 57, descended from either Josiah or Samuel C., who were settlers of C., about 1690. He entered Yale college, but soon left to take part in the great struggle for liberty, and served, for a time, as captain of a company of sappers and miners. He subsequently returned to New Haven and took his degree in 1777. He became a lawyer, and soon made himself known as a man of talent and energy. He was repeatedly in the legislature, and held high command in the militia. In 1796 he went to Ohio, as a commissioner to treat with the Indians and make purchases in the western reserve. The site of Cleveland now a fair and fast growing city, was his selection, and from him the place received its name. He was brave, ardent, and patriotic: a man of cheerful temper, of ready humor, and the most free-hearted hospitality. His wife was Esther Champion of Colchester. Their daughter, Mary Esther, was married to Prof. Andrew Harris of the New Haven medical school. Another daughter, Frances A., is the wife of Samuel Morgan of Norwich. His brother, Judge William Pitt Cleaveland, died in New London in 1845, aged about 70, a graduate of Yale in 1793. There was a graduate of the same name in 1816, who died in 1841.

CLEAVELAND, NEHEMIAH, M. D., died at Topsfield, Mass., Feb. 26, 1837, aged 76, the youngest son of Rev. John C., of Ipswich. At the age of 16 he attended his father during the siege of Boston in 1775; in 1777 he enlisted in the army for about a year. Then he toiled on his father's little farm. Having studied physic with his brother, and with Dr. Manning of Ipswich, he entered on the practice at Topsfield in 1783. Together with his employment as a physician, his services were often required in various public offices. A zealous federalist in politics, he was for years a useful member of the senate. From 1823 to 1828 he was chief justice of the court of sessions. His form was well-proportioned, and he was of large stature and commanding aspect. A print of him from a picture by Cole may be seen in the address at Topsfield celebration in 1850 by his son, Nehemiah Cleaveland. His constitution was vigorous and his health unbroken until his fiftieth year: from that period he suffered much from one of the most painful of maladies. In other respects he had a happy old age, employed in his profession, imparting sound advice to his neighbors, seeking the welfare of the church and the general interests of Zion. Then he had the consolation of books and the pleasures of home. "His setting sun went gently down, while the brightness of a better day seemed to glow in the departing orb, and left its consoling radiance behind." His first wife, who died childless in four years, in 1791, was Lucy, the daughter of Dr. Manning. His second wife, the mother of nine children, was Experience, the daughter of Dr. Elisha Lord of Pomfret, Conn.; she died in 1845 at the house of her son-in-law, Rev. O. A. Taylor, aged 81. Five of her children were living in 1856, William, at Topsfield, Nehemiah C., at Brooklyn, N. Y., a distinguished teacher and scholar, a graduate of Bowdoin college in 1813, John C., a lawyer in the city of New York, a graduate of Bowdoin in 1826, and Rev. Dr. Elisha Lord C., a minister in New Haven, a graduate of 1829. His daughter, Mary, married Rev. O. A. Taylor. The following are some of the verses of the hymn, written by Nehemiah Cleaveland and sung at the two hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the town.

"Then came the pious task to rear
Meet shrines, Benignant Power, for Thee:
Schools free as air were founded here,
And law, and sacred liberty.

"O Thou, whose arm, all-powerful, bore
Those pilgrims o'er the storm-swept sea,
And help'd them plant along this shore
These homesteads of the brave and free,—

"Here, where our fathers hymn'd thy name,
List to their grateful children's praise,
And still be ours the heavenly flame
That warm'd their hearts in olden days."

CLEAVELAND, NEHEMIAH, deacon, a Revolutionary pensioner, died at Skanateles, New York, Oct. 25, 1843, aged 90. A native of Mansfield, Conn., he lived for a period in Williamsburg, Mass.

CLEVELAND, JOSIAH, captain, of Owego, died at Charlestown, Mass., June 30, 1843, aged 89, and was buried at Mount Auburn in Cambridge. Born in Canterbury, Conn., he was an officer, and served in the war of the Revolution, and fought in various battles, first at Bunker Hill. It was to attend the commemoration on finishing the monument at Bunker Hill, that he came five-hundred miles, which he witnessed, and died.

CLEEVES, GEORGE, an early settler and distinguished magistrate of Maine, lived at Spurrink, Cape Elizabeth, in 1630, associated in business with Richard Tucker. In 1632 they commenced the settlement at Casco and erected the first house on the Neck, called Machigonne by the Indians, then Cleeves' Neck and Munjoy's Neck, now Portland. In 1643 he was appointed by Rigby his deputy in the government of Ligonias, and was a large land-owner under grants from Gorges and Rigby. He died at Portland between Nov., 1666, and Jan., 1671, at an advanced age, probably more than 90. The Bracketts are his descendants. An ample account of him is given in Willis' history of Portland. — Maine Hist. Coll. i. 124.

CLEVELAND, HENRY RUSSELL, of Boston, died at St. Louis June 12, 1843, aged 34. He graduated at Harvard in 1827. The life of Hudson in Sparks' Biography was written by him: he was also the editor of an edition of Sallust much approved, and the author of a volume on classical studies.

CLEVINGER, SHOBAI L. VAL, an eminent sculptor, died at sea Sept. 28, 1843. He was born in Middletown, Ohio, in 1812: his father was a weaver, who removed to Indian Creek. At the age of 15 he went to Centreville to learn stone-cutting with his brother, who was employed on the canal. He was soon afflicted with the ague and fever and returned home. Next he went to Cincinnati and was employed by Mr. Guino, a stone-cutter. Here he married Elizabeth Wright. At length he went into partnership with Mr. Bassett. His chiselling of a cherub on a tomb-stone attracted the notice of Mr. Thomas, editor of the Evening Post. He soon, without a clay model, cut from the stone an excellent bust of Mr. Thomas. Going to Boston, he made a bust of Mr. Webster; and also of Mr. Biddle, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Van Buren. He then went to Italy, where he spent several years. His great work was an Indian, bold and wild, which was much admired by the Italians. Returning with his family, he sailed from Leghorn, but in ten days he died of the consumption on his passage.

CLIFFORD, JOHN D., a man of science, died at Lexington, Ky., May 8, 1820, aged 42. He formed a valuable cabinet of natural history, and published essays on the antiquities of the western country, in the Western Review, 1819 and 1820.

CLIFTON, WILLIAM, a poet, the son of a rich mechanic in Philadelphia, was born in 1772, and was educated as a Quaker, but in the latter part of his life threw off the Quaker dress and manners. He died of the consumption in Dec., 1799, aged 26. He published an epistle to Mr. Gifford, in an edition of Gifford's poems, evincing much poetical power. He also commenced, but did not finish, a poem called the Chimeriad, in which, under the character of the witch, Chimeria, the genius of false philosophy is portrayed. His poems were printed at New York, 12mo., 1800. Much of his poetry is of a satirical, political cast, containing vituperations of the French revolutionists and of the party to which he was opposed. — Encyclopedia Amer.; Knapp's Lect. 179; Specimens American Poetry, II. 86.

CLINTON, GEORGE, governor of the colony of New York before the Revolution, was the youngest son of Francis Clinton, the earl of Lincoln. He was appointed governor in 1743. His administration of ten years was turbulent. He was engaged in a violent controversy with the general assembly, instigated by chief justice James Delaney, the ruling demagogue of that period. Mr. Horsemander wrote against the governor; Mr. Colden in his favor. The governor was the friend of Sir William Johnson. Mr. Clinton was succeeded in Oct., 1753, by Sir D. O.borne, who in two days, in consequence of political troubles, committed suicide. He was afterwards governor of Greenwich hospital. — Hist. Coll., VII. 79; Lempriere.

CLINTON, CHARLES, the ancestor of the family of Clintons in New York, died in Ulster, afterwards Orange county, Nov. 19, 1773. He was a descendant of Wm. C., who, after being an adherent of Charles I., took refuge in the north of Ireland. James, the son of Wm., married Elizabeth Smith, the daughter of a captain in Cromwell's army, and was the father of Charles, who was born in the county of Longford, Ireland, in 1690. Having induced a number of his friends to join him in the project of emigrating to America, he chartered a ship for Philadelphia in 1729 and sailed May 20th. On the passage it was ascertained, that the captain had formed the design to starve the passengers in order to seize their property. Among those, who died, were a son and daughter of Mr. Clinton. It was now proposed to wrest the command from the captain; but there was not energy enough in the passengers to make the attempt. At length they were landed at Cape Cod, Oct. 4th. It was not till the spring of 1731, that they removed and formed a settlement in the county of Ulster, State of New York, about sixty miles from the city and eight miles west of the river. Mr. Clinton was a farmer and land surveyor. His house was surrounded by a palisade, against the Indians. He was made judge of the county court; and in 1756 was appointed lieutenant-colonel under Col. Oliver Delaney. He served under Bradstreet at the capture of fort Frontenac. Of his four sons in America, Alexander, a graduate in the third class at Princeton, in 1750, was a physician; Charles was a surgeon in the army, which took Havana in 1762, and died in April, 1791; James was major-general; and George vice president of the United States. With an uncommon genius and a fund of useful knowledge, he was affable and interesting in conversation. He was tall, graceful, and dignified. The duties of the various relations of private life were regarded by him; and he was a patriot and a sincere Christian. — Lord's Lempriere; Rogers' Biog. Dictionary; N. Y. Statesman, Aug. 23, 1828.

CLINTON, JAMES, brigadier-general, the fourth son of the preceding, died Dec. 22, 1812, aged 75. He was born in Ulster county, N. Y., Aug. 9, 1736. He received a good education. In 1756 he was a captain under Bradstreet at fort Frontenac, and captured a French sloop of war on Lake Ontario. In 1763 he was appointed captain commandant of four companies, raised for the defence of Ulster and Orange, whose western frontiers were exposed to the inroads of the savages. In the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was appointed colonel June 30, 1775, and accompanied Montgomery to Canada. He was made brigadier-general Aug. 9, 1776. In Oct., 1777, he commanded, under Gov. Clinton, at fort Clinton, which, with fort Montgomery, separated from each other by a creek, defended the Hudson against the ascent of the enemy below West Point. Sir Henry Clinton, in order to favor the designs of Burgoyne, attacked these forts Oct. 6th, with three thousand men, and carried them by storm, as they were defended by only about five hundred militia. A brave resistance was made from four o'clock until it was dark, when the garrison were overpowered. Gen. Clinton was severely wounded by a bayonet, but escaped. After riding a little distance he dismounted, that he might escape the pursuing enemy, and taking the bridle from his horse slid down a precipice one hundred feet to the creek, which separated the forts. Thus he reached the mountain at a secure distance. In the morning he found a horse,

In 1779 he joined with sixteen hundred men General Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians. Proceeding up the Mohawk in batteaux about fifty-four miles above Schenectady, he conveyed them from Canajoharie to the head of the Otsego lake, one of the sources of the Susquehannah, down which he was to join Sullivan. As the water in the outlet of the lake was too low to float his batteaux, he constructed a dam across it, and thus accumulated the water in the lake. By letting out this water his boats and troops were rapidly conveyed to Tioga, where he joined Sullivan, who had ascended the Susquehannah. During most of the war General Clinton was stationed in command of the northern department at Albany. But he was afterwards present at the capture of Cornwallis. On the evacuation of New York, bidding the commander-in-chief an affectionate farewell, he retired to his estate. Yet was he afterwards called by his fellow-citizens to various public services, being a commissioner to adjust the boundary line with Pennsylvania, representative, delegate to the convention of 1801 for amending the constitution, and senator; and in all his labors manifesting integrity and ability. He was buried at Little Britain, in Orange county. His temper was affectionate and mild, but capable of being roused to vehemence by injuries and insults. His wife, Mary De Witt, was of a family which emigrated from Holland. — Rogers' Biog. Dict.; Encyc. Amer.; Lord's Lempriere.

CLINTON, GEORGE, governor of New York and vice president of the United States, died at Washington April 20, 1812, aged 72. He was named after the colonial governor, a friend of his father. He was the youngest son of Col. Charles Clinton, and was born in Ulster county, now Orange, July 26, 1739. In his education his father was assisted by Daniel Thain, a minister from Scotland. In early life he evinced the enterprise which distinguished him afterwards. He once left his father's house and sailed in a privateer. On his return he accompanied as a lieutenant his brother, James, in the expedition against fort Frontenac, now Kingston. He afterwards studied law under William Smith, and rose to some distinction in his native country. As a member of the colonial assembly in 1775 and afterwards, he was a zealous whig. May 15, 1775, he took his seat as a member of congress. He voted for the declaration of independence, July 4, 1776; but, being called away by his appointment as brigadier-general before the instrument was ready for the signature of the members, his name is not attached to it. March 25, 1777, he was appointed brigadier-general of the United States. At the first election under the constitution of New York, he was chosen, April 20, 1777, both governor and lieutenant-governor. Accepting the former office, the latter was filled by Mr. Van Cortlandt. He was thus elected chief magistrate six successive periods, or for eighteen years, till 1795, when he was succeeded by Mr. Jay. Being at the head of a powerful State, and in the command of the militia, his patriotic services were of the highest importance to his country. On the advance of the enemy up the Hudson in Oct., 1777, he prolegued the assembly and proceeded to take command of fort Montgomery, where he and his brother James made a most gallant defence Oct. 6th. He escaped under cover of the night. The next day forts Independence and Constitution were evacuated. He presided in the convention at Poughkeepsie, June 17, 1788, for deliberating on the federal constitution, which he deemed not sufficiently guarded in favor of the sovereignty of each State. After being five years in private life, he was elected to the legislature. Again in 1801 was he chosen governor, but in 1804 was succeeded by Mr. Lewis. In that year he was elevated to the vice presidency of the United States, in which station he continued till his death. It was by his casting vote that the bill for renewing the bank charter was negatived. In private life he was frank, amiable, and warm in friendship. By his wife, Cornelia Tappan, of Kingston, he had one son and five daughters, of whom but one daughter was living in 1832. His daughter, Maria, wife of Dr. S. D. Beekman, died in April, 1829; his second daughter, Cornelia, wife of E. C. Genet, died March, 1810, aged 35; his third daughter, Elizabeth, widow of Matthias Talmadge, died April, 1825, aged 45. Another daughter married Col. Van Cortlandt, and died in 1811. An oration on his death was delivered by Gouverneur Morris.

Of his energy and decision the following are instances. At the conclusion of the war, when a British officer was placed on a cart in the city of New York, to be tarred and feathered, he rushed in among the mob with a drawn sword and rescued the sufferer. During the raging of what was called the doctor's mob, when, in consequence of the disinterment of some bodies for dissection, the houses of the physicians were in danger of being pulled down, he called out the militia and quelled the turbulence. The following is an instance of the skill with which he diverted attention from his growing infirmities. On a visit to Pittsfield, as he was rising from a dinner table in his old age, he fell, but was caught by a lady sitting next to him. "Thus," said he, "should I ever wish to fall—into the hands of the ladies." For many years he suffered much by the rheumatism. — Delaplaine's Repository; Encyclopedie Americana; Lord's Lempriere; Rogers; Marshall, v. 396; Almon's Remembrancer, 1780, 160.

CLINTON, HENRY, Sir, an English general, son of the colonial governor C., was the grandson of the earl of Lincoln. After distinguishing himself in the battle of Bunker Hill in 1775, he was sent unsuccessfully against New York and Charleston. He afterwards, in Sept., 1776, occupied the city of New York. Oct. 6, 1777, he assaulted and took forts Clinton and Montgomery. In 1778 he succeeded Howe in the command at Philadelphia, whence Washington compelled him to retire. In May, 1780, he took Charleston. It was he who negotiated with Arnold in his treason. He returned to England in 1782, and died Dec. 22, 1795. A few months before his death he was made governor of Gibraltar. He published a narrative of his conduct in America, 1782; observations on Cornwallis' answer, 1783; observations on Stedman, 1784.

CLINTON, DE WITT, LL. D., governor of New York, died at Albany Feb. 11, 1828, aged 59. He was the son of Gen. James Clinton, and was born at Little Britain, in Orange county, March 2, 1769. He was graduated at Columbia college, with the highest honors of his class, in 1786. Although he studied law under Samuel Jones, he was never much engaged in the practice. After having been private secretary of his uncle Gov. George Clinton, he was elected to the senate of New York in 1799. He was two years before in the house. It was a time of violent party excitement; he entered into the struggle with all his energy, and was one of the champions of democracy. At this period, as afterwards, he was the friend of education, the sciences, and the arts, and advocated liberal grants to Union college and the common schools. He exerted himself also to procure the abolition of slavery in New York. As a member of the council of appointment, he claimed a co-ordinate right of nomination, in which claim he and a majority of the council were resisted by Gov. Jay. By reason of this controversy all the officers of the State held over for one year. In 1801 the constitution was amended, allowing the co-ordinate nomination. In July, 1802, he betrayed a want of moral and religious principle by fighting a duel with John Swartwout, arising from political controversy concerning Mr. Burr. In the same year he was appointed a senator of the United States, in which station he voted for the treaty with the Creek Indians, guaranteeing to them the peaceful possession of their own territory in Georgia. In the difficulty with Spain concerning the navigation of the Mississippi, he successfully, in a powerful speech, resisted the attempt of the federal party to plunge the country into war. His last vote in the senate was to confirm the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana. He was chosen mayor of New York, an office of great emolument and patronage, in 1803, and annually, — excepting in 1807 and 1810, — until 1815, exerting himself to promote in every way the prosperity of the city. Under his auspices the historical society and the academy of arts were incorporated; the city hall was founded; the orphan asylum established; and the city fortified. While he was mayor, he was also, during several years, a senator and the lieutenant-governor, engaging with zeal and with strong ambition in the political movements of the day. He could not be content without being a prominent leader. In respect to the war of 1812, he was opposed to its declaration, as inexpedient and injurious; yet, after it was commenced, he made every effort to call forth the energies of the country against the enemy. In 1812, he consented to become the candidate of the peace party for the presidency of the United States, and received eighty-nine votes, Mr. Madison obtaining one hundred and twenty-eight and being re-elected. By thus arraying himself against Madison, Clinton alienated from himself many of his former friends.

In 1815 he became a private citizen. In 1816 he was appointed a canal commissioner and president of the board; he had been a member of the first board, with Gov. Morris, Stephen Van Rensselaer, and others, in 1810; but nothing was effected until April, 1817, when, in consequence of the exertions of Mr. Clinton, a law was passed, authorizing the Erie canal, three hundred and sixty-three miles in length, at an estimated expense of five millions of dollars. Being in the next month elected governor, in his able message to the legislature he called their attention, among other subjects, to the great interests of education and of internal improvement, particularly to the proposed most important canal. During his administration of three years, a strong party was arrayed against him. He was however re-elected in 1820 against Mr. Tompkins. But his opponents obtained majorities in both branches of the legislature, so that, when under the amended constitution, limiting the term of office to two years, a new election came on in 1822, Mr. Clinton, in order to avoid certain defeat, withdrew from the contest. Yet the various measures of his administration had all been wisely directed to promote the public welfare. In regard to education he remarked to the legislature: "It cannot be too forcibly inculcated, nor too generally understood, that in promoting the great interests of moral and intellectual cultivation, there can be no prodigality in the application of the public treasure."

He acted as a president of the board of canal commissioners in 1823 and 1824; but in this last year the legislature, without accusation, removed him from this place. This flagrant act of injustice towards the father of the great system of internal improvement roused the indignation of the people. He was immediately nominated for governor, and was elected by a majority of sixteen thousand votes over his antagonist. During his administration, the Erie canal was in 1825 finished, and the completion of the work was celebrated throughout the State. Re-elected in 1826, he in that year declined the embassy to England, which Mr. Adams offered him. At this period, the most important measure which he recommended was an amendment of the constitution, making the right of suffrage universal. The change was made by the people; but there were those who regarded the recommendation as arising from the desire of gaining popularity. He died suddenly from a disease of the heart, in consequence of a catarrhal affection of the throat and chest. His first wife was Maria Franklin, the daughter of an eminent merchant of New York, by whom he had seven sons and three daughters, of whom four sons and two daughters survived him. His second wife was Catherine Jones, the daughter of Dr. Thomas Jones.

Mr. Clinton was a member, and the president of various learned societies, before which he was frequently invited to deliver discourses, in all which, as well as in his official communications, he displayed the energies of an enlightened and comprehensive intellect. His title as the head of the freemasons was sufficiently ridiculous: "Most Excellent General Grand High Priest of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States!" In his person he was tall and of a commanding aspect. His manners were distant and reserved; yet was he cheerful, and kind, and sincere in friendship. He rose early and toiled incessantly for the enlargement of his knowledge. There is no doubt that he was ambitious, and that he was looking higher than the office of governor. But his political measures deserve to be commended, as subservient to the prosperity and honor of the State. His failure to reach the height to which he aimed in the national government, and his sudden removal from the world, present a new and striking instance of the vanity of earthly pursuits. They who fix their aim upon any object beneath the sky will be disappointed; even the man of ambition, who gains the desired and giddy eminence, will not there be happy. In Hosack's life of Clinton, there is published a letter, addressed to him by one of the ministers of New York, deploring his neglect of an important religious duty, and pointing out a path, which leads to the unwithering honors of a future life. He published a discourse before the New York historical society, 1811; discourse before the literary and philosophical society of New York, 1815; and in the transactions of that society, remarks on the fishes of the western waters of New York; discourse before the American academy of the arts, 1816; a discourse before the Phi Beta Kappa society, 1823; address before the American Bible society, 1823 and 1825; address to the freemasons on resigning a high office, 1825.—Hosack's Memoirs; American Ann. Reg. 1827-29, p. 151-166; Proudfit's Sermon; Renwick's Life of C.

CLINTON, ISAAC, minister of Southwick, Mass., died at Lowville, N. Y., March 18, 1840, aged 82. A graduate of Yale in 1786, he was pastor from 1788 to 1807. He published a treatise on baptism.—Holland, II. 114.

CLYMER, GEORGE, a patriot of the Revolution, died at Morrisville, Penn., Jan. 23, 1813, aged 73. He was born in Philadelphia in 1739. He received a good education and acquired a taste for books; but engaged in mercantile pursuits. He early espoused the cause of his country. In 1773 he resolutely opposed the sale of tea, sent out by the British government. Not a pound was sold in Philadelphia. In 1775 he was one of the first continental treasurers. As a member of congress, he the next year signed the Declaration of Independence. In 1774 the furniture of his house in Chester county, twenty-five miles from Philadelphia, was destroyed by the enemy. In this year he was commissioner to the Indians to preserve peace and enlist warriors from the Shawanese and Delaware tribes. In this capacity he resided for a while at Pittsburg. In 1780 he co-operated with Robert Morris in the establishment of a bank for the relief of the country. Again was he a member of congress in 1780; but in 1782 he removed to Princeton for the education of his children. After the adoption of the constitution he was again a member of congress. On the passage of the bill for imposing a duty on distilled spirits in 1791, he was placed at the head of the excise department in Pennsylvania. The insurrection made the duties sufficiently disagreeable; and he resigned the office. In 1796 he was sent to Georgia, to negotiate, together with Hawkins and Pickens, a treaty with the Cherokee and Creek Indians. He was afterwards president of the Philadelphia bank and of the academy of fine arts. His wife was the daughter of Mr. Meredith. Joseph Hopkinson pronounced an eulogy upon his character. In his various stations he was remarkable for the punctual and conscientious discharge of duty. He had a delicacy of taste, and was attached to the refined pursuits of a cultivated genius. The improvement of his country awakened his constant solicitude.—Goodrich's Lives.

CLYMER, GEORGE, inventor of a printing-press, lived in Philadelphia; he died in London Sept. 4, 1834, aged 80.

COBB, EBENEZER, remarkable for longevity, died at Kingston, Mass., Dec. 8, 1801, aged 107. He was born in Plymouth March 22, 1694, and was ten years contemporary with Peregrine White, of Marshfield, the first son of New England, who was born on board the Mayflower in Cape Cod harbor, in Nov., 1620. His days were passed in cultivating the earth. His mode of living was simple. Only twice in his life, and then it was to gratify his brethren on a jury, did he substitute an enervating cup of tea in place of the invigorating bowl of broth, or the nutritive porringer of milk. He never used glasses, but for several years could not see to read. He was of a moderate stature, stooping in attitude, having an expanded chest, and of a fair and florid countenance. He enjoyed life in his old age, and in his last year declared that he had the same attachment to life as ever. He was a professed Christian. As he approached the close of his days, he shrewdly replied to some one, who made a remark upon his expected dissolution, "It is very rare that persons of my age die." His posterity were not numerous, being only one hundred and eighty-five. — Columbian Centinel, Dec. 16, 1801; N. Y. Spect., Dec. 23.

COBB, THOMAS, captain, died in Jersey City Feb. 17, 1845, aged 85. A native of Parsippany, he was engaged in thirteen battles of the war, and not wounded, though he saw eleven men fall at his side.

COBB, OLIVER, D. D., died at Sippican, Rochester, Mass., June 23, 1849, aged 79. Born in Kingston, he graduated at Brown university, and was ordained at R. Feb. 6, 1799, and was for more than fifty years the pastor of the church. He had prepared, but did not preach a half-century sermon. His earnestness and success were evinced in three revivals, in which more than two hundred persons were added to his church. His son was at last his colleague.

COBB, SYLVANUS R., a merchant, died in Boston May 22, 1834, aged 35. As he began business he wrote a solemn covenant, that he would give a quarter of his profits to charitable uses; and one-half if he should be worth 20,000 dollars; three-quarters if worth 30,000; the whole if worth 50,000. He was faithful. Being a Baptist, he gave the surplus, 7,500 dollars, to found Newton institution, and as much more at other times.

COBBETT, THOMAS, an eminent minister and writer, died Nov. 5, 1685, aged 77. He was born at Newbury, in England, in 1608. He entered the university of Oxford, and was for some time a student there; but in the time of the plague he was induced to remove, and to become a pupil of the celebrated Dr. Twiss of Newbury. In consequence of his nonconformity to the established church, he experienced a storm of persecution which drove him to this country in 1637. He came in the same vessel with Mr. Davenport. He was soon chosen as a colleague to his old friend Mr. Whiting, of Lynn, with whom he labored in his benevolent work nearly twenty years. In the year in which their salary was reduced to 30 pounds each, the town suffered a loss by disease among the cattle of 300 pounds, which may be regarded, in the opinion of Cotton Mather, as a punishment of their parsimony. After the removal of Mr. Norton of Ipswich, to Boston, and the death of Mr. Rogers, he became the pastor of the first church in Ipswich. During his ministry there was a powerful and extensive revival of religion in the town. Here he continued in the faithful discharge of the duties of the sacred office till his death. From the records of the town it appears, that the expenses of the funeral were about £18, including 32 galls. of wine at 4s., 62 lbs. of sugar, cider, and ginger, and some dozen pairs of gloves. His predecessors were Ward, Norton, and Rogers; his successors Hubbard, Dennison, J. Rogers, Fitch, N. Rogers, Frisbie, and Kimball.

Mr. Cobbett was remarkable not only for a constant spirit of devotion and for the frequency of his addresses to heaven, but for a particular faith, or assurance in prayer. During the wars with the Indians one of his sons was taken prisoner by the savages. The aged parent called together a number of his neighbors, and they mingled their prayers for the deliverance of the captive. He was impressed with the belief that the Father of mercies had heard the supplications addressed to him, and his heart was no more sad. In a few days his son, who had been redeemed of a sachem at Penobscot for a red coat, actually returned. He published a work on infant baptism, 1648, which is much commended by Cotton, and described by Mather as "a large, nervous, golden discourse;" the civil magistrate's power in matters of religion modestly debated, etc., with an answer to a pamphlet called, ill news from England, by John Clarke, of R. I., 1653; a practical discourse of prayer, 8vo., 1654; on the honor due from children to their parents, 1656. — Magnalia, III. 165—167.

COCHRAN, JOHN, M. D., a physician, was born in 1730 in Chester county, Penn. His father, a farmer, came from the north of Ireland. He studied physic with Dr. Thompson, of Lancaster. In the French war, which began in 1755, he served as surgeon's mate in the hospital department. At the close of the war he settled in Albany, and married Gertrude Schuyler, the only sister of Gen. Schuyler. But he soon removed to New Brunswick. April 10, 1777, on the recommendation of Washington, he was appointed physician and surgeon-general in the middle department, and in Oct., 1781, director-general of the hospitals of the United States. After the peace he removed to New York, where Washington nominated him the commissioner of loans. He died at Palatine, Montgomery county, April 6, 1807, aged 76. The impressions in early life derived from a religious father were never obliterated. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

COCHRAN, JAMES, died in Batavia, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1846, aged 83. He was a brass-founder in Philadelphia. Although the inventor of the method of making cut nails, he died poor.

COCKE, JOHN, general, died in Grainger Co., Tenn., in 1854, aged 72; another account makes his age 82. The eldest son of Col. Wm. Cocke, of Nottoway county, Va., he early emigrated to Tennessee. He sustained various offices, and was many years speaker of the house; from 1819 to 1827 a member of congress.

CODDINGTON, WILLIAM, the father of Rhode Island, died Nov. 1, 1678, aged 77. He was a native of Lincolnshire, England. He came to this country as an assistant, or one of the magistrates, of Massachusetts, and arrived at Salem in the Arabella June 12, 1630. He was several times rechosen to that office; but in 1637, when Governor Vane, to whose interests he was attached, was superseded by Mr. Winthrop, he also was left out of the magistracy. The freemen of Boston, however, the next day chose him and Mr. Vane their deputies to the court. Mr. Coddington expressed his dissatisfaction in losing the office which he had sustained, by sitting with the deacons at public worship, instead of placing himself as usual in the magistrates' seat, and by going to Mount Wollaston on the day of the general fast, to hear Mr. Wheelwright. When the religious contentions ran high in 1637, he defended Mrs. Hutchinson at her trial, in opposition to Governor Winthrop and the ministers; he opposed the proceedings of the court against Mr. Wheelwright and others; and, when he found that his exertions were unavailing, he relinquished his advantageous situation as a merchant at Boston, and his large property and improvements in Braintree, and accompanied the emigrants, who at that time left the colony. He removed to Rhode Island April 26, 1638, and was the principal instrument in effecting the original settlement of that place. His name stands first on the covenant, signed by eighteen persons at Aquetneck, or Rhode Island, March 7, 1638, forming themselves into a body politic, to be governed by the laws of the Lord Jesus Christ, the King of kings. It was soon found necessary to have something more definite. Mr. Coddington was appointed judge, and three elders were joined with him. These were directed by a vote of the freemen, Jan. 2, 1639, to be governed by the general rules of the word of God, when no particular rule was known. But this plan was changed March 12, 1640, when a governor, lieutenant-governor, and four assistants were appointed.

Mr. Coddington was chosen governor seven years, until the charter was obtained, and the island was incorporated with Providence plantations. In 1647 he assisted in forming the body of laws, which has been the basis of the government of Rhode Island ever since. The next year, May 16, 1648, he was elected governor; but he declined the office on account of a controversy in which he was engaged respecting some lands. In September he made an unsuccessful attempt to procure the reception of Rhode Island into the confederacy of the united colonies. In 1651 he went to England, and was commissioned governor of Aquetneck island, separate from the rest of the colony; but, as the people were jealous lest his commission should affect their laws and liberties, he resigned it. He now retired from public business; but toward the close of his life he was prevailed on to accept the chief-magistracy. He was governor in the years 1674 and 1675.

He appears to have been prudent in his administration, and active in promoting the welfare of the little commonwealth which he had assisted in founding. While he lived in Rhode Island, he embraced the sentiments of the Quakers. He was a warm advocate for liberty of conscience. A letter, which he wrote in 1674 to the governor of New England, is preserved in Besse's Sufferings of the Quakers, ii. 265-270. — Dedication of Callender's Hist. Disc.; Holmes; Winthrop; Hutchinson, i. 18.

CODMAN, JOHN, a member of the senate of Mass., died in Boston May 17, 1803, aged 48. He filled the public stations, in which he was placed, with integrity and honor. As a merchant, he sustained a character of the first respectability. Endeared to his friends by a natural disposition which rendered him warm in his attachments, he also possessed, by the gift of Divine grace, a principle of benevolence, which drew upon him the blessings of the poor. In his last moments, more anxious for the safety of others than for his own, he resigned himself to death with the fortitude, calmness, and triumph, becoming the religion which he professed. — N. Y. Herald, May 25, 1803.

CODMAN, CATHERINE, the second wife and widow of the preceding, died in Boston Dec., 1831, aged 62. She was of the family of Amory of Boston. Her minister in her widowhood was Dr. Channing, for whom she had the highest regard. Her house was the seat of hospitality. Her life was a life of active benevolence and eminent usefulness: no one could doubt her sincere and ardent piety. She went down to the grave in Christian peace, rejoicing in the hope of a blessed immortality.

CODMAN, JOHN, D. D., a minister in Dorchester, died Dec. 23, 1847, aged 65. Born in Boston Aug. 3, 1782, the son of John Codman above mentioned and Mary Russell, he graduated at Harvard in the large class of 1802, and studied theology at Cambridge and in Edinburgh. He spent nearly three years abroad, from 1805 to 1808, the last of which he was employed as the preacher to the Scotch church in Swallow street, London. Among the eminent ministers, whom he knew in England, were George Burder, David Bayne, Robert Hall, Andrew Fuller, and William Jay, the last of whom with two others gave him a license to preach in April, 1807. Of the ministers of Edinburgh, Dr. David Dickson was especially his friend. During his residence abroad he made a visit of six weeks to Paris. Returning to America in May, 1808, he was soon invited to become the minister of the second church and society, newly established in Dorchester. Before accepting the invitation, he sent a letter to the people, declaring, that in his faith he was opposed to certain doctrines, which he named, then prevalent, and accorded in general with the old Massachusetts confession of 1680. The people voted to accept his letter, and said, "We venerate the principles of our forefathers." He was ordained Dec. 7, 1808, so that he was thirty-nine years the minister of his church. His ordination sermon was preached by his friend and his mother's pastor, Mr. Channing. For a year he labored in quietude; but the three following years were years of controversy, arising from the loose religious principles and customs of a portion of his people, and because he would not exchange with all the ministers they wished to hear. So great was their folly, that on the Sabbath they planted eight men on the pulpit-stairs, who prevented the minister from entering his pulpit, into which they placed an intruder, and compelled Mr. Codman to preach on the floor below. But this outrage was so frowned upon, even by the men of accordant sentiments in Boston, that the offenders were compelled to sell out their pews, and they left the society in peace. Dr. Codman was a very faithful, acceptable, and successful minister, and had the pleasure of seeing a great increase of his church and society. Inheriting wealth from his father, he was able to do much for the religious interests of Dorchester, and for the general objects of Christian benevolence. To Princeton theological seminary he gave a considerable sum of money; to Andover theological seminary he gave his excellent library of several thousand volumes. His wife, Mary Wheelwright of Newburyport, whom he married Jan. 19, 1813, survived the companion of her youth, the father of her children, and still lives. His father's sister, Parnell, widow of Ezekiel Savage of Salem, died at his house in 1846, aged 85; her sister, Abigail, died in 1843. A memoir of Dr. Codman, by his early friend, the author of this Dictionary, was published, together with reminiscences by another friend, Dr. Joshua Bates, with six select sermons, 8vo., 1853, with a portrait: one of the most beautifully printed books of the day. He published sermons on various occasions, 1834; a narrative of a visit to England, 1836; and many separate sermons.

COFFEE, JOHN, general, died near Florence, Alabama, July 7, 1833, aged 61. He fought in various Indian battles, serving under Jackson. At Emuchfaw he was shot through the body; yet afterwards he rose from his litter and mounted his horse to repel an assault on our retiring army. His death was caused by disease of the lungs, contracted at Washington in the preceding winter. — A Gen. John Coffee died in 1836, a member of congress from Georgia.

COFFEE, JOHN, a slave, born in Africa, died in Norfolk, Va., Jan. 2, 1836, aged about 120.

COFFIN, PAUL, D. D., a minister in Maine, was graduated at Harvard college in 1759, and was settled the first minister of Buxton, then called "Narragansett, No. 1," in March, 1763. Having preached fifty-four years, he received Levi Loring as his colleague in Nov., 1817, and died June, 1821, aged 85. He published Mass. election sermon, 1799.

COFFIN, NATHANIEL, M. D., a physician in Portland, died Oct. 18, 1826, aged 82. He was the son of Dr. Nathaniel Coffin, who came from Newburyport to Portland in 1738, and died of the palsy in Jan., 1766, aged 50, and a descendant of Tristram Coffin, who came to this country in 1642, and after living at Newbury, died at Nantucket in 1681. He was born May 3, 1744. His medical studies were completed in the hospitals of London. His long life of professional services was spent in Portland. By his wife, the daughter of Isaac Foster of Charlestown, he had eleven children. He was the first president of the Maine medical society. As a surgeon he was particularly skilful and eminent. As to his religion, he united forty years before his death in the Unitarian faith of Dr. Freeman of Boston, and was afterwards a member of the church of the first parish in Portland. — Thacher's Medical Biog.

COFFIN, ALEXANDER, mayor of Hudson, died Jan. 11, 1839, aged 98. Born in Nantucket in 1740, he was the last of the original settlers of Hudson, N. Y., in 1784: a man of talents and usefulness.

COFFIN, JOHN GORHAM, M. D., a physician in Boston, died at Brookfield in Jan., 1829, aged 59. He published a treatise on cold and warm bathing, 12mo., 1818; on medical education, 1822.

COFFIN, ISAAC, judge, died at Nantucket Dec. 24, 1841, aged 77. He was judge of probate; and a man of benevolence and urbanity.

COFFIN, ROBERT S., a poet, died May 7, 1827, aged about 30. He was the son of Ebenezer Coffin, minister of Brunswick, Maine, and born about the year 1797. As his father soon removed to Newburyport, he was there apprenticed to a printer. He began to indite poetry at an early age. In the war he was a sailor, and found himself a prisoner on board a British frigate. After the war he pursued his business as a printer at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, sending forth also occasional pieces of poetry under the name of "the Boston Bard." In March, 1826, he was in New York, in sickness and poverty, and with the wretchedness of self-reproach for his misconduct. He had been in habits of intemperance. Some benevolent ladies and others assisted him to return to his destitute, widowed mother and sister in Massachusetts. In Boston some sympathy was awakened by his distresses. After many months of extreme suffering he died at Rowley, and was buried at Newbury Old Town, as the place is contradictorily called by the inhabitants. He was buried by the side of his father, whose example unhappily was of no benefit to the son. His poetical pieces were collected and published in a volume in 1826. His last production breathed the wish, that he might die the death of the righteous. — Specimens American Poetry, II. 159.

COFFIN, CHARLES, D. D., died at Greenville, East Tennessee, in June, 1853, aged nearly 78. Born in Newburyport, he graduated at Cambridge in 1793; was president of Greenville, then of Knoxville college; and had lived in Tennessee fifty years. He published a sermon on obedience to God.

COGGESHALL, JOHN, first president of Rhode Island, was a representative of Boston in the first court in May, 1634, and in various courts afterwards. His name was written Coxeall. Being exiled from Mass. in March, 1638, he joined his companions in persecution at Rhode Island, and was chosen governor in 1647. Jer. Clarke succeeded him the next year. His descendants remain to the present day. — Savage's Winthrop, I. 130.

COGSWELL, JAMES, D. D., minister of Windham, Conn., died Jan. 2, 1807, aged 87. He was born in Saybrook, Jan. 6, 1720. In his childhood his parents removed to Lebanon, where they remained till, in their old age, he with filial affection took them to his own house. He was graduated at Yale college in 1742, and, while a member of that institution, at the time of the general revival of religion through America, he became experimentally acquainted with the truth as it is in Jesus. Forming the resolution to devote his life to the service of the Redeemer, he was ordained in 1744 pastor of the first church in Canterbury. In 1771 he was removed from this charge. But early in the following year he was installed minister of Scotland, a parish in the town of Windham, where he continued until Dec., 1804. The infirmities of age now rendering him incapable of public service, he found a retreat for the remainder of his life in the family of his son, Dr. Mason Fitch Cogswell of Hartford. His own filial piety was now repaid him. His wife's name was Fitch. His father was Samuel; his mother was Anne, daughter of Capt. Mason of Lebanon or Norwich. He was in early life distinguished for his learning, and he retained it in his old age. His temper was cheerful and social, and benevolence shone in his countenance. Under heavy afflictions he was submissive, adoring the sovereignty of God. His preaching was generally plain and practical, addressed to the understandings and consciences of his hearers. On the great doctrines of the gospel, which he inculcated, he built his own hope of a blessed immortality. He published a sermon preached at the funeral of Solomon Williams, 1776, 2d edition, 1806. — Panoplist, II. 581-583; Piscataqua Evangelical Magazine, III. 196.

COGSWELL, MASON FITCH, M. D., son of the preceding, was graduated at Yale college in 1780, and, after studying physic, settled at Hartford. In 1812 he was chosen president of the Connecticut medical society, and held the office ten years. He died Dec., 1830, aged 69. As a physician he was distinguished, and as a surgeon he had few equals. Dr. Cogswell first formed the design of an establishment for the education of the deaf and dumb in this country. His sympathy for them had been awakened by the unfortunate condition of his own daughter. The asylum for the deaf and dumb, at Hartford, commenced by Mr. Gallaudet, is to be ascribed in a considerable degree to the exertions of Dr. Cogswell. It is remarkable, that his own deaf and dumb daughter survived her father only a few weeks, her heart being broken by the event of his removal. Mrs. Sigourney, in a piece upon her death, supposes Alice Cogswell to say to some of her relatives:

"Sisters! there 's music here;
From countless harps it flows
Throughout this wide, celestial sphere,
Nor pause nor discord knows.
The seal is melted from my ear
By love divine;
And what through life I pined to hear
Is mine! is mine!
The warbling of an ever tuneful choir,
And the full, deep response of David's golden lyre.
Did the kind earth hide from me
Her broken harmony,
That thus the melodies of Heaven might roll
And whelm in deeper tides of bliss my wondering soul?"

COGSWELL, WILLIAM, D. D., died in Gilmanston, N. H., April 18, 1850, aged 62. He was the son of Dr. William C., of Atkinson, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1811. He was descended from John, of London, who came to Ipswich about 1635. His grandfather was Nathaniel, who, by his wife Judith Badger, had eighteen or nineteen children, and died at Atkinson March 23, 1783, aged 76. His father died Jan. 1, 1831, aged 70. For fourteen years he was pastor of the south church in Dedham. In 1832 he was secretary of the American education society; for three years he was professor of history at Dartmouth; and then professor of theology at Gilmanston. His wife was a daughter of Rev. J. Strong of Randolph. His only son, Wm. Strong Cogswell, died while a member of college. He published a manual of theology and devotion; the Christian philanthropist; the theological class-book; and was editor of the American quarterly register, the N. H. repository, and the N. E. historical register.

COIT, JOSEPH, the first minister of Plainfield, Conn., died July 1, 1750, aged 76, in the forty-fifth year of his ministry. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1697, and he had an honorary degree at Yale in its first year, 1702.

COIT, JONATHAN, died in New London in Dec., 1855, leaving property to the amount of 300,000 dollars, of which he bequeathed about 50,000 to charitable uses. He gave 30,000 dollars to be divided among eight Congregational, Episcopal, Baptist, and Methodist churches in New London for the support of their ministers; 10,000 dollars for the poor in the alms-house; and 2500 to the N. L. seamen's friend society.

COKE, THOMAS, LL. D., a Methodist bishop in the United States, was born in Wales in 1747, and educated at Oxford. At the university he was a deist. He afterwards was a curate in Somersetshire. By reading Witherspoon on regeneration, he was convinced that he needed a new heart. His first interview with Mr. Wesley was in 1776; he became his assistant in 1780. In Sept., 1784, he sailed for New York, and communicated in America the new plan of government and discipline, which Mr. W. had drawn, and which still binds the great body of Methodists. In 1786 he established missions in the West Indies. In the subsequent year he repeatedly visited the United States; for the last time in 1804. He sailed for Ceylon with six preachers Dec. 31, 1813, but died suddenly on his passage, May 3, 1814, aged 66 years, being in the morning found dead in his cabin. On his passage he wrote several sermons in Portuguese, that his usefulness might be increased in Asia. His pious zeal may well shame the slothfulness of Christians, if such they can be called, who do nothing for the diffusion of the gospel in the world. He published a history of the West Indies; a commentary on the Scriptures.—Christian Visitant.

COLBERT, PITMAN, major, a Chickasaw Indian, died near fort Towson Feb. 24, 1853, aged 96, wealthy, and of influence in his tribe, an advocate of Christian education.

COLBURN, LEWIS, captain, died at Dedham in 1843, aged 91, a soldier of the Revolution; he fought at the first battle, April 19, 1775.

COLBURN, WARREN, died at Lowell Sept. 15, 1833, aged 40, superintendent of the Merrimack manufacturing company. He graduated at Harvard in 1820, and was a man of talents and excellent character. He published treatises on arithmetic and algebra, and other valuable books of education.

COLBURN, ZERAH, died at Norwich, Vt., March 2, 1839, aged 34. He was born at Cabot, Vt., Sept 1, 1804. When nearly six years old, in Aug., 1810, he began to manifest wonderful powers of arithmetical computation. His father, Abia, exhibited him at Boston in Nov., and in 1812 in London. Being asked the number of seconds since the Christian era, in 1813 years, 7 months, 27 days, he answered correctly, 57,234,384,000. Being asked the square root of 106,929, he immediately answered 327. Asked the cube root of 268,336,125, he readily answered 645. After proceeding to Ireland, and Scotland, and Paris, he returned to London in 1816. For three years he was at Westminster school; afterwards he was a teacher. His father dying in London in 1824, he returned to this country. In July, 1825, he joined the Congregational church in Burlington, but soon became a Methodist minister, and was for several years an itinerant preacher. He lost his power of calculation before he left England. As a preacher he displayed no uncommon talent. He published his own memoir in 1833. Some other results of his remarkable faculty when a boy of eight or nine years and afterwards are the following: Being asked the factors which produce 247,483, he answered 941 and 263; which are indeed its only two factors. Being asked for the factors of 36,083, he immediately replied that it had none. Now the dark mystery is, how the boy could reach these true conclusions by the rapid action of his mind? Being asked the factors of 171,395, he mentioned the seven pairs of factors which will produce that number, as  $5 \times 34,279$ , etc. The French mathematicians had said, that  $4,294,967,297 (= 2^{32} + 1)$  was a prime number having no factors. But Colburn announced the factors  $641 \times 6,700,417$ . Being asked to give the square of 999,999, he said he could not directly, but he accomplished it by multiplying 37,037 by itself, and that product twice by 27; the answer being 999,998,000,001. How could the child discover all this? He added that he could multiply this twice by 49 and once by 25, giving the final product, 60,024,879,950,060,025. It was not by inspiration that he did this, but by wonderful mental processes and astonishing powers of memory as to figures, as was judged by the motion of his lips and by his nervous indications. So rapid was his process, that, when less than seven years old, when asked how many days and hours in 1811 years, he answered in twenty seconds, 661,015 days, 15,864,360 hours. How many seconds in 11 years? He answered in four seconds, 346,896,000. In some of his easier labors he was able, after two or three years, to explain the process. For instance, in extracting roots; if the square consisted of five figures, as 92,416, he first sought a number squared, which would produce the two last figures, and that is 04. Next he sought a number, which, when squared, would give the first figure of the square, or come nearest under it; and that is 3. Putting them together, 304 is the number sought. But how did the boy discover this rule? His more arduous processes he could not explain. At the age of twelve he was able to explain the rapid mental process by which he multiplied two numbers, as 4791 and 238, and obtained the result 1,140,258. It was by twelve distinct multiplications and eleven additions and some other mental acts, his memory retaining the sum as it grew, until it reached the result. He first multiplied 4000 by 200, then 700 and 90 and 1 by the same, adding the results as he proceeded; then he multiplied them by 30 and by 8, adding the results. For this, what a wonderful faculty of memory must have been possessed!

COLBY, PHILIP, died in North Middleborough Feb. 27, 1851, aged 72, having been the minister thirty-four years, highly respected and useful.

COLBY, MARIA OTIS, died at Middleborough May 20, 1821, aged 33, wife of the preceding. She was the daughter of Gen. Joseph Otis, of Barnstable, and at the age of eighteen became a member of the church under Rev. O. Shaw. She was married Jan. 1, 1818. She was distinguished by her intellectual character, her temper, beauty, and manners, and was faithful in her new sphere. The gospel, which she zealously endeavored to send out to the dark-minded, cheered her, as she went down to the grave. She addressed earnestly each member of her house, and left messages for her aged mother, for her sister and four brothers.

COLBY, H. G. O., judge, died at New Bedford Feb. 22, 1853, aged 44. He was judge of the court of common pleas from 1845 to 1847, then district attorney; author of a work on Practice.

COLDEN, CADWALLADER, a physician, botanist, and astronomer, died at New York Sept. 28, 1776, aged 88. He was the son of Rev. Alex. Colden of Dunse, in Scotland, and was born Feb. 17, 1688. After having received a liberal education under the immediate inspection of his father, he went to the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated in 1705. He then applied himself to medicine and mathematics, and was eminently distinguished by his proficiency in both. Allured by the fame of Wm. Penn's colony, he came over to this country about the year 1708; and, having practised physic for some years with considerable reputation, he returned to England, which he found greatly distracted in consequence of the troubles of 1715. While in London he was introduced to Dr. Halley, who was so well pleased with a paper of his on animal secretions, that he read it before the royal society, the notice of which it greatly attracted. At this time he formed an acquaintance with some of the most distinguished literary characters of England, with whom he afterwards corresponded, giving them curious and useful intelligence respecting a part of the world then but little known.

Governor Hunter, of New York, conceived so favorable an opinion of him, after a short acquaintance, that he became his warm friend, and offered his patronage, if he would remove to New York. In 1718 he therefore settled in that city. He was the first who filled the office of surveyor-general in the colony. He received also the appointment of master in chancery. In 1720, on the arrival of Gov. Burnet, he was honored with a seat in the king's council of the province. He afterwards rose to the head of this board, and in that station succeeded to the administration of the government in 1760. He had previously obtained a patent for a tract of land about nine miles from Newburgh, on Hudson's river; and to this place, which in his patent is called Coldingham, or Coldenham, he retired with his family about the year 1755. There he undertook to clear and cultivate a small part of the tract as a farm, and his attention was divided between agricultural and philosophical pursuits, and the duties of his office of surveyor-general. The spot which he had selected for his retirement was entirely inland, and the grounds were rough. At the time he chose it for a residence it was solitary, uncultivated, and the country around it absolutely a wilderness, without roads, or such only as were almost impassable. It was, besides, a frontier to the Indians, who committed frequent barbarities. Yet no entreaties of his friends, when they thought him in danger from his savage neighbors, could entice him from his favorite home. He chose rather to guard and fortify his house; and, amidst dangers which would have disturbed the minds of most men, he appears to have been occupied without any interruption in the pursuit of knowledge.

In 1761 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of New York, and he held this commission during the remainder of his life, being repeatedly at the head of the government in consequence of the death or absence of several governors. His political character was rendered very conspicuous by the firmness of his conduct in the violent commotions which preceded the late Revolution. He possessed the supreme authority when the paper to be distributed in New York under the British stamp act arrived; and it was put under his care in the fortification called fort George, which was then standing on Battery point. The attempt of the British parliament to raise a revenue, by taxing the colonies, had in every stage excited a spirit of indignation and resentment, which had long before this risen above the control of government. At length a multitude, consisting of several thousand people, assembled under leaders who were afterwards conspicuous revolutionary characters, and determined to make the lieutenant-governor deliver up the stamp paper to be destroyed. Mr. Colden had received intimation of their design, and prepared to defend with fidelity the trust which had devolved upon him. The fort was surrounded on the evening of Feb. 15, 1766, by a vast concourse of people, who threatened to massacre him and his adherents, if the paper was not delivered to them; and, though the engineers within assured him that the place was untenable, and a terrified family implored him to regard his safety, he yet preserved a firmness of mind, and succeeded finally in securing the papers on board a British man-of-war, then in the port. The populace, in the mean time, unwilling to proceed to extremities, gratified their resentment by burning his effigy and destroying his carriages under his view. His administration is rendered memorable, amongst other things, by several charters of incorporation for useful and benevolent purposes. The corporation for the relief of distressed seamen, called the marine society; that of the chamber of commerce; and one for the relief of widows and children of clergymen, will transmit his name with honor to posterity. After the return of Mr. Tryon, the governor, in 1775, he was relieved from the cares of government. He then retired to a seat on Long Island, where a recollection of his former studies and a few select friends, ever welcomed by a sociable and hospitable disposition, cheered him in his last days. He died a few hours before New York was wrapped in flames, which laid nearly one-fourth part of the city in ashes. He complained neither of pain of body nor anguish of mind, except on account of the political troubles which he had long predicted, and which he then saw overwhelming the country. His wife, Alice Christie, daughter of the minister of Kelso in Scotland, died in 1762. His son, Alexander, who succeeded him as surveyor-general and was also postmaster, died Dec., 1774, aged 58. His son David, also surveyor-general, a physician and man of letters, died in England July, 1784, aged 51. His grandson, Thomas Colden, died at Coldenham March, 1826, aged 72.

Mr. Colden early began to notice the plants in America, classing and distinguishing them according to the method of botany, then in use. He was attentive to the climate, and left a long course of diurnal observations on the thermometer, barometer, and winds. He cultivated an acquaintance with the natives of the country, and often entertained his correspondents with observations on their customs and manners. He wrote also a history of the prevalent diseases of the climate; and, if he was not the first to recommend the cooling regimen in the cure of fevers, he was one of its earliest and warmest advocates, and he opposed with great earnestness the shutting up in warm and confined rooms of patients in the small pox. Though he quitted the practice of medicine at an early day, yet he never lost sight of his favorite study, being ever ready to give his assistance to his neighborhood, and to those who, from his reputation for knowledge and experience, applied to him from more distant quarters. His principal attention, after the year 1760, was directed from philosophical to political matters; yet he maintained with great punctuality his literary correspondence, particularly with Linnæus, Gronovius of Leyden, Dr. Pottersfield and Dr. Whittle of Edinburgh, and Mr. Peter Collinson, who was a most useful and affectionate friend, and to whom Mr. Colden, though he never saw him, owed an introduction to many of the most distinguished literary characters of Europe. He was the correspondent of Dr. Franklin, and they regularly communicated to each other their philosophical and physical discoveries, particularly on electricity, which at that time began to excite the attention of philosophers. In their letters are to be observed the first dawnings of many of those discoveries which Dr. Franklin has communicated to the world, and which have excited so much astonishment, and contributed so much to human happiness. Of the American philosophical society he first suggested the plan. It was established at Philadelphia on account of the central and convenient situation of that city.

About the year 1743 a malignant fever, then called the yellow fever, had raged for two summers in the city of New York; and it appears to have been in all respects similar to that disorder which of late years has proved so very fatal. He communicated his thoughts to the public on the most probable cure of the calamity in a little treatise, in which he enlarged on the bad effects of stagnating waters, moist air, damp cellars, filthy stores, and dirty streets; showed how much these nuisances prevailed in many parts of the city; and pointed out the remedies. The corporation of the city gave him their thanks, and established a plan for draining and cleaning the city, which was attended with the most happy effects. He also wrote and published a treatise on the cure of the cancer. Another essay of his on the virtues of the boritanice, or great water dock, a species of rumex, introduced him to an acquaintance with Linnæus. In 1753 he published some observations on exidematic sore throat, which appeared first at Kingston, Mass., in 1735, and had spread over a great part of North America. These observations are republished in the American Museum.

When he became acquainted with Linnæus' system of botany, he applied himself with new delight to that study. His description of between three and four hundred American plants was published in the acta upsaliensia. He also published the history of the five Indian nations, and dedicated it to Gov. Burnet, who had distinguished himself by his wisdom and success in the management of the Indians. The book was printed at London, 1747, with the original dedication, intended for Gov. Burnet, directed to Gen. Oglethorpe. Mr. Colden justly complained of this as an unpardonable absurdity of the printer, who took the further liberty of adding several Indian treaties without his knowledge or approbation. But the subject, which drew Mr. Colden at one time of his life from every other pursuit, was what he first published under the title of the cause of gravitation; which, being much enlarged, appeared in 1751 under the title of the principles of action in matter, to which is added a treatise on fluxions. He died in the firm persuasion, that, however he might have erred in the deductions, the grand fundamental principles of his system were true; and that they would at length be received as such in the world. This book cost him many years of close and severe study. He prepared a new edition of it, with elucidations of such parts as had been subjected to objections, and with large additions. At the time it was prepared for the press, he was so far advanced in years that he despaired of living to see it published. He therefore transmitted the manuscripts to Dr. Whittle, professor of medicine in the university of Edinburgh. The fate of the work since that time is not known. Of his other manuscripts, many, through the variety of hands into which they have fallen, have become mutilated, and a great part of some of them is entirely lost. Among these are an inquiry into the operation of intellect in animals, a piece of great originality; another on the essential properties of light, interspersed with observations on electricity, heat, matter, etc.; an introduction to the study of physics, in the form of instructions to one of his grandsons, and dated in the eighty-first year of his age; an inquiry into the causes, producing the phenomenon of metal medley swimming in water; an essay on vital motion; and, lastly, observations on Mr. Smith's history of New York, comprehending memoirs of the public transactions, in which he was conversant. He complains of the partiality of Mr. Smith, and supposes that he is incorrect in many particulars. — Rees; American Museum, III. 53-59.

COLDEN, CADWALLADER D., died in Jersey city Jan. 7, 1834, aged 65. He was long an eminent lawyer in New York; mayor of the city; and a member of congress. He published a memoir of Robert Fulton.

COLE, JAMES L., a poet, died at Canandaigua, N. Y., in Feb., 1823, aged 24. His repugnance to mercantile business induced him to engage in the study of the law, in the practice of which he established himself at Detroit in 1821. A pulmonary affection induced him to return to his father's roof. About three years before his death he made a public profession of his attachment to the Saviour of the world. For several of his last years he devoted much time to poetical composition. His productions appeared in the New York Statesman, and in the Ontario Repository, with the signature of "Adrian." He had fancy, genius, and taste, and was virtuous and pious, though he had occasion to lament the predominance of his imagination and his propensity to satire.

COLE, COLETTA, a colored woman, died at New London alms-house in 1844, aged 110.

COLE, THOMAS, an eminent painter, died at Catskill Feb. 11, 1847, aged 46. He was born in England, although his parents had previously lived in America; and in his childhood they returned hither, residing in Philadelphia and Ohio. He early indicated a taste for painting, but had no instruction, until at length a travelling painter, Stein, gave him some aid and guidance in his art. In his rambling life he reached Philadelphia, where he painted transparencies on occasion of Lafayette's visit. Thence he went to New York. In the course of time his friends enabled him to visit Italy. On his return he fixed his residence amid the magnificent scenery of the Hudson. He was a landscape painter. He painted the "Course of Empire," the "Voyage of Life," and "Past and Present." His view of the falls was purchased by Col. Trumbull; Dunlap and Durand were also his friends. He wrote much poetry. Some of his prose pieces were published in the Literary World. Bryant wrote a sonnet on his going to Europe. — Noble's Life of Cole; Cyclopedia of American Lit., II. 318.

COLE, N. W., M. D., died in Burlington, N. J., July 18, 1848, aged 73 years. He was the principal physician for half a century.

COLE, THOMAS, a teacher in Amherst, N. H., and afterwards, for many years, of a celebrated female school in Salem, Mass. He died in Salem June 24, 1852, aged 72. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1798.

COLEMAN, SETH, a physician in Amherst, Mass., died Sept. 9, 1815, aged 75. Born in Hatfield, he graduated at Yale in 1765. He was long a useful physician, and also a deacon in the church, eminent for piety. His first wife was Sarah Beecher of New Haven, by whom he had eight children; his second was Mrs. Eunice Warner of Hadley. His memoirs were published in 1817.

COLEMAN, WILLIAM, editor of the New York Evening Post, died July 13, 1829, aged 63. He was for many years the able editor of a paper, first in Hampshire county, Mass., and then in New York. In his politics he was a zealous federalist of the school of Hamilton, and violent in his warfare. His only son, William Henry, died at New York July, 1830, aged 33.

COLEMAN, WILLIAM A., died in New York Jan 27, 1850, aged 60. He was a bookseller, and for thirty years connected with literature and art.

COLEMAN, OBED M., inventor of the æolian attachment to the piano-forte, died at Saratoga April 5, 1845, aged 28. He was a member of the Presbyterian church. On his marble monument is this passage: "As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there." He died of the measles, caught in New York, after intense suffering but uncomplaining, saying he was perfectly willing to leave all for Christ. He was born at Barnstable Jan. 23, 1817, of German and English parents. At the age of sixteen he lived at New Bedford. By selling his invention of the automaton lady minstrel and singing bird for 800 dollars, he was relieved from extreme poverty. About 1842 he removed to Saratoga, and invented his attachment, which he sold for more than 100,000 dollars here, and for 10,000 in England, from which country he returned in Jan., 1845.

COLLAMORE, JOHN, died in Kensington, N. H., Dec. 29, 1825, aged 110 years and four months. He was a native of Ireland. His hair, which had been silvery white, became before his death nearly black.

COLLETON, JAMES, governor of South Carolina from 1686 to 1690, came from Barbadoes, and was proprietary and landgrave. He built a fine house on Cooper river. His government was very unpopular. There were disputes concerning tenures of land and quit-rents. In 1687 he called a parliament and procured alterations in the fundamental laws. He offended the high church party, who were inflamed with zeal against the Puritans. In the end he was driven from the government and the province. — Univ. Hist. XL. 426.

COLLINS, JOHN, governor of Rhode Island from 1786 to 1789, succeeded Wm. Greene, and was succeeded by A. Fenner. He was a patriot of the Revolution; a delegate to congress in 1789. He died at Newport in March, 1795, aged 78. Dr. John Warren, of Boston, married his daughter.

COLLINS, NATHANIEL, minister of Middletown, Conn., died in 1684, aged 42; a graduate of Harvard in 1660. He was the son of Deacon Edward C. of Cambridge. He married Mary, daughter of William Whiting, the first settler of Hartford; she died in 1709. His son John married Mary, daughter of the regicide, Judge Dixwell.

COLLINS, NATHANIEL, the first minister of Enfield, Conn., died Feb. 6, 1758, aged 79. He was the son of the preceding. He graduated at Cambridge in 1697. His wife was Alice, daughter of Rev. William Adams of Dedham; she died Feb. 19, 1735. His daughter, Ann, married Ephraim Terry of Enfield, and was the grandmother of Seth Terry of Hartford. His brother-in-law, Rev. Mr. Whiting of Windham, died at his house.

COLLINS, TIMOTHY, the first minister of Litchfield, died in 1777, aged about 80. Born in Guilford, he graduated at Yale in 1718, and preached at L. from 1721 to 1752, when he was dismissed at his own request. He afterwards practised physic.

COLLINS, DANIEL, the first minister of Lanesborough, Mass., died Aug. 26, 1822, aged 83. Born in Guilford, Conn., he graduated at Yale in 1760, and was ordained April 17, 1764; the same council ordained the next day Rev. T. Allen, in the adjoining town of Pittsfield. Rev. J. De Witt was a colleague in 1812.

COLLINS, AARON COOKE, minister of Williston, Vt., and of Bloomfield, N. Y., died 1830, aged about 65. He graduated at Yale in 1786. His wife was Love Lee, daughter of Rev. Jonathan Lee of Salisbury by his second wife, Love Graham Brinkerhoff.

COLMAN, BENJAMIN, D. D., first minister of the church in Brattle street, Boston, died Aug. 29, 1747, aged 73. Born in Boston in 1673, he was distinguished by early piety and zeal in literary pursuits, and in 1692 was graduated at Harvard college. Beginning to preach soon afterwards, his benevolent labors were enjoyed for half a year by the town of Medford. In July, 1695, he embarked for London. During the voyage the ship, in which he sailed, was attacked by a French privateer, and Mr. Colman, though he had none of the presumptuous fearlessness of some of his companions, yet remained upon the quarter-deck, and fought bravely with the rest. Being taken prisoner, he was dressed in rags, and put into the hold among the sailors. When he arrived in France, by means of a little money, which he had preserved, he was enabled to make some improvement in his appearance. In a few weeks he was exchanged, and he soon reached London. Among the eminent ministers, with whom he here became acquainted, were Howe, Calamy, and Burkitt. Being called to preach in different places, he supplied a small congregation at Cambridge for a few weeks, and was succeeded by the learned James Pierce, who by his mathematical knowledge attracted the notice of Mr. Whiston, and, becoming his friend, imbibed his Arian sentiments.

He afterwards preached about two years at Bath, where he became intimately acquainted with Mrs. Rowe, then Miss Singer, and admired her sublime devotion as well as ingenuity and wit, and afterwards corresponded with her.

A new society having been formed in Brattle street, Boston, the principal gentlemen who composed it sent him an invitation to return to his native country, and to be their minister. The peculiar constitution of this church, differing from that of the other churches in New England, rendered the founders desirous that he should be ordained in London. They approved of the confession of faith composed by the Westminster Assembly; but they were averse to the public relation of experiences then practised previously to admission into the churches, and they wished the Scriptures to be read on the Sabbath, and the Lord's prayer to be used. These innovations, the founders believed, would excite alarm; and, to avoid difficulty, Mr. Colman was ordained by some dissenting ministers in London Aug. 4, 1699. He arrived at Boston Nov. 1; and Dec. 24th the new house of worship was opened, and Mr. Colman preached in it for the first time. From the year 1701 he had for his assistant about two years and a half Eliphalet Adams, afterwards minister of New London. William Cooper was ordained his colleague May 23, 1716, and after his death in 1743, his son, Dr. Cooper, was settled in his place. His three wives were Jane Clark, widow Sarah Clark, and widow Mary Frost, sister of Sir Wm. Pepperell. He left no son. One daughter married Mr. Turell, another Mr. Dennie.

He was an eminently useful and good man, and was universally respected for his learning and talents. He was distinguished as a preacher. Tall and erect in stature, of a benign aspect, presenting in his whole appearance something amiable and venerable, and having a peculiar expression in his eye, he was enabled to interest his hearers. His voice was harmonious, and his action inimitable. He was ranked among the first ministers of New England. Jesus Christ was the great subject of his preaching. He dwelt upon the Redeemer in his person, natures, offices, and benefits, and upon the duties of natural religion as performed only by strength derived from the Saviour, and as acceptable only for his sake. He had a happy way of introducing large paragraphs of Scripture to enrich his discourses, and he frequently embellished them by allusions to the historical parts of the sacred volume. He could delight by the gracefulness of his manner, and never by boisterousness and violence transgressed the decorum of the pulpit; yet he knew how to preach with pungency, and could array the terrors of the Lord before the children of iniquity. It may excite surprise at the present day, that the practice of reading the Scripture and repeating the Lord's prayer, as a part of the services of the Sabbath, should have excited opposition; but many were offended, though it was not long before a number of other churches followed in the steps of Brattle-street. The ground of opposition to this new church was the strong features of Episcopacy which it was imagined were to be discerned in it.

In the various duties of the pastoral office Dr. Colman was diligent and faithful. He catechized the children of his congregation, addressed them upon the concerns of their souls, and as they advanced in years was urgent in his persuasions to induce them to approach the table of the Lord. His church had intrusted him with authority to judge of the qualifications of communicants, and it was thought by many that he was too free in his admissions to the supper. But he was far from thinking that a competent knowledge of Christianity and a moral life were sufficient qualifications. He thought that there should be a profession of repentance and faith, with the purpose and promise of obedience through the influence of the Divine Spirit; and believed that the purity of the churches would be corrupted, if there was an indiscriminate and general admission to the sacrament. While he entertained the highest veneration for the fathers of New England, and was very friendly to confessions of faith and to the publication of them on particular occasions, he used to say that the Bible was his platform. In his sentiments upon church government he inclined towards the Presbyterians. He was opposed to the practice, adopted by the churches, of sending for a council wherever they pleased, believing the neighboring churches to be the proper counsellors. As he conceived that all baptized persons who made a credible profession of the religion of Christ were the members of the church, he thought that they should not be prohibited in voting for the choice of a minister. At the same time, he considered them as very reprehensible, if they neglected to approach the table of the Lord.

Such was the estimation in which he was held, that, after the death of Mr. Leverett in 1724, he was chosen his successor as president of Harvard college; but he declined the appointment. He however rendered great service to the institution. He procured benefactions for it, and took indefatigable pains in forming rules and orders relating to the settlement of the Hollis professor of divinity in Cambridge. His care also extended to Yale college, for which he procured many valuable books. In 1732 he addressed a letter to Mr. Adams, of New London, one of its trustees, desiring him to vindicate that college from the charge of Arminianism. By his acquaintance in England his usefulness was much increased. He received from Samuel Holden, of London, thirty-nine sets of the practical works of Mr. Baxter, in four massive volumes; folio, to distribute among our churches. He procured also benefactions for the Indians at Houssatonnoe, and engaged with earnestness in promoting the objects of that mission, which was intrusted to the care of Mr. Sergeant. But his labors were not confined to what particularly related to his profession. He was employed, in his younger as well as in his latter years, on weighty affairs by the general court. No minister has since possessed so great influence. His attention to civil concerns drew upon him censure, and at times insult; but he thought himself justified in embracing every opportunity for doing good. He knew the interest of his country and was able to promote it; and he could not admit that the circumstance of his being a minister ought to prevent his exertions. Still there were few men more zealous and unwearied in the labors of his sacred office. His character was singularly excellent. Having imbibed the true spirit of the gospel, he was catholic, moderate, benevolent, ever anxious to promote the gospel of salvation. He was willing to sacrifice everything but truth, to peace. After a life conspicuous for sanctity and usefulness, he met the king of terrors without fear. In the early part of his life his health was very infirm; sickness frequently reminded him of his mortality, and he made it his constant care to live in readiness for death. With a feeble constitution, he yet was able to preach on the very Sabbath before he died. His life was written by Mr. Turell, who married his daughter; and was published in 1749.

He published an artillery sermon in 1702; the government and improvement of mirth, in three sermons, 1707; imprecation against the enemies of God lawful; practical discourses on the parable of the ten virgins, 8vo., 1707; a poem on the death of Mr. Willard; the ruler's piety and duty; a sermon on the union of England and Scotland, 1708; on seeking God early, 1713; the heinous nature of the sin of murder; on the incomprehensibility of God, in four sermons, 1715; the precious gifts of the ascended Saviour; the blessing and honor of fruitful mothers; divine compassions magnified; funeral sermons on Abigail Foster, 1711; Elizabeth Wainwright, 1714; Isaac Addington and Thomas Bridge, 1714; Elizabeth Hirst, 1716; Messrs. Brattle and Pemberton, and Grove Hirst, 1717; Governor Dudley, 1720; William Harris, 1721; Madam Steel, David Stoddard, and Increase Mather, 1723; President Leverett, 1724; Cotton Mather, 1728; Solomon Stoddard and William Welsted, 1729; Simeon Stoddard, 1730; Thomas Hollis, 1731; on his eldest daughter, 1735; Thomas Steel, 1736; Peter Thacher, 1739; Samuel Holden, 1740; William Cooper, 1743; Francis Shirley, 1746: the warnings of

COLMAN, HENRY, died at Islington, London, Aug. 17, 1849. He was a graduate of Dartmouth in 1805, and was many years a Unitarian minister in Salem. He afterwards devoted himself to agricultural inquiries, and had a commission for that object under the authority of the State; in this capacity he went abroad in 1842, and was received with distinction in various parts of England. It was on his return from Ireland, visited for the same object, that by his exposure on deck he took a violent and fatal cold. He had engaged his passage home to America. His daughter, Anna S., wife of Pickering Dodge, died in North Salem Sept. 16, 1849. He published a volume of sermons, 1820; a half-century sermon, 1826; six or seven other sermons; and various agricultural reports and works, among them, agriculture and rural economy of France, etc.; European agriculture, etc., 2 vols.; also, European life and manners, 2 vols., 1848.

COLTON, GEORGE, died in Springfield, now Longmeadow, in 1699, the ancestor of all in New England who bear the name of Colton. He came from near Birmingham, was at Springfield as early as 1644, and was representative in 1669. His wife was Deborah Gardner. He left five sons and four daughters.

COLTON, GEORGE, died at Bolton, Conn., in 1812, aged 56. He was the son of Rev. Benjamin C., of West Hartford, a graduate of 1756. With eccentricities, he was yet a devout, godly man. He was a few inches less than seven feet in height, and lank, and wore a cocked hat and an enormous wig; he was called "the high priest of Bolton." A child cried at meeting, being afraid of "that big man with a sheep on his back." He once preached a sermon of reproof to his people, and the same by way of exchange at Andover, some miles distant, uttering these words from it, much to the astonishment of the people: "I hear the sound of your axes at my house every Saturday night, long after sundown." In his last years his church declined; but his successor, Philander Parmelee, who died in 1822, by his most faithful and zealous labors in various revivals, greatly promoted the interests of religion in Bolton.

COLTON, JOHN O., a minister in New Haven, died April 20, 1840, aged 30. He was a graduate of 1822, the son of Rev. George C., of Westford, N. Y., and great-grandson of Rev. Benj. C., of West Hartford. He was a scholar of promise; he edited a Greek reader.

COLTON, WALTER, died in Philadelphia Jan. 22, 1851, aged 53. He was born in Rutland, Vt., the brother of Calvin C., was graduated at Yale in 1822, and early became a preacher, and taught an academy at Middletown. In 1828 he edited the American Spectator, a political paper at Washington. He was the friend of Jackson, who in 1830 appointed him a chaplain in the navy. He was three years in the Constellation in the Mediterranean. He was then chaplain of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, and edited the North American. Going with the squadron to the Pacific, about 1846, he was alcalde of Monterey in California, and judge of admiralty, and established the Californian, the first paper, and built the first school-house, and first announced to our country the discovery of gold. He returned in 1850. A cold, terminating in dropsy, occasioned his death. He wrote much: ship and shore, 1835; visit to Constantinople and Athens, 1836; deck and port; three years in California; land and lee; the sea and the sailor; notes on France and Italy, with a memoir by Henry T. Cheever.

COLTON, GEORGE H., died Dec. 1, 1847, aged 29. The son of Rev. George C., of Westford, N. Y., he was graduated at Yale in 1840. He was a teacher in Hartford, delivered lectures on the Indians, and commenced in 1845 the editorship of the American Whig Review. He published Tecumseh, a poem in nine cantos. — Cycl. of American Literature, II. 658.

COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER, the first discoverer of the New World, died May 20, 1506, aged about 70. He was born at Colognette, near Genoa, about the year 1436. His father, Domenico Colombo, was a manufacturer of woolen stuffs in Genoa, and rather poor. When the son went to reside in Spain he changed the name of Colombo to Colon, as more conformable to the Spanish idiom, writing his name Cristoval Colon. He was educated in the sciences of geometry and astronomy, which form the basis of navigation, and was well versed in cosmography, history, and philosophy, having studied some time at Pavia. To equip himself more completely for making discoveries, he learned to draw. He entered upon a seafaring life at the age of fourteen. During one of his voyages the ship in which he sailed took fire in an engagement with a Venetian galley, and, by the help of an oar, he swam two leagues to the coast of Portugal, near Lisbon.

He married at Lisbon Dona Felipa Monis de Palestrello, the daughter of an old Italian seaman, from whose journals and charts he received the highest entertainment. The Portuguese were at this time endeavoring to find a way to India around Africa; they had been pursuing this object for half a century without attaining it, and had advanced no farther along the coast of Africa than just to cross the equator, when Columbus conceived his great design of finding India in the west. He knew from observing lunar eclipses that the earth was a sphere, and concluded that it might be travelled over from east to west, or from west to east. He also hoped, that between Spain and India some islands would be found, which would be resting-places in his voyage. Some learned writers had asserted that it was possible to effect what he was now resolved to accomplish. So early as the year 1474 he had communicated his ideas in writing to Paul Foscaneli, a learned physician of Florence, who encouraged his design, sending him a chart, in which he had laid down the supposed capital of China, but little more than two thousand leagues westward from Lisbon. The stories of mariners, that carved wood, a covered canoe, and human bodies of a singular complexion had been found after westerly winds, also contributed to settle his judgment. Having established his theory and formed his design, he now began to think of the means of carrying it into execution. Deeming the enterprise too great to be undertaken by any but a sovereign State, he applied first, according to Herrera, to the republic of Genoa, by whom his project was treated as visionary. Ferdinando Columbus, in his life of his father, says nothing of this application, but represents that the plan was first proposed to John II., king of Portugal, because his father lived under him. This king had encountered such vast expense in fruitless attempts to find a way to India around the African continent, that he was entirely indisposed to give to Columbus the encouragement which he wished to obtain. By the advice, however, of a favorite courtier, he privately gave orders to a ship bound to the island of Cape de Verd, to attempt a discovery in the west; but the navigators, through ignorance and want of enterprise, effected nothing, and on reaching their destined port turned the project of Columbus into ridicule. When he became acquainted with this dishonorable conduct of the king, he quitted Portugal in disgust, and repaired to Ferdinand, king of Spain. He had previously sent his brother, Bartholomew, to England, to solicit the patronage of Henry VII.; but on his passage he was taken by pirates, and he was detained a number of years in captivity. The proposal of Columbus was referred to the consideration of the most learned men in Spain, who rejected it for various reasons, one of which was, that, if a ship should sail westward on a globe, she would necessarily go down on the opposite side, and then it would be impossible to return, for it would be like climbing up a hill, which no ship could do with the strongest wind. But, by the influence of Juan Perez, a Spanish priest, and Lewis Santangel, an officer of the king's household, Queen Isabella was persuaded to listen to his request, and, after he had been twice repulsed, recalled him to court. She offered to pawn her jewels to defray the expense of the equipment, amounting to more than 2,500 crowns; but the money was advanced by Santangel. Thus, after seven years' painful solicitation, he obtained the patronage which he thought of the highest importance in executing his plan.

By an agreement with their Catholic majesties, of April 17, 1492, he was to be viceroy and admiral of all the countries which he should discover, and was to receive one-tenth part of the profits accruing from their productions and commerce. He sailed from Palos in Spain, Friday, Aug. 3, 1492, with three vessels, two of which were called caravels, being small vessels, without decks, except perhaps at the ends, having on board in the whole ninety men. He might have deemed small vessels better fitted for the purposes of navigation in unknown seas. He himself commanded the largest vessel, called Santa Maria.

He left the Canaries Sept. 6, and, when he was about two hundred leagues to the west, the magnetic needle was observed, Sept. 14th, to vary from the pole-star. This phenomenon filled the seamen with terror, but his fertile genius, by suggesting a plausible reason, in some degree quieted their apprehensions. After being twenty days at sea without the sight of land, some of them talked of throwing their commander into the ocean. All his talents were required to stimulate their hopes. At length, when he was almost reduced to the necessity of abandoning the enterprise, at ten o'clock in the night of Oct. 11th, he saw a light, which was supposed to be on shore, and early the next morning, Friday, Oct. 12th, land was distinctly seen, which proved to be Guanahana, one of the Bahama islands. Thus he effected an object which he had been twenty years in projecting and executing. At sunrise the boats were manned and the adventurers rowed towards the shore with music and with martial pomp. The coast was covered with people, who were overwhelmed with astonishment. Columbus went first on shore, and was followed by his men. They all, kneeling down, kissed the ground with tears of joy, and returned thanks for their successful voyage. This island, which is in north latitude 25°, and is sometimes called Cat island, was named by Columbus San Salvador. Having discovered a number of other islands, and among them Cuba, Oct. 27th, and Hispaniola, Dec. 6th, he began to think of returning. His large ship having been wrecked on the shoals of Hispaniola, he built a fort with her timber, and left behind him a colony of thirty-nine men at the port, which he called Navidad, the nativity, because he entered it on Christmas day. From this place he sailed Jan. 4, 1493. During his passage, when threatened with destruction by a violent storm, he wrote an account of his discoveries on parchment, which he wrapped in a piece of oiled cloth and inclosed in a cake of wax. This he put into a tight cask and threw it into the sea, with the hope that it might be driven ashore, and that his discoveries might not be lost, if the vessel should sink. But he was providentially saved from destruction, and arrived safe at Lisbon March 4th. On the 15th he reached Palos, and was received with the highest tokens of honor by the king and queen, who now made him admiral of Spain.

He sailed on his second voyage to the New World Sept. 25, 1493, having a fleet of three ships of war, and fourteen caravels, and about one thousand and five hundred people, some of whom were of the first families in Spain. The pope had granted, by bull, dated May 3, 1493, in full right to Ferdinand and Isabella, all the countries from pole to pole beyond a line drawn one hundred leagues west of the Azores; and their

Catholic majesties had confirmed to Columbus his privileges, making the office of viceroy and governor of the Indies hereditary in his family. On the Lord's day, Nov. 3, he discovered an island, which in honor of the day he called Dominica. After discovering Marigalante, so called in honor of his ship, Guadaloupe, Montserrat, Antigua, and other islands, he entered the port of Navidad, on the north side of Hispaniola, where he had left his colony; but not a Spaniard was to be seen, and the fort was entirely demolished. The men, whom he had left in this place, had seized the provisions of the natives and their women, and exhibited such rapacity as to excite the indignation of the Indians, who had in consequence burned the fort and cut them off. Dec. 8th, he landed at another part of the same island, near a rock which was a convenient situation for a fort; and here he built a town, which he called Isabella, and which was the first town founded by Europeans in the New World. He discovered Jamaica May 5, 1494, where he found water and other refreshments for his men, of which they were in the greatest want. On his return to Hispaniola, Sept. 29, he met his brother, Bartholomew, from whom he had been separated for thirteen years, and whom he supposed to be dead. His brother had brought supplies from Spain in three ships, which he commanded, and arrived at a time when his prudence, experience, and bravery were peculiarly needed; for Columbus on his return found the colony in the utmost confusion. Their licentiousness had provoked the natives, who had united against their invaders, and had actually killed a number of the Spaniards. He collected his people, and prevented the destruction which threatened them. In the spring of 1495, he carried on a war against the natives, and with two hundred men, twenty horses, and as many dogs, he defeated an army of Indians which has been estimated at one hundred thousand. In about a year he reduced the natives to submission. But while Columbus was faithfully employing his talents to promote the interests of his sovereign, his enemies were endeavoring to ruin his character. He was a forger, and the proud Spaniards could not patiently see him elevated to such honors. He did not require so enormous a tribute of the Indians as some of his rapacious adventurers would impose, and complaints against him were entered with the king's ministers. The discipline, which he maintained was represented as severity, and the punishments which he inflicted, as cruelty; and it was suggested, that he was aiming to make himself independent. These whispers excited suspicion in the jealous mind of Ferdinand, and Columbus was reduced to the necessity of returning to the Spanish court, that he might vindicate himself from these false charges. After placing the affairs of the colony in the best possible condition, and leaving the supreme power in the hands of his brother Bartholomew, he sailed from Isabella March 10, 1496, having with him thirty Indians. He first visited several islands, and, leaving the West Indies April 20, he arrived at Cadiz, after a dangerous and tedious voyage, June 11th. His presence at court, with the influence of the gold and other valuable articles which he carried with him, removed in some degree the suspicions which had been gathering in the mind of the king. But his enemies, though silent, were not idle. They threw such obstructions in his way, that it was nearly two years before he could again set sail to continue his discoveries. Fonseca, Bishop of Badajoz, who in Sept., 1497, was reinstated in the direction of Indian affairs, was his principal enemy. It was he who patronized Amerigo.

May 30, 1498, he sailed from Spain on his third voyage with six ships. At the Canary Islands he dispatched three of his ships with provisions to Hispaniola, and with the other three he kept a course more to the south. He discovered Trinidad July 31, and the continent of Terra Firma on the first of August. Having made many other discoveries he entered the port of St. Domingo, in Hispaniola, Aug. 30. By the direction of Columbus, his brother had begun a settlement in this place, and it was now made the capital. Its name was given to it in honor of Dominic, the father of Columbus. He found the colony in a state which awakened his most serious apprehensions. Francis Roldan, whom he had left chief justice, had excited a considerable number of the Spaniards to mutiny. He had attempted to seize the magazine and fort, but, failing of success, retired to a distant part of the island. Columbus had not a force sufficient to subdue him, and he dreaded the effects of a civil war, which might put it in the power of the Indians to destroy the whole colony. He had recourse therefore to address. By promising pardon to such as should submit, by offering the liberty of return to Spain, and by offering to re-establish Roldan in his office, he in Nov. dissolved this dangerous combination. Some of the refractory were tried and put to death.

As soon as his affairs would permit, he sent some of his ships to Spain, with a journal of his voyage, a chart of the coast which he had discovered, specimens of the gold and pearls, and an account of the insurrection. Roldan at the same time sent home his accusations against Columbus. The suspicions of Ferdinand were revived, and they were fomented by Fonseca and others. It was resolved to send to Hispaniola a judge, who should examine facts upon the spot. Francis de Bovadilla was appointed for this purpose, with full powers to supersede Columbus, if he found him guilty. When he arrived at St. Domingo, all dissensions were composed in the island, effectual provisions were made for working the mines, and the authority of Columbus over the Spaniards and Indians was well established. But Bovadilla was determined to treat him as a criminal. He accordingly took possession of his house and seized his effects, and, assuming the government, ordered Columbus to be arrested in Oct., 1500, and loaded with irons. He was thus sent home as a prisoner. The captain of the vessel, as soon as he was clear of the island, offered to release him from his fetters. "No," said Columbus, "I wear these irons in consequence of an order of my sovereigns, and their command alone shall set me at liberty." He arrived at Cadiz Nov. 5, and Dec. 17 was set at liberty by the command of Ferdinand and invited to court. He vindicated his conduct and brought the most satisfying proofs of the malevolence of his enemies. But, though his sovereigns promised to recall Bovadilla, they did not restore Columbus to his government. Their jealousy was not yet entirely removed. In the beginning of 1502, Ovando was sent out governor of Hispaniola, and thus a new proof was given of the suspicion and injustice of the Spanish king.

Columbus, still intent on discovering a passage to India, sailed on his fourth voyage from Cadiz May 9, 1502, with four small vessels, the largest of which was but of seventy tons. He arrived off St. Domingo June 29, but Ovando refused him admission into the port. A fleet of eighteen sail was at this time about setting sail for Spain. Columbus advised Ovando to stop them for a few days, as he perceived the prognostics of an approaching storm; but his salutary warning was disregarded. The fleet sailed, and of the eighteen vessels, but two or three escaped the hurricane. In this general wreck perished Bovadilla, Roldan, and the other enemies of Columbus, together with the immense wealth which they had unjustly acquired. Columbus under the lee of the shore rode out the tempest with great difficulty. He soon left Hispaniola, and discovered the bay of Honduras. He then proceeded to Cape Gracias á Dios and thence along the coast to the Isthmus of Darien, where he hoped but in vain to find a passage to the great sea beyond the continent, which he believed would conduct him to India. Nov. 2, he found a harbor, which on account of its beauty he called Porto Bello. He afterwards met with such violent storms as threatened his leaky vessels with destruction. One of them he lost and the other he was obliged to abandon. With the two remaining ships he with the utmost difficulty reached the island of Jamaica in 1503, being obliged to run them aground to prevent them from sinking. His ships were ruined beyond the possibility of being repaired, and to convey an account of his situation to His-paniola seemed impracticable. But his fertile genius discovered the only expedient which was left him. He obtained from the natives two of their canoes, each formed out of a single tree. In these, two of his most faithful friends offered to set out on a voyage of above thirty leagues. They reached Hispaniola in ten days, but they solicited relief for their companions eight months in vain. Ovando was governed by a mean jealousy of Columbus, and he was willing that he should perish. In the mean time Columbus had to struggle with the greatest difficulties. His seamen threatened his life for bringing them into such trouble; they mutinied, seized a number of boats, and went to a distant part of the island; the natives murmured at the long residence of the Spaniards among them, and began to bring in their provisions with reluctance. But the ingenuity and foresight of Columbus again relieved him from his difficulties. He knew that a total eclipse of the moon was near. On the day before it occurred, he assembled the principal Indians, and told them that the Great Spirit in heaven was angry with them for withdrawing their assistance from his servants, the Spaniards; that he was about to punish them; and that as a sign of his wrath the moon would be obscured that very night. As the eclipse came on, they ran to Columbus, loaded with provisions, and entreated his intercession with the Great Spirit to avert the destruction which threatened them. From this time the natives were very ready to bring their provisions, and they treated the Spaniards with the greatest respect.

At the end of eight months Ovando sent a small vessel to Jamaica to spy out the condition of Columbus. Its approach inspired the greatest joy; but the officer, after delivering a cask of wine, two fitches of bacon, and a letter of compliment, immediately set sail on his return. To quiet the murmurs, which were rising, Columbus told his companions, that he himself had refused to return in the caravel, because it was too small to take the whole of them; but that another vessel would soon arrive to take them off. The mutineers from a distant part of the island were approaching and it was necessary to oppose them with force. Columbus, being afflicted with the gout, sent his brother, Bartholomew, against them, who on their refusing to submit attacked them, and took their leader prisoner. At length a vessel, which was purchased by one of his friends, who went to Hispaniola for his relief, came to Jamaica and released him from his unpleasant situation. On his arrival at St. Domingo Aug. 13, 1504, Ovando received him with the most studied respect, but, as he soon gave new proofs of malevolence, Columbus prepared for his return to Spain. In Sept., he set sail, accompanied by his brother and son, and after a long voyage, in which he encountered violent storms, and after sailing seven hundred leagues with jury masts, he reached the port of St. Lucar in Dec. He now was informed of the death of his patroness, Isabella. He soon repaired to court, and after spending about a year in fruitless solicitation for his violated rights, and after calling in vain upon a sovereign to respect his engagements, he died at Valladolid, leaving two sons, Don Diego and Ferdinand. His body was deposited in the convent of St. Francisco; and in 1513 removed to the monastery of the Carthusians at Seville, and thence in 1536 to the city of St. Domingo in Hispaniola, where it was placed in the chancel of the cathedral. In 1795, when the Spanish part of Hispaniola was ceded to France, the bones of Columbus were transported to the Havana, where they now lie, in the wall of the cathedral. At this city a eulogy was pronounced on the occasion by an aged priest, Jan. 17, 1796, in the presence of nearly a hundred thousand people. A white marble tablet was inserted in the wall in 1832, having on it a medallion profile, and an inscription, wishing his remains might remain a thousand years in the urn and in the remembrance of the nation.

In the character of Columbus were combined the qualities which constitute greatness. He possessed a strong and penetrating mind. He knew the sciences, as they were taught at the period in which he lived. He was fond of great enterprises, and capable of prosecuting them with the most unwearied patience. He surmounted difficulties which would have entirely discouraged persons of less firmness and constancy of spirit. His invention extricated him from many perplexities, and his prudence enabled him to conceal or subdue his own infirmities, whilst he took advantage of the passions of others, adjusting his behavior to his circumstances, temporizing, or acting with vigor, as the occasion required. He was a man of undaunted courage and high thoughts.

The following instance of the ingenuity of Columbus, in vindicating his claim to respect for his discoveries, is related by Peter Martyr. Not long before his death, at a public dinner, the nobility insinuated that his discoveries were rather the result of accident than of well-concerted measures. Columbus heard them decried his services for some time, but at length called for an egg, and asked them to set it upright on its smaller end. When they confessed it to be impossible, he flatted its shell by striking it gently upon the table till it stood upright. The company immediately exclaimed, with a sneer, "Anybody might have done it."—"Yes," said Columbus, "but none of you thought of it. So I discovered the Indies, and now every pilot can steer the same course. Remember the scoffs which were thrown at me before I put my design in execution. Then it was a dream, a chimera, a delusion; now it is what anybody might have done as well as I." The signature to his will is as follows:

EL ALMIRANTE.

Instead of the last line, the Admiral, he sometimes put the words,—

XPO FERENS,

Or Christo Ferens. The other letters have not been explained. They are supposed to be the ciphers of a pious ejaculation to Christ and Mary and Joseph, as Sancta Maria, Salva me, etc. Mr. Irving has not accounted for the disposition of the letters in the form of a pyramid. It was probably with reference to the name Colon, Colonna in Italian, a column.

Columbus was tall of stature, large and muscular, long visaged, of a majestic aspect, his nose hooked, his eyes gray, of a clear complexion, and somewhat ruddy. He was witty and elegant. His conversation was discreet, which gained him the affections of those with whom he had to deal, and his presence attracted respect, having an air of authority and grandeur. He was always temperate in eating and drinking, and modest in his dress. He understood Latin and composed verses. In religion he was a very zealous and devout Catholic. He left two sons, Diego and Ferdinand. The latter entered the church: he collected the richest library in Spain, consisting of twelve thousand volumes, which he bequeathed to the cathedral church of Seville, where he resided. Diego was for a time admiral and governor of Hispaniola.

Columbus was ever faithful to his prince. How far the artifices, to which he had recourse in the dangerous circumstances in which he was placed, can be justified, it might not be easy to decide. He is represented as a person who always entertained a reverence for the Deity, and confidence in his protection. His last words were, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit." His life was written by his son Ferdinand. His personal narrative, translated by Samuel Kettell, was published at Boston, 8vo., 1827; his life by Irving, 4 vols., 12mo., Paris, 1829. — Robertson's Hist. America, book II.; Belknap's Biog. i. 86-148; Holmes; Herrera's Hist. America, i.; Irving's Life of Columbus.

COMFORT, DAVID, died in Kingston, N. J., Dec. 28, 1853, aged 89. He was fifty years pastor of his flock.

COMLY, JOHN, a Friend, died in Byberry, Penn., Aug. 17, 1850, aged 76, author of a popular spelling-book and grammar.

COMSTOCK, DANIEL, Dr., died in Danbury, Conn., Aug. 27, 1848, aged 82. For forty years he had been a member of the church. The gospel sustained him in affliction and infirmity.

COMSTOCK, CYRUS, died in Lewis, N. Y.,

Jan. 8, 1853, aged 86. He planted nearly every Congregational church in Essex county, where he labored nearly forty years, employed by the Berkshire missionary association.

CONANT, ROGER, an early settler in Mass., born in 1591, came to Plymouth in 1623, and removed to Nantasket in 1625, and thence in the autumn to Cape Ann, intrusted with the care of the plantation by the adventurers in England. He discovered Naumkeak or Salem, and proposed that as a better place of settlement, and built the first house there in 1626. He was representative at the first court in 1634, and died at Beverly Nov. 19, 1679, aged 88. His son, Roger, was the first white child born in Salem, and from that circumstance had a grant of twenty acres in 1640. — Farmer's New England Register.

CONANT, SYLVANUS, minister of Middleborough, Mass., was graduated at Harvard college in 1740, and was ordained as the successor of Peter Thacher March 28, 1745; but a minority, opposed to him, soon settled Thomas Weld as their minister. He died of the small-pox Dec. 7, 1777, and was succeeded by Joseph Barker. He published a letter on the death of his wife, with a poem to her memory by Judge Peter Oliver, 1756; a discourse at Plymouth, 1776.

CONDEE, MRS., wife of Daniel T. Condee, missionary at the Sandwich Islands, died in March or April, 1855, at Wailuku, aged 44. Her name was Andelucia Lee of Jericho, Vt. She embarked in 1836. In her last hours she had the consolation of knowing, that her two daughters were sharers in the great salvation of the gospel. Though about to leave husband and children, she hoped to meet them on the shores of immortality.

CONDIT, AARON, died in Morristown, N. J., in April, 1852, aged 87, nearly forty years pastor at Hanover. He preached ten thousand sermons, had nine or ten revivals, received six hundred and forty-four persons into his church, eleven of whom became preachers, and baptized one thousand and fifty-five. Four of his sons were ministers, one of whom, Rev. Joseph C., of South Hadley, died Sept. 19, 1847, aged 43. — Magie's Fun. Serm.

CONE, SPENCER H., D. D., a Baptist minister, died in New York Aug. 28, 1855, aged 70. At first he was an actor, and was last on the stage in 1811, when many perished in the burning of the Richmond theatre. He afterwards was an editor at R., and a clerk in the treasury. In 1823 he became a pastor in New York, and was one of the most distinguished among the Baptist ministers.

CONGDON, BENJAMIN T., died in New Bedford April 6, 1851. He published the New Bedford Courier, an anti-masonic paper, and was register of deeds.

CONKLIN, BENJAMIN, minister of Leicester, died Jan. 30, 1798, aged 65. A native of Southhold, and a graduate of Princeton, he was settled as the successor of Mr. Roberts in Nov., 1763: from ill health he was dismissed in 1794, and was succeeded by Mr. Moore. He was sagacious, and energetic, and patriotic. In the Shays rebellion he lent effectual aid to the cause of good order. As a trustee of the academy he was also useful. — Washburn's Sketch of Leicester Academy.

CONWAY, HENRY, general, a hero of the Revolution, died in East Tennessee in Sept., 1812, of the sting of bees.

CONWAY, THOMAS, major-general, a native of Ireland, came from France in 1777, on the recommendation of Silas Deane. After intriguing against Washington, and fighting Gen. Cadwallader, he returned to France in 1778. It was while suffering under the wound, received in the duel, that he repented and wrote to Washington, "You are in my eyes the great and good man."

CONWAY, ROBERT, general, a hero of the Revolution, died at Georgetown, South Carolina, in Dec., 1823, aged 70. He had previously lived at Charleston.

CONWELL, HENRY, D. D., Roman Catholic bishop, died at Philadelphia April 22, 1842, aged 91. He was consecrated in London in 1820.

COOKE, AARON, captain, died at Northampton Sept. 5, 1690, aged 80, the head of the families of Cooke. He came from England to Dorchester in 1630, and lived in Windsor and Northampton. He had four wives; among them the daughter of Thomas Ford of Windsor. His second wife, of the name of Denslow, was the mother of Aaron Cooke.

COOKE, ELISHA, a physician of Boston, the son of Richard C., died Oct. 31, 1715, aged 78. He was born Sept. 16, 1637, and was graduated at Harvard college 1657. After having been an assistant under the old government, he was sent to England in 1689 as an agent of Mass. to procure the restoration of the charter. He was decided in his opinion, that if the old charter could not be obtained, it would be better to meet the consequences, than to submit to a charter which abridged the liberties of the people. When the new charter was procured in 1691, he refused to accept it, and did what he could to prevent its acceptance. Increase Mather, who was agent at the same time, pursued a different course, thinking it wise to submit to a necessary evil. Though he was not placed in the list of councillors, nominated by Dr. Mather in 1692, from apprehensions that he would oppose the new charter; yet in the following year he was elected in Massachusetts. He was, however, rejected by Gov. Phips, because he opposed his appointment in England. In 1694, he was re-elected, and continued in the council till 1703, when Gov. Dudley negatived his election, as he did for a number of years successively. Though esteemed as a physician, he was most remarkable in his political character, having been more than forty years in places of public trust, and being always firm and steady to his principles. He married a daughter of Gov. Leverett. — Hutchinson, I. 393, 408; II. 70, 136, 211.

COOKE, ELISHA, distinguished in the history of Mass., was the son of the preceding and was graduated at Harvard college in 1697. He was a representative of Boston in the general court in 1713, and was in favor of a private bank, rather than of the public bank, the plan of which was adopted to remedy the evils of the bills of credit. He was elected into the council in 1717, and immediately commenced his opposition to Gov. Shute, engaging on the popular side. This was the commencement of the dispute. The different parties became more hostile; new subjects of controversy arose; and Shute was at length obliged to leave the colony. Mr. Cooke was elected a councillor in 1718; but the governor in a manner not very civil informed him, that his attendance at the board would be excused. In 1720 he was chosen speaker of the house of representatives; but the governor negated the choice, and as the house refused to make a new election, contesting his right to control them, he dissolved the assembly. At the next session a different person was elected, not because the pretension of Shute was admitted, but that there might be no obstruction to the progress of the regular business of the court. In 1723 he was appointed agent for Massachusetts, and sailed for London in January. Soon after his return he was chosen, in May, 1726, a member of the council. On the accession of Gov. Belcher, he was appointed in 1730 a justice of the common pleas for Suffolk. He had hitherto retained the attachment of the people by endeavoring to support their liberties; but being desirous of securing his interest both with the governor and the town of Boston, a jealousy was excited, and he was in danger of losing the regard of both parties. In 1733 or 1734 he was elected representative by a majority of only one or two votes in six or seven hundred. He died in Aug., 1737, worn out with his labors, having been many years the head of the popular party. He published political tracts. — Hutchinson, II. 221, 233, 302, 348, 391; Collect. Hist. Soc. III. 300.

COOKE, WILLIAM, the first minister of East Sudbury, died Nov. 12, 1760, aged 63, having been a useful pastor for thirty-six years. He graduated at Harvard in 1716, and was the librarian. He was succeeded at S. by Mr. Bridge. He published a sermon at ordination of Elisha Marsh, 1742; of Samuel Baldwin, 1757.

COOKE, SAMUEL, first minister of the second parish in Cambridge, was graduated at Harvard college in 1735, and ordained Sept. 12, 1739.

He died June 4, 1783, aged 74, and was succeeded by Mr. Fiske. He was a man of science, of a social disposition, distinguished by his good sense and prudence, and a faithful servant of the Lord Jesus. He published a sermon at the ordination of C. Brown, 1748; of W. Symmes, 1759; the election sermon, 1770; a sermon for a memorial of the battle of Lexington, 1777. — Hist. Coll. VII. 33.

COOKE, GEORGE FREDERIC, a theatrical performer, was born in Westminster, April 17, 1756. He became distinguished as a player in London, in 1800. He came to America in Nov., 1810, and was much admired. He was intemperate, and died at New York as a drunkard, Sept. 26, 1812. Mr. Dunlap published his memoirs, 2 vols., 1813.

COOKE, PHILIP P., died Jan. 20, 1850, aged 33. The son of John R. C., he graduated at Princeton, and studied law with his father at Winchester in Va., and settled on the Shenandoah, near the Blue Ridge. He wrote tales for the periodicals. He published the Froissart ballads, 1847. — Cyc. of American Lit. II. 635.

COOLIDGE, JOSEPH, died in Boston, Nov. 19, 1840, aged 67. He was educated in Boston, and in a military academy in the south of France. He had an ample fortune. He contributed and toiled for the establishment of the McLean asylum. For railroads he subscribed largely, — not for gain, but for the public good. He was of a public spirit and energetic.

COOPER, JOHN, was of Scituate in 1634, but removed to Barnstable. As he calls Alice Bradford his sister, his wife was probably of the name of Carpenter. At his death he left one third of his large estate to the church.

COOPER, WILLIAM, minister in Boston, died Dec. 13, 1743, aged 49. He was a native of that town, and, being early impressed by the truths of religion and delighting in the study of the Scriptures, passed through the temptations of youth without a blemish upon his character. He was grave, but not gloomy nor austere; discreet, but not precise; and cheerful, with innocence. While a member of Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1712, he ardently cultivated those branches of science which were most useful and important. Every literary pursuit was sanctified by prayer, and every human acquisition rendered subservient to the knowledge of God and religion. Soon after he began to preach, the eminence of his qualifications as a minister attracted the attention of the church in Brattle street, Boston, and he was invited to be colleague pastor with Mr. Colman. At his own request his ordination was delayed for a year, until May 23, 1716, when he was inducted into the sacred office. From this period to that of his death his ministerial gifts, graces, and usefulness seemed constantly to increase, and the more he was known, the more he was esteemed, loved, and honored. In the year 1737 he was chosen president of Harvard college, but he declined the honorable trust.

He was an eminent preacher, being an able and zealous advocate of the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel. Jesus Christ was ever the prominent object in his discourses. He insisted much on the doctrines of grace; considering them as not only constituting the sole foundation of a sinner's hope, but as exhibiting the capital aids and incentives to holiness of heart and life. Hence his preaching was practical as well as evangelical. He inculcated obedience upon Christian principles and by Christian arguments. His sermons were easy and natural in method; rich in important truth; plain but not grovelling in style; solid and argumentative, yet animated with the spirit of devotion; calculated at once to enlighten the mind, to impress the conscience, and to warm the heart. In explaining the profound and sublime truths of the gospel, he had the singular felicity to be intelligible to the ignorant, instructive to the well-informed, and edifying to the serious. In prayer he remarkably excelled. He had a voice at once strong and pleasant, and elocution grave and dignified; while a deep impression of God, whose mercy he implored and whose messages he delivered, was visible in his countenance and demeanor, and added an indescribable solemnity to all his performances. His benevolent labors were not in vain. He was an eminent instrument and promoter of the great revival of religion, which occurred toward the close of his life. With a heart overflowing with joy he declared that, "Since the year 1740, more people had sometimes come to him in concern about their souls in one week, than in the preceding twenty-four years of his ministry." To these applicants he was a most judicious and affectionate counsellor and guide. Though the general attention to the things of another world was pronounced by many to be enthusiasm and fanaticism; yet, Mr. Cooper, while he withstood the irregularities which prevailed, was persuaded that there was a remarkable work of Divine grace. The numerous instances in his own parish, of persons affected either with pungent and distressing convictions of sin, with deep humiliation and self-abhorrence, with ardent love to God and man, or with inexpressible consolation in religion, perfectly satisfied him that the power of the Divine Reprover, Sanctifier, and Comforter was among them. In the private walks of life he displayed the combined excellencies of the gentleman and Christian. He had but little warning of the approach of death, but in the lucid intervals of his disease, he was enabled to declare that he rejoiced in God his Saviour.

He published a sermon on the incomprehensibility of God, 1714; how and why young people should cleanse their way, 1716; a sermon to young people, 1723; a funeral sermon on J. Corey, 1726; on the earthquake, 1727; a discourse on early piety, 1728; a discourse on the reality, extremity, and absolute certainty of hell torments, 1732; on the death of Lieut.-Gov. Tailer, 1732; at the ordination of R. Breck, 1736; concio hyemalis, or a winter sermon, 1737; on the death of P. Thacher, 1739; the doctrine of predestination unto life explained and vindicated in four sermons, 1740, which were republished in 1804; election sermon, 1740; a preface to Edwards' sermon on the trial of the spirits, 1741; two sermons preached at Portsmouth in the time of the revival, 1741. — Colman's Funeral Sermon; Panoplist, II. 537-540; Coll. Hist. Soc. x. 157.

COOPER, SAMUEL, D. D., minister in Boston, son of the preceding, died Dec. 29, 1783, aged 58. He was born March 28, 1725. He exhibited early marks of a masterly genius. As his mind was deeply impressed by religious truth, soon after he was graduated at Harvard college, in 1743, he devoted himself to the study of divinity, preferring the office of a minister of the gospel to the temporal advantages which his talents might have procured him. When he first appeared in the pulpit, his performances were so acceptable, and raised such expectations, that at the age of twenty years he was invited by the congregation in Brattle street, Boston, to succeed his father as colleague with Dr. Colman. In this office he was ordained May 21, 1746, thirty years after the ordination of his father. He did not disappoint the hopes of his friends. His reputation increased, and he soon became one of the most popular preachers in the country. After a ministry of thirty-seven years he died of the apoplexy.

Dr. Cooper was very distinguished in the sacred office which he sustained. His sermons were evangelical and perspicuous, and unequalled in America for elegance and taste. Delivering them with energy and pathos, his eloquence arrested attention and warmed the heart. In his prayers, which were uttered with humility and reverence, there was a grateful variety; and, as they were pertinent, scriptural, and animated with the spirit of devotion, they were admirably calculated to raise the souls of his fellow worshippers to God. His presence in the chambers of the sick was peculiarly acceptable, for he knew how to address the conscience without offence, to impart instruction, to soothe, and to comfort. His attention was not confined to theology; but he made himself acquainted with other branches of science, and was one of the most finished classical scholars of his day. His friendship to literature induced him, after the destruction of the library of Harvard college by fire, to exert himself to procure subscriptions to repair the loss. In 1767 he was elected a member of the corporation, in which office he continued until his death. He was an active member of the society for propagating the gospel among the aborigines of America. To his other acquisitions he added a just knowledge of the nature and design of government, and the rights of mankind. Most sincerely attached to the cause of civil and religious liberty, he was among the first of those patriots who took a decided part in opposition to the arbitrary exactions of Great Britain. In his intercourse with his fellow-citizens, and by his pen, he endeavored to arouse and strengthen the spirit of resistance. Such were his abilities and firmness, that he was esteemed and consulted by some of the principal men who were the means of effecting our Revolution. He did much toward procuring foreign alliances. His letters were read with great satisfaction in the court of Versailles, while men of the most distinguished characters in Europe became his correspondents. The friendship which he maintained with Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams was the means of introducing to his acquaintance many gentlemen from France, to whom he rendered himself peculiarly agreeable by his literary attainments, by an engaging address, and by the ease and politeness of his manners. Receiving from Dr. Franklin the letters of Hutchinson, procured by Mr. Williamson, with a strict injunction not to allow them to be published, he put them into the hands of a gentleman under the same injunction; but his confidence was misplaced. When his country had asserted her right to independence, believing that knowledge is necessary to the support of a free government, he was anxious to render our liberties perpetual by promoting literary establishments. He was therefore one of the foremost in laying the foundation of the American academy of arts and sciences, and was chosen its first vice president in the year 1780. In his last illness he expressed his great satisfaction in seeing his country in peace, and in possession of freedom and independence, and his hopes that the virtue and the public spirit of his countrymen would prove to the world that they were not unworthy of these inestimable blessings. In the intervals of reason, he informed his friends that he was perfectly resigned to the will of Heaven; that his hopes and consolations sprang from a firm belief of those truths which he had preached to others; and that he wished not to be detained any longer from that state of perfection and felicity which the gospel had opened to his view.

Besides his political writings, which appeared in the journals of the day, he published the following discourses: on the artillery election, 1751; before the society for encouraging industry, 1753; at the general election, 1756; on the reduction of Quebec, 1759; at the ordination of J. Jackson, 1760; on the death of George II., 1761; at the Duddleian lecture, 1773; on the commencement of the new constitution of Massachusetts, Oct. 25, 1780. This last discourse and others of his productions have been published in several languages, and, being written in a polished and elegant manner, were well calculated for the lips of an eloquent speaker, such as he himself was. He was also one of the poetic contributors to the "Pietas et Gratulatio," with Dr. Church and others, 1760. — Clarke's Funeral Sermon; American Herald, Jan. 19, 1784; Continental Journal, Jan. 22; Holmes; Thacker's Cent. Disc.

COOPER, MYLES, D. D., president of King's college, New York, died in Edinburgh May 1, 1785, aged about 50. He was educated in the university of Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1760. He arrived at New York in the autumn of 1762, being recommended by the archbishop of Canterbury as a person well qualified to assist in the management of the college, and to succeed the president. He was received by Dr. Johnson with the affection of a father, and was immediately appointed professor of moral philosophy. After the resignation of Dr. Johnson in Feb., 1763, he was chosen president, previously to the commencement in May. It was not long before Dr. Clossey, a gentleman who had been educated in Trinity college, Dublin, and had taken the degree of doctor of physic, was appointed professor of natural philosophy. A grammar school was also established and connected with the college, under the care of Mr. Cushing, from Boston. The classes were now taught by Mr. Cooper, Mr. Harper, and Dr. Clossey; and under such able instructors they had peculiar advantages. In the year 1775 Dr. Cooper, as his politics leaned toward the British, was reduced to the necessity of withdrawing from the college and returning to England. He was afterward one of the ministers of the Episcopal chapel of Edinburgh. After the Revolution William Samuel Johnson, son of Dr. Johnson, was president of the college.

Dr. Cooper, though he had long expected death, waiting patiently for its approach, yet died in rather a sudden manner. The following epitaph was written by himself.

"Here lies a priest of English blood,
Who, living, liked whatever was good;
Good company, good wine, good name,
Yet never hunted after fame;
But, as the first he still preferred,
So here he chose to be interred,
And, unobscured, from crowds withdrew,
To rest among a chosen few,
In humble hopes that sovereign love
Will raise him to be blest above."

He published a volume of poems in 1758, and a sermon on civil government, preached before the university of Oxford on a fast, 1777. While in this country he maintained a literary character of considerable eminence. He wrote on the subject of an American episcopate, and sometimes used his pen on political subjects. It is said he narrowly escaped the fury of the whigs. — New and General Biographical Dictionary; Miller, II. 369; Pennsylvania Packet, July 29, 1785; Chandler's Life of Johnson, 106–109.

COOPER, WILLIAM, town clerk of Boston forty-nine years, died Nov. 28, 1809, aged 89. He was, it is believed, the brother of Dr. Samuel C., and he was, for his excellent and faithful services, held in high estimation in Boston.

COOPER, JOSEPH, a distinguished farmer of Cooper's Point, N. J., died at Philadelphia in Nov., 1818.

COOPER, THOMAS, M. D., president of South Carolina college, died in Columbia May 11, 1839, aged 79. He was born in England about 1760, and followed to this country Priestley, who came in 1794. In his politics he was a zealous democrat; as a lecturer he was learned and interesting. He was unhappily an Infidel. He published works on law, medical jurisprudence, and political economy. He digested the statutes of South Carolina in 4 vols. He translated Justinian and Broussais. In Pennsylvania he was a judge of common law, and a professor of chemistry at Carlisle.

COOPER, JAMES B., commander in the U. S. navy, died Feb. 5, 1854, at Haddonfield, N. J., aged 93. He was a captain in Lee's celebrated legion in the Revolution; assisted in the capture of Stony Point and Paulus Hook; and was engaged in the battles of Guilford court-house and of Eutaw Springs. He entered the navy in July, 1812, as sailing-master; he was made a commander in 1841.

COOPER, JAMES FENIMORE, died in Cooperstown, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1851, aged 62. He was the son of Judge William C., of Burlington, N. J., an English immigrant. He graduated at Yale in 1805. After serving in the navy six years, in 1811 he married Miss De Lancey, sister of the bishop of western New York. She died Jan. 20, 1852. In 1826 he visited Europe.

He published various works of fiction: Precaution, the Spy, the Pioneers, the Leather-stocking tales, the Prairie, the last of the Mohicans, the Path-finder, the Deer-slayer, the Pilot; the Red rover, the Water-witch, the two Admirals, and Wing and wing; the Bravo, the Heidenmaur, the Headsmen, the Homeward bound, the Home as found. He wrote also a history of the Navy, and 6 vols. of Gleanings in Europe and Sketches of Switzerland.

COPELAND, LAWRENCE, died at Braintree Jan. 14, 1700, aged 110.

about 76. He was born in 1738 in Boston. He had a natural talent for painting, and was the pupil and successor of Smibert. Many full-length portraits painted by him remain in Massachusetts. In coloring and drapery he excelled; and his likenesses were faithful. He went to England before the war. In 1770 he was admitted a member of the royal academy of painting in London. He was patronized by Mr. West. In 1774 he went to Italy, and in 1776 returned to England, where he met his wife and children, whom he had left in Boston. He now devoted himself to portrait painting. His first historical picture was the Youth rescued from a shark. His picture of the death of Lord Chatham established his fame. Afterwards he painted the siege of Gibraltar; Major Pearson's death on the island of Jersey; Charles I. in the house of commons; the surrender of De Winter to Duncan, besides many portraits. His mother was Sarah Winslow, of the Plymouth family. Col. Henry Bromfield married his sister. His wife was the daughter of Richard Clarke, a merchant in Boston, one of the consignees of the India company's tea; a connection which may account for his attachment to the royal interest. His daughter married Gardiner Greene, who in 1818 presented to Harvard college a collection of all the proof engravings of Copley's historical paintings. — Knapp's Lectures, 191; Encyc. Amer.

CORBITANT, an Indian sachem, living at Mattapoiset, a neck of land in Swanzy, was an enemy of the Plymouth plantation at the first settlement. He was a sachem under Massasoit. Indignant at the peace made with the English, he in 1621 seized Squanto at Namasket, or Middleborough, and put his knife to the breast of Hobbamoc, another Indian, friendly to the English, who, being stout, broke away and fled to Plymouth. Capt. Standish and ten men were immediately sent to Namasket to take Corbitant prisoner; but he escaped. Some time after, Corbitant, through the mediation of Massasoit, made peace, and ventured to show himself at Plymouth. In March, 1623, he was visited by E. Winslow and John Hampden, celebrated in English history, with Hobbamoc for their guide. The Indian "was a notable politician, yet full of merry jests and squibs, and never better pleased than when the like were returned again upon him." He inquired why it was, that, when he visited the English, the guns were pointed towards him; and on being told it was out of respect and honor, he said, shaking his head, he "liked not such salutations." On seeing his visitors ask a blessing on their food, he inquired the meaning, and on being told the reason, said it was well; he, too, believed in an Almighty power, called Kichtan. — Hist. Coll. VIII. 263; Mourt's Relat. in 2 Hist. Coll. IX. 54; Belknap's Biography, II. 229.

CORLET, ELIJAH, an eminent instructor, commenced his labors at Cambridge not long after the first settlement of the town. He was master of the grammar school between forty and fifty years, and many of the most worthy men in the country enjoyed the benefit of his instructions previously to their entrance into college. The society for propagating the gospel compensated him for his attention to the Indian scholars, who were designed for the university. He died in 1687, aged 76. He was a man of learning, piety, and respectability. N. Walter published an elegy on his death in blank verse. He wrote a Latin epitaph on Mr. Hooker, which is inserted in Mather's Magnalia. — Hist. Coll. I. 243; VII. 22; Life of Walter; Mather's Magnalia, III. 68.

CORNBURY, EDWARD HYDE, lord, governor of New York, died at Chelsea April 1, 1723. He was the son of the Earl of Clarendon, and being one of the first officers who deserted the army of King James, King William, in gratitude for his services, appointed him to an American government. Hunted out of England by a host of hungry creditors, bent upon accumulating as much wealth as he could squeeze from the purses of an impoverished people, and animated with unequalled zeal for the church, he commenced his administration, as successor of Lord Bellamont, May 3, 1702. His sense of justice was as weak as his bigotry was uncontrollable. The following act of outrage will exhibit his character. A great sickness, which was probably the yellow fever, prevailing in New York in 1703, Lord Cornbury retired to Jamaica, on Long Island; and, as Mr. Hubbard, the Presbyterian minister, lived in the best house in the town, his lordship requested the use of it during his short residence there. Mr. Hubbard put himself to great inconvenience to oblige the governor, and the governor in return delivered the parsonage house into the hands of the Episcopal party, and seized upon the glebe. In the year 1707 he imprisoned without law two Presbyterian ministers for presuming to preach in New York without his license. They were sent out by some dissenters in London as itinerant preachers, for the benefit of the middle and southern colonies. He had a conference with them, and made himself conspicuous as a savage bigot and an ungentlemanly tyrant. The cries of the oppressed reaching the ears of the queen in 1708, she appointed Lord Lovelace governor in his stead. As soon as Cornbury was superseded, his creditors threw him into the custody of the sheriff of New York; but after the death of his father he was permitted to return to England, and succeeded to the earldom of Clarendon. Never was there a governor of New York so universally detested, or so deserving of abhorrence. His behavior was trifling, mean, and extravagant. It was not uncommon for him to dress himself in a woman's habit, and then to patrol the fort, in which he resided. By such freaks he drew upon himself universal contempt; while his despotism, bigotry, injustice, and insatiable avarice aroused the indignation of the people. — Smith's New York, 101–116; Hutchinson, II. 123; Marshall, I. 272.

CORNELIUS, ELIAS, a physician and a patriot of the Revolution, died at Somers, N. Y., June 13, 1823, aged 65. He was a native of Long Island. At the age of nineteen, in opposition to the advice of his relatives, who were then attached to the British cause, he repaired to New York early in 1777, and, being recommended by his instructor, Dr. Samuel Latham, was appointed surgeon's mate in the second Rhode Island regiment, commanded by Col. Israel Angell. On reconnoitring near the lines above New York, he was soon taken prisoner and carried to the "old Provost" jail in the city, where he suffered incredible hardships, till with great courage and presence of mind he made his escape in March, 1778. He immediately rejoined the army and continued in it till the close of 1781. He left a widow, three daughters, and a son. As a physician he had extensive and successful practice. It was while he was in the army that he received those religious impressions which issued in an established Christian hope. A warm friend to charitable institutions, he left 100 dollars to each of the following societies: the American bible, education, foreign mission, and the united foreign mission. — Boston Recorder, July 5, 1823.

CORNELIUS, ELIAS, D. D., secretary of the American education society, son of the preceding, died Feb. 12, 1832, aged 37. He graduated at Yale college in 1813; and, after studying theology, engaged in 1816 as an agent of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, in which capacity he was for one or two years very active and successful. In Sept. and Oct., 1817, he visited the missions in the Cherokee nation. On his way thence to the Chickasaw nation he met a party of Indians from the Arkansas, and redeemed from them a little Osage orphan captive, five years of age, and sent the girl to the mission family. The subsequent winter he spent at New Orleans, in the employment of the Missionary society of Connecticut. He arrived in the city Dec. 30, 1817, and commenced preaching and gathering a congregation. Jan. 22, 1818, he was joined by Sylvester Larned, and they labored together till the congregation was organized and Mr. Larned invited to become the minister; after which he turned his attention to the poor and sick and others of the destitute. In the spring he returned to Andover; and, July 21, 1819, was installed as colleague with Dr. Worcester at Salem. In Sept., 1826, he was dismissed by the advice of a mutual council, having been appointed secretary of the American education society. In the service of this institution he devised the plan of permanent scholarships, and met with unexampled success in soliciting subscriptions. He established also the quarterly register and journal of the American education society, which he conducted for some years, assisted by Mr. B. B. Edwards. In Oct., 1831, he was chosen secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, in the place of Mr. Evarts, deceased. But he had signified his acceptance of this office only a few weeks, and had just entered the new and wide field of toil for the enlargement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, when he was removed from the world. Exhausted by a journey from Boston, he was taken sick at Hartford, Conn., Feb. 7, and died in that city of a fever on the brain. His wife, the daughter of Rev. Asahel Hooker, arrived a few hours after his decease. Dr. Cornelius was enterprising, bold, and eloquent; though resolute, yet considerate and prudent. Of a vigorous frame and determined spirit, he was capable of meeting and surmounting great difficulties. He fell in the fulness of his strength; and the American churches are again taught not to trust in man. Besides his labors in the quarterly journal and the annual reports of the education society, he published a discourse on the doctrine of the trinity, reprinted as No. 185 of the tract society. His memoirs, by B. B. Edwards, was published 1833.

CORNPLANTER, or GARYAN, an Indian chief, died at Seneca reservation, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1836, aged about 100 years. He early espoused the American side. His associate was Red Jacket.

CORNWALLIS, CHARLES, marquis, commander of the British army in America, surrendered at Yorktown, Oct. 19, 1781, an event which brought the war to a close. In 1790 he was governor-general of India, and by his victories in the war with Tippoo Saib acquired high reputation. Again was he appointed, in 1805, governor of India, where he died, at Ghazepore, Oct. 5. He married in 1768 Miss Jones, a lady of large fortune, said to have died of a broken heart in consequence of his engaging in the American war. He published an answer to the narrative of Sir Henry Clinton, 1783.

CORREA DE SERRA, JOSEPH FRANCIS, minister plenipotentiary from Portugal to this country, was born in 1750, and studied at Rome and Naples. Botany early engaged his attention. After the peace of Amiens he resided eleven years in Paris. He came to this country in 1813, in order to prosecute his researches in natural history; and, while here, received his appointment as minister from Portugal. He died at Lisbon in Sept., 1823, aged 74. He was an eminent botanist. He published dissertations on subjects of natural history in the English philosophical transactions; note sur la valeur du perisperme; vues carpologiques; collecao de livros ineditos de historiae Portugal, 3 vol., 1790; soil of Kentucky in American phil. trans. i. new series.

CÓRTEZ, HERNANDO, the conqueror of Mexico, died in Spain Dec. 2, 1547, aged 62. He was born in Estremadura, in Spain, in 1485. At the age of 33 he sailed from Cuba Nov. 18, 1518, with eleven small vessels, six hundred and seventeen men, soldiers and sailors, ten field-pieces, and only thirteen firelocks. He landed at Tabasco, and captured it. At Vera Cruz he built a small fort; then, burning his ships, he advanced against Mexico, with five hundred men and fifteen horses. The emperor, Montezuma, received him into the city with great pomp; but he was seized and confined by the Spaniard. In a tumult of the people, Montezuma was brought forward, in order to quell it; but in the attack the emperor was mortally wounded and the invaders driven from the city. But Cortez, after obtaining recruits, marched again to Mexico in Dec., 1520, and after a siege of three months took it, and seized Guatemozin. The sovereign was placed on burning coals, in order to extort from him a confession of the place where his riches were concealed. Thus the empire was subdued by a small band of adventurers, and hundreds of the natives for refusing to become Christians were cruelly put to death by men of less religion than they. The name of Cortez is made memorable on the earth for bravery, avarice, and cruelty.

CORTLANDT, PIERRE VAN, lieutenant-governor of New York, died at his seat at Croton river May 1, 1819, aged 94. He was appointed to that office at the commencement of the new government in 1777, and was continued in it eighteen years in succession till 1795, his friend and confidant, George Clinton, being during the same period governor. He early took an active part against the oppressive acts of the British government. Of the first provincial congress he was a member; also of the convention which framed the constitution of New York. His residence being forty or fifty miles from the city, during the war his family was driven from their dwelling in the manor of Cortlandt; but he confided in the justice of the American cause, and, putting his trust in God, he was undismayed by danger. His wife was the daughter of Gilbert Livingston. Col. Van Cortlandt, probably his son, married a daughter of Gov. Clinton. — Augustus Van Cortlandt, perhaps his brother, died in Yonkers, N. Y., in 1823, aged 96. — He was a man of exemplary virtues, upright, benevolent, the friend of the poor, and died a sincere Christian, with full assurance of salvation by the redeeming love of Jesus Christ, upon whom in his last moments he called to receive him to endless life and glory. — Westchester Gazette.

CORY, GILES, accused of witchcraft, was brought into court at Salem in Sept., 1692; but, observing the fate of those, who had been tried, fifteen at that court having been convicted, he refused to plead, and agreeably to law he had judgment for standing mute and was pressed to death. This is the only instance of the kind in the history of this country. Eight of the fifteen were executed Sept. 22, among whom was Martha Cory. — Hutchinson, ii. 60.

COSTER, JOHN G., died in New York, Aug. 8, 1844, aged 62. Born in Holland, he was an honorable and successful merchant in New York for fifty years.

COTTING, URIAH, died at Boston May 9, 1819, aged 53; a mechanist and projector, doing perhaps more than any other man for the improvement of the city.

COTTON, JOHN, one of the most distinguished of the early ministers of New England, died Dec. 23, 1652, aged 67. He was born in Derby, Eng., Dec. 4, 1585. At the age of 13 he was admitted a member of Trinity college, Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Emanuel college, where he obtained a fellowship. He was soon chosen the head lecturer in the college, being also employed as tutor to many scholars, who afterwards became distinguished. For this office he was peculiarly well qualified, as his knowledge was extensive, his manners gentle and accommodating, and he possessed an uncommon ease and facility in communicating his ideas. His occasional orations and discourses were so accurate and elegant, and displayed such invention and taste, that he acquired a high reputation in the university. Hitherto he had been seeking the gratification of a literary taste, or yielding to the claims of ambition; but at length a complete change in his character, which he attributed to the grace of God, induced him to engage with earnestness in the pursuit of new and more exalted objects. While a member of the college his conscience had been impressed by the faithful preaching of William Perkins; but he resisted his convictions; and such was his enmity to the truths, which had disturbed his peace, that when he heard the bell toll for the funeral of that eminent servant of God, it was a joyful sound to him. It announced his release from a ministry, hostile to his self-righteous and unhumiliated spirit. It was not long, however, before he was again awakened from his security by a sermon of Dr. Sibs on the misery of those who have no righteousness except the moral virtues. After a distressing anxiety of three years, it pleased God to give him joy in believing. He was soon called upon to preach again in his turn before the university, and, more anxious to do good than to attract applause, he did not array his discourse in the ornaments of language, but preached with plainness and pungency upon the duty of repentance. The vain wits of the university, disappointed in their expectations of a splendid harangue, and reproved by the fidelity of him who was now a Christian minister, did not hum their applauses as usual, and one of them, Mr. Preston, who afterwards became famous in the religious world, received such deep impressions upon his mind as were never effaced. Such was the collegial life of Mr. Cotton.

About the year 1612, when in the twenty-eighth year of his age, he became the minister of Boston in Lincolnshire. Soon after his establishment in this place, the zeal of a physician in the town in promoting Arminian sentiments, induced him to dwell much and principally for some time upon what he believed to be the truths of Scripture; upon the doctrine of God's eternal election before all foresight of good or evil, and the redemption only of the elect; upon the effectual influence of the Holy Spirit in the conversion of the sinner, without any regard to the previous exertions of free will; and upon the certain perseverance of every true believer. Such was his success, that he soon silenced his antagonist, and afterwards the doctrine of predestination was not brought into controversy. He soon entertained doubts respecting the lawfulness of complying with some of the ceremonies of the church, and was subjected to inconveniences on this account; but as his people coincided with him in his sentiments he kept his place for twenty years, and was during this time remarkably useful, not only by the effect of his faithful preaching, but as an instructor of young men who were designed for the ministry, some of whom were from Germany and Holland. His labors were immense, for in addition to his other avocations he generally preached four lectures in the course of a week. His benevolent exertions were not in vain. It pleased God, that a general reformation should take place in the town. The voice of profaneness was no longer heard, and the infinitely important truths of the gospel arrested the attention of almost all the inhabitants. He was much admired and much applauded, but he ever remained humble. At length, after the government of the English church fell into the hands of Bishop Laud, divisions arose among the parishioners of Mr. Cotton; a dissolute fellow, who had been punished for his immoralities, informed against the magistrates and the ministers for not kneeling at the sacrament; and Mr. Cotton, being cited before the high commission court, was obliged to flee. After being concealed for some time in London, he embarked for this country, anxious to secure to himself the peaceable enjoyment of the rights of conscience, though in a wilderness. He sailed in the same vessel with Mr. Hooker and Mr. Stone, and the circumstance of their names caused the people to say, on their arrival, Sept. 4, 1633, that their three great necessities would now be supplied, for they had Cotton for their clothing, Hooker for their fishing, and Stone for their building. This was an age of conceits. During the voyage three sermons or expositions were delivered almost every day, and Mr. Cotton was blessed in the birth of his eldest son, whom at his baptism in Boston, he called Seaborn. In Oct., 1633, he was established the teacher of the church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Wilson, who was pastor. He was set apart to this office, on a day of fasting, by imposition of the hands of Mr. Wilson and his two elders. He remained in this town, connected with this church, more than nineteen years; and such was his influence in establishing the order of our churches, and so extensive was his usefulness, that he has been called the patriarch of New England. The prevalence of those erroneous doctrines, which occasioned the synod of 1637, so much disturbed his peace, that he was almost induced to remove to New Haven. Mrs. Hutchinson endeavored to promote her wild sentiments by shielding them under the name of Mr. Cotton; but, though he was imposed upon for some time by the artifices of those of her party, yet, when he discovered their real opinions, he was bold and decided in his opposition to them. Though he did not sign the result of the synod of 1637, on account of his differing from it in one or two points; he yet approved of it in general, and his peaceable intercourse with his brethren in the ministry was not afterwards interrupted on account of his supposed errors. In 1642 he was invited to England, with Mr. Hooker and Mr. Davenport, to assist in the assembly of divines at Westminster, and he was in favor of accepting the invitation, but Mr. Hooker was opposed to it, as he was at that time forming a system of church government for New England. His death was occasioned by an inflammation of the lungs, brought on by exposure in crossing the ferry to Cambridge, where he went to preach. So universally was he venerated, that many sermons were preached on his decease in different parts of the country.

Mr. Cotton sustained a high reputation for learning. He was a critic in Greek, and with Hebrew he was so well acquainted that he could discourse in it. He also wrote Latin with elegance, as a specimen of which, his preface to Norton's answer to the inquiries of Appollonius has often been mentioned. In the pulpit he impressed his hearers with admiration. Uniting to conspicuous talents and a profound judgment, the candor and mildness enjoined in the gospel, and the warmth of pious feeling, his instructions did not meet the resistance which is often experienced, but fell with the gentleness of the dew, and insinuated themselves imperceptibly into the mind. His labors, soon after he came to Boston, were more effectual than those of any of the ministers in the country; he was the means of exciting great attention to religious subjects; and some of the most profligate were brought to renounce their iniquities, and to engage in a course of conduct more honorable and more satisfactory, and which would terminate in everlasting felicity. His discourses were generally written with the greatest attention, though he sometimes preached without any preparation. His intimate and accurate knowledge of the Scriptures and the extent of his learning enabled him to do this without difficulty. His written sermons, which he had composed with care, were yet remarkable for their simplicity and plainness, for he was desirous that all should understand him, and less anxious to acquire fame than to do good. His voice was not loud, but it was so clear and distinct, that it was heard with ease by the largest auditory; and his utterance was accompanied by a natural and becoming motion of his right hand. The Lord was in the still, small voice. He preached with such life, dignity, and majesty, that Mr. Wilson said, one almost thinks that he hears the very prophet speak, upon whose works he is dwelling. His library was large, and he had well studied the fathers and schoolmen, but he preferred Calvin to them all. Being asked, in the latter part of his life, why he indulged in nocturnal studies, he answered, that he loved to sweeten his mouth with a piece of Calvin before he went to sleep. Twelve hours in a day were generally occupied by his studies; and such was his zeal in theological pursuits, that he frequently lamented the useless visits with which he was oppressed, though he was incapable of incivility to persons, who thus obtruded upon him. He gave himself chiefly to reading and preparation for the duties of public instruction, depending much on the ruling elders for intelligence respecting his flock. He was an excellent casuist, and, besides resolving many cases which were brought him, he was also deeply though not violently engaged in controversies respecting church government. In his controversy with Mr. Williams he found an antagonist, whose weapons were powerful and whose cause was good; while he himself unhappily advocated a cause which he had once opposed, when suffering persecution in England. He contended for the interference of the civil power in support of the truth, and to the objection of Mr. Williams, that this was infringing the rights of conscience, the only reply that could be made was, that when a person, after repeated admonitions, persisted in rejecting and opposing fundamental points of doctrine or worship, it could not be from conscience, but against conscience, and therefore that it was not persecution for cause of conscience for the civil power to drive such persons away, but it was a wise regard to the good of the church; it was putting away evil from the people.

To his intellectual powers and improvements he added the virtues which render the Christian character amiable and interesting. Even Mr. Williams, his great antagonist, with very extraordinary candor speaks of him with esteem and respect, commending him for his goodness and for his attachment to so many of the truths of the gospel. He was modest, humble, gentle, peaceable, patient, and forbearing. Sometimes he almost lamented that he carried his meekness to such an extent. "Angry men," said he, "have an advantage over me; the people will not oppose them, for they will rage; but some are encouraged to do me injury, because they know I shall not be angry with them again." It will not be questioned, however, that his temper contributed more to his peace, and enjoyment, and usefulness, than a different temper would have done. When he was once told that his preaching was very dark and comfortless, he replied, "Let me have your prayers, brother, that it may be otherwise." Having observed to a person, who boasted of his knowledge of the book of Revelation, that he wanted light in those mysteries, the man went home and sent him a pound of candles; which insolence only excited a smile. "Mr. Cotton," says Dr. Mather, "would not set the beacon of his great soul on fire at the landing of such a little cock-boat." A drunken fellow, to make merriment for his companions, approached him in the street, and whispered in his ear, "Thou art an old fool." Mr. Cotton replied, "I confess I am so; the Lord make both me and thee wiser than we are, even wise to salvation." Though he asserted the right of the civil power to banish heretics, he yet had a great aversion to engaging in any civil affairs, and with reluctance yielded his attention to any concern not immediately connected with his holy calling. In his family he was very careful to impart instruction, and wisely and calmly to exercise his authority in restraining vice. He read a chapter in the Bible, with an exposition, before and after which he made a prayer, remembering, however, to avoid a tedious prolixity. He observed the Sabbath from evening to evening, and by him this practice was rendered general in New England. On Saturday evening, after expounding the Scriptures, he catechized his children and servants, prayed with them, and sung a psalm. On the Sabbath evening the sermons of the day were repeated, and, after singing, with uplifted hands and eyes he uttered the doxology, "Blessed be God in Christ our Saviour." In his study he prayed much. He would rarely engage in any theological research, or sit down to prosecute his studies, without first imploring the Divine blessing. He kept many days of private fasting and thanksgiving. While he was thus distinguished for his piety, he was also kind and benevolent. He knew that the efficacy of religious principles must be evinced by good works, and he was therefore hospitable and charitable. The stranger and the needy were ever welcomed to his table. Such was his beneficence, that, when Mr. White was driven with his church from Bermuda into the American wilderness, he collected 700 pounds for their relief, towards which he himself contributed very liberally. Two hundred pounds were given by the church in Boston.

After a life of eminent sanctity and usefulness, he was not left destitute of support in his dying moments. In his sickness President Dunster went to see him, and with tears begged his blessing, saying, "I know in my heart, that he whom you bless shall be blessed." He sent for the elders of the church, and exhorted them to guard against declensions, expressing to them the pleasure which he had found in the service of the Lord Jesus Christ. After he had addressed his children, he desired to be left alone, that his thoughts might be occupied by heavenly things without interruption; and thus he died in peace. He was of a clear, fair complexion, and, like David, of a ruddy countenance. His stature was rather short than tall. In early life his hair was brown, but in his latter days it was white as the driven snow. In his countenance there was an inexpressible majesty, which commanded reverence from every one not hardened against good impressions, who approached him. In an epitaph on Mr. Cotton by Mr. Woodbridge are the following lines, which probably led Dr. Franklin to write the famous epitaph on himself.

"A living, breathing Bible; tables, where Both covenants at large engraven were;
Gospel and law in 's heart had each its column,
His head an index to the sacred volume;
His very name a title page; and next,
His life a commentary on the text.
O, what a monument of glorious worth,
When in a new edition he comes forth,
Without errata may we think he'll be,
In leaves and covers of eternity!"

He left two sons, who were ministers of Hampton and of Plymouth. His youngest daughter married Increase Mather.

Mr. Cotton's publications were numerous; the most celebrated are the works which he published in the controversy with Mr. Williams, and his power of the keys, on the subject of church government. In this latter work he contends, that the constituent members of a church are elders and brethren; that the elders are intrusted with government, so that without them there can be no elections, admissions, or excommunications; that they have a negative upon the acts of the fraternity, yet that the brethren have so much liberty, that nothing of common concernment can be imposed upon them without their consent. He asserts the necessary communion of churches in synods, who have authority to enjoin such things as may rectify disorders, dissensions, and confusion of congregations, and, upon an obstinate refusal to comply, may withdraw communion. The following is a catalogue of his writings: God's promise to his plantation, an election sermon, 1634; a letter in answer to objections made against the New England churches, with the questions proposed to such as are admitted to church fellowship, 1641; the way of life, 4to; God's mercy mixed with his justice; an abstract of the laws of New England, 1641, and a second edition in 1655; this abstract of such laws of the Jews as were supposed to be of perpetual obligation was drawn up in 1636, when Vane was governor, though it was never accepted; it is preserved in vol. v. of the historical collections; the church's resurrection, on the fifth and sixth verses of revelation, XX. 1642; a modest and clear answer to Mr. Ball's discourse on set forms of prayer; exposition of revelation, XVI.; the true constitution of a particular, visible church, 1643; the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and power thereof, 1644; the doctrine of the church, to which is committed the keys of the kingdom of heaven; the covenant of God's free grace most sweetly unfolded, to which is added a profession of faith by Mr. Davenport, 1645; 3d edit., 1671; the way of the churches of Christ in New England, or the way of churches walking in brotherly equality, etc.; this was published from an imperfect copy, and represents Mr. Cotton as less friendly to the authority of the elders than he really was; the pouring out of the seven vials; the controversy concerning liberty of conscience truly stated, 1646; a treatise showing that singing of psalms is a gospel ordinance, 1647; the grounds and ends of the baptism of the children of the faithful, 1647; a letter to Mr. Williams, the bloody tenet washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb, being discussed and discharged of blood-guiltiness by just defence, in answer to Mr. Williams, to which is added, a reply to Mr. Williams' answer to Mr. Cotton's letter, 1647; questions propounded to him by the teaching elders, with his answer to each question; the way of congregational churches cleared, in two treatises, against Mr. Baylie and Mr. Rutherford, 1648; of the holiness of church members, proving that visible saints are the matter of the church, 1650; Christ the fountain of life, 1651; a brief exposition of Ecclesiastes, 1654; his censure upon the way of Mr. Henden, of Kent, 1656; sermons on the first epistle of John, folio; a discourse on things indifferent, proving that no church governors have power to impose indifferent things upon the consciences of men; exposition of Canticles; milk for babes, a catechism; meat for strong men; a discourse about civil government in a plantation, whose design is religion, 1663. — Norton's and Mather's Life of Cotton; Mather's Magnalia, III. 14-31; Neal's New England, I. 305-307; Hist. Coll. v. 171; IX. 41-44; Hutchinson, I. 34, 55-75, 115, 179; Winthrop, 52-153.

COTTON, SEABORN, minister of Hampton, N. H., was the son of the preceding, and was born at sea in Aug., 1633, while his parents were on their voyage to New England. His name is put Marigena in the catalogue of Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1651. He was ordained at Hampton in 1660, as successor of Mr. Wheelright, and died April 19, 1686, aged 52 years. His first wife was Dorothy, daughter of Gov. Bradstreet. His son John, his successor in the ministry at Hampton, was ordained in 1696, and died March 27, 1710, aged 52 years. During Gov. Cranfield's administration Mr. Moody was imprisoned for refusing to administer the sacrament to him; the next week the governor sent word to Mr. Cotton, that, "when he had prepared his soul, he would come and demand the sacrament of him, as he had done at Portsmouth." This threat induced Mr. Cotton to withdraw for some time to Boston. He was esteemed a thorough scholar and an able preacher. The heresies of his namesake, Pelagius, which had been revived in the world, he regarded with abhorrence. — Magnalia, III. 20, 31; Farmer's Belknap, I.

COTTON, JOHN, minister of Plymouth, Mass., and of Charleston, S. C., brother of the preceding, died Sept., 1699, aged 59. He was the son of John Cotton, of Boston, and was born March 13, 1640. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1657. From 1664 to 1667 he preached on Martha's Vineyard to a congregation of white people and also to the Indians, having acquired a good knowledge of their language; and thus he afforded great assistance to Thomas Mayhew, who was laboring to make the heathen acquainted with the glad tidings of salvation. In Nov., 1667, he removed to Plymouth on the invitation of the people in that town, but was not ordained until June 30, 1669. He continued there about thirty years. He was a very faithful minister, and his exertions were extensively useful. He was completely occupied in doing good by visiting the families in his parish with the ruling elders, catechizing the children, and attending church meetings, and by his public preaching on the Sabbath. Before his admission of any person into the church he required a relation, either public or private, of the experience of a work of Divine grace. He usually expounded the psalm, which was sung, and the psalms were sung in course.

In 1681 the practice of reading the psalm line by line was introduced from regard to a brother, who was unable to read. Some difference of opinion between him and his church respecting the settlement of a neighboring minister having arisen, and there being no prospect of a reconciliation, he was induced to ask a dismissal, which was granted Oct. 5, 1697. Being soon invited to South Carolina, he set sail for Charleston Nov. 15, 1698. After his arrival he gathered a church and labored with great diligence and much success till his death. In the short space of time that he lived here, twenty-five were added to the number of which the church consisted when it was first organized, and many baptized. His church erected a handsome monument over his grave. Among his sons were the following ministers: John of Yarmouth, Roland of Sandwich, and Theophilus of Hampton Falls.

Mr. Cotton was eminent for his acquaintance with the Indian language. When he began to learn it, he hired an Indian for his instructor at the rate of twelve pence a day for fifty days; but his knavish tutor, having received his whole pay in advance, ran away before twenty days had expired. Mr. Cotton, however, found means to perfect his acquaintance with the barbarous dialect. While at Plymouth he frequently preached to the Indians, who lived in several congregations in the neighborhood. The whole care of revising and correcting Eliot's Indian Bible, which was printed at Cambridge in 1685, fell on him.—Hist. Coll. iv. 122-128, 137; Magnalia, III. 194, 199, 200; Mayhew's Indian Converts; Holmes.

COTTON, ROLAND, first minister of Sandwich, Mass., the son of Rev. John C., of Plymouth, was graduated at Harvard college in 1685, ordained Nov. 28, 1694, and died March 29, 1722. His successors were B. Fessenden, A. Williams, and J. Burr. His wife was the sister of Gov. Saltonstall, and widow of Rev. J. Denison, of Ipswich. One daughter married Rev. J. Brown, of Haverhill, and another married Rev. S. Bourne, of Seitate. He is worthy of honorable remembrance for his benevolent regard to the spiritual interests of the Indians at Marshpee, of which two hundred and fourteen were under his care in 1693, while five hundred of other tribes were under the care of his father.—Hist. Coll. i. 201; x. 133.

COTTON, JOSIAH, judge, a preacher to the Indians, the son of Rev. John C., of Plymouth, was born Jan. 8, 1680, and graduated at Harvard college in 1698. Sustaining the office of clerk of court, register of deeds, and judge of the common pleas, he also preached to the Indians at Manomet and Herring ponds, Plymouth, and Mattakeeset pond, Pembroke, with a salary of 20 pounds from the commissioners for propagating the gospel. His engagement closed Nov. 15, 1744, having preached nearly forty years both in Indian and English. He died Aug. 19, 1756, aged 75. He had four brothers who were ministers. Of his fourteen children, his son John was minister of Halifax. His daughter Mary was the mother of Judge Wm. Cushing. He compiled a copious English and Indian vocabulary, published in Mass. Hist. Coll. 3d series, II. 147-257.

COTTON, JOHN, minister of Newton, Mass., son of Rev. Roland C. of Sandwich, was graduated at Harvard college in 1710. Having been ordained as successor of Mr. Hobart, Nov. 3, 1714, he continued in this place till his death, May 17, 1757, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. He was faithful, fervent, and successful in his labors, and was particularly happy in seeing the attention of his people to religious truths in 1729 and 1740. He published a sermon after the earthquakes, 1728; on the death of Nathaniel Cotton, of Bristol, 1729; at the ordination of his brother, Ward Cotton, 1734; four sermons addressed to youth, 1739; at the election, 1753.—Homer's History of Newton; Hist. Soc. v. 273-276.

COTTON, JOHN, first minister of Halifax, Mass., a native of Plymouth, son of Josiah C., was graduated at Harvard college in 1730 and ordained in 1735. The failure of his voice induced him to resign in 1736, and he was succeeded by William Patten, afterwards a minister of Hartford, Conn. He was a useful citizen at Plymouth, county treasurer, and register of deeds, and died in 1789, aged 77. He published two sermons on a day of humiliation for the drought and war, 1757; practice of the churches as to baptism vindicated; history of Plymouth church.—2 Hist. Coll. iv. 282.

COTTON, JOHN, M. D., died at Marietta, Ohio, April 2, 1847, aged 85. He was a descendant of J. C., of Boston; a man of piety, of literature, and science.

COUCH, PAUL, an unequalled sufferer, died at Newburyport March 19, 1842, aged 64. As a preacher he was in 1804 a missionary on the Kennebec in Maine. By exposure to the cold air after the fatigue of preaching, he became ill, and soon was helpless by rheumatism. For thirty-eight years he was a sufferer, and for twenty-eight never left his small chamber, unable to rise from his bed or to dress himself without help. Every day was a day of pain, which required daily anodynes. For twenty years he was nearly blind; he was also dependent on charity. Yet was he a cheerful, happy Christian, respected and esteemed.—Dimmick's Address.

COUDRAY, DU, general, was engaged by the American commissioners at Paris to enter our service as the head of the American artillery. He was at Boston in May, 1777. But Sept. 16th he was drowned in the Schuylkill. He rode into a ferry-boat, and was unable to control his horse, which plunged into the river. Had he lived, probably great dissatisfaction would have been felt in consequence of the rank assigned him. — Heath, 128.

COVINGTON, LEONARD, brigadier-general, was the son of Levin C., of Maryland. He served with reputation under Wayne in the Indian war. At fort Recovery his horse was shot under him. He participated in the battle on the Miami. Returning to his family, he settled as a planter. For many years he was a member of the Maryland senate; he was also elected a member of congress. In 1809 Mr. Jefferson appointed him lieutenant-colonel in the regiment of dragoons. Appointed Aug. 1, 1813, brigadier-general, he repaired to the north. At the battle of Williamsburg, Nov. 11th, when Boyd commanded, while gallantly leading his brigade to the charge, he was mortally wounded, and died on the 13th, aged 45, leaving a wife and six children. He was buried at French Mills, now called Mount Covington.

COVINGTON, ALEXANDER, judge, died in Washington city, Mississippi, Oct. 16, 1848, aged 71. A native of Virginia, he had lived in Mississippi forty years. He was a Christian professor, charitable and hospitable, of rare colloquial powers.

COWLES, GELES H., D. D., died at Austinburgh, Ohio, July 5, 1835, aged 68.

COWLES, SOLOMON, general, died in Farmington, Conn., Nov. 25, 1846, aged 89, an officer in the Revolutionary army.

COWLES, EZEKIEL, died at Farmington, Conn., in Aug., 1850, aged 91. He fought at Bunker's Hill and served in the war, being quartermaster and paymaster.

COX, WILLIAM, died in England about 1851. He came to this country early in life as a printer, and was employed in the Mirror office, New York; and he wrote much for the Mirror. He published Crayon sketches, 2 vols., 1833. — Cycl. American Literature, II. 415.

COXE, DANIEL, an author, claimed the territory of Georgia, Florida, and Louisiana under his father, who purchased of Sir Robert Heath, to whom it was originally granted in 1630; but the claim was declared void, as the conditions had not been fulfilled. He lived fourteen years in this country; and published a description of the English province of Carolina, by the Spaniards called Florida, etc. 8vo., London, 1722; the same, 1741.

COKE, TENCH, a writer on public economy, died at Philadelphia July 16, 1824, aged 68. He published an address on American manufactures; an inquiry on the principles of a commercial system for the United States, 1787; examination of Lord Sheffield's observations, 1792; view of the United States, 1794; thoughts on naval power and the encouragement of commerce and manufactures, 1806; memoir on the cultivation, trade, and manufacture of cotton, 1807; memoir on a navigation act, 1809; statement of the arts and manufactures of the United States, 1814.

CRADOCK, MATTHEW, first governor of Massachusetts, was an opulent merchant in London. Of the London company, which in 1628 purchased the patent of the territory of Massachusetts, he was chosen governor. He never came to this country; but Endicott was sent out to make a plantation. He proposed the important measure of transferring the government to the actual settlers; accordingly Wintthrop was chosen governor. — Wintthrop, I. 2; 2. Hist. Coll. v. 190.

CRADOCK, THOMAS, rector of St. Thomas, Baltimore county, Maryland, died in 1760. He delivered a sermon in 1753, before the governor and assembly, on the irregularities of some of the clergy. He also published in 1756 a version of the psalms of David in heroic measure, which, though not destitute of merit, will hardly attract many readers at the present day.

CRAFTS, EBENEZER, colonel, died in Craftsbury, Vt., in 1810, aged 70. Born in Pomfret, he graduated at Yale in 1759, and became a merchant in Sturbridge. In the Shays rebellion he served under Lincoln, at the head of a regiment. He was a founder of Leicester academy. In 1790, he removed to the wilderness of Vermont, to a place, which took his name: in the removal of his family, there being no road for twenty miles, the women were carried on hand sleds on the snow. He was generous, firm, energetic, and led a pure, Christian life, inflexible in principle. — Washburn's Sketch of Leicester Academy.

CRAFTS, SAMUEL CHANDLER, son of the preceding, governor of Vermont, was born in Woodstock, Conn., Oct. 6, 1768, and graduated at Cambridge in 1790. He soon removed with his father to Craftsbury, Vt.; and there he died Nov. 19, 1853, aged 85. Various offices were sustained by him, as chief judge of the county court, a member of congress eight years from 1816, governor in 1828–1830, and senator of the United States in 1842. He was a man of simplicity of manners, of sound learning, of great moral worth.

CRAFTS, WILLIAM, a poet, was born in Charleston, S. C., Jan. 24, 1787, and, having graduated at Harvard college in 1805, soon settled in his native city as a lawyer of ability. He was a member of the legislature, and for some time the editor of the Charleston Courier. He died at New Lebanon springs, New York, Sept. 23, 1826, aged 39. A collection of his poems and prose essays, with a memoir, was published in 1828. — Specimens of Amer. Poetry, II. 144.

CRAIG, THOMAS, major, died at Windsor, Vt., in Aug., 1840, aged 87, a Revolutionary soldier. He was born in Charlestown, Mass.

CRAIG, NATHAN, died in Leicester, 1852, aged 98, a soldier of the Revolution.

CRAIK, JAMES, M. D., a physician, a native of Scotland, accompanied Washington in the expedition against the French and Indians in 1754, and in 1755 attended Braddock and assisted in dressing his wounds. During the Revolutionary war he served in the medical department. As director-general of the hospital at Yorktown, he was present at the surrender of Cornwallis, Oct. 19, 1781. After the war, at the request of Washington, he settled in the neighborhood of Mount Vernon. He died in Fairfax county Feb. 6, 1814, aged 83. He was estimable in the various relations of private life. As a physician he had great skill and success. Washington designated him in these terms: "My compatriot in arms, my old and intimate friend."—Thacker's Med. Biog.

CRAM, JACOB, died Dec. 21, 1833, at Exeter, aged 71, a graduate of 1782, and minister of Hopkinton from 1789 to 1792, then a missionary in New York, and among the Indians. He studied with Dr. Emmons.

CRANCH, RICHARD, judge of the common pleas for Suffolk, was born in England of Puritan parents in Oct., 1726. He resided for a while in Boston, and became a member of Dr. Mayhew's church. In 1759 he removed to Braintree, now Quincy, where he died Oct. 16, 1811, aged 85. His wife, Mary, died the next day, aged 70. They had lived together nearly fifty years. She was the daughter of Rev. W. Smith, and the sister of Mrs. Adams. Judge Cranch had three children. One daughter married Rev. Jacob Norton of Weymouth, and died Jan. 25, 1811; another married John Greenleaf. The son was Wm. Cranch, late chief justice of the district court of Columbia and reporter of the supreme court of the United States. His grandson, Richard, of the topographical engineers, was drowned in lake Erie in 1825. Judge Cranch was very much respected for his intelligence and learning and for his moral and religious character. Theological investigations occupied much of his time. He published his views of the prophecies concerning antichrist.—Whitney's Funeral Sermon; Norton's Discourse.

CRANCH, WILLIAM, judge, LL. D., died at Washington Sept. 1, 1855, aged 86. A graduate of Harvard in 1787, he removed to Washington in 1794, and was appointed in 1801 a judge of the circuit court; he was afterwards chief justice till his death. He was highly respected for his talents, learning, and principles. His father was Richard C., of Weymouth, and his mother, Mary Smith, was the sister of Abigail Smith, wife of John Adams. He published nine volumes of reports of cases in the supreme court, a memoir of J. Adams, and an address on temperance.—Boston Advertiser, July 16, 1856.

CRANE, JOHN, D. D., died at Northbridge

Sept. 1, 1836, aged 80. Born at Norton, he graduated at Harvard in 1780, and was ordained June 25, 1783, toiling in the ministry fifty years, during the same period being a teacher thirty years, preparing one hundred young men for college, and writing four thousand sermons. In the last revival about seventy were added to the church, but only two hundred and twelve in his whole ministry. He published several occasional discourses.—Holman's Sermon.

CRANE, JAMES C., secretary of the united foreign mission society, died Jan. 12, 1826, aged 32. He was born in Morristown, N. J., Jan. 11, 1794. His parents were pious. The faithful instructions of his mother deeply impressed him at the age of six years. His father having removed in 1805 to New York, he there served as an apprentice. Amidst temptations he fell into vicious habits; but in consequence of the lessons of his deceased mother he experienced severe rebukes of conscience. The approach of night terrified him, and compelled him to pray; but the return of morning re-assured him in his irreligious life. At last, in 1813, his anguish constrained him to seek mercy as a miserable sinner; and he found it. From this time he felt the strongest desires for the conversion of the heathen. By conversing with his fellow apprentices, in a short time a majority of them became pious. Determined to become a missionary, he, while yet an apprentice, attended the lectures of Dr. Mason, and was directed in his studies by Rev. J. M. Matthews. He was ordained in April, 1817. In a few days he repaired as a missionary to the Indians in Tuscarora village, where he continued till Sept., 1823, when he was appointed general agent of the united foreign mission society; and in May, 1825, secretary for domestic correspondence, as successor to Mr. Lewis. In the same year he visited the Indians in the western part of New York and in Ohio, and returned with impaired health. The society being now about to be merged in another, he was chosen assistant secretary of the American bible society. He left a wife and three children without property. His anxiety for the Indians was strong in his sickness. He said: "O, how mysterious the providence! The fields are white, the laborers few. I have done little—just beginning—and now I am going. The Lord's will be done."—Panoplist, April, 1826.

CRANE, ELIAS W., died suddenly, Nov. 10, 1840, aged 44. A native of Elizabethtown, a graduate of Princeton in 1814, he was a teacher at Morristown, and the minister of Springfield, N. J., six years. In 1825, in a remarkable revival, eighty persons were added to the church. From 1826 till his death he was the minister of Jamaica, L. I.; and here were two revivals in 1831 and 1839, in which seventy-four and seventy-six persons became church members. — Observer, Nov. 28, 1840.

CRANE, JOANNA, Mrs., died in Berkeley in 1846, aged 100.

CRANE, WILLIAM M., commodore, died at Washington March 18, 1846, aged 61, by self-murder from an unknown cause, the son of Gen. William C., who served before Quebec. Capt. Crane was the sixth in the line of captains, after Barrow, Stewart, Jones, Morris, and Warrington. He was distinguished before Tripoli. He was chief of the bureau of ordnance.

CRANE, JOHN R., D. D., died in Middletown, Conn., Aug. 17, 1853, aged 66, having been pastor of the first church nearly thirty-five years. He published some tracts.

CRANE, EDWIN, missionary to the Nestorians at Gawar, died Aug. 27, 1854, of the typhus fever, in great calmness and peace. In a few days Mrs. Crane also witnessed the death of her little son. Mr. C. was a native of Utica; his father was the agent of the home missionary society.

CRANFIELD, EDWARD, president of New Hampshire, succeeded Waldron in 1682, and was succeeded by Barefoote in 1685. He was afterwards collector of Barbadoes, and died about 1700. The tyrannical acts of his administration are narrated by Belknap. In his displeasure toward Rev. Mr. Moody, he endeavored to enforce the uniformity act. He ventured to tax the people without their consent. He came to this country to make his fortune: his injustice drove him away in dishonor. — Farmer's Belknap, i. 113; Hist. Coll. x. 44.

CRAVEN, CHARLES, governor of South Carolina from 1712 to 1716, had been previously secretary to the proprietors. They ordered him in 1712 to sound Port Royal river, and probably he built Beaufort soon afterwards. In 1715, on the occurrence of an Indian war, he displayed great vigor and talents, and expelled from the province the invading savages. — Holmes, i. 513.

CRAWFORD, MARY, died at Castine, Me., Feb. 20, 1836, aged 100 years and 5 months. She was the widow of Dr. William C., chaplain and surgeon at fort Point in the Revolutionary war.

CRAWFORD, WILLIAM H., secretary of the treasury, died near Elberton, Geo., in Sept., 1834, aged 62. He was born in Virginia in 1772, and followed the plough till twenty-one; then became a distinguished lawyer and was appointed with others in 1800 to revise the laws of Georgia. He zealously supported the election of Mr. Jefferson. In 1802 he was challenged by Peter L. Van Alen, a lawyer, and murdered him in a duel; he also fought another duel with Gov. Clark, and was severely wounded. It is deplorable and dishonorable to our country, that we have had public men of eminence, who, in violation of human and Divine laws, have engaged in private combat, and who yet have afterwards received the votes of the people.

CRAWFORD, JOHN, died at West Camp, N. Y., March 7, 1851, aged 90. He entered the ministry of the Methodist church in 1789.

CRÉSSON, ELLIOTT, died in Philadelphia Feb. 20, 1854, president of the Pennsylvania colonization society. He bequeathed 122,000 dollars to various charitable institutions, and to his pastor, Dr. Stevens, 5,000 dollars. To Sunday schools the sum given was 50,000; to the historical society, to buy Penn's mansion, to the Episcopal mission to Liberia, for a monument to Penn, 10,000 each; to the hospital for the insane, 5,000; to the university, to the agricultural society, to an Episcopal seminary at Alexandria, 5,000 each.

CROCKETT, DAVID, colonel, fell at Bexar in Texas, March 6, 1836. He had been a member of congress from Tennessee.

CROES, JOHN, D. D., bishop of New Jersey, died in New Brunswick July 31, 1832, aged 69.

CROGHAN, WILLIAM, major, died in Locust Grove, Ky., in 1822, aged 69. An emigrant from Ireland, he entered the American army in 1776, as a captain, and soon was a major in the Virginia line. He fought at Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. He was captured with Lincoln at Charleston. In 1756 he went to Kentucky. His wife was a sister of Gen. George R. Clark. His house was the seat of plenty and hospitality.

CROGHAN, GEORGE, colonel, son of the preceding, died at New Orleans, Jan 8, 1849, aged 58. He was inspector-general of the army. At the age of nineteen he made the brave defence of fort Sandusky.

CROIX, JOHN BAPTIST DE LA, second bishop of Quebec, was of a noble family in Grenoble, and was appointed first almoner to Louis XIV. He came to Canada about the year 1685, as successor to Laval, the first bishop. He died Dec. 28, 1727, aged 74, having been forty-two years in Quebec. Such was his benevolence, that he founded three hospitals, and distributed among the poor more than a million of livres. — Wynne's Brit. Emp. in America, ii. 138-141.

CROMBIE, JAMES, M. D., died at Derry, N. H., in March, 1853, aged 83. His parents were Scotch-Irish. For more than twenty years he was a physician at Temple, for thirty years in Frankestown. In 1831 he became a member of the church. He was an excellent physician and was respected in all the relations of life.

CROMWELL, THOMAS, captain, was a common seaman in Massachusetts, about 1636. While serving under Capt. Jackson in a man-of-war in the West Indies, he was intrusted with the command of a vessel, and captured four or five Spanish vessels. Dec. 4, 1646, he arrived at Boston with three ships and eighty men, having previously put into Plymouth. To the governor he presented a curious sedan, designed by the viceroy of Mexico as a present for his sister. He and his men had much money, plate, and jewels of great value. In Boston he lodged with a poor man, in a thatched house, because "in his mean estate that poor man had entertained him when others would not." He died in Boston, 1649. His widow was soon married. — Winthrop, II. 264.

CROPPER, JOHN, general, an officer of the Revolution, entered the army in 1776, as captain in a Virginia regiment, at the age of nineteen or twenty. He was soon promoted. He fought in the battle of Brandywine, when the regiment, in which he was a major, was nearly cut to pieces. His colonel and lieutenant-colonel having run off, he commanded the regiment in the retreat. He was also in the battles of Germantown and Monmouth court-house. He died at Bowman's Folly in Accomac county, Virginia, Jan. 15, 1821, aged 65.

CROSBY, JOHN, general, died at Hampden, Me., May 26, 1843, aged nearly 90, a man of enterprise and perseverance. He once did the largest commercial business of any man on the Penobscot.

CROSBY, WILLIAM, judge, died in Belfast, Me., March 31, 1852, aged 82. Born in Billerica, he graduated at Harvard in 1794. In 1802 he went to Belfast. He was representative, senator, judge of the common pleas for ten years; after the new State was formed, he resumed his profession. In 1831 he withdrew from active life.

CROSWELL, ANDREW, minister in Boston, died April 12, 1785, aged 76. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1728. After having been settled in Groton, Conn., as successor of Ebenezer Punderson for two years, he was installed over a society in Boston, which was formed by persons from other churches, Oct. 6, 1738. The house of meeting was formerly possessed by Mr. Le Mercier's society, and, after Mr. Crosswell's death, it was converted into a Roman Catholic chapel. It was his fate to be engaged much in controversy. He published a narrative of the new congregational church: what is Christ to me if he is not mine, or a seasonable defence of the old protestant doctrine of justifying faith, 1746; an answer to Giles Firmin's eight arguments in relation to this subject; several sermons against Arminians; controversial writings with Turell, Cumming, and others; part of an exposition of Paul's journey to Damascus, showing that giving more than forty stripes is breaking the moral law, 1768; remarks on Bishop Warburton's sermon before the society for propagating the gospel, 1768; remarks on commencement drollery, 1771. — Collect. Hist. Soc. III. 264.

CROSWELL, WILLIAM, D. D., died in Boston, Nov. 9, 1851, aged 47. Born in Hudson, he graduated at Yale in 1822. He was rector of Christ's church, Boston, in 1829; then he labored four years at Auburn, N. Y.; at last he was rector of the church of the Advent in Boston. His poetical writings have been commended. A memoir of him, with his poems, was published by his father, Dr. Crosswell of New Haven, almost eighty years of age.

CROWELL, ROBERT, D. D., died in Essex, Mass., Nov. 10, 1855, aged 68. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1811, studied theology at Andover, and had been in Essex forty-one years. His disease was consumption; in his illness he was sustained by that faith in Christ, which he had so long commended to others. His wife was a sister of Rufus Choate, and his residence was the old Choate mansion.

CROWNINSHIELD, BENJAMIN W., secretary of the navy, died at Boston Feb. 3, 1851, aged 77. He was secretary under Madison and Monroe.

CRUIKSHANK, JOSEPH, died in Philadelphia Aug. 9, 1836, aged 89. He was a printer, an extensive publisher and bookseller.

CRULL, PHILIP, died on his farm in Fairfax county, Va., Nov. 16, 1813, aged 115. A native of Germany, he came to this country in 1721. He was active to the day of his death. His wife died aged 101.

CUFFEE, PAUL, a native Indian preacher to the Shinnecock tribe on Long Island, died at Montauk March 7, 1812, aged 55. He was thirteen years employed by the New York missionary society. A marble slab denotes his grave at Canoe place. The earliest missionary to the Indians was Rev. Azariah Horton in 1741, followed by Samson Occum, Peter John, and Paul Cuffee. All the Indian churches are extinct except one at Poosepatuck, in the southern part of Brookhaven, and one at Shinnecock, two miles west of the village at Southampton: the former having twenty, the latter seventy members. Deacon Oby, the brother of Cuffee, was living in 1845, aged 81; and Deacon Vincent, the son of Cuffee, was 53.

CULLEN, JOHN, M. D., professor of the theory and practice in Hampden Sidney college, died in Richmond Jan. 25, 1851, aged 53.

CULPEPPER, THOMAS, lord, governor of Virginia from 1680 to 1683, died in 1719. On his arrival the assembly passed an act of oblivion in reference to persons concerned in the rebellion under Gov. Berkeley. They also, in order to encourage immigration, authorized the governor to naturalize any person by instrument under seal. An act was also passed to prevent the frequent meetings of the slaves. Of his associates in the grant of the territory between the Potomac and Rappahannock in 1649, he purchased their rights in 1669. His estate descended to his daughter, married to Lord Fairfax. — Holmes, i. 397; Lord's Lempriere.

CUMING, JOHN, a physician, was the son of Robert C., a Scotchman, who emigrated after the rebellion, and died in Concord, Mass. In the French war of 1755, he was a lieutenant and was taken prisoner. He afterwards became an eminent physician in Concord, and died July 3, 1788, aged 60. He was a Christian, who early devoted himself to the service of his Maker, and he died in peace. He was a friend to learning, charitable to the poor, and constantly exerting himself to promote the good of society. His generous donations for the benefit of the poor, for the maintenance of schools, for a library in Concord, and to the college in Cambridge toward the support of a medical professor, are evidences of his enlightened benevolence. — Independent Chronicle, July 24, 1788.

CUMINGS, HENRY, D. D., minister of Billerica, Mass., was born in Hollis, N. H., Sept. 28, 1739, and graduated at Harvard college 1760. He was ordained Jan. 26, 1763. After toiling fifty-one years, he received Nathaniel Whitman as his colleague, Jan. 26, 1814. He died Sept. 5, 1823, aged nearly 84. He was frequently called to preach on public occasions. His occasional discourses published are fourteen, of which are the following; at the election, 1783; Duddleian lecture, 1791; at a thanksgiving, 1798; before a charitable society, 1802; half-century discourse, 1813. — Farmer's Coll. II. app. 86.

CUMMING, ALEXANDER, minister in Boston, died Aug. 25, 1763, aged 36. He was the son of Robert C., a native of Montrose, Scotland, a merchant, highly respected, who died at Freehold in 1769. In 1750 he was chosen a colleague of Mr. Pemberton of New York, but was dismissed in 1753 on account of his ill health. Feb. 25, 1761, he was installed as colleague with Dr. Sewall at Boston. Dr. Macwhorter married his sister. His mind readily comprehended points, which to others were intricate and abstruse, and his public discourses were frequently on such subjects. He was zealous against the errors of the day. The sermon which he preached at his own instalment was published, and it is a specimen of his talents, and of his regard to the truths of the gospel. — Sewall's Funeral Sermon.

CUMMING, JOHN NOBLE, general, a hero of the Revolution, was a relative of the preceding, probably his son. He early espoused the cause of his country, and participated in some of the battles of the war. He died at Newark, N. J., July 6, 1821, aged 70. His wife was the daughter of Gen. Forman. His son, Hooper Cumming, D. D., minister of Newark for a few years, died at Charleston, S. C., in Dec., 1825. Gen. C. was a man of integrity and honor, a patron of civil order, and a supporter of religious institutions. Though not a professor of religion, yet at the period of a revival of religion in 1817 his mind experienced a great change, and from that time he regularly attended family prayer. His minister regarded him as a true believer in the gospel. — Griffin's Sermon.

CUMMING, ROBERT, general, a Revolutionary hero, died at his residence in Liberty-town, in Maryland, Feb. 14, 1826, aged 71 years. He commanded at the time of his death the second division of the militia.

CUMMING, SARAH, widow of Gen. John N. C., died in Newark Sept. 28, 1841, aged 79, — a Christian ripe in years and piety.

CUMMINGS, ARCHIBALD, Episcopal commissary for Pennsylvania, and rector of Christ church, succeeded Dr. Welton in 1726, and died at Philadelphia, April 19, 1741. He published an exhortation to the clergy, 1729; a sermon on the death of Gov. Gordon, 1736; two sermons on unity, 1737; two sermons on faith, occasioned by Mr. Whitefield's reflections, 1740.

CUMMINGS, ABRAHAM, a missionary, graduated at Providence college in 1776, and died at Phippsburgh, Me., Aug. 31, 1827, aged 72. He had never any pastoral charge, but was strictly an itinerant preacher or missionary. He was known and respected in almost all the towns along the coast from Rhode Island to Passamaquoddy, especially in the islands, which had no settled minister. In his little boat he often traversed alone the waters along the whole coast of Maine, and preached the gospel of Jesus Christ in the islands. For these toils in the cause of benevolence the world will not honor him, as it honors the blood-stained hero; but such toils will not be unrewarded. He published a few treatises.

CUMMINGS, JACOB A., author of several elementary works, was graduated at Harvard college in 1801, and after being a useful teacher and bookseller in Boston, died Feb. 24, 1820, aged 47. His publications for schools were highly esteemed, and his industry, useful labors, and amiable qualities procured him much respect. He published New Testament questions, 1817; geography, ancient and modern, 1825.

CUMMINGS, ASA, D. D., died at sea two days out from Aspinwall, June 5 or 6, 1836, aged 60, and was buried in the deep. He had been at Panama, spending a few months with his daughter, the wife of Mr. Rowell, seamen's chaplain. After a partial recovery from the prevailing disease of the climate, he set out on his return, by the advice of his physician, accompanied by his son-in-law and daughter. He was on board the steamer George Law. He was the sixth of sixteen children, born in Andover, Mass., but his father, Asa, died in Albany, Me., in 1845, aged 85. Such was the pious zeal of his father, that, although a plain farmer, he read sermons on the Sabbath twenty-eight years, in the want of a minister. His great-grandfather was 102 years old. He graduated at Harvard in 1817, was ordained at North Yarmouth in Maine, in 1821, and was dismissed in 1829. He became the editor of the Christian Mirror at Portland, as early as 1826; after some years he purchased the establishment. A year or two before his death, his wife received by bequest a large estate. He was a wise, learned, excellent, venerable man; hard-working for thirty years as an editor. He published memoirs of Dr. Payson.—Boston Advertiser, July 16, 1856.

CUMMINGS, SENECA, missionary to China, died suddenly at New Ipswich, N. H., Aug. 12, 1856, aged 39; he died at the house of Mr. Stearns, his father-in-law. He and his wife sailed in Nov., 1847; he returned on account of her health in 1855. His field of preparation for his work was the valley of Min in China,—connected with the Fuhchau mission. He was hoping to return.

CUMMINS, FRANCIS, D. D., died at Greensborough, Geo., March, 1832, aged 80. For fifty-three years he was the pastor of different churches; and he was a whig of the Revolution.

CURRIE, WILLIAM, died in Great Valley, Chester county, Pa., Oct. 25, 1803, aged 93. He was formerly a missionary to the churches of Radnor and Perquimem.

CURRIER, JOSEPH, minister of Corinth, Vt., died in Aug., 1829, aged 86, a graduate of Harvard in 1763, and a classmate of President Willard.

CURRIER, MEHETABEL, died in Danbury, N. H., in 1852, aged 103 years and 9 months. She survived her husband forty-six years, and all her seven children.

CUSHING, THOMAS, speaker of the house of representatives of Mass., was the son of Thomas C., a member of the council, and a descendant of Matthew C. of Hingham. He was born in Boston Jan. 30, 1691, graduated at Harvard college in 1711, and died April 11, 1746, aged 52. His wife, was Mary, the daughter of Edward Bromfield. He left one son and two daughters. He was distinguished by his wealth, his abilities, his zeal for his country's service, his integrity, and, in a peculiar manner, for his piety. Mr. Prince says of him, "I found that in a small, relaxed, and feeble body there dwelt a great, a lively, a strong, and well-composed soul." About the age of twenty his soul was renewed by the Spirit of God. He daily read the Scriptures and prayed in his family; and he died in joyful hope. The revival of religion in Boston, a few years before his death, gave him great delight. In regard to public men in days of difficulty, he said: "Men may be a long while great patriots from moral or political principles; or party or worldly interests; or the applause or esteem of others. But there is nothing like the special grace of God, a believing view of his present eye and future judgment, and an interest and conscience wholly subjected to him, to keep men steady to the public interest in times of trial."—Prince's Funeral Sermon.

CUSHING, CALEB, minister of Salisbury, son of John C. of Scituate, was born Jan. 6, 1672, graduated at Harvard 1692, and ordained 1697. He died Jan. 25, 1752, aged 80. His wife was a daughter of Rev. John Cotton. His sons were Caleb, James, and John. His daughter, Mary, married John Appleton of Ipswich, and Elizabeth married Rev. Joshua Moody, of the Isle of Shoals.

CUSHING, CALEB, judge of the common pleas of Essex, died in Jan., 1798, aged 93.

CUSHING, JOB, minister of Shrewsbury, the son of Matthew C. of Hingham, was born in 1694, and graduated at Harvard in 1714. He was ordained the first minister of S., Dec. 4, 1723. He died suddenly Aug. 6, 1760. Of his sons, Jacob was the minister of Waltham, and John of Ashburnham. His widow, Mary, daughter of Rev. John Prentice, of Lancaster, died in 1798, aged 90.

CUSHING, THOMAS, LL. D., lieutenant-governor of Mass., the son of the preceding, died Feb. 28, 1788, aged 62. He was born in the year 1725, and graduated at Harvard college in 1744. In early life he was called to respectable public offices. Having been chosen representative of Boston in the general court, his patriotism and talents soon procured him the appointment of speaker. While in the chair, it was resolved, in the controversy with England, to make an appeal to arms, and he bent all his exertions to promote the cause of his country. He was a judicious and active member of the first and second congress, the friend and counsellor of Hancock, and the correspondent of Franklin. On his return to his own State he was elected into the council, which then constituted the supreme executive. He was also appointed judge of the courts of common pleas and of probate in Suffolk, which stations he held till the adoption of the State constitution. Being then appointed lieutenant-governor, he remained in that office till his death. A few days before his death, he had the satisfaction of seeing the new federal constitution ratified in Massachusetts. One of his daughters married John Avery, secretary of State, who died June, 1806. He was from youth a professor of religion; the motives of the gospel governed him through life; and, at the hour of his departure from the world, its sublime doctrines and its promises gave him support. He was a man of abilities; a distinguished patriot; a friend of learning; charitable to the poor; and amiable in all the relations of life. His days were passed in constant exertion for the public good. James S. Loring wrote in 1856 a sketch of his life, which was published in the Advertiser. — American Museum, vii. 163, 164; Centinel, March 1, 1788; Prince's Funeral Sermon; Boston Advertiser, Oct. 4, 1856.

CUSHING, JACOB, D. D., minister of Waltham, Mass., was the son of Rev. Job Cushing of Shrewsbury, and was born Feb. 28, 1730. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1748, and ordained Nov. 22, 1752. After continuing fifty-six years in the ministry, he died Jan. 18, 1809, aged 78. He was mild and benevolent in his temper, and in the discharge of the duties of the pastoral office was conspicuous for discretion and prudence. In his preaching, however, he was not so fond of dwelling upon those doctrines of the sacred volume, which are controverted, as upon the practical views of the gospel. He published the following sermons: at the ordination of Samuel Williams, 1766; of Elijah Brown, 1771; of Jacob Biglow, 1772; of N. Underwood, 1793; a sermon at Lexington, April 20, 1778; on the death of Joseph Jackson, 1796. — Columb. Centinel, Feb. 8, 1809.

CUSHING, JONATHAN, minister of Dover, N. H., died March 25, 1769, aged 78, in the fifty-second year of his ministry. Dr. Belknap was his colleague. He was a sound preacher, a judicious pastor, a wise and faithful friend.

CUSHING, WILLIAM, LL. D., judge of the supreme court of the United States, died at Scituate, Sept. 13, 1810, aged 75. He was the descendant of Matthew C., who arrived at Boston in 1638. John C., his grandfather, the grandson of Matthew, was appointed a judge of the supreme court in 1728, and died at Scituate Jan. 19, 1737, aged 75. His father, John, also a judge of the supreme court, died in 1772. He was born in Scituate in March, 1733, and graduated at Harvard college in 1751. He studied law with Gridley. Appointed judge of probate for the county of Lincoln, he lived in 1769 at Pownalborough or Wiscasset. In 1772, as successor of his father, he received a commission as justice of the superior court, and in Nov., 1777, that of chief justice. At the beginning of the Revolution, among the high in office, he alone supported the rights of his country. At the organization of the federal government he was placed by Washington, in 1789, on the bench of the supreme court of the United States, in which office he continued till his death, although for some time, by reason of ill health, unable to attend to its duties. He united patience of inquiry with quickness of perception, and the learning of the scholar with the science of the lawyer. Convinced of the truth of Christianity, he was careful in the performance of its duties, and was eminent for his public and private virtues.

CUSHING, NATHANIEL, colonel, died in Ohio Aug., 1814, aged 61, an early settler. Born in Pembroke, Mass., he was an officer in the war, in R. Putnam's regiment. He was one of the Belpre colony in 1789, most intelligent and useful. In his children he was rewarded for his care in their education. Thomas H. C. was his brother. — Hildreth's Biog. Mem.

CUSHING, JOHN, D. D., minister of Ashburnham, Mass., was born in Shrewsbury; graduated at Harvard in 1764; was ordained Nov. 2, 1768; and died April 27, 1823, aged 78. He was respected for his attainments and virtues. He published several occasional discourses, among them one on the completion of the fiftieth year of his ministry.

CUSHING, THOMAS H., brigadier-general, a native of Mass., entered the army in 1776, and served during the war. He was appointed a captain under St. Clair in 1790; adjutant-general in 1812; and brigadier-general in 1813. After the war he was appointed, in 1815, collector of New London, in the place of Gen. Huntington, and died Oct. 19, 1822, aged 67. He had not strength of moral principle to restrain him from a duel with Mr. Lewis, member of congress from Virginia. His life was saved by his watch, which was struck by his adversary's ball. Some one remarked, it must be a good watch, that kept time from eternity. An account of his trial before a court martial was published in 1812.

CUSHING, JONATHAN P., died April 25, 1835. A native of Rochester, N. H., and a graduate of Dartmouth in 1817, he was fourteen years the president of Hampden Sidney college in Virginia.

CUSHING, LUTHER STEARNS, died in Boston June 22, 1856, aged 53 on the day of his death. Born in Lunenburg, he graduated at the Cambridge law school in 1826, and in Boston conducted a law periodical. In 1832, he was clerk of the house, and held the office for years, and was a judge of the court of common pleas from 1844 to 1848; and afterwards reporter to the supreme court. Of reports he published 8 or 10 vols.; also, rules of proceeding and debate in deliberative assemblies, 1845; also, elements of the law and practice of legislative assemblies.

CUSHING, THOMAS P., a merchant in Boston, died Nov. 23, 1854, aged 67. He had been retired from business for some years.

CUSHMAN, ROBERT, distinguished in the history of Plymouth colony, was one of those worthies, who quitted England for the sake of liberty of conscience, and settled at Leyden. In 1617 he was sent to England with Mr. Carver, to procure a grant of lands in America, and in 1619 he was sent again with Mr. Brewster, and obtained a patent. He set sail with the first company in 1620, but, the vessel proving leaky, he was obliged to relinquish the voyage. He did not arrive at Plymouth till Nov. 10, 1621, and tarried only a month, being under the necessity of returning to give an account of the plantation to the merchant adventurers, by whose assistance the first settlers were transported. While preparing to rejoin his friends in America, he was removed to another and better country in 1626. He was a man of activity and enterprise; respectable for his talents and virtues; well acquainted with the Scriptures; and a professed disciple of Jesus Christ. After his death, his family came to New England, and his son, Thomas Cushman, succeeded Mr. Brewster, as ruling elder of the church of Plymouth, and died in 1691, aged 83. Mr. Cushman, during his short residence at Plymouth, though not a minister, delivered a discourse on the sin and danger of self-love, which was printed at London in 1622, at Boston in 1724, and at Plymouth in 1785, with an appendix by John Davis, containing an account of Mr. Cushman. The design of the discourse was to repress the desire of personal property, which was beginning to exhibit itself, and to persuade our fathers to continue that entire community of interests, which they at first established. Extracts from this valuable and curious relic of antiquity are preserved in Belknap. H. W. Cushman, of Bernardston, has prepared a genealogy of all the Cushmans. All are descended from Elder Thomas C., and his wife, Mary, the daughter of Mary Allerton. — Appendix to Cushman's Discourse; Belknap's American Biography, II. 267-280.

CUSHMAN, THOMAS, died at Plymouth, Dec. 11, 1691, aged 83. He was the son of Robert C.; a ruling elder after Brewster, from April 6, 1649, nearly forty-three years. He was capable as a teacher, and possessed all the virtues required for his office.

CUSHMAN, GIDEON, died in Hebron, Me., May, 1845, aged 95, a first settler; leaving ten children, eighty grandchildren, one hundred great-grandchildren.

CUSTIS, JOHN PARKE, only son of Mrs. Custis, who married Washington; his father was Daniel Parke Custis. His daughter, Eleanor, married Lawrence Lewis of Windham, Va. He was the son of Gen. Washington's only sister. Mrs. Lewis died in 1852, aged 73, — leaving a brother, George Washington Parke Custis, of Arlington house. Martha Washington was of the old Calvert family, a descendant of Lord Baltimore.

CUTBUSIL, JAMES, professor of chemistry in the military academy at West Point, died there Dec. 15, 1823. He was profoundly skilled in chemistry, and was also a man of great independence of opinion, the promoter of objects which he deemed conducive to the happiness and honor of his country. He published the useful cabinet, monthly, 1 vol. 1808; philosophy of experimental chemistry, 2 vols. 1813. After his death a treatise, which he prepared on pyrotechny, was published by his widow.

CUTLER, EPHRAIM, judge, died at Warren, Ohio, in July, 1853, aged 86. The son of Rev. Manasseh Cutler, he removed to Ohio as early as 1795. In 1802, as a member of the State convention, he drafted the article against slavery. In 1819, he framed the bill for the present school system. His piety was manifested in his family and in all the relations of life. He and Judge Burnet went to Ohio in the same year, and after a residence of nearly sixty years each died in 1853. Prof. Andrews published a discourse on his death.

CUTLER, JOHN, long an eminent physician and surgeon in Boston, died Sept. 23, 1761, aged 85. Dr. Boylston was his pupil.

CUTLER, TIMOTHY, D. D., president of Yale college, died in Boston Aug. 17, 1765, aged 82. He was the son of Maj. John Cutler of Charlestown, Mass., and was graduated at Harvard college in 1701. He was ordained Jan. 11, 1709, minister of Stratford, Conn., where he continued ten years in high esteem, being the most celebrated preacher in the colony. In 1719 he was chosen president of Yale college, and entered upon the duties of the office in the same year. His predecessor was Mr. Pierson, in the interval between whose death and his accession the college had been removed to New Haven. The removal was in 1716; the first commencement at New Haven was in 1717. The appointment of Mr. Cutler was considered as an auspicious event to the institution, for he was a man of profound and general learning, particularly distinguished for his acquaintance with oriental literature, and he presided over the college with dignity and reputation. In 1722 he was induced, in consequence of reading the works of a number of late writers in England, to renounce the communion of the Congregational churches, and the trustees therefore passed a vote "excusing him from all further service, as rector of Yale college," and requiring of future rectors satisfactory evidence of "the soundness of their faith in opposition to Arminian and prelatial corruptions." He was succeeded by Mr. Williams. He went to Boston in Oct., where a new church was offered to him, and embarked with Mr. Johnson for England Nov. 5th. In the latter end of March, 1723, he was ordained, first a deacon and then a priest. From Oxford he received his degree of doctor in divinity. He set sail on his return to America July 26th, and soon after became rector of Christ church in Boston, where he continued till his death.

He was a man of strong powers of mind. Dr. Eliot describes him as haughty and overbearing in his manners, and incapable of winning the hearts of the young. Mr. Whitefield gives an account of a debate with him on Presbyterian ordination and instantaneous conversion. He spoke Latin with great fluency and dignity, and he was one of the best oriental scholars ever educated in this country. President Stiles represents him as having more knowledge of the Arabic than any man in New England before him, except President Chauncy, and his disciple, Mr. Thacher. He was also well skilled in logic, metaphysics, moral philosophy, theology, and ecclesiastical history. He published a sermon delivered before the general court at New Haven, 1717; and a sermon on the death of Thomas Greaves, 1757. — Caner's Fun. Serm.; Miller, II. 359; Clap's Hist. of Yale College, 31; Whitefield's Jour. in N. E. 1740, 48; Chandler's Life of Johnson, 17, 27-39; Holmes' Life of Stiles, 387; and Annals, II. 143.

CUTLER, MANASSEH, LL. D., a botanist, minister of Hamilton, Mass., graduated at Yale college in 1765, and died July 28, 1823, aged 81, in the fifty-second year of his ministry. He was a member of various learned societies, and was one of the earliest cultivators in New England of the science of botany. Besides being a minister, he was also elected a member of congress in 1800 and 1802. He published a century discourse, 1815; and an account of American plants in memoirs of American academy, vol. I. 396-493.

CUTLER, JERVIS, major, died in Evansville, Ind., June 25, 1844, aged 76. He was born in Edgartown, the son of Rev. Manasseh Cutler, who as a member of congress was a negotiator for the purchase of a million and a half of acres by the Ohio company. He went with Rufus Putnam to settle Marietta, cutting down the first tree for a clearing in Ohio in 1788. He was esteemed for his integrity and kind-heartedness. He had a taste for the fine arts. His adventures are related by Hildreth. — Hildreth's Biog. Mem.

CUTT, JOHN, president of the province of New Hampshire, came from Wales before 1646, and was a distinguished merchant, of great probity, in Portsmouth. He was appointed president in 1679, and commenced the duties of his office in 1680. He died March 27, 1681, and was succeeded by Richard Waldron. He left sons, John and Samuel. His widow, a second wife, was killed by the Indians. His brother, John, carried on the fishery at the Isle of Shoals, and Robert the business of ship-building at Kittery. The descendants write the name Cutts. Of these, Edward died at Kittery in Jan. or Feb., 1818, aged 89; and Col. Thomas at Saco, Jan., 1821, aged 87. — Annals of Portsmouth 70; Farmer.

CUTTER, AMMI R., M. D., a physician, died Dec. 8, 1820, aged 85. He was born in North Yarmouth, Maine, in 1735, the son of Ammi R. C., the first minister of that town. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1752. In 1755 he served as a surgeon in the company of rangers under Robert Rogers in a very hazardous expedition, and in 1758 in the expedition against Louisbourg. He settled at Portsmouth. Early in 1777 he was appointed physician-general of the eastern department, and stationed at Fishkill, N. J. During his absence his eldest son, at college, died. He returned to his large family in the beginning of 1778. After being in practice about fifty years he received his son, William, into partnership, and soon relinquished business. — Thatcher's Med. Biog; Ann. of Portsmouth.

CUTTER, LEVI, an eminently useful and pious man, died at Portland March 2, 1856, aged about 83. He had been a merchant, and as mayor of the city he had done much for its improvement and ornament, especially in its public walks at the east and west parts of the town. His son, Rev. Edward Cutter, succeeded Mr. Cummings in 1856 as the editor of the Christian Mirror.

CUTTS, CHARLES, secretary of the senate of the United States, died at Washington Jan. 25, 1846, aged about 78. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1789.

CUTTS, RICHARD, died at Washington April 7, 1845, aged 73. He was the son of Thomas Cutts of Saco, and was graduated at Harvard in 1790. He was in congress from 1801 to 1813; and then comptroller of the treasury. His wife, Anna Paine, a sister of Mrs. Madison, died in 1832. He left six children.

CUYLER, CORNELIUS C., D. D., died in Philadelphia Aug. 31, 1850, aged 66. He was many years pastor of the Dutch church in Poughkeepsie, and seventeen years pastor of the second Presbyterian church in Philadelphia. He was also president of Jefferson medical college.

DABALL, NATHAN, died at Groton, N. Y., March 9, 1818, aged 68. He was an able teacher of mathematics; and one thousand and five hundred persons were instructed by him in navigation. He published a valuable system of arithmetic, and a system of navigation.

DAGGETT, NAPIITALI, D. D., president of Yale college, died Nov. 25, 1780, aged about 52. He was a native of Attleborough, Mass., and in 1748 graduated at the institution which was afterwards intrusted to his care. In the year 1751 he was settled in the ministry at Smith Town on Long Island, from whence he removed in 1756 to New Haven, and accepted the appointment of professor of divinity in the college. This office he filled during the remainder of his life. After the death of Mr. Clap in 1766, he officiated as president till April 1, 1777, when he resigned the chair. Dr. Stiles was appointed his successor. In July, 1779, he distinguished himself by his bravery, when the British attacked New Haven. He was succeeded in his professorship by Samuel Wales. He was a good classical scholar, and a learned divine. He published a sermon on the death of President Clap, 1767; at the ordination of Ebenezer Baldwin, 1770; of J. Howe, 1773. — Holmes' Life of Stiles, 392, 396; Gen. Hist. of Conn., 412.

DAGGETT, HENRY, an officer of the Revolutionary army, died at New Haven June 20, 1843, aged 85, the oldest of the graduates. He was the son of President Daggett.

DAGGETT, DAVID, LL. D., judge, died at New Haven April 10, 1851, aged 86. He was born at Attleborough Dec. 31, 1764, descended from John D. of Watertown in 1630, from Thomas D. of Edgartown, who married Hannah Mayhew, and from John and Ebenezer of Attleborough. A graduate of 1783 at Yale, in a distinguished class, he practised law and sustained various offices. From 1813 he was a senator of the United States for six years; in 1824 he was an instructor in the law school; in 1826, Kent professor in Yale college; from 1832 to 1834, chief justice of the supreme court of Conn., retiring by limitation at the age of 70. His widow, Mary L., died in Dec., 1854, aged 65. His son, Dr. O. E. Daggett, is minister of Canandaigua. He published an oration July 4, 1787; another, entitled sunbeams from cucumbers, 1799; an argument before general assembly of Conn., 1804; eulogium on R. Griswold, 1812.

DALLE, PETER, minister of the French Protestant church in Boston, came to New England in 1686, and died May 21, 1715, aged 65, and was succeeded by Le Mercier. He was buried in the centre of the Granary burying-yard: around him are French names. He was of great piety, charitable, courteous, exemplary. He required by his will that there should be no wine at his funeral; though a scarf and gloves were given to each minister. His library he gave to the church, and to the minister of the same church one hundred pounds. — Hist. Coll. 3d series, vol. II. p. 52.

DALE, THOMAS, Sir, governor of Va., died in the East Indies in 1616. He was high marshal in 1609 and 1611; again governor after Gates in 1614.

DALE, RICHARD, commodore in the navy, was born in Virginia about 1757. In the war of the Revolution he served in the brig Lexington as midshipman. Captured in 1776, by a British frigate, he and his crew retook the brig in the following night. He was again captured Sept. 19, 1777, and thrown into Mill prison, from which he made his escape in Feb., 1779, and joined Paul Jones in the Bon Homme Richard at L'Orient. In the action with the Serapis, Sept. 23, he was badly wounded in the leg. On board the Trumbull of twenty-eight guns, Capt. J. Nicholson, he was again captured in 1781, but in Nov. was exchanged. In May, 1798, he commanded the sloop-of-war Ganges. April 28, 1801, he was appointed to the command of the American squadron in the Mediterranean; but resigned his commission Dec. 17, 1802. His residence was at Philadelphia, where, in the midst of an amiable family and respected as a citizen and a Christian, he died Feb. 24, 1826, aged 69. — Life of Jones, 126, 361.

DALE, SAMUEL, general, died in Mississippi May 23, 1841, a pioneer in the settlement of the southwest. In the last war, his canoe fight with Indians in the middle of the Alabama is well attested, although almost incredible. He fought seven warriors with clubbed rifles, and rowed ashore with the corpse of the last under his feet.

DALLAS, ALEXANDER JAMES, secretary of the treasury of the United States, died Jan. 16, 1817, aged 57. He was of Scotch descent and was born in the island of Jamaica in 1759. His father, Robert D., was an eminent physician. After receiving an early education at Edinburgh and Westminster, he came to this country, after the death of his father, in 1783, and studied law at Philadelphia. He also engaged in various literary enterprises, writing much for the periodicals and being at one time the editor of the Columbian Magazine. In Jan., 1791, he was appointed secretary of State, and again in 1793 and 1796. In 1801 he was appointed by Jefferson attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. About this time he recovered against Fenno 2500 dollars for a libel. In Oct., 1814, he was appointed by Mr. Madison secretary of the treasury of the United States as the successor of G. W. Campbell; and in March, 1815, he undertook the additional trust of secretary at war, and performed the task, on the return of peace, of reducing the army. He resigned his honorable office and returned to the practice of the law at Philadelphia in Nov., 1816; but in a few weeks his earthly career was closed. While at Trenton, he was attacked with the gout in the stomach, of which he died soon after he reached home. His wife, whom he married in 1780, was of Devonshire, England. Mr. Dallas had great decision and energy, and was eminent as a lawyer. He excelled in conversation, and his manners were highly polished. While in office he promoted the establishment of a tariff and of the national bank. He published: features of Jay's treaty, 1795; speeches on the trial of Blount and the impeachment of the judges; the laws of Pennsylvania, with notes; address to the society of constitutional republicans, 1805; reports of cases in the courts of the United States and Pennsylvania, 4 vols., 1806-7; treasury reports; exposition of the causes and character of the late war, 1815. George M. Dallas proposed, in 1817, to publish his works in 3 vols. He left unfinished sketches of a history of Pennsylvania. — National Intelligencer, March 15th, 1817.

DALLAS, ALEXANDER J., commodore, died in Callao Bay June 3, 1844, aged 55. He bore the name of his father, and was in the naval service thirty-nine years.

DALTON, TIMOTHY, first minister of Hampton, N. H., died Dec. 28, 1661. He was the brother of Philemon, of Dedham, 1836, and died without issue. By a liberal donation he constituted the ministerial fund in Hampton and North Hampton.

DALTON, TRISTRAM, died at Boston May 30, 1817, aged 79. Born at Newburyport, he was graduated in 1755. He studied law, married the daughter of Robert Hooper, and engaged with him in commercial pursuits, and was appointed with Mr. Strong a senator in the first congress in 1789. He was induced to remove to Washington and to invest in real estate his fortune, nearly all of which he lost after living in affluence sixty years. As a man of philosophy and religion, he was sustained. In 1815 he was surveyor of the port of Boston. He had lived in intimacy with the first four presidents.

DAMON, JUDE, minister of Truro, died in 1828, aged about 70. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1776. His predecessors were John Avery and Caleb Upham.

DAMON, DAVID, D. D., died in 1843, aged about 62. He was graduated at Harvard in 1811, and settled at Lunenburg as successor of T. Flint in 1815. He published a sermon before a bible society, 1826; a farewell sermon, 1827; address at Amesbury on temperance, 1829.

DANA, RICHARD, of Cambridge, who died in 1695, had four sons, who were the ancestors of the numerous families of Danas in this country; Jacob, born in 1655, who settled in Pomfret, Conn., Joseph, Benjamin, and Daniel born in 1663 who lived in Cambridge.

DANA, WILLIAM, captain, died in 1809, aged 64. He was born in Little Cambridge, now Brighton. He was an officer in the Revolution; in 1789 he joined the Belpre associates in Ohio. He left many descendants. — Hildreth's Biog. Memoirs.

DANA, FRANCIS, LL. D., chief justice of Massachusetts, died at Cambridge April 25, 1811, aged 68. He was a descendant of Richard Dana, who died at Cambridge about 1695. His father was Richard Dana, an eminent magistrate. He was born at Charlestown in Aug., 1742, and, after graduating at Harvard college in 1762, studied law with Judge Trowbridge. He passed the year 1775 in England, where he had a brother, Edmund, a minister at Wroxeter, who died in 1823. In 1776 he was appointed a delegate to congress, and, taking his seat in Nov., 1777, continued in that body until, in Nov., 1779, he accompanied

Mr. Adams to Paris as secretary of legation. He was elected Dec. 19, 1780, as minister to Russia, where he remained, though not publicly received, from Aug., 1781, till the close of the war, returning in Dec., 1783. He was chosen a delegate to congress in 1784. A member of the Massachusetts convention, he advocated the constitution. The office of envoy extraordinary to France in 1797 he declined, and Mr. Gerry was deputed in his stead, with Marshall and Pinckney. Appointed chief justice of Massachusetts in 1792, he discharged very impartially and ably the duties of that office until his resignation in 1806. Judge Dana was a learned lawyer and presided in court with great dignity. His opinions on the bench were remarkable for their clearness and perspicuity. In his politics, during the days of violent excitement, he was strongly attached to the federalists. His correspondence while in Europe is contained in Sparks' diplomatic correspondence, vol. VIII.

DANA, SAMUEL, judge, died in Amherst, N. H., April 2, 1798, aged 58. Born in Cambridge, now Brighton, he graduated in 1755 in the class of John Adams, and was settled as the minister of Groton June 3, 1761, the successor of Caleb Trowbridge. Not having the whig zeal of his parishioners, he relinquished, voluntarily, his charge in 1775, and lived on a small farm, which he cultivated. In 1780 he preached to a small, separate society. Being the executor of the will of John Bulkley, he removed Mr. B.'s law library to his own house, and was led to read it and to become a lawyer; he commenced the practice in Amherst in 1781. He was judge of probate. His son Samuel was a lawyer in Groton; James G. a lawyer and editor in Frankfort, Ky.; his daughter Mchtabel married Gov. Samuel Bell; his son Luther was the father of Professor J. F. Dana. His earliest ancestor was Richard, of Cambridge, from 1648 to 1695, who left four sons, from whom descended the numerous families of Dana in New England.

DANA, SAMUEL, judge, son of the preceding, died in Charlestown, Mass., in Nov., 1835, aged 60. His residence during the active period of his life was at Groton. He and Mr. Bigelow were eminent rival lawyers, and opposed also in politics, Judge D. being of the democratic or Jeffersonian party. In his speeches at the bar he was as smooth, gentle, and insinuating as Mr. Bigelow was bold, rapid, vehement. He published an oration, July 4, 1807.

DANA, JAMES, D. D., a minister of New Haven, died Aug. 18, 1812, aged 77. He was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1753. Some years afterwards he was a resident at Cambridge. He was ordained as the successor of Samuel Whittelsey, at Wallingford, Conn., Oct. 12, 1758. The history of the difficulties, occasioned by his settlement, occupies forty or fifty pages in Trumbull's history of Connecticut; he was accused of heterodoxy, and an interesting question also arose concerning the construction of the Saybrook platform. The writers called forth on the occasion were Eells, Todd, Hart, and Hobart. It is plain that the ordination was a departure from the Saybrook platform, because the ordaining council was not limited to the consociation; it amounted to an assertion of the independence of the church, in disregard of the platform. The members of the council were considered as inclining to Arminianism. After remaining at Wallingford thirty years, Dr. Dana was installed the pastor of the first church at New Haven, April 29, 1789, as the successor of Chauncy Whittlesey. In the autumn of 1805 he was dismissed; after which he occasionally preached in the pulpits of his brethren in the vicinity. Samuel W. Dana, senator of the United States, was his only surviving child. Dr. Dana published anonymously an examination of Edwards' inquiry on the freedom of the will, 8vo. Boston, 1770; and, with his name, the examination continued, New Haven, 1773; in all more than three hundred pages. Some of his views are the following, which are similar to those of Samuel West, of New Bedford, published at a later period: For the actions of men there must be an efficient cause. Motives are not that cause; abstract notions, and such are all reasons and motives, are not agents; and if they were, they must themselves, according to Edwards, be determined by motives. As motives are not the efficient cause of the actions of men, so neither is God that cause; for the scheme of Stephen West, of Stockbridge, making God the sole efficient in the universe, is fraught with the impiety of making God the author of sin, and annihilates the responsibility of man, rendering him a mere machine, or binding upon him the chains of a dreadful fatalism. Men themselves, then, are the only efficient causes of their own volitions; nor do they always determine according to the greatest apparent good; the affections do not follow the judgment; men sin against light, with the wiser choice, the greater good, full in their view. Through the impetuosity of their passions they determine against the greatest apparent good. This is the case with every sinner who resolves to delay repentance to a future time. Self-determination is the characteristic of every moral agent. Such was the opinion of Dr. Watts, who maintained that every intelligent spirit is the cause of its own volitions. Even according to Edwards, it is evidently improper to speak of the mind as being determined by motives; for he expressly allows, that "an appearing most agreeable or pleasing to the mind, and the mind's preferring and choosing, seem hardly to be properly and perfectly distinct." But, if not distinct, then the choice is not caused by the appearance of the greatest good. Motive is not the determiner of volition and at the same time the act of volition. And if the highest motive is the same as volition, then, to say that a man chooses as he pleases, is to say that he chooses as he chooses. The absence of liberty he deemed inconsistent with moral agency; and by liberty he meant, not merely liberty in regard to the external action, but liberty of volition; an exemption from all circumstances and causes having a controlling influence over the will; a self-determining power of man, as a real agent, in respect to his own volitions. On the whole, he regarded the scheme of Edwards as acquitting the creature of blame, and impeaching the truth and justice of the Creator. He published also three sermons in American preacher, vols. I. and III.; on death of John Hall, 1763; of Chauncy Whittlesey, 1764; two sermons on faith and inscrutable providence, 1767; a century discourse, April 9, 1770; on prayer, 1774; election sermon, 1779; on death of W. Beadle, etc., 1782; on capital punishments, 1790; on African slave trade, 1791; at the installation of himself, 1789; of A. Holmes, 1792; practical atheism, 1794; ordination of E. Gay, 1793; A. Waterman, 1794; of Dan Huntington, 1799; on the death of Dr. Styles, 1795; two sermons on new year and completion of eighteenth century, 1801; on death of E. G. Marsh, 1803; character of scoffers, 1805; sermons to young people, 1806.

DANA, JOSEPH, D. D., minister of Ipswich, Mass., died Nov. 16, 1827, aged 85. He was born at Pomfret, Conn., Nov. 13, 1742, and graduated at Yale college in 1760. He was a descendant of Jacob Dana, of Pomfret, the son of Richard D., of Cambridge. Having early devoted himself to God, he studied theology, and was ordained as the minister of the south society in Ipswich Nov. 7, 1765. On the sixtieth anniversary of his ordination, at the age of 83, he preached in 1825 a discourse, in which he stated, that all who were heads of families at the time of his settlement were deceased, excepting five; that he had followed about nine hundred of his parishioners to the grave, and had received into the church the small number of one hundred and twenty-one, being the average of two in a year. Of these, fifty were received in a revival from 1798 to 1801. He left two sons, Daniel and Samuel, ministers of Newburyport and Marblehead. Dr. Dana was a firm believer in the great doctrines of Calvinism, a faithful preacher, eminently a man of prayer, and deeply interested in all the events which relate to the kingdom of Jesus Christ. He was a diligent student and laborious pastor. A fortnight before his death he preached a discourse, recently written. An unaffected humility marked his character, and his end was peace. He published two discourses on Proverbs, XVI: 8, 1782; at the ordination of D. Dana, 1795; of D. Smith, 1795; of his son Samuel, 1801; of Joshua Dodge, 1809; at a fast, 1799; a discourse on the death of Washington, 1800; at the convention, 1801; observations on baptism, 1806; on integrity; on the worth of the soul, 1807; two discourses, 1810; at Boston, 1812; on the death of J. M'Kean, 1818. — Crowell's Funeral Sermon.

DANA, JAMES FREEMAN, M. D., the grandson of Judge Samuel Dana and the son of Luther Dana, was born in Amherst, N. H., Sept. 23, 1793. His mother, Lucy Giddings, was a descendant in the seventh generation from John Robinson. He graduated at Harvard college in 1813, and in a few years was appointed assistant to Dr. Gorham, professor of chemistry. In 1820 he was appointed professor of chemistry and mineralogy at Dartmouth college; but resigned this office in 1826, on being chosen professor of chemistry in the college of physicians and surgeons at New York. In November he removed to that city. He soon lost his only child, and in April, 1827, after an illness of five days, he died of the erysipelas, at the age of 33. His wife was the daughter of President Webber. He was a distinguished chemist, and highly esteemed by his acquaintance. He published, with his brother, outlines of the geology and mineralogy of Boston, with a map, 1818; an epitome of chemical philosophy as a text-book, 8vo., 1825. He wrote also for various journals many communications, a list of which is given by Dr. Thacher. — Thacher's Med. Biog.; Coll. N. H. Hist. Soc. II. 290.

DANA, SAMUEL W., a senator of the United States from Connecticut, died in 1830, aged about 73. He was the son of Dr. James D., and graduated at Yale in 1775.

DANA, JUDAH, died at Fryeburg, Me., Dec. 27, 1845, aged 73, a senator of the United States. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1795; his wife was a daughter of Prof. Ripley, and granddaughter of the first President Wheelock. He sustained various offices, as county attorney, judge of probate twenty years, and of the common pleas, and a member of the convention that formed the constitution of Maine. He was a man of ability and conscientiously faithful to the public.

DANA, SYLVESTER, a descendant of Richard D., of Cambridge, now Brighton, in 1640, died at Concord, N. H., June 9, 1849, aged nearly 80. He was born at Ashford, Conn., July 4, 1769. His father, Anderson D., a lawyer, who removed to Wilkesbarre, was killed by the Indians in Wyoming Valley. The family, the widow and seven children, fled on foot to Connecticut. S. D. was graduated in 1797. At Orford, N. H., he was ordained in May, 1801, and continued there thirty-three years. His last words were, "There is rest in heaven." His house was burnt at Concord in 1844, and he lost his library, and a manuscript system of theology, and history of Wyoming, which he had prepared. His mother was Susanna Huntington, of Lebanon. His brother Anderson held the old property in Wilkesbarre, which made him rich. Dana's academy is a witness to his liberality. He is now in years, if yet alive. His brother, Judge Daniel, lived in the State of New York, and died in Ohio in 1841, aged 80.

DANA, NATHANIEL, died at Brookline Jan. 18, 1856, aged 68. Born in South Natick, he passed most of his life in business in Portland. He was a worthy member of Dr. Payson's church. In 1830 he removed to Boston. He was a man of good sense, of counsel, judgment, and decision; an eminent Christian, fervent in prayer.

DANE, FRANCIS, the second minister of Andover, died Feb. 17, 1697, aged 81. He came from England in 1636, and was ordained about 1648. His brother John, of Ipswich, born in 1618, was the ancestor of Nathan Dane.

DANE, NATHAN, LL. D., died at Beverly in Feb., 1835, aged 82, an eminent jurist and statesman. Born at Ipswich, he was of the sixth generation from John, of Ipswich and Roxbury, who died in 1658. He was graduated at Harvard in 1778. In congress he framed the celebrated ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern territory, by which slavery was shut out. He founded at Cambridge the Dane professorship of law, and the law hall. He published a general abridgment and digest of American law in 9 vols. 8vo.

DANFORTH, THOMAS, president of the district of Maine, died Nov. 5, 1699, aged 77. He was born in England in 1622, and was the son of Nicholas Danforth, who died at Cambridge in 1637. He had great influence in the management of public affairs in difficult times. He was an assistant from 1659 to 1678. In 1679 he was elected deputy-governor. In the same year the inhabitants of the district of Maine, being no longer attached to Massachusetts as a county, elected him president of the province. He accordingly opened his court at York, and granted several parcels of land. He continued in this office, and in that of deputy-governor, till the arrival of Andros at the end of the year 1686, and during this time resided chiefly in Cambridge. He was also a judge of the superior court. In 1681 he united with Gookin, Cooke, and others, in opposing the acts of trade and vindicating the chartered rights of his country. He was a man of great integrity and wisdom. In the time of the witchcraft delusion, in 1692, he evinced his correctness of judgment and his firmness by condemning the proceedings of the courts. — Hutchinson, I. 189, 323, 329, 331, 380, 404; Sullivan, 385, 386; Hist. Coll. v. 75.

DANFORTH, SAMUEL, minister of Roxbury, Mass., brother of the preceding, was born in England in Sept., 1626, and came to this country with his father in 1634. After he was graduated at Harvard college in 1643, he was a tutor and fellow. When Mr. Welde returned to England, he was invited to become the colleague of Mr. Eliot of Roxbury, and he was accordingly ordained Sept. 24, 1650. He died Nov. 19, 1674, aged 48 years. He had twelve children. Two of his sons were ministers. His sermons were elaborate, judicious, and methodical; he wrote them twice over in a fair, large hand, and in each discourse usually quoted forty or fifty passages of Scripture. Notwithstanding this care and labor, he was so affectionate and pathetic, that he rarely finished the delivery of a sermon without weeping. In the forenoon he usually expounded the Old Testament, and in the afternoon discoursed on the body of divinity. His wife, whom he married in 1651, was the daughter of Mr. Wilson, and, when he was contracted to her, before his marriage, a sermon was preached by Mr. Cotton, according to the old usage of New England. Such was his peace in his last moments, that Mr. Eliot used to say, "My brother Danforth made the most glorious end that I ever saw." Mr. Welde wrote a poem on his death. He published a number of almanacs, and an astronomical description of the comet, which appeared in 1664, with a brief theological application. He contends that a comet is a heavenly body, moving according to Divine laws, and that its appearance is portentous. He published, also, the cry of Sodom inquired into, or a testimony against the sin of uncleanness; and the election sermon, 1670, entitled, a recognition of New England's errand into the wilderness. — Mather's Magnalia, iv. 153-157.

DANFORTH, JOHN, 7th minister of Dorehester, Mass., was the son of the preceding, born Nov. 5, 1660, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1677. He was ordained as successor of Mr. Flint, June 28, 1682. From this period he continued in the ministry till his death, May 26, 1730, aged 70 years. Dr. Samuel Danforth, of Boston, was his grandson. Jonathan Bowman, who survived him, was ordained his colleague Nov. 5, 1729. Mr. Danforth was a man of great learning. While he possessed an uncommon acquaintance with mathematics, he had also a taste for poetry. He wrote many epitaphs upon the good Christians of his flock. He was an eminent servant of Jesus Christ, being sound in his principles, zealous to promote the salvation of his brethren, upright, holy, and devout. The following lines, which are a version of Mr. Eliot's hints on the proper method of teaching the Indians the Christian religion, may serve as a specimen of his poetry.

"Till agriculture and cohabitation
Come under full restraint and regulation,
Much you would do you 'll find impracticable,
And much you do will prove unprofitable.
The common lands, that lie unfenc'd, you know,
The husbandman in vain doth plough and sow;
We hope in vain the plant of grace will thrive
In forests, where civility can't live."

He published a sermon at the departure of Mr. Lord and his church for Carolina, 1697; kneeling at parting, a sermon, and a poem on J. Eliot, 1697; the blackness of sinning against the light, 1710; funeral sermon on E. Bromfield; judgment begun at the house of God, 1716; two sermons on the earthquake, to which is added, a poem on the death of P. Thacher of Milton, and S. Danforth of Taunton, 1727; a fast sermon; a poem on the death of Ann Eliot, and verses to the memory of her husband, John Eliot. — Coll. Hist. Soc. ix. 176, 177; New England Weekly Journal, June 1, 1730.

DANFORTH, SAMUEL, minister of Taunton, Mass., was the son of Mr. Danforth of Roxbury, and was born Dec. 18, 1666. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1683, and married the daughter of Rev. J. Allen of Boston. He died Nov. 14, 1727. He was one of the most learned and eminent ministers of his day. In the beginning of the year 1705, by means of his benevolent labors, a deep impression was made upon the minds of the people, and a most pleasing reformation occurred. The youth, who formerly assembled for amusement and folly, now met for the exalted purpose of improving in Christian knowledge and virtue, and of becoming fitted for the joys of the heavenly and eternal world, in the presence of Jesus, the Saviour. Several letters of Mr. Danforth, giving an account of this reformation, are preserved in Mr. Prince's Christian history. He published an eulogy on Thomas Leonard, 1713, and the election sermon, 1714. He left behind him a manuscript Indian dictionary, a part of which is now in the library of the Massachusetts historical society. It seems to have been formed from Eliot's Indian bible, as there is a reference under every word to a passage of Scripture. — Hist. Coll. iii. 173; ix. 176; Christian Hist. i. 108.

DANFORTH, JONATHAN, captain, died in Billerica in 1712. He was an eminent surveyor, frequently employed in locating new towns, and a man of piety.

DANFORTH, SAMUEL, a member of the Massachusetts medical society, died in 1817, aged about 45. He published an oration at Boston July 4, 1804; discourse before the humane society, 1808.

DANFORTH, SAMUEL, M. D., a physician in Boston, died Nov. 16, 1827, aged 87. He was born in 1740, and was the son of Samuel D., judge of probate for Middlesex, and the descendant of men distinguished in New England. He was graduated in 1758, and studied with Dr. Rand. At this period he became acquainted with a German physician, probably Dr. Kast, who exerted an unhappy influence on his religious opinions. He practised first at Newport; then settled at Boston. Being a loyalist, he remained in the town, while it was occupied by the British; for which he was afterwards treated harshly. From 1795 to 1798 he was president of the medical society. Neglecting surgery, he devoted himself to medicine, and had full practice till he was nearly eighty years old. For about four years he was confined to his family. He died of a paralytic affection. He was tall, thin, erect, with an aquiline nose and a prominent chin, and a countenance expressive of great sagacity. He employed only a few and powerful remedies, relying chiefly on calomel, opium, ipecacuanha, and bark. He rarely caused a patient to be bled. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

DANFORTH, JOSHUA, colonel, died at Pittsfield, Mass., Jan. 30, 1837, aged about 78; an officer in the Revolution, and the oldest postmaster in the country. His son, Rev. Joshua N., of the neighborhood of Washington, has long been an acceptable correspondent of religious papers.

DANIEL, WILLIAM, judge, died at Lynchburg, Va., Nov. 20, 1839, aged 68. He was for the last twenty-three years a judge of the general and circuit courts of Virginia, and much respected for his talents and legal knowledge.

DANIELSON, DANIEL, general, died in Brimfield Sept. 19, 1791, aged 58. His widow married Gen. Eaton. He was a graduate of Yale in 1756, and a patriot of the Revolution; a member of the provincial congress in 1774, a delegate to Connecticut in 1775 on the subject of raising an army, and appointed to command a regiment; afterwards chief justice of Hampshire county. Large in person, finely formed, bold and able, he always had a commanding influence.

DAPONTE, LORENZO, died at New York in 1838, aged 92. He was an Italian; and he published several operas.

DARBY, WILLIAM, engineer and geographer, died in Frederic county, Maryland, in Aug., 1827. He was an officer under Gen. Jackson in Louisiana, and was one of the surveyors of the boundary between the United States and Canada. He published a geographical description of Louisiana, 8vo., 1816; a map of the same; plan of Pittsburg and adjacent country, 1817; emigrant's guide to the western country, 8vo., 1818; tour from New York to Detroit, 1819; memoir on the geography and history of Florida, with a map, 1821; 3d edition of Brooke's universal gazetteer, 1823.

DARBY, WILLIAM, died at Washington Oct. 9, 1854, aged 79; a geographer and statistician, a native of Pennsylvania.

DARKE, WILLIAM, a brave officer during the American war, died in Jefferson county, Va., Nov. 26, 1801, aged 65. He was born in Philadelphia county in 1736, and when a boy accompanied his parents to Virginia. In the nineteenth year of his age he joined the army under Gen. Braddock, and shared in the dangers of his defeat in 1755. In the beginning of the war with Great Britain he accepted a captain's commission, and served with great reputation till the close of the war, at which time he held the rank of major. In 1791 he received from congress the command of a regiment in the army under St. Clair, and bore a distinguished part in the unfortunate battle with the Indians, Nov. 4th. In this battle he lost a favorite son, and narrowly escaped with his own life. In his retirement during his remaining years, he enjoyed the confidence of the State which had adopted him, and was honored with the rank of major-general of the militia. — New York Spectator, Dec. 18, 1801.

DARLING, JOSHUA, judge, died at Henniker, N. H., in 1842. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1794, he was appointed a judge of the common pleas in 1817. Eleven years before his death he became a Christian. — Boston's Funeral Sermon.

DARLING, NOYES, judge, died at New Haven Sept. 17, 1846, aged 64. Born at Woodbridge, he graduated at Yale in 1801, and was mayor of the city. He was a man of science, and wrote papers on insects and agriculture.

DARLING, JOSEPH, Dr., died at New Haven Nov. 15, 1850, aged 91. He graduated at Yale in 1777.

DAROY, ETIENNE, died at Thibadeauxville, La., in Nov., 1833, aged 110.

D'ARUSMONT, FANNY WRIGHT, Mrs., died at Cincinnati Dec. 14, 1852, aged 57. She was born in Dundee, Scotland, and acquired by her writings an unenvied notoriety.

D'AULNAY, DE CHARNISE, or D'Aunai, D'Aunay, D'Aulney, as his name is variously written, governor of Acadia, had a fort at Penobscot as early as Nov., 1636, and claimed as far as Pemaquid. About the year 1632 Acadia was divided into three provinces, and the propriety and government assigned to De Razilly, La Tour, and Denys. The first had the territory from Port Royal, in the west of Nova Scotia, to New England; the second had Acadia proper, or Nova Scotia; yet La Tour had a fort at the river St. John, in the province of the first. The rights of Razilly were, after his death, purchased by D'Aulnay, who built a fort at Port Royal. His claims conflicting with those of La Tour, a warfare was carried on between them. Of these difficulties a long account is given by Hubbard. In 1643 and 1644 D'Aulnay still had a fort at Penobscot. He made a treaty with Gov. Endecott Oct. 8, 1644. Some advantages were derived from the trade with him. His secretary afterwards visited Boston to confer with the governor on certain grievances, and the governor sent D'Aulnay, as a conciliatory present, the "fair new sedan," which Capt. Cromwell had given him. Early in 1645 he captured La Tour's fort at St. John river, after it had been resolutely defended by his wife; he lost twelve men in the assault, and in violation of his faith he put to death all the men in the fort, except one, whom he made the hangman of the others. The jewels, plate, etc., were estimated at 10,000 pounds. La Tour's wife died with grief in three weeks. After D'Aulnay's death La Tour married his widow. Such was the termination of the quarrel. — 2 Hist. Coll. vi. 478-499; Charlevoix, i. 411.

DAVENPORT, JOHN, first minister of New Haven, and one of the founders of the colony of that name, died March 15, 1670, aged 72. He was born in the city of Coventry in England. In 1613 he was sent to Merton college, Oxford, where he continued about two years. He was then removed to Magdalen hall, which he left without a degree. Retiring to London, he became an eminent preacher among the Puritans, and at length minister of St. Stephen's church in Coleman street. In 1625 he went to Magdalen hall, and, performing the exercise required, took the degree of bachelor of divinity. By his great industry he became a universal scholar, and as a preacher he held the first rank. There was in his delivery a gravity, an energy, and an engaging eloquence, which were seldom witnessed. About the year 1630 he united with Dr. Gouge, Dr. Sibs, and others, in a design of purchasing impropriations, and with the profits of them to provide ministers for poor and destitute congregations. Such progress was made in the execution of the plan, that all the church lands in the possession of laymen would soon have been obtained; but Bishop Laud, who was apprehensive that the project would promote the interests of nonconformity, caused the company to be dissolved, and the money to be confiscated to the use of his majesty. As Mr. Davenport soon became a conscientious nonconformist, the persecutions to which he was exposed obliged him to resign his pastoral charge in Coleman street, and to retire into Holland at the close of the year 1633. He was invited to become the colleague of the aged Mr. Paget, pastor of the English church in Amsterdam; but, as he soon withstood the promiscuous baptism of children, which was practised in Holland, he became engaged in a controversy, which, in about two years, obliged him to desist from his public ministry. He now contented himself with giving private instruction; but, his situation becoming uncomfortable, he returned to London. A letter from Mr. Cotton, giving a favorable account of the colony of Massachusetts, induced Mr. Davenport to come to Boston, where he arrived June 26, 1637, in company with Mr. Eaton and Mr. Hopkins. He was received with great respect, and in August was a prudent and useful member of the synod, which was occasioned by the errors of the day. He sailed with his company March 30, 1638, for Quinnipiack, or New Haven, to found a new colony. He preached under an oak April 18th, the first Sabbath after their arrival, and he was minister there near thirty years. His successors were Street, Pierpont, Noyes, Whittlesey, Dana, Stuart, Taylor, and Bacon. He endeavored to establish a civil and religious order more strictly in conformity to the word of God than he had seen exhibited in any part of the world. In the government which was established, it was ordained that none but members of the church should enjoy the privileges of freemen. He was anxious to promote the purity of the church, and he therefore wrote against the result of the synod of 1662, which met in Massachusetts, and recommended a more general baptism of children than had before that time been practised. He was scrupulously careful in admitting persons to church communion, it being a fixed principle with him, that no person should be received into the church, who did not exhibit satisfactory evidence that he was truly penitent and believing. He did not think it possible to render the church perfectly pure, as men could not search into the heart; but he was persuaded that there should be a discrimination.

After the death of Mr. Wilson, pastor of the first church in Boston, in 1667, Mr. Davenport was invited to succeed him; and at the close of the year he accordingly removed to that town. He was now almost seventy years of age, and his church and people were unwilling to be separated from him; but his colony of New Haven had been blended with Connecticut, and he hoped to be more useful in Boston, where the strictness of former times in relation to ecclesiastical discipline had been somewhat relaxed. He was ordained pastor Dec. 9, 1668, and James Allen at the same time teacher. But his labors in this place were of short continuance, for he soon died of an apoplexy. He was a distinguished scholar, an admirable preacher, and a man of exemplary piety and virtue. Yet his philosophy was so imperfect, that, in his letter to Gov. Winthrop, acknowledging an almanac, which predicts four eclipses in these words, "Twice shall this planet, whereon we live, and its concomitant, the moon, widow each other of their sun-derived lustre," he remarks, "The place whereon we live is the earth, — the place, I say, not the planet." Such was his reputation, that he was invited with Mr. Cotton and Mr. Hooker to take a seat among the Westminster divines. Knowing the efficacy of prayer, he recommended with earnestness ejac ulatory addresses to Heaven. His intrepidity saved Whalley and Goffe, the judges of King Charles, who fled to New Haven in 1661. He concealed them in his own house, and, when the pursuers were coming to New Haven, preached publicly from Isaiah xvi. 3, 4, believing it to be a duty to afford them protection. His portrait is in the museum of Yale college. He owned a servant boy, worth 10 pounds; his books were appraised at 233 pounds. His letters to Winthrop are annexed to Bacon's historical discourses. He published a sermon on 2 Samuel, i. 18, 1629; a letter to the Dutch classis, wherein is declared the miserable slavery and bondage that the English church at Amsterdam is now in by reason of the tyrannical government and corrupt doctrines of Mr. John Paget, 1634; instructions to the elders of the English church, to be propounded to the pastors of the Dutch church; a report of some proceedings about his calling to the English church, against John Paget; allegations of Scripture against the baptizing of some kind of infants; protestation about the publication of his writings, all in 1634; an apologetical reply to the answer of W. Best, 1636; a discourse about civil government in a new plantation, whose design is religion; a profession of his faith made at his admission into one of the churches of New England, 1642; the knowledge of Christ, wherein the types, prophecies, etc., relating to him, are opened; the Messiah is already come, a sermon, 1653; saint's anchor holds in all storms and tempests, 1661; essay for investigation of the truth, 1663; election sermon, 1669; God's call to his people to turn unto him, in two fast sermons, 1670; the power of congregational churches asserted and vindicated, in answer to a treatise of Mr. Paget, 1672. He also wrote in Latin a letter to John Dury, which was subscribed by the rest of the ministers of New Haven colony, and he gave his aid to Mr. Norton, in his life of Cotton. He left behind him an exposition on the Canticles, in a hundred sheets of small handwriting, but it was never published. — *Wood's Ath. DAVENPORT, JOHN, minister of Stamford, Conn., grandson of the preceding, was the son of John D., of New Haven; his mother was Abigail, daughter of Rev. A. Pierson. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1687, ordained in 1694, and died Feb. 5, 1731, aged 61. His daughter, Sarah, married first Mr. Maltby of New Haven, and then Rev. E. Wheelock; another daughter was the first wife of Rev. Wm. Gaylord. Courageous in the reprehension of prevalent vices, particularly drunkenness, and pungent in his addresses to the conscience, he was eminently faithful as a minister, and, being devout and exemplary in his life, he was revered by all good men. The original languages in which the Scriptures are written were almost as familiar to him as his mother tongue. When he read the Bible in his family, he did not make use of the English translation, but of the Greek and Hebrew original. — Cook's Funeral Sermon.

DAVENPORT, ADDINGTON, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was graduated at Harvard college in 1689, and was afterwards clerk of the courts. In 1715 he was appointed a judge. He died April 2, 1736, aged 66.

DAVENPORT, ADDINGTON, Episcopal minister in Boston, died in 1746, aged about 45. He graduated at Harvard in 1719; was a minister at Scituate from 1730 to 1737; then at King's chapel, Boston, from 1737 to 1740; and then was the first rector of Trinity church. His wife was a daughter of Grove Hirst, a merchant of Boston; her sister, Maria, married Sir William Pepperell.

DAVENPORT, JAMES, minister of Southold, Long Island, son of Rev. John D., died in 1757, aged about 45. He was graduated at Yale college in 1732. He had been esteemed for some years a sound, pious, and faithful minister at Southold, when, in the religious excitement of 1740 and 1741, he was borne away by a strange enthusiasm. He preached in New Haven and other towns, and encouraged the outcries and agitations by which religion was disgraced. His voice he raised to the highest pitch, and gave it a tune, which was characteristic of the separate preachers. In his zeal he examined ministers as to the reality of their religion, and warned the people against unconverted ministers. In 1742 the assembly of Connecticut, deeming him under the influence of enthusiastic impulses, directed the governor and council to transport him out of the colony to the place whence he came. Without doubt he was enthusiastic; but the assembly was equally bewildered, being arbitrary and tyrannical. At last, through the influence of Mr. Wheelock and Mr. Williams, he was convinced of his error, and published an ample confession and retraction in 1744. His brother, Abraham, colonel and judge, of Stamford, died in 1789. His son, John, born at Freehold, Aug. 11, 1752, was graduated at Princeton in 1769, and after studying with Drs. Bellamy and Buell was minister of Bedford, N. Y., and Deerfield, N. J. In 1809, he returned to the State of New York and died at Lysander, July 13, 1821. — Trumbull, II. 167, 189.

DAVENPORT, JAMES, judge, died at Stamford Aug. 3, 1797, aged 37. He was the son of the preceding, a graduate of 1777; and was a judge of the common pleas and a member of congress. His four daughters married as follows:

Elizabeth married Charles Apthorp of Boston, and their daughter married Rev. Dr. Bushnell of Hartford; Abigail married Rev. Mr. Whelpley of New York; Mary Ann married Rev. Mr. Bruen of New York; and Frances married Rev. Dr. T. H. Skinner of New York.

DAVENPORT, ABRAHAM, colonel, died suddenly at Danbury, where he was attending a court as judge of the common pleas, in Nov., 1789, aged about 75. He was the son of Rev. John D. of Stamford: his mother was a daughter of Jabez Huntington of Windham. He was graduated in 1732, and lived at Stamford. A patriot of the Revolution, he was of stern integrity, and yet generous beneficence. In a time of scarcity and high prices he sold the produce of his farms to the poor at the old prices. He was an exemplary Christian. Being a member of the council at Hartford on the dark day, May 19, 1780, when it was proposed to adjourn, as some thought the day of judgment was at hand, he objected, saying, "That day is either at hand, or it is not: if it is not, there is no cause of adjournment; if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I wish, therefore, candles may be brought."

DAVENPORT, MARY, died in Brooklyn June 25, 1847, aged 92, an eminent Christian. She was the widow of John D., of Stamford, a member of congress, who died in 1830, aged 78. Her father was Rev. Noah Welles of Stamford.

DAVEZAC, AUGUSTE, chargé to Holland, died Feb. 15, 1851, aged about 74. Born in St. Domingo, he emigrated to North Carolina, and settled as a lawyer in New Orleans. In the war of 1812 he was aid to Gen. Jackson, by whom he was appointed secretary of legation to the Netherlands. He was also appointed to Holland.

DAVIDSON, WILLIAM, brigadier-general, a soldier of the Revolution, was born in 1746, the son of George D., who removed in 1750 from Pennsylvania to Rowan county, North Carolina. He was a major in one of the first regiments of North Carolina, and served in New Jersey. In Nov., 1779, he was detached to reinforce Lincoln at the South. On his march he visited his family, from which he had been absent nearly three years; such were the sacrifices of the heroes who fought for American liberty. In an action with a party of the loyalists near Calson's mill, at the West, a ball passed through his body near the kidneys; but from this wound he recovered in two months, and instantly rejoined the army, being appointed brigadier in the place of Rutherford, taken prisoner at Camden. Jan. 31, 1781, he was ordered by Greene to guard the ford of the Catawba, which Cornwallis might attempt to pass. In the action with the superior force of the enemy, Feb. 1, Gen. Davidson was shot through the breast and instantly fell dead. The British lieutenant-colonel Hall was also killed; and Cornwallis had a horse shot under him. Congress ordered a monument to his memory, not exceeding 500 dollars in value. He was a man of pleasing address, active and indefatigable, and devoted to the cause of his country.—Lee's Memoirs, i. 271, 397.

DAVIDSON, JAMES, professor of languages in the university of Pennsylvania, died June 28, 1809, aged 77. He published an introduction to the Latin, 1798.

DAVIDSON, LUCRETIA MARIA, a youthful poetess, died Aug. 27, 1825, aged nearly 17. She was born at Plattsburg, on lake Champlain, Sept. 27, 1808, being the second daughter of Dr. Oliver Davidson and Margaret his wife. Her parents being in straitened circumstances, much of her time was devoted to the cares of home; yet she read much, and wrote poetry at a very early age. When her productions were discovered by her mother in a dark closet, she in her sensitiveness and modesty burned them. Afterwards she wrote an epitaph upon a robin in her 9th year, which is the earliest remaining specimen of her verse. Before she was 12 years old, she had read much history, the dramatic works of Shakspeare, Kotzebue, and Goldsmith, together with popular novels and romances. She was frequently seen watching the storm, the clouds, the rainbow, the setting sun, for hours. At the age of 12, a gentleman, who was pleased with her verses, sent her a bank-bill for 20 dollars. She wished to buy books; but, her mother being at this time sick, she instantly carried the money to her father, saying, "Take it, father; it will buy many comforts for mother; I can do without the books." Knowing that some people had counselled her parents to deprive her of pen, ink, and paper, and confine her to domestic toils, she relinquished her books and her pen entirely for several months, though with tears; till her mother advised her to alternate her studies and the busyness of the world. She composed with great rapidity; yet her thoughts so outstripped her pen, that she often wished that she had two pair of hands, that she might employ them in writing. She was often, when walking, in danger from carriages, in consequence of her absence of mind. Often did she forget her meals. She had a burning thirst for knowledge. In Oct., 1824, a gentleman, on a visit to Plattsburg, saw some of her verses, and was made acquainted with her character and circumstances. He determined to give her the best education. On knowing his purpose, her joy was almost greater than she could bear. She was placed in Mrs. Willard's school at Troy; but her incessant application was perilous to her health. After returning home and recovering from illness, she was sent to Miss Gilbert's school at Albany. But soon she was again very ill. On her return, the hectic flush of her cheek indicated her approaching fate. She awaited the event with a reliance on the divine promises, hoping for salvation through the Lord Jesus Christ. The last name she pronounced was that of her patron. In her 15th year she wrote the following verses.

“TO A STAR.

“How calmly, brightly, dost thou shine,
Like the pure lamp in Virtue's shrine?
Sure, the fair world, which thou may'st boast,
Was never ransomed, never lost.
There, beings pure as Heaven's own air,
Their hopes, their joys together share;
While hovering angels touch the string,
And seraphs spread the sheltering wing.
There, cloudless days and brilliant nights,
Illumed by Heaven's refulgent lights,
There, seasons, years unnoticed roll,
And unregretted by the soul.
Thou little, sparkling Star of Even—
Thou gem upon an azure Heaven!
How swiftly will I soar to thee,
When this imprisoned soul is free!”

Her person was singularly beautiful. She had “a high, open forehead, a soft black eye, perfect symmetry of features, a fair complexion, and luxuriant dark hair. The prevailing expression of her face was melancholy.”

Her poetical writings, besides many which were burnt, amount to two hundred and seventy-eight pieces, among which were five poems of several cantos each. She also wrote some romances, and a tragedy. A biographical sketch, with a collection of her poems, was published by Mr. Samuel F. B. Morse, in 1829, with the title of “Amir Khan, and other Poems: the remains of L. M. Davidson.” Of this work a very interesting review, which may be imagined, by those conversant with his writings, to have come from the pen of Robert Southey, is contained in the London quarterly review for 1829. The writer says, “In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton and Kirke White, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement.” By the early death of a person of such growing power and unequalled promise we may well be taught the vanity of earthly hopes, and be led to estimate more highly and to seek more earnestly a lasting dwelling-place in the world of unclouded light, and perfect holiness, and purest joy. Her life by Miss Sedgwick has been published.

DAVIE, MARY, died at Newton, Mass., in 1752, aged 116 years. Her portrait, drawn by Smibert, is in the museum of the historical society. — Holmes.

DAVIE, WILLIAM RICHARDSON, brigadier-general, governor of North Carolina, died Nov. 8, 1820, aged 64. He was born at the village of Egremont, near White Haven, England, came to this country in 1763, and was graduated at Princeton college in 1776. He soon afterwards entered the army as an officer in the cavalry of Count Pulaski's legion. By his talents and zeal he soon rose to the rank of colonel. He fought at Stono, where he was severely wounded; at Hanging Rock and Rocky Mount. Having great strength and activity, it was his delight to lead a charge and to engage in personal conflict. At the period of Gates' defeat he expended the last shilling of an estate, bequeathed him by his uncle, Rev. Wm. Richardson, in equipping the legionary corps, which he commanded. Greene appointed him a commissary. During the whole struggle he displayed great zeal and energy. After the war he devoted himself to the profession of the law at Halifax, on the Roanoke, and rose to eminence. He was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, though his absence prevented his name from being affixed to it; and in the convention of North Carolina he was an able advocate for its acceptance. Through his efforts the university of North Carolina was established. In 1799 he was elected governor; but he was soon appointed by President Adams envoy to France, with Ellsworth and Murray. His residence after his return was at Tivoli, a beautiful estate on the Catawba river, in South Carolina. He died at Camden. His wife, Sarah, was the daughter of Gen. Allen Jones. Of a commanding figure, he was dignified in his manners, and distinguished for his patriotic spirit and soldierly qualities, for manly eloquence, and for the virtues of private life. — Lee, i. 381.

DAVIES, SAMUEL, president of Princeton college in New Jersey, died Feb. 4, 1761, aged 36. He was of Welsh descent, and born Nov. 3, 1724. His father was a planter in the county of Newcastle on the Delaware, of great simplicity of manners and reputed piety. He was an only son; a daughter was born five years before. His mother, an eminent Christian, had earnestly besought him of Heaven, and, believing him to be given in answer to prayer, she named him Samuel. This excellent woman took upon herself the task of teaching her son to read, as there was no school in the neighborhood; and her efforts were rewarded by the uncommon proficiency of her pupil. At the age of ten he was sent to a school at some distance from home, and continued in it two years. His mind was at this period very little impressed by religious truth, though he was not inattentive to secret prayer, especially in the evening; but it was not long before that God, to whom he had been dedicated, and who designed him for eminent service in the gospel of his Son, was pleased to enlighten and renew him. Perceiving himself to be a sinner, exposed to the awful displeasure of God, he was filled with anxiety and terror. In this distress he was enabled to discern the value of the salvation revealed in the gospel. This divine system of mercy now appeared in a new light. It satisfied his anxious inquiries, and made provision for all his wants. In the blood and righteousness of the Redeemer he found an un-failing source of consolation. His comforts, however, were long intermingled with doubts; but, after repeated and impartial self-examination, he attained a confidence respecting his state, which continued to the close of life. From this period his mind seemed almost entirely absorbed by heavenly things, and it was his great concern that every thought, word, and action should correspond with the divine law. Having tasted the joys and made a profession of religion at the age of fifteen, he became eagerly desirous of imparting to his fellow sinners the knowledge of the truth. With this object before him, he engaged with new ardor in literary and theological pursuits, under Samuel Blair. Every obstacle was surmounted; and, after the previous trials, which he passed with distinguished approbation, he was licensed to preach the gospel at the age of twenty-two. He was also ordained Feb. 19, 1747, that he might be qualified to perform pastoral duties.

He now applied himself to unfold and enforce those precious truths, whose power he had experienced on his own heart. His fervent zeal and undissembled piety, his popular talents and engaging methods of address, soon excited general admiration. At this time an uncommon regard to religion existed in Hanover county, Virginia, produced by the benevolent exertions of Mr. Morris, a layman. The event was so remarkable, and the Virginians in general were so ignorant of the true doctrines of the gospel, that the presbytery of Newcastle thought it incumbent upon them to send thither a faithful preacher. Mr. Davies was accordingly chosen. He went to Hanover in April, 1747, and soon obtained of the general court a license to officiate in four meeting-houses. After preaching assiduously for some time, and not without effect, he returned from Virginia, though earnestly invited to continue his labors. A call for him to settle at Hanover was immediately sent to the presbytery; but he was about this time seized by complaints which appeared consumptive, and which brought him to the borders of the grave. In this enfeebled state he determined to spend the remainder of his life in unremitting endeavors to advance the interests of religion. Being among a people who were destitute of a minister, his indisposition did not repress his exertions. He still preached in the day, while by night his hectic was so severe as sometimes to render him delirious. In the spring of 1748 a messenger from Hanover visited him, and he thought it his duty to accept the invitation of the people in that place. He hoped that he might live to organize the congregation. His health, however, gradually improved. In Oct., 1748, three more meeting-houses were licensed, and among his seven assemblies, which were in different counties, Hanover, Henrico, Caroline, Louisa, and Goochland, some of them forty miles distant from each other, he divided his labors. His home was in Hanover, about twelve miles from Richmond. His preaching encountered all the obstacles which could arise from blindness, prejudice, and bigotry, from profaneness and immorality. He, and those who attended upon his preaching, were denominated new lights by the more zealous Episcopalians. But by his patience and perseverance, his magnanimity and piety, in conjunction with his evangelical and powerful ministry, he triumphed over opposition. Contempt and aversion were gradually turned into reverence. Many were attracted by curiosity to hear a man of such distinguished talents, and he proclaimed to them the most solemn and impressive truths with an energy which they could not resist. It pleased God to accompany these exertions with the efficacy of his Spirit. In about three years Mr. Davies beheld three hundred communicants in his congregation, whom he considered as real Christians. He had also in this period baptized about forty adult negroes, who made such a profession of saving faith as he judged credible. He had a long controversy with the Episcopalians, who denied, while he maintained, that the "act of toleration" extended to Virginia. On this point he contended with the attorney-general, Peyton Randolph, and once addressed the court with great learning and eloquence. When he afterwards went to England, he obtained from Sir Dudley Rider, attorney-general, a declaration, that the act did extend to Virginia. In 1753 the synod of New York, by request of the trustees of New Jersey college, chose him to accompany Gilbert Tennent to Great Britain to solicit benefactions for the college. This service he cheerfully undertook, and he executed it with singular spirit and success. He arrived in London Dec. 25. He preached before the king by his command. As his majesty spoke aloud to some around him, remarking on the sermon, Dr. D. looked at him and repeated Amos III., 8, which silenced him; he afterward said of him, "An honest man, an honest man!" The liberal benefactions, obtained from the patrons of religion and learning, placed the college in a respectable condition. After his return to America he entered anew, in 1754 or early in 1755, on his beloved task of preaching the gospel in Hanover. Here he continued till 1759, when he was chosen president of the college, as successor of Mr. Edwards. He hesitated in his acceptance of the appointment, for his people were endeared to him, and he loved to be occupied in the various duties of the ministerial office. But repeated applications and the unanimous opinion of the synod of New York and Philadelphia at length determined him. He was dismissed May 13, and entered upon his new office July 6, 1759. Here the vigor and versatility of his genius were strikingly displayed. The ample opportunities and demands which he found for the exercise of his talents gave a new spring to his diligence; and, while his active labors were multiplied and arduous, his studies were intense. He left the college at his death in as high a state of literary excellence as it had ever known since its institution. In the short space of eighteen months he made some considerable improvements in the seminary, and was particularly happy in inspiring his pupils with a taste for writing and oratory, in which he himself so much excelled.

His habit of body being plethoric, the exercise of riding, to which he was much habituated in Virginia, was probably the means of preserving his health. At Princeton his life was sedentary, and his application to study incessant from morning till midnight. At the close of Jan., 1761, he was bled for a bad cold, and the next day transcribed for the press his sermon on the death of George II. The day following he preached twice in the chapel. His arm became inflamed, and a violent fever succeeded, to which he fell a victim in ten days. His new year's sermon, in the preceding month, was from the text, "This year thou shalt die," as was also President's Burr's on the first day of the year in which he died. Dr. Witherspoon avoided preaching on that occasion from that text. President Davies was succeeded by Dr. Finley. His venerable mother, Martha Davies, survived him. When he was laid in the coffin, she gazed at him a few minutes, and said, "There is the son of my prayers and my hopes — my only son — my only earthly support. But there is the will of God, and I am satisfied." She afterwards lived in the family of her son's friend, Rev. Dr. Rodgers of New York, till her death. His widow, Jean Davies, returned to her friends in Virginia. His son, Col. William Davies, now deceased, studied law and settled at Norfolk; was an officer of merit in the Revolution; and enjoyed in a high degree the esteem of Washington. His son, John Rodgers Davies, also studied law, and settled in Sussex, Va. Samuel Davies, the third son, died at Petersburg. An only daughter, unmarried, was living in 1822.

The Father of Spirits had endowed Mr. Davies with the richest intellectual gifts; with a vigorous understanding, a glowing imagination, a fertile invention, united with a correct judgment, and a retentive memory. He was bold and enterprising, and destined to excel in whatever he undertook. Yet was he divested of the pride of talents and of science, and, being moulded into the temper of the gospel, he consecrated all his powers to the promotion of religion. "O, my dear brother," says he in a letter to his friend, Dr.

Gibbons, "could we spend our lives in painful, disinterested, indefatigable service for God and the world, how serene and bright would it render the swift approaching eve of life! I am laboring to do a little to save my country, and, which is of much more consequence, to save souls from death; from that tremendous kind of death which a soul can die. I have but little success, of late; but, blessed be God, it surpasses my expectation, and much more my desert." His religion was purely evangelical. It brought him to the foot of the cross to receive salvation as a free gift. It rendered him humble and dissatisfied with himself amidst his highest attainments. While he contended earnestly for the great and distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, he did not attach any undue importance to points respecting which Christians may differ. It was the power of religion, and not any particular form, that he was desirous of promoting, and real worth ever engaged his esteem and affection. Having sought the truth with diligence, he avowed his sentiments with the greatest simplicity and courage. Though decided in his conduct, he was yet remarkable for the gentleness and suavity of his disposition. A friend, who was very intimate with him for a number of years, never observed him once angry during that period. His ardent benevolence rendered him the delight of his friends and the admiration of all who knew him. In his generous eagerness to supply the wants of the poor he often exceeded his ability. As a parent he felt all the solicitude which nature and grace could inspire. "There is nothing," he writes, "that can wound a parent's heart so deeply, as the thought, that he should bring up children to dishonor his God here, and be miserable hereafter. I beg your prayers for mine, and you may expect a return in the same kind. We have now three sons and two daughters. My dear little creatures sob and drop a tear now and then, under my instructions; but I am not so happy as to see them under deep and lasting impressions of religion; and this is the greatest grief they afford me." As president of the college he possessed an admirable mode of government and instruction. He watched over his pupils with the tender solicitude of a father, and secured equally their reverence and love. He seized every opportunity to inculcate on them the worth of their souls, and the pressing necessity of securing immediately the blessings of salvation.

Dr. Davies was a model of the most striking oratory. It is probable, that the eloquent spirit of Patrick Henry, who lived in his neighborhood from his eleventh to his twenty-second year, was kindled by listening to his impassioned addresses; such as his patriotic sermons of July 20, 1755, after the defeat of Braddock; and of August, on religion and patriotism the constituents of a good soldier; in a note to which, he says: "I may point out to the public that heroic youth, Col. Washington, whom I cannot but hope Providence has hitherto preserved, in so signal a manner, for some important service to his country." A similar sermon was preached to the militia May 8, 1759, a few days before he left his people, in order to raise a company for Capt. Meredith. It was raised on the spot. When he went to the tavern to order his horse, the whole regiment followed, and from the porch he again addressed them, till he was exhausted. As his personal appearance was august and venerable, yet benevolent and mild, he could address his auditory either with the most commanding authority, or with the most melting tenderness. When he spoke, he seemed to have the glories and terrors of the unseen world in his eye. He seldom preached without producing some visible emotions in great numbers present, and without making an impression on one or more, which was never effaced. His favorite themes were the utter depravity and impotence of man; the sovereignty and free grace of Jehovah; the divinity of Christ; the atonement in his blood; justification through his righteousness; and regeneration and sanctification by the Holy Spirit. He viewed these doctrines as constituting the essence of the Christian scheme, and he considered those, who attempted to subvert and explain them away, as equally hostile to the truth of God and the best interests of men. His printed sermons, which exhibit his sentiments, abound with striking thoughts, with the beauties and elegancies of expression, and with the richest imagery. His highly ornamented style is the more pardonable, as he was by nature a poet, and forms of expression were familiar to him, which to others may seem unnatural and affected.

He published a sermon on man's primitive state, 1748; the state of religion among the protestant dissenters of Virginia, in a letter to Joseph Bellamy, 1751; religion and patriotism the constituents of a good soldier, a sermon before a company of volunteers, 1755; Virginia's danger and remedy, two discourses occasioned by the severe drought, and the defeat of Gen. Braddock, 1756; curse of cowardice, a sermon before the militia of Virginia, 1757; letters from 1751 to 1757, showing the state of religion in Virginia, particularly among the negroes; the vessels of mercy and the vessels of wrath; little children invited to Jesus Christ, 1758; sixth edit. has an account of a revival at Princeton college; valedictory address to the senior class, 1760; a sermon on the death of George II., 1761; sermons on the most useful and important subjects, 3 vols. 8vo., 1765; which have passed through a number of editions; the third in 5 vols. 1772-4; and sermons, 2 vols. 8vo.—Preface to his Sermons; Finley's and Gibbon's

DAVISS, JOSEPH HAMILTON, colonel, attorney of the United States for Kentucky, volunteered in the expedition against the savages in 1811, and fell Nov. 7th, as did also Col. Owen, in the battle of Tippecanoe, in which Gen. Harrison defeated the Indians. When they suddenly attacked the American encampment at four o'clock in the morning, Col. Daviess asked permission to charge the enemy, and, making the charge with only sixteen dragoons, he was killed. Though it was yet dark, his white blanket coat enabled the savages to distinguish him. He was a man of talents, honored in his profession, and beloved in social life. His wife was Nancy, the sister of chief justice Marshall. He published in 1807 a view of the president's conduct concerning the conspiracy of 1806.—Schoolcraft's Trav., 1821, p. 135.

DAVIS, SYLVANUS, captain, an early settler of Falmouth, or Portland, Me., died in Boston in 1703. He purchased land of the Indians at Damariscotta, June, 1659, also other tracts. For some time he resided at Sheepscott. In Aug., 1676, when the Indians captured the fort on Arosic island, he fled and crossed to the west side of the Kennebec in a boat with Capt. Lake. Lake was shot and killed as he landed, while Davis escaped with a severe wound. Early in 1677 he accompanied the expedition under Maj. Waldron, and was left by him with forty men in command of a fort on Arosic island; but the garrison was soon recalled. He became an inhabitant of Falmouth, where he owned land in 1680. In 1686 the ferry was granted to him at Nonsuch point, near Vaughan's bridge. Early in 1690, he took the command of fort Loyal in Falmouth, in which he was besieged, May 16th, by four or five hundred French and Indians. He fought the enemy five days, and then was obliged to surrender, May 20, after requiring Portneuf, the French leader, to lift up his hand and swear by the great God to protect all in the fort and allow them to march to the next English town; but the treacherous commander forgot his oath, and conducted the prisoners to Canada, being twenty-four days on the road. After remaining four months in Quebec he was exchanged. He was named a councillor in 1691, in the charter of William and Mary; and Gov. Phipps appointed him to the same office in 1692.—Maine Hist. Coll. I. 168, 203, 209.

DAVIS, R., published hymns on various subjects, Boston, 6th edit., 1741.

DAVIS, JOHN A. G., professor of law in the university of Va., was shot by a student and died Nov. 14, 1840, aged 39. He had been ten years in office; and was amiable, industrious, of high intelligence, a member of the Episcopal church. He published a treatise on criminal law, and a guide to justices of the peace, 1838.

DAVIS, DANIEL, died at Barnstable April 28, 1799, aged 85. Born in B., he was judge of probate, and of the common pleas. Of excellent temper and character, a pillar of the church, he left the world blessing those around him, and expressing the assured hope of everlasting glory. Mr. Mellen's sermon on his death was published.

DAVIS, RICHARD B., died at his father's in New Brunswick in 1799, aged 28, of the yellow fever, taken in New York. In 1796 he edited "The Diary." His poems with a sketch of his life were published in 1807.

DAVIS, AUGUSTINE, postmaster at Richmond, Va., died in that city in 1825. He was the oldest editor and printer of Virginia. For many years he conducted the Virginia Gazette. A zealous politician, he differed from the dominant party in Virginia.

DAVIS, JOHN, LL. D., judge, died in Boston Jan. 14, 1847, aged nearly 86; a graduate of 1781. Born in Plymouth, his father was Thomas Davis, a merchant; his mother, Mercy Hedge, a descendant of Bradford and Brewster. After being a teacher in the family of Gen. Joseph Otis, of Barnstable, he studied law and settled in Plymouth. In 1795 Washington appointed him comptroller of the treasury of the United States, which office after one year he resigned. Being next appointed United States attorney, he removed to Boston. In 1801 he became judge of the district court, and served for forty years, resigning at the age of eighty. He was a learned man in various departments, but he had a special relish for the history and antiquities of New England. His labors for the historical society, of which he was the president, were very important. He published an address to Massachusetts charitable society, 1799; eulogy on Washington, 1800; discourse before the historical society, in Mass. historical collections, 2d series, vol. I.; Morton's memorial, with notes, 1826. A memoir of him, by Dr. C. Francis, is in historical collections, 3d series, vol. x.

DAVIS, MATTHEW L., died in Manhattanville June 21, 1850, aged 84, a printer and a man of cultivated mind. He wrote the spy in Washington for the New York Courier, and memoirs of the life of Aaron Burr.

DAVIS, HENRY, D. D., president of two colleges, died in Clinton, N. Y., March 7, 1852, aged about 78. Born in East Hampton, New York, he graduated at Yale in 1796, and was tutor in Williams and Yale seven years. From 1805 to 1810, he was professor of Greek at Union college; then president of Middlebury until 1817, when he was chosen president of Hamilton, in which office he continued until 1833. He published inaugural oration, 1810; sermon before American board of missions, 1816.

DAVIS, HANNAH, died at Clinton, N. Y., April 16, 1856, aged 85, the widow of President H. Davis. She was the daughter of Thomas Treadwell of Smithtown, L. I., who removed to New York, — a man of worth. She married in 1801, her husband being then a teacher in Yale college. With him she lived in New Haven, and also at Schenectady, Middlebury, and Clinton. At the last place she was the president of the female missionary society of western New York. Her education, temper, talents, and character made her useful wherever she lived. Her end was peace, her hope being "in the precious blood of Christ."

DAVIS, ISAAC P., died in Boston Jan. 13, 1855, aged 83; brother of Judge John D. His mind was filled with historical and antiquarian lore; and he was a member of various societies. To him, as his friend, Daniel Webster dedicated the 2d vol. of his works.

DAVIS, JOHN, governor, died in Worcester April 19, 1854, aged 67, sick only a few hours of the bilious colic. He graduated at Yale in 1812; was many years in Congress, first chosen in 1825; was chosen governor by the national republicans of the legislature in 1833, and by the people in 1834, and in other years; and he was also a senator of the United States, at different periods from 1845 to 1853. He published an obituary of C. C. Baldwin, in Arch. Americana, II.

DAVY, JOHN, died in Hampshire county, Va., Jan., 1839, aged 103. He came to America with Gen. Wolfe, and was in the battle of Quebec, and served also in the war of the Revolution.

DAWES, THOMAS, judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, died July 22, 1825, aged 68. He was the son of Thomas Dawes, eminent as an architect, long a member of the senate and council and deacon of the old south church, Boston, who died Jan. 2, 1809, aged 77. He was born in 1757, and graduated at Harvard college in 1777. In the Revolutionary war he espoused with zeal the cause of his country. After a successful course of practice at the bar, he was appointed judge of the supreme court in 1792, but resigned in 1802, and was made judge of probate for Suffolk. On the decease of Judge Minot he also received in 1802 the appointment of judge of the municipal court of Boston, which he held twenty years. The office of judge of probate he retained till his death. He was an impartial, faithful, humane magistrate. In early life he wrote a few pieces of poetry. He published an oration on the Boston massacre, 1781; oration July 4th, 1787.

DAWSON, MARTIN, died in May, 1835, in Albemarle county, Va., aged 55. By his will he set free sixty slaves, and removed them to Liberia; and he also gave 40,000 dollars for schools in Virginia.

DAWSON, WILLIAM C., governor of Georgia, died at Greensborough in May, 1856. He had been a senator of the United States.

DAY, STEPHEN, the first printer in New England, died at Cambridge Dec. 22, 1668, aged 57. He came to this country in 1638, or early in 1639, for he commenced printing at Cambridge, by direction of the magistrates and elders, in March, 1639. Day was employed by Mr. Glover, who died on his passage. The first thing printed was the freeman's oath; next an almanac, made by Wm. Pierce, mariner; then the psalms, "newly turned into metre." He was unskilled in the art of the compositor, and was an ignorant printer. The printing-house about 1648 was taken from him and put into the hands of Sam. Green. Mr. Farmer, who once had in his possession an almanac of 1647, with the imprint of Matthew Day, regards Matthew as the first printer; but Mr. Thomas quotes from the colony records, which in 1641 speak of "Steeven Day — the first that set upon printing." Matthew was admitted freeman in 1646. The oath and almanac were printed in 1639; the psalms in 1640. Almanacs in subsequent years, some of them by S. Danforth, were printed. Mr. Day also printed a catechism; body of liberties, one hundred laws, 1641; the psalms, 2d edition, 1647; they were afterwards improved by Dunster. — Thomas, i. 227-234.

DAY, ROBERT, of Hartford, died in 1648, aged 44. He was the ancestor of descendants, two thousand four hundred in number of persons in the male line, bearing the name of Day, and whose names have been published in a register edited by Rev. George E. Day, Northampton, 1848. It is supposed the family lived in Wales, where the name is Dec, pronounced Day, probably taken from the river Dec, the word signifying dark, not light. He was about 30 years old, when he arrived with his wife Mary in April, 1634, in the bark Elizabeth, and lived at Cambridge. The next year, or soon after, he removed to Hartford. His second wife was Editha Stebbins. He had two sons: Thomas, the ancestor of the Springfield branch, and John of the Hartford; and two daughters, Sarah, who married S. Kellogg of Hatfield, and was slain by the Indians Sept. 19, 1677, and Mary, who married S. Ely of Springfield, then T. Stebbins, and next John Coleman of Hatfield. His widow married J. Maynard, and then Elizur Holyoke of Springfield. Besides Robert, there were seven others of the name of Day, who lived in New England, within thirty years after its first settlement. Of the sons of Robert, Thomas is regarded as the head of the Springfield branch, and John of the Hartford.

DAY, THOMAS, son of Robert, the first of the Springfield branch, died Dec. 27, 1711. He was probably about 80 years old, as he was married to Sarah Cooper fifty-two years before.

DAY, JOHN, son of Robert, the first of the Hartford branch of Days, died in 1730, aged probably about 80. His wife was Sarah Maynard.

DAY, DAVID, a descendant of Robert, died in Colchester, Conn., Sept. 5, 1775, aged 76. He left a large estate for the support of the gospel in Colchester, and in Hartland and Rumney, N. H., and for a high school in C.

DAY, JEREMIAH, minister of New Preston, in Washington, Conn., died Sept. 12, 1806, aged 69. He was born in Colchester, the son of Thomas, a descendant of Robert. He graduated in 1756. He was the father of President Day. — Evangelical Magazine, vii. p. 217.

DAY, ASA, a useful teacher, died in 1819, aged 58. He was the descendant of John. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1783, he taught school in Pittsfield, for some years, then settled in Stockbridge, Mass., where he died.

DAY, ORIN, a descendant of Robert, died at Catskill Dec. 26, 1846, aged 70: a Christian, and a respected and useful citizen. He was a merchant and banker. Of the bible, tract, education, and American home missionary societies, he was one of the founders. He encouraged also the cause of temperance. — N. Y. Observer, Jan.

DAY, THOMAS, LL. D., son of Rev. Jeremiah D., died in Hartford March 1, 1855, aged 77. He was a graduate of 1797. For twenty-five years from 1810 he was secretary of State; he was also judge of the county court. He was a reporter from 1814 till 1853, preparing and publishing twenty-six volumes of reports, besides a digest. He edited also several English law-books; in all sixty volumes. He was president of the Conn., historical society, and of the Wadsworth æneum. His brother, Col. Noble Day, died in Hudson, Ohio, Feb. 13, 1855, aged 75.

DAYTON, ELIAS, major-general of the militia of New Jersey, at the commencement of the American Revolution, though in the enjoyment of every domestic blessing, took an active part, and never quitted the tented field till the consummation of independence. In Feb., 1778, congress appointed him colonel. He died at Philadelphia in July, 1807, aged 70. He was open, generous, and sincere; ardent in his friendships; scrupulously upright; in manners easy, unassuming, and pleasant; prompt and diffusive in his charities; and also a warm supporter of the gospel. At the time of his death he held the office of major-general. — Brown's American Register, ii. 76.

DAYTON, ELIAS B., brigadier-general, died at Elizabethtown, N. J., Jan. 17, 1846, aged 82, a much respected citizen. He might have descended from Ralph D., of Easthampton, L. I., in 1650.

DAYTON, JONATHAN, LL. D., a distinguished statesman of New Jersey, died at Elizabethtown Oct. 9, 1824, aged about 68. He was the son of Gen. Elias; graduated at Princeton in 1776, and was a member of the convention in 1787, and speaker of the house of representatives of the United States in 1797. As a member of the senate he opposed the repeal of the judiciary act in 1802. He was in the house from 1790 to 1799, and a senator from 1799 to 1805. William Lewis Dayton, one of the candidates for the vice-presidency of the United States in 1856, was his nephew, the son of Joel.

DEAN, BARZILLAI, captain, died at Easton in a remarkable manner June 29, 1848. He had erected a new tomb for himself and family, and at its completion, as he entered it to examine it, the roof fell and crushed him to death.

DEAN, JAMES, LL. D., died at Burlington Jan. 20, 1849, aged 73; professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Vermont university. He was a graduate of Dartmouth in 1800.

DEANE, SILAS, minister of the United States to the court of France, died Aug. 23, 1789. He was a native of Groton, Conn., and was graduated at Yale college in 1758. He was a member of the first congress, which met in 1774. In 1776, he was deputed to France as a political and commercial agent, and he arrived at Paris in June with instructions to sound the disposition of the cabinet on the controversy with Great Britain, and to endeavor to obtain supplies of military stores. In Sept., it was agreed to appoint ministers to negotiate treaties with foreign powers, and Dr. Franklin and Mr. Jefferson were elected to join Mr. Deane in France. But Mr. Jefferson declining the appointment, Arthur Lee, then in London, was chosen in his place. It is remarkable, that the delegates of Connecticut did not vote for Mr. Deane. In Dec., the three commissioners met at Paris. Though Mr. Deane assisted in negotiating the treaty with his most Christian majesty, yet he had very little to recommend him to the high station in which he was placed. He was instructed to engage not exceeding four engineers, and he was most profuse in his promises of offices of rank to induce French gentlemen to come to America. Congress, being embarrassed by his contracts, was under the necessity of recalling him Nov. 21, 1777, and John Adams was appointed in his place. He left Paris April 1, 1778. After his arrival in this country, he was desired to give an account of his transactions on the floor of congress, but he did not remove all suspicions of having misapplied the public monies. He evaded the scrutiny by pleading that his papers were in Europe. To divert the public attention from himself, he in Dec. published a manifesto, in which he arraigned before the bar of the public, the conduct, not only of those concerned in foreign negotiations, but of the members of congress themselves. In 1784, he published an address to the citizens of the United States, complaining of the manner in which he had been treated. He went soon afterwards to Europe, and at last, reduced to extreme poverty, died in a miserable condition at Deal, in England. His intercepted letters to his brothers and others were published in 1782. — Warren's American Rev., II. 130–137; Marshall, III. 155, 411; IV. 5; Gordon, III. 216.

DEANE, SAMUEL, D. D., minister of Portland, Me., was graduated at Harvard college in 1760, and was ordained a colleague with Thomas Smith, the first minister, Oct. 17, 1764. After preaching forty-five years, he received as a colleague Ichabod Nichols, in June, 1809. He died Nov. 12, 1814, aged about 73. He published election sermon, 1794; sermon on the death of T. Smith, 1795; at thanksgiving; New England farmer, or Geographical dictionary, 2d edition, 8vo. 1797.

DEANE, SAMUEL, minister of Scituate, died in 1834, aged 56. He was a graduate of Brown, in 1795. He published a discourse on Christian liberty, 1825; the populous village, a poem, 1826; on human nature, 1827; a history of Scituate, in 1831.

DEANE, CHRISTOPHER C., died at Charlestown June 17, 1854. He had been for twenty years treasurer and agent of the Massachusetts Sabbath school society.

DEARBORN, HENRY, major-general, a soldier of the Revolution, died June 6, 1829, aged 78. He was a descendant of Godfrey D., who came from Exeter, England, with his son Henry, and settled at Exeter, N. H., in 1639, but afterwards removed to Hampton, where many descendants still live. In this town Gen. Dearborn was born in March, 1751. He studied physic with Dr. Hall Jackson of Portsmouth, and had been settled three years at Nottingham-square, when, on the 20th of April, 1775, an express announced the battle of Lexington on the preceding day. He marched on the same day with sixty volunteers, and early in the next day reached Cambridge, a distance of sixty-five miles. On his return he was appointed a captain in the regiment of Stark; and, having enlisted his men, he presented himself again at Cambridge with a full company, May 15th. He participated June 17th in the battle of Breed's hill. Having marched on that day across Charlestown neck under a galling fire, he took post behind the rail fence which stretched from Prescott's redoubt to Mystic river. During the bloody action he regularly fired with his men. In Sept. he accompanied Arnold in the expedition through the wilderness of Maine to Quebec. The army was more than a month in the wilderness, before they reached, Nov. 4th, the first house in Canada, on the Chaudiere. The hardships and sufferings of the troops were incredible. The provisions were exhausted. "My dog," said Gen. D., in a letter to the author of this work, "was very large and a great favorite. I gave him up to several men of Capt. Goodrich's company at their earnest solicitation. They carried him to their company and killed and divided him among those who were suffering most severely with hunger. They ate every part of him, not excepting his entrails; and after finishing their meal they collected the bones and carried them to be pounded up, and to make broth for another meal. There was but one other dog with the detachment. It was small, and had been privately killed and eaten. Old mooschide breeches were boiled and then broiled on the coals and eaten. A barber's powder-bag made a soup in the course of the last three or four days before we reached the first settlements in Canada. Many men died with fatigue and hunger, frequently four or five minutes after making their last effort and sitting down." Being seized with a fever, he was left in a cottage on the banks of the Chaudiere without a physician. During ten days his life was despaired of. A good Catholic woman even sprinkled him with holy water. Yet he gradually recovered; and, procuring a conveyance sixty miles to point Levi, he crossed over to Wolfe's cove, and rejoined his company early in Dec. The assault on the city was made in the morning of Dec. 31st. Montgomery fell on the bank of the St. Lawrence, in attacking the lower town on that side. Arnold's division made the attack on the other side of the city, along the St. Charles. In the action Capt. Dearborn, who had been quartered on the north side of the river St. Charles, marched to join the main body, but in the attempt was captured with his company by Capt. Law, who issued from Palacc gate with two hundred men and some cannon. He was put into close confinement; but in May, 1776, was permitted to return on parole with Maj. Meigs. They were carried to Halifax in the frigate Niger, and then transferred to another frigate, which after a cruise of thirty days landed them at Penobscot bay. In March, 1777, he was exchanged. Being appointed a major in Scammel's regiment, he proceeded in May to Ticonderoga. He fought in the conflict of Sept. 19th, and on the 7th Oct. he shared in the honor of carrying the German fortified camp. On the 17th the British army surrendered. Gen. Gates in his dispatch particularly noticed Morgan and Dearborn. At the battle of Monmouth, in 1778, after Lee's retreat, Washington ordered Cilley's regiment, in which Dearborn was lieutenant-col., to attack a body of the enemy. A gallant charge comelled the British to retreat. Dearborn being sent to ask for further orders, Washington inquired, by way of commendation, "What troops are those?"—"Full-blooded Yankees from New Hampshire, sir," was the reply.

In 1779 he accompanied Sullivan in his expedition against the Indians; in 1780 he was with the army in New Jersey; in 1781 he was at Yorktown at the surrender of Cornwallis. On the death of Scammel he succeeded to the command of the regiment. During 1782 he was on garrison duty at the frontier post at Saratoga. After the peace, he emigrated, in June, 1784, to the banks of the Kennebec, and engaged in agricultural pursuits. In 1789 Washington appointed him marshal of Maine. Twice he was elected a member of congress. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency, in 1801, he was appointed secretary of war, as the successor of Roger Griswold; and the laborious duties of the office he faithfully discharged for eight years, till 1809, when he was succeeded by Wm. Eustis, and was appointed to the lucrative office of collector of Boston. In Feb., 1812, he received a commission as senior major-general in the army of the United States. In the spring of the next year he captured York, in Upper Canada, April 27th, and soon afterwards fort George, at the mouth of the Niagara. But, his health being somewhat impaired, Mr. Madison was induced, very unnecessarily, to recall him July 6, 1813, on the ground of ill health. A court of inquiry was immediately solicited, but not granted. He was soon ordered to assume the command of the military district of New York city. After the peace of 1815 he retired to private life. In July, 1822, he sailed from Boston for Lisbon, having been appointed by President Monroe the minister plenipotentiary to Portugal. After two years he solicited permission to return home. Though he usually resided at Boston, he annually repaired to the scene of his agricultural labors in Maine. In 1829 an imprudent exposure brought on a violent bilious attack, which caused some fatal organic disarrangements. During the agonies of his last illness he never complained; he trusted in the mercy of the Supreme Intelligence. He died at the residence of his son, Gen. H. A. S. Dearborn, in Roxbury. He was thrice married. His last wife, the widow of James Bowdoin, died in May, 1826. Gen. Dearborn was large and manly in his person, of great frankness and unimpeached integrity, and, as a commanding officer, notwithstanding his recall from the frontier, he had the confidence and the warm attachment of the brave officers and men who served under him. He published an account of Bunker Hill battle.

DEARBORN, BENJAMIN, inventor of the patent balance, died at Boston Feb. 22, 1838, aged 82. He was a man of science, and much respected. His father was Dr. Benj. D., of Portsmouth, who died in 1755. His mother was Ruth, daughter of Rev. Benjamin Rogers, of P.

DEARBORN, EDWARD, Dr., died at Scabrook, N. H., March 6, 1851, aged 75, bequeathing 3,000 dollars for a female seminary, and 4,000 for the Congregational society.

DEARBORN, HENRY A. S., general, died in Portland July 29, 1851, aged 67. The son of Gen. Henry S., he was born in Exeter, and educated in Virginia. He practised law in Salem and Portland. Mr. Madison appointed him collector of Boston, as successor of his father; he was also adjutant-general, a member of congress, and mayor of Roxbury, which office he held till his death. He published an oration July 4, 1811; address to horticultural society, 1823; a life of Eliot; three volumes on the Black Sea; a biography of Commodore Bainbridge, also of his own father. He left a volume of his writings on architecture, another on flowers, and one for his wife, on Christ, with the passages of Scripture relating to him quoted and harmonized.

DEARBORN, NATHANIEL, died at South Reading, Nov. 7, 1852, aged 66, son of Benjamin D. He was one of the first to introduce wood engravings. He published text-book of letters; book of Boston notions and guide; guide to Mount Auburn.

DE BRAHM, WILLIAM G., surveyor-general of the southern district of North America in 1765, published the Atlantic pilot.

DECATUR, STEPHEN, commodore, died March 22, 1820, aged 40, being killed in a duel with Commodore Barron. He was born on the eastern shore of Maryland. His grandfather, a native of France, married a lady of Newport, R. I., where he resided. His father, Stephen Decatur, after the establishment of the navy, was appointed to command the Delaware sloop-of-war, and afterwards the frigate Philadelphia. On the occurrence of peace with France he resigned his commission, and died at Frankford, near Philadelphia, Nov. 14, 1808, aged 57. The son, Stephen, was educated in that city. In March, 1798, at the age of nineteen, he entered as midshipman the American navy under Barry. Thrice he proceeded to the Mediterranean under Commodores Dale, Morris, and Preble. He arrived the third time just after the frigate Philadelphia, which had run aground on the Barbary coast, had fallen into the hands of the Tripolitans. He immediately formed the project of recapturing or destroying her, and, having obtained the consent of Com. Preble, he sailed for Syracuse Feb. 3, 1804, in the ketch Intrepid, with seventy volunteers, accompanied by the United States brig Syren, Lieut. Stewart. In a few days he arrived at the harbor of Tripoli, which he entered about eight o'clock in the evening, alone, as he was unwilling to wait for the boats of the Syren, which was several miles distant. The enterprise was extremely hazardous, for the Philadelphia was moored within half-gunshot of the bashaw's castle, and of the principal battery. Two cruisers and several gun-boats lay near, and the guns of the frigate were mounted and loaded. The attack was to be made by a single ketch. About eleven o'clock he approached within two hundred yards, when he was hailed and ordered to anchor. He directed a Maltese pilot to answer that the anchors had been lost in a gale of wind. His object was not suspected, until he was almost alongside the frigate, when the Turks were thrown into the utmost confusion. Decatur sprang aboard, followed by midshipman Charles Morris, and they were nearly a minute on deck before their companions could join them, the enemy in the mean while not offering to assail them, being crowded together in astonishment on the quarter-deck. The Turks were soon assaulted and overpowered. About twenty men were killed on the spot; many jumped overboard, and the rest were driven to the hold. After setting fire to the ship in different parts, Decatur retreated to his ketch, and, a breeze springing up, he soon got beyond the reach of the enemy's guns, which had opened a fire upon him from the batteries, and castle, and two corsairs. In this daring exploit not a single man was killed, and only four were wounded. For this achievement he was immediately promoted to the rank of post captain.

At an attack on Tripoli, Aug. 3d, he commanded a division of gun-boats, which he led to action, covered by the frigate Constitution and some smaller vessels. Disregarding the fire of the batteries, he with twenty-seven men boarded one of the enemy's gun-boats, which contained forty men; and, in ten minutes, with but three wounded, he cleared the deck and made it a prize. At this moment he was informed that his brother, Lieut. James Decatur, who commanded another boat, had captured a boat of the enemy, but was treacherously shot by her commander, who immediately pushed off, and was then stretching toward the harbor. Decatur instantly pursued him, entering the enemy's line with his single boat, and, overtaking the foe, boarded her with eleven men, being all the Americans he had left. He singled out the Turkish commander, who was armed with a spear, in attempting to cut off the head of which he struck the iron and broke his sword close to the hilt. The Turk now making a push, and wounding him slightly, he seized the spear and closed with him. In the struggle both fell. Decatur, being uppermost, caught the arm of the Turk, who was on the point of stabbing him with a dagger, and with a pocket pistol shot him. The crews at the same time were fighting around them, and it was with difficulty that, after killing his adversary, he could extricate himself from the slain and wounded. His life in this struggle with the Turk was preserved by a noble-minded common sailor, who, when a blow was aimed at his captain from behind with an uplifted sabre, having lost the use of his hands, rushed forward and received the blow on his own head, by which his skull was fractured. He however survived, and received a pension from government. Decatur returned to the squadron with both of his prizes, and the next day received the highest commendation in a general order from Commodore Preble. After a peace was concluded with Tripoli he returned home in the Congress and after his return was employed in superintending gun-boats, until he was ordered to supersede Commodore Barron in the command of the Chesapeake frigate. He afterwards was removed to the United States, in which ship, Oct. 25, 1812, in lat. 29° N., long. 29° 30' W., he fell in with his Britannic majesty's ship Macedonian, one of the finest frigates in the British navy, which he captured after an action of an hour and a half. His loss was four killed and seven wounded; that of the enemy thirty-six killed and sixty-eight wounded. When Capt. Carden came on board the United States and presented his sword, Decatur observed, that he could not think of taking the sword of so brave an officer, but would be happy to take him by the hand. The prize was safely brought into Newport by Lieut. W. H. Allen, and the command of her given to Capt. Jones.

In May, 1813, in command of the United States, with his prize, the Macedonian, refitted as an American frigate, he attempted to get to sea, but was compelled to enter the harbor of New London, where, for a long time, the enemy closely blockaded him. In Jan., 1815, he was appointed to the command of the President, and attempted to get to sea, but, after first fighting the Endymion, was captured on the 15th by the Pomone, and Tenedos, and Majestic, and carried into Bermuda. He returned to New London Feb. 22d. Being soon dispatched with a squadron to the Mediterranean, he captured, off Cape de Gatt, an Algerine frigate of forty-nine guns, in which the celebrated admiral, Rais Hammda, was killed; and on the 19th an Algerine brig of twenty-two guns. He arrived before Algiers June 28, and the next day compelled the proud regency to a treaty most honorable to our country, according to which no tribute was ever again demanded of the United States; all enslaved Americans were to be released without ransom, and no American should ever again be held as a slave. These terms shamed the great powers of Europe, who had long been tributary to a band of corsairs. He proceeded also to Tunis and Tripoli, and obtained redress for outrages. After his return, Nov. 12th, he was appointed one of the board of navy commissioners, and resided at Washington, at the former seat of Joel Barlow, called Kalorama. During a part of the year 1819 he had a long correspondence with Commodore Barron, who some years before had been punished for yielding up the Chesapeake, by a court martial, of which Decatur was a member. The correspondence issued in a challenge from Barron, though he considered duelling "as a barbarous practice, which ought to be exploded from civilized society;" and the challenge was accepted by Decatur, though he "had long since discovered that fighting duels is not even an unerring criterion of personal courage." He was persuaded that it was the intention of Barron "to fight up his character." They fought at Bladensburgh, and at the first fire he was mortally wounded, and, being conveyed to his home, and to his distracted wife, died the same night. His wife, whom he married in 1806, was Susan, daughter of Luke Wheeler, mayor of Norfolk. Thus the brave officer died, "as a fool dieth." It has been stated, that, before he died, he renounced the principle of duelling, and cast himself upon the mercy of God. He was murdered under the eyes of congress, which, in consequence of his having "died in the violation of the laws of God and his country," refused to bestow the official marks of respect customary on the decease at Washington of men in high public stations. Yet, with strange inconsistency, notwithstanding the laws of the country, his murderer afterwards received some appointment from the government. — Analect. Mag. i. 502; American Naval Biography, 75-93.

DEEMS, ADAN, died at Parkersburg, Va., Sept. 21, 1856, aged 102 years.

DE FOREST, BENJAMIN, died in New York Sept. 27, 1850. He was of Huguenot descent, an eminent merchant for fifty years. His temper was equable, his death peaceful.

DE GERSTNER, FRANCIS A. C., died at Philadelphia April 12, 1846, aged 44, a distinguished Austrian engineer. He was born at Prague April 17, 1796, and was for six years professor of practical geometry at Vienna. He obtained a charter for the first railroad on the continent, from Budweis to Lintz, one hundred and thirty miles long, completed in 1832. In 1834 he proposed to the Russian emperor a railroad from St. Petersburg to Moscow. Having visited various countries, he came to the United States in 1838, examining our railroads. He wrote a piece on American and Belgian railroads in the American almanac, 1840. He published practical mechanics, 3 vols.

DEGRAND, PETER P. F., a broker, died in Boston Dec. 23, 1855, aged about 75. A native of Marseilles, in order to escape conscription in the army he came to Boston in 1803. He commenced business as a merchant in 1809. From 1819 to 1830 he published a useful commercial paper, the Weekly Report. In 1835 he devoted himself to the business of a stock-broker. Though an adherent of Jefferson and Madison, he aided the election of J. Q. Adams, and from that time was a whig. As a man of business he was skilful, energetic, decisive, upright, and honorable. He acquired much property. The railroad and other enterprises he earnestly promoted. Once, in 1810, he in his folly was engaged in a duel, in which no life was lost, but he was wounded. He was never married.

DEHON, THEODORE, D. D., bishop of South Carolina, of French descent, was born at Boston in 1776, and graduated at Harvard college in 1795. After being a rector at Newport, R. I., he removed to Charleston, where he was elected bishop in 1812. He married in 1813 Sarah, daughter of Nathaniel Russell, and died suddenly of a malignant fever, Aug. 6, 1817, aged 41. He was respected as a man of talents, and beloved for his amiable qualities and many virtues. He published a discourse on the death of Washington; before a charitable society, 1804; a thanksgiving sermon, 1805; a discourse to the Phi Beta Kappa society, 1807; a sermon before the Episcopal convention of the United States; sermons on confirmation, 1818; ninety sermons on various subjects, 2 vols. 8vo., 1821.

DE KAY, JAMES E., Dr., died in Oyster Bay Nov. 21, 1851, aged 59. Devoted to natural history, he wrote the zoology published in the State survey of New York.

DE LANCEY, JAMES, chief justice and lieutenant-governor of New York, died Aug. 2, 1760, aged 57. He was the son of a Protestant emigrant from Caen, in Normandy, who fled from persecution in France. Being sent to England for education, he entered the university of Cambridge about 1725. He returned to this country in 1729, and was soon, while ignorant of the law, appointed a judge of the supreme court, and chief justice in 1733. His industry made him a profound lawyer. During the greater part of the administration of Clinton, from 1743 to 1753, Mr. De Lancey exerted a powerful influence on the legislature in opposition to the governor. After the removal of Clinton and the death of Osborn, he, as lieutenant-governor, was at the head of the government from 1753 to 1755, and also a successor to Hardy from 1757 to 1760. His daughter, the wife of the celebrated Sir W. Draper, died in 1778. His brother Oliver, a loyalist in the war, was appointed a brigadier-general in 1777 and adjutant-general in 1783, and was afterwards a member of parliament. The character of De Lancey is described by the author of the review of military operations from 1753 to 1756, who represents him as a man of learning and talents, yet as an unprincipled demagogue and finished intriguer. "His uncommon vivacity, with the semblance of affability and ease, his adroitness at jest, with a show of condescension to his inferiors, wonderfully facilitated his progress. These plausible arts, together with his influence as chief justice, and a vast personal estate at use, all conspired to secure his popular triumph." — Hist. Coll. VII. 78; Miller, II. 256.

DELANO, PHILIP, was an early settler at Plymouth, in 1623. His name was sometimes written De la Noye; probably he was a French Protestant, who joined the church at Leyden.

DENISON, DANIEL, major-general, the son of Wm. D., of Cambridge, was born in England in 1613, and removed from Cambridge to Ipswich in 1634. He sustained various civil and military offices; for many years he was an assistant; in 1649 and 1651 the speaker of the house, and major-general in 1662. He died Sept. 20, 1682, aged 69. His wife was Patience, the daughter of Gov. Dudley. His grandson, John, the sixth minister of Ipswich, was ordained colleague with Mr. Hubbard in 1687, and died in Sept., 1689, leaving a widow, Elizabeth, who married Roland Cotton. Gen. D. was a man of eminence and religion. He wrote a treatise, which is annexed to Hubbard's funeral sermon, called Irenicon, or a salve for New England's sore, which considers the public calamities, the occasion, danger, blamable causes, and cure of them. — Hubbard; Farmer.

DENISON, GEORGE, captain, of Stonington, Conn., in March, 1676, made an incursion into the Narragansett country, and seized Nanuntenuo, the son of Miantunnu, and the chief sachem. The savage, when offered his life upon condition of living in peace, said, that he chose to die, before his heart became soft. In the year 1676 Denison and his volunteers killed and took two hundred and thirty of the enemy, without having one man either killed or wounded.

DENISON, JOHN, the sixth minister of Ipswich, died in Sept., 1689. He was the son of John, and grandson of major-general D.; graduated in 1684, and was ordained in 1687. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of N. Saltonstall, he had one son, Col. John D.

DENNIE, JOSEPH, editor of the Portfolio, the son of Joseph, a merchant in Boston, died Jan. 7, 1812, aged 43. He was born Aug. 30, 1768, and graduated at Harvard college in 1790. He studied law at Charlestown, N. H., but was not successful in the practice at Walpole, where he opened an office. For four months he read prayers in a church at Dartmouth. In 1795 he published in Boston the Tablet, a weekly paper; and the Farmer's Museum at Walpole, in which he inserted essays of some celebrity, entitled the Lay preacher. Mr. Pickering, secretary of State, having appointed him one of his clerks, he removed to Philadelphia in 1799. On the dismissal of his patron he conducted the Portfolio, a literary journal, commenced in 1800. Being deficient in industry and discretion, he destroyed his bodily constitution and his hopes of fortune. His father, who was deranged twenty-five years, died in 1811. With genius, taste, a fine style, and a fund of literature; with colloquial powers and other interesting qualities, he yet stands only as a warning to others against indolence and imprudence.

DENNISON, NATHAN, colonel, died in July, 1778, at fort Kingston, in the vale of Wyoming, of which he had the command at the defeat of Col. Z. Butler. After the investment and assault, July 4th, he went the next day with a flag of truce to John Butler, at fort Exeter, and asked the terms of surrender; the reply was, "The hatchet." Such was doubtless his fate, as he was compelled to surrender at discretion.

DENNY, SAMUEL, colonel, died in Leicester, 1817, aged 86. He served as an officer in the war. He was a benefactor of Leicester academy.

DENNY, THOMAS, colonel, died at Leicester very suddenly, Dec. 5, 1814, aged 57. He was the son of Thomas Denny, a patriot of 1774, in which year he died, who was the son of Daniel D., an early settler of Leicester, whose sister married T. Prince, the annalist. Col. D., having been long engaged in mercantile and manufacturing business, was the wealthiest man in Leicester. One of his daughters married J. Smith, a benefactor of Leicester academy.

DENTON, RICHARD, a minister, who came from England, died at Hempstead about 1663. He had been a minister at Halifax in Yorkshire. He first preached at Wethersfield; from 1641 to 1644 he was at Stamford. He wrote what was not published, a system of divinity, considering man in four states, that of created purity, contrasted deformity, restored beauty, and celestial glory. — Farmer's Register.

DEPUTY, JACOB, a black man, died near Milford, Delaware, June 5, 1848, aged 117 years and 9 months, being born Aug. 20, 1730, in Sussex county, where he lived.

DERBIGNY, PETER, governor of Louisiana, died Oct. 6, 1829.

DERBY, EZEKIEL HERSEY, died in Salem Oct. 31, 1852, aged 80. The son of Hasket D., he graduated at Harvard in 1791, and was in early life a merchant, then for thirty-five years an active, well-known agriculturist.

DESAUSSURE, HENRY W., chancellor of South Carolina, died at Charleston March 29, 1839, aged 75. He bore arms in defence of Charleston in the Revolutionary war, and succeeded Rittenhouse as director of the mint at Philadelphia. Returning to Charleston, he rose to eminence as a lawyer. Elected one of the chancellors in 1808, he filled the office with high reputation for twenty-nine years, during which time he lived in Columbia. For his talents, learning, moral virtues, and religion he was held in great regard. His equity reports were published in 4 vols.

DE SCHWEINITZ, LEWIS D., the secular head of the Moravian society, died at Bethlehem, Pa., in Feb., 1834, aged about 52. He was the author of several valuable works on botany.

DESHA, ROBERT, general, died in Mobile Feb., 1849, a hero in the war of 1812.

DEVENS, RICHARD, was a graduate of Princeton in 1767, a tutor in 1770, but lost the powers of his mind in 1770. His talents were indicated by a paraphrase of some parts of the book of Job in poetry.

DEVOL, JONATHAN, an early settler in Ohio, died near Marietta in 1824, aged 68, a native of Tiverton, R. I. He was a brave soldier in the war, and an associate of the Ohio company in 1789. His wife was Nancy, daughter of Capt. Isaac Barker, shipmaster at Newport, R. I. Mr. D. built in 1801 a ship at Marietta of 400 tons for Mr. Gilman.

DEVOTION, EBENEZER, minister of Suffield, died in 1741, aged about 54. He graduated at Harvard in 1707. B. Ruggles preceded him; E. Gay was his successor.

DEVOTION, EBENEZER, minister in Windham, Scotland society, died in 1771, aged about 62. He graduated at Yale in 1732. He published election sermons, 1753 and 1777; and sermon at ordination of N. Huntington, 1750; and of E. Huntington, 1762.

DEVOTION, JOHN, minister in Saybrook, Westbrook society, died in 1802, aged about 64. He graduated at Yale in 1754, and was settled in 1758.

DEWEY, DANIEL, a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, died at Washington May 26, 1815, aged 49. A native of Sheffield, he settled in Williamstown in 1790, and was a member of the thirteenth congress. He was appointed a judge in 1814. His son, Charles A. Dewey, is now a judge of the same court. His wife, Maria, the daughter of Judge David Noble, died in 1813. — Holland's History, II. 613.

DEWEES, WILLIAM P., M. D., died at Philadelphia May 18, 1841, aged 74; formerly professor of obstetrics in the university. He published a book on obstetrics; also, practice of medicine.

DE WITT, BENJAMIN, M. D., a physician of New York, was appointed professor of medicine in Columbia college in 1807, and professor of chemistry in 1808. He was also health officer of the city, and died of the yellow fever at the quarantine ground, Staten Island, Sept. 11, 1819, aged 45. He published a dissertation on the effect of oxygen, 1797; an oration commemorative of the prisoners who died in the prison-ships at Wallabout, 1808; account of minerals in New York in Mem. of A. A. S., vol. II.

DE WITT, SUSAN, died at Philadelphia, while on a visit, May 5, 1824. She was the wife of Simcon De Witt, of Albany, and the second daughter of Rev. Dr. Linn. She was a woman of strong intellectual powers, and of elevated piety. She published a poem, which has been much read and admired,—The pleasures of religion.

DE WITT, JOHN, D. D., professor of biblical history in the theological seminary of the Dutch Reformed church at New Brunswick, N. J., a native of Catskill, N. Y., was ordained as colleague with Daniel Collins, of Lanesborough, Mass., July 8, 1812, and was dismissed Dec. 8, 1813, and afterwards settled as the minister of the second Reformed Dutch church in Albany. He was afterwards professor in the theological seminary, and also one of the professors of Rutgers college in New Brunswick, where he died Oct. 12, 1831, aged about 42.—History of Berkshire, 389.

DE WITT, SIMCON, died at Ithaca Dec. 3, 1834, aged 79. He was surveyor-general of New York, skilled in astronomy and engineering.

DEXTER, GREGORY, a minister in Providence, died at the age of 90. A native of London, he was at first a stationer. He settled at Providence, as pastor of the Baptist church, in 1643.

DEXTER, SAMUEL, minister of Dedham, died in 1755, aged 54. He was the son of captain and deacon John, of Malden, who was the grandson of Richard, of Malden and Boston. He had brothers, John M., and Dr. Richard, of Topsfield, who died in 1783, aged 70. He graduated at Harvard in 1720. His predecessor was Joseph Belcher, a graduate of 1690, who died in 1723. His daughter married Rev. J. Haven. There was published, in 1840, "Dedham pulpit," containing the sermons of six ministers: J. Allin, W. Adams, J. Belcher, S. Dexter, J. Haven, J. Bates, and a centennial by E. Burgess. This book has two sermons by Mr. Dexter. He published a century discourse, 1738.

DEXTER, SAMUEL, a benefactor of Harvard college, was the son of the preceding, and a merchant in Boston. In the political struggles just before the Revolution he was repeatedly elected to the council, and negatived for his patriotic zeal by the royal governor. In his last years he was deeply engaged in investigating the doctrines of theology. He died at Mendon June 10, 1810, aged 84. For the encouragement of biblical criticism he bequeathed a legacy of 5,000 dollars to Harvard college. He also bequeathed 40 dollars to a minister, whom he wished to preach a funeral sermon, without making any mention of him in the discourse, from the words, "The things which are seen, are temporal; but the things which are not seen, are eternal." He said in his last will: "I wish the preacher to expostulate with his auditory on the absurdity of their being extremely assiduous to 'lay up treasures on earth,' while they are indolent with respect to their well-being hereafter. To those of so blamable a character, and to such as are of a still worse, and from their vicious lives appear to be totally regardless of the doctrine of a future existence, let him address himself with pious ardor. Let him entreat them to pay a serious attention to their most valuable interests. Let him represent 'the summit of earthly glory as ineffably despicable, when comparatively estimated with an exemption from the punishment denounced, and the possession of the perfect and never-ending felicity promised in the Scriptures.'"—Kendal's Funeral Sermon.

DEXTER, SAMUEL, LL. D., secretary of war of the United States, son of the preceding, died May 4, 1816, aged 54. He was born in 1761, and graduated at Harvard college in 1781. Having studied law at Worcester with Levi Lincoln, he soon rose to professional eminence. After being for some time a member of the house of representatives in congress, he was elected to the senate. During the administration of John Adams, he was appointed secretary of war in 1800, and secretary of the treasury in Jan., 1801, and for a short time also had the charge of the department of State. He was offered a foreign embassy, but declined it. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency he returned to the practice of law. In the progress of events he thought he observed that political parties were changing their policy and principles. From his old friends he separated, and lent the aid of his powerful mind in support of the war of 1812, while they were throwing obstacles in the way of its prosecution. He maintained that they had changed, and that he was unchangeable. In the practice of law before the supreme court at Washington, he stood in the first rank of advocates. He always attracted an audience, consisting of the beauty, taste, and learning of the city. He was requested by Mr. Madison in 1815 to accept of a mission to Spain, but declined the appointment. On his return from Washington, at the close of April, 1816, he went to Athens, N. Y., to attend the nuptials of his son. Somewhat unwell with the epidemic prevailing at Washington, he called for medical aid on Tuesday, and died of the scarlet fever Saturday. His wife was a sister of Wm. Gordon, of N. H. He was tall and muscular, with strong features. His enunciation was very slow and distinct, and his tones monotonous; but at times his eloquence was thrilling. He drafted the eloquent answer of the senate to President Adams' address on the death of Washington.

He was established in the belief of Christianity. A few weeks before his death Mr. Dexter had been the republican candidate for governor in Massachusetts, in opposition to Dr. Brooks, and received about 47,000 and his rival about 49,000 votes. He had also been the candidate in 1815. The republicans had selected him, as they said, because "he had broken forth from the legions of rebellion," referring to his manly resistance to the Hartford convention, a favorite project of the party with which he had before been associated. In his letter expressing his acceptance of the invitation to be a candidate, he said: "Every combination for general opposition is an offence against the community." The party struggles for office are not worthy of remembrance; but the principles, which have a bearing on the public welfare hereafter, ought not to be forgotten. In the preceding year he expressed in his letter from Washington his entire opposition to the system of restriction on commerce, as unconstitutional, oppressive, ineffectual, and impracticable; and at the same time declared that he was unable to reconcile some of the leading measures of the federalists in regard to the war with the fundamental principles of civilized society, and the duty of American citizens to support the union of their country. He published a letter on freemasonry; progress of science, a poem, 1780. — Story's Sketch of Dexter.

DEXTER, J. S., judge, died in Cumberland, R. L., June 20, 1844, aged 90. He served during the war and was a major. He was appointed by Washington supervisor of the revenue in Rhode Island. In his age he lived in Providence, his native place.

DIBBLE, SHIELDON, missionary at the Sandwich Islands, died at Lahainaluna Jan. 22, 1845. He graduated at Hamilton college in 1827, at Auburn seminary in 1830, and embarked in Dec. He visited the United States in 1837-1840. His wife, Maria M. Tomlinson, died Feb. 20, 1837.

DICKERSON, MAILON, governor, died in Morris county, N. J., Oct. 5, 1853, aged more than 80. In 1815, he was elected governor by a democratic or republican legislature; and a senator of the United States from 1817, for sixteen years. In 1834, he was secretary of the navy; but resigned and retired to private life in 1838. He was largely concerned in the mining and manufacture of iron in Morris county. He was kind, amiable, and much esteemed, and was regarded as a man of sound judgment and a safe legislator.

DICKINSON, JONATHAN, first president of New Jersey college, died Oct. 7, 1747, aged 59. He was born in Hatfield, Mass., April 22, 1688. His father was Hezekiah D.; his mother, being left a widow, married again and removed to Springfield, and carefully educated her children. His grandfather was Nathaniel, one of the first settlers of Wethersfield, who removed to Hadley. He was graduated at Yale college in 1706, and within one or two years afterwards he was settled the minister of the first Presbyterian church in Elizabethtown, New Jersey. Of this church he was for near forty years the joy and glory. As a friend of literature he was also eminently useful. The charter of the college of New Jersey, which had never yet been carried into operation, was enlarged by Governor Belcher, Oct. 22, 1746; and Mr. Dickinson was appointed president. The institution commenced at Elizabethtown, but it did not long enjoy the advantages of his superintendence, for it pleased God soon to call him away from life. The first commencement was in 1748, when six young men graduated, five of whom became ministers. He left three daughters, married to Jonathan Sergeant of Princeton, to John Cooper, and to Rev. Caleb Smith of Orange.

Mr. Dickinson, besides his other employments, was a practising physician, of considerable medical reputation. He was a man of learning, of distinguished talents, and much celebrated as a preacher; and he was succeeded in the college by men, who hold a high reputation in our country; by Burr, Edwards, Davies, Finley, and Witherspoon. He had a mind formed for inquiry; he possessed a quick perception and an accurate judgment; and to a keen penetration he united a disinterested attachment to truth. With a natural turn for controversy he had a happy government of his passions, and abhorred the perverse disputings, so common to men of corrupt minds. The eagerness of contention did not extinguish in him the fervors of devotion and brotherly love. By his good works and exemplary life he adorned the doctrines of grace, which he advocated with zeal. He boldly appeared in defence of the great truths of our most holy religion, confronting what he considered as error, and resisting every attack on the Christian faith. He wished to promote the interests of practical godliness, of holy living; and therefore he withstood error in every shape, knowing that it poisons the heart and thus destroys the very principles of virtue. He was an enemy to that blind charity, that politic silence, that temporizing moderation, which sacrifices the truths of God to human friendships, and under color of peace and candor gives up important points of gospel doctrine to every opposer. He knew, that this temper was inconsistent with the love of truth, and was usually connected with the hatred of those who engaged warmly in its support. He expected to be opposed and ridiculed, if he followed his Saviour, and preached with plainness and earnestness the doctrines which are so obnoxious to the corrupt heart and perverted understanding. Still, under pretence of zeal for truth he concealed no party animosity, no bigotry, no malevolence. He had generous sentiments with regard to freedom of inquiry and the rights of private judgment in matters of conscience, not approving subscription to human tests of orthodoxy. As he lived a devout and useful life and was a bright ornament to his profession, he died universally lamented.

His writings possess very considerable merit. They are designed to unfold the wonderful method of redemption, and to excite men to that cheerful consecration of all their talents to their Maker, to that careful avoidance of sin and practice of godliness, which will exalt them to glory. He published the reasonableness of Christianity, in four sermons, Boston, 1732; a funeral sermon on Ruth Pierson, wife of Rev. John P. of Woodbridge, 1733; a sermon on the witness of the Spirit, 1740; the true Scripture doctrine concerning eternal election, original sin, grace in conversion, justification by faith, and the saint's perseverance, in five discourses, 1741, in answer to Mr. Whitby; a display of God's special grace, in a familiar dialogue, 1742; on the nature and necessity of regeneration, with remarks on Dr. Waterland's regeneration stated and explained, 1743, against baptismal regeneration; reflections upon Mr. Wetmore's letter in defence of Dr. Waterland's discourse on regeneration, 1745. The above works were published in an octavo volume at Edinburgh in 1793. President Dickinson published also a defence of Presbyterian ordination, in answer to a pamphlet, entitled a modest proof, etc., 1724; the vanity of human institutions in the worship of God, a sermon, 1733; a defence of it afterwards; a second defence of it against the exceptions of John Beach in his appeal to the unprejudiced, 1738; this work is entitled, the reasonableness of nonconformity to the church of England in point of worship; familiar letters upon various important subjects in religion, 1745; a pamphlet in favor of infant baptism, 1746; a vindication of God's sovereign free grace; a second vindication, etc., against John Beach, to which are added brief reflections on Dr. Johnson's defence of Aristocles' letter to Authades, 1748; an account of the deliverance of Robert Barrow, shipwrecked among the cannibals of Florida.—Pierson's Sermon on his death; Preface to his Sermon. Edin. edit.; Miller, II. 345; Douglass, II. 284; Brainerd's Life, 129, 161; Chandler's Life of Johnson, 69; Green, 297.

DICKINSON, JONATHAN, chief justice of Pennsylvania, a Quaker, came from Jamaica, with his family, in 1696, and was shipwrecked in the gulf of Florida. He died in 1722. He published an account of his shipwreck, entitled, God's protecting providence, man's surest help and defence.

DICKINSON, MOSES, brother of Rev. Jonathan D., died in 1778, aged 82, in the fifty-first year of his ministry. He was graduated at Yale college in 1717, and in 1727 succeeded Stephen Buckingham as the minister of Norwalk. He was succeeded by William Tenment. The ministers of Norwalk were Presbyterian during 112 years out of 202. He was a man of a vigorous mind, cheerful, prudent. His widow, Hannah, died at Plymouth, Conn., in 1803, aged 98. He published an inquiry into the consequences of Calvinistic and Arminian principles, in which is considered Beach's reply to J. Dickinson's second vindication, 1750; election sermon, 1755; answer to Wetmore; on the death of T. Fitch, 1774.

DICKINSON, JOHN, president of Delaware and of Pennsylvania, died Feb. 15, 1808, aged 75. He was born in Maryland in Dec., 1732. His father, Samuel D., who soon after the birth of his son removed to Delaware, was chief justice of the county of Kent, and died July 6, 1760, aged 71. He studied law in Philadelphia, and then three years at the Temple in London, and on his return engaged successfully in the practice at Philadelphia. Of the assembly of Pennsylvania he was a member in 1764, and of the general congress in 1765. In the same year he began to write against the measures of the British government. In Nov., 1767, he began to publish his celebrated letters against the acts for taxation of the colonies; in which writings he supported the liberties of his country and contributed much toward the American Revolution. He was a member of the first Revolutionary congress in 1774, and a member in subsequent years. Of the eloquent and important state papers of that period he wrote the principal: the address to the inhabitants of Quebec; the first petition to the king; the address to the armies; the second petition to the king; and the address to the several States. He wrote also, in 1774, the resolves and instructions of the committee of Pennsylvania. In June, 1776, he opposed the Declaration of Independence, when the motion was considered by congress, because he doubted of the policy at that particular period, "without some preliminary trials of our strength," and before the terms of confederation were settled, and foreign assistance made certain. He had occasion afterwards, in order to prove the sincerity of his attachment to his country's liberty, to appeal to the fact, that within a few days after the declaration he was the only member of congress who marched to face the enemy. He accompanied his regiment to Elizabethtown in July to repel the invading enemy, and remained there till the end of the term of service. In Sept., he resigned, because two brigadiers had been raised over him, through the same hostility, as he supposed, which effected his removal from congress. He now retired to Delaware, and there, in the summer of 1777, in Capt. Lewis' company he served as a private with his musket upon his shoulder in the militia movements against the British, who had landed at the head of Elk. In Oct., Mr. M'Kean gave him a commission of brigadier-general. In 1779, by unanimous vote of the assembly, he was elected a member of congress, and in May wrote the address to the States. In 1780, he was elected by the county of New Castle a member of the assembly; in 1781, he was chosen president of Delaware, as successor of Cæsar Rodney, by unanimous vote of the two houses. On commencing his duties he published, Nov. 19, 1781, an excellent proclamation, recommending piety and virtue and the enforcement of the laws in favor of morality. In 1782 he was chosen president of Pennsylvania, and remained in office from Nov., 1782, till Oct., 1785, when he was succeeded by Franklin. In 1788, he wrote nine letters with the signature of Fabius, in order to promote the adoption of the constitution; and with the same signature, in 1797, he wrote fourteen letters in order to promote a favorable feeling toward France. His last days were spent in private life at Wilmington, Delaware. His wife, whom he married in 1770, was Mary Norris of Philadelphia. His daughter, Maria, married in 1808 Albinus C. Logan. His countenance and person were fine. He filled with ability the various high stations in which he was placed. He was distinguished by his strength of mind, miscellaneous knowledge, and cultivated taste, which were united with an habitual eloquence, with an elegance of manners, and a benignity, which made him the delight and ornament of society. The infirmities of declining years had detached him long before his death from the busy scenes of life; but in retirement his patriotism felt no abatement. The welfare of his country was ever dear to him, and he was ready to make any sacrifices for its promotion. Unequivocal in his attachment to a republican government, he invariably supported, as far as his voice could have influence, those men and those measures which he believed most friendly to republican principles. He was esteemed for his uprightness and the purity of his morals. From a letter, which he wrote to Mrs. Warren of Plymouth, dated the 25th of the first month, 1805, it seems that he was a member of the society of Friends. He published a speech delivered in the house of assembly of Pennsylvania, 1764; a reply to a speech of Joseph Galloway, 1765; late regulations respecting the colonies considered, 1765; letters from a farmer in Pennsylvania to the inhabitants of the British colonies, 1767-1768. Mr. Dickinson's political writings were collected and published in two volumes, 8vo. 1801. — Gordon, i. 220; Ramsay, ii. 319; Warren, i. 412; Adams' Letter to Dr. Calkoen; Monthly Anthol.

DICKINSON, PHILEMON, general, a brave officer in the Revolutionary war, died at his seat near Trenton, N. J., Feb. 4, 1809, aged 68. He took an early and an active part in the struggle with Great Britain, and hazarded his ample fortune and his life in establishing our independence. In the memorable battle of Monmouth, at the head of the Jersey militia, he exhibited the spirit and gallantry of a soldier of liberty. After the establishment of the present national government he was a member of congress. In the various stations, civil and military, with which he was honored, he discharged his duty with zeal and ability. The last twelve or fifteen years of his life were spent in retirement from public concerns. — Philadelphia Gazette, Feb. 7, 1809.

DICKINSON, SAMUEL, general, a patriot of the Revolution, died in Middletown, Ky., in 1817.

DICKINSON, TIMOTHY, minister of Holliston, Mass., died July 6, 1813, aged 52. Born in Amherst, Mass., he graduated at Dartmouth in 1785. In 1789 he was ordained the successor of Joshua Prentiss, the second pastor of H., in whose day occurred the fatal sickness of 1754, occasioning the death of fifty-three persons in six weeks, out of the small population of four hundred. Dr. Emmons' funeral discourse was founded on the words, "I am now ready to be offered," etc. Mr. D. was one of the founders of the Massachusetts missionary society. He published a sermon to the missionary society, 1811. — Panoplist, iii. 335.

DICKINSON, JOHN, senior, died in Amherst Jan. 4, 1850, aged 92, a soldier at Bunker Hill.

DICKINSON, PLINY, minister at Walpole, N. H., died in 1834, aged 57. He was born in Granby, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1798, and succeeded T. Fessenden.

DICKINSON, AUSTIN, died in New York, Aug. 15, 1849, aged 58, formerly minister of Amherst, Mass. Born in Amherst, he graduated at Dartmouth in 1813. His life was one of Christian enterprise and usefulness. He established the Family Visitor in Richmond, and the National Preacher in New York, in 1826. For several years he furnished the secular papers with religious intelligence with the signature A. D. He was poor, but liberal and generous. — N. Y. Observer, Aug. 18.

DICKINSON, S. N., an accomplished printer, died at Roxbury Jan. 16, 1849, aged 47.

DICKINSON, R. S. STORRS, a minister in New York and Philadelphia, died suddenly in Edinburgh, Scotland, Aug. 18, 1856, aged 32. He was born in Longmeadow, Mass., the son of Baxter Dickinson, D. D., and graduated at Amherst college in 1844, and at Union Theological seminary, N. Y., in 1848. He was four years pastor of the Houston street church in N. Y., and between two and three years assistant minister with Rev. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia. He was a youthful preacher of noble Christian aspirations, high culture, and rare accomplishments.

DICKMAN, THOMAS, died in Greenfield Dec. 9, 1841, aged 41. He was a printer. He began the "Intelligencer" at G., in 1793, and published it fourteen years, then the "Federalist" in Springfield from 1806 to 1819. He established a reading-room in S.

DIESKAU, JOHN HARMAND, baron, lieutenant-general in the French army, proceeded in 1755 from Montreal with two thousand men against fort Edward, intending to penetrate to Albany. Gen. Johnson was at this time encamped at the south end of lake George. After defeating the detachment of Col. E. Williams, he attacked Johnson's camp, Sept. 8; but the roar of the artillery frightened away his Indians; his troops were routed; and he himself taken prisoner. A soldier found him alone, leaning on a stump, being wounded in the leg; and, while he was feeling for his watch to surrender it, supposing he was searching for a pistol, poured a charge through his hips. He was conveyed to New York, where Dr. Jones attended him. Marshall says he was mortally wounded; but he lived some years. He died at Surene in France, Sept. 8, 1767. — Thacher's Med. Biog. 327; Dwight, III. 374.

DIGGES, EDWARD, was governor of Virginia in 1655. During his short administration, the Indians defeated the Virginians near the falls of Jamestown. Solicitous to promote the culture of silk, he sent to Armenia for persons to teach the art of raising it.

DINSMOOR, ROBERT, "the rustic bard," died at Windham in 1836, aged 79. His poems and letters, with his life, were published in 1828.

DINSMOOR, SAMUEL, governor of New Hampshire, died at Keene March 15, 1835, aged 69. Born in Londonderry, he was major-general of the militia, judge of probate, and governor in 1831-1833.

DINWIDDIE, ROBERT, governor of Virginia from 1752 to 1758, died in England Aug. 1, 1770, aged 80. He was clerk to a collector of customs in the West Indies, whose enormous fraud he detected and exposed to the government. For this disclosure he was rewarded by his appointment in Virginia. But while he was governor he did not forget what he had learned when a clerk, for he trod in the steps of his principal; at least, he was charged with applying to his own use 20,000 pounds, sent to defray the expenses of Virginia for the public service. It was during his administration, that Braddock proceeded on his expedition against the Indians.

DIX, SAMUEL, minister of Townsend, died

Nov. 12, 1797, aged 61. He graduated at Harvard in 1758, and was ordained March 4, 1761. — Farrar's Funeral Sermon.

DIXON, ALEXANDER, died in North Carolina, in 1814, leaving 12,000 dollars for the education of poor children in Dublin county.

DIXON, NATHAN F., died at Washington Jan. 29, 1842, aged 67, a senator from Rhode Island. He was born in Plainfield, Conn., and graduated at Providence in 1799, and practised law in R. I.

DIXWELL, JOHN, colonel, one of the judges of King Charles I., fled to this country for safety. In 1664 he visited Whalley and Goffe at Hadley, and afterwards resided at New Haven, with the name of John Davids, till his death, March 18, 1689, aged 81. He married at New Haven, and left children. A descendant by the female line, a respectable physician of Boston, assumed the name of John Dixwell. Mr. D., of Boston, erected a monument to his memory over his grave in 1849. It is copied in Boston Advertiser, Jan. 9, 1850.

DIXWELL, JOHN, M. D., died at Boston in 1834, aged 60. He graduated at Harvard in 1796, and was vice-president of the Massachusetts medical society.

DOANE, GEORGE B., M. D., died in Boston April 13, 1842, aged 49, a man of skill, integrity, and kindness.

DOANE, AUGUSTUS SIDNEY, M. D., died on Staten Island Jan. 27, 1852, aged 44. He was quarantine physician at New York. Born in Boston, he was graduated at Harvard in 1825. He was the author and editor of various professional works.

DOBSON, THOMAS, a bookseller of Philadelphia, of the Caledonian society, republished the Encyclopedia Britannica, 18 vols., 4to., 1790. He died March 8, 1823. He was the author of letters on the character of the deity, and the moral state of man, 2 vols., 12mo., 1807, written with irreligious freedom.

DOD, ALBERT D., D. D., died at Princeton, N. J., Nov. 20, 1845, aged 40, professor of mathematics. Born in Mendham, N. J., he graduated at Princeton in 1822, and was chosen professor in 1829. He was a good teacher and writer, and an eloquent preacher.

DODD, STEPHEN, pastor of East Haven, died Feb. 5, 1856, aged 78. Born in Bloomfield, N. J., he graduated at Union college. He was successively a minister in Carmel, N. Y., Waterbury, Conn., and in East Haven from 1817 to 1847. He published a history of E. H. in 1826.

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP, a member of congress from Virginia, died at Washington Nov. 19, 1832, aged 60. He was a man of great ability, and an eminent lawyer.

DODGE, JAMES, Dr., died at Tunis Oct. 10,

1806, aged 34. While a skilful physician in New York, ill health induced him to accept a station in the navy. While in the Mediterranean the office of consul at Tunis became vacant, and he was appointed chargé des affaires. He had a brilliant poetical genius, and a heart of humanity and generosity, as was manifested toward the unhappy prisoners at Algiers.

DODGE, NEMEMIAH, minister in New London, died Jan. 3, 1843, aged 73.

DODGE, DAVID L., died in New York April 23, 1852, aged 77; an eminent merchant, to be honorably remembered for his aid to the religious and benevolent movements of his day. He aided in forming bible and tract societies. He was one of the founders of the peace society, the first meeting being held in his parlor forty years before his death. On the morning of his last day, he said, "I shall go home to-day." He himself joined in a final song. — A. D. Smith's Sermon.

DODGE, ASA, M. D., missionary in Syria, died at Jerusalem Jan. 28, 1835, of the typhus fever, aged 33. Born in Newcastle, a graduate of Bowdoin college in 1827, he arrived at Beirut in 1833, and went to Jerusalem in 1834. His wife was Martha W. Merrill of Portland.

DAGGETT, SIMEON, minister of Raynham, died March 20, 1852, aged 87. He published a sermon on the way to eternal life, 1796; at funeral of R. George, 1827.

DOLE, AUNT BETTY, a black, died in Troy Jan. 22, 1842, supposed to be 135 years old. She was kidnapped in Africa at the age of fifteen.

DOLE, NATHAN, died at Brewer, Me., in July, 1855. A graduate of Bowdoin in 1836, he was some years a minister in Brewer. He had edited the Journal of Missions and Youth's Dayspring, a few years, at the rooms of the American board in Boston.

DONALDSON, WILLIAM, M. D., died at Baltimore Jan. 13, 1835, aged 58; a distinguished physician.

DONGAN, THOMAS, governor of New York from 1683 to 1688, afterwards earl of Limerick, succeeded Brockholst, and was succeeded by Nicholson. He was highly respected as a governor, being upright, discreet, and accomplished in manners. He ordered an assembly to be convened by election, a privilege which the people had not before enjoyed. Yet he unjustly fell under the displeasure of his sovereign.

DONNISON, WILLIAM, died at Boston Jan. 24, 1834. He was adjutant in the Revolutionary war, and adjutant and inspector-general from 1788 to 1813; also, judge of the common pleas.

DOOLITTLE, Rev. BENJAMIN, first minister of Northfield, Mass., was the grandson of Abraham D., who died at Wallingford Aug. 11, 1690, aged 70. He was born July 10, 1695, graduated at Yale in 1716, was ordained in 1718, and died very suddenly Jan. 9, 1749. At the time of his settlement there were thirty-five families. He practised as a physician. His successor was J. Hubbard. His funeral sermon was by J. Ashley, of Deerfield. He published an inquiry into enthusiasm, and a narrative of the mischief by the French and Indians from 1744 to 1748. — Holland, 408.

DOOLITTLE, JOEL, a judge of the supreme court of Vermont, descended from Abraham D., was the son of Titus D., of Westfield, and graduated at Yale in 1799. He settled in Middlebury, Vt., and was a member of the corporation of the college. He died March 9, 1841, aged 67.

DOOLITTLE, MARK, brother of the preceding, died at Belchertown, Mass., Nov. 7, 1855, aged 73 years. He was a graduate of Yale in 1804, and settled in 1812 as a lawyer at B. He was a senator; and for many years an active and consistent member of the church, highly respected. He published a history of the Congregational church of B; and address to agricultural society, 1826.

DORR, EDWARD, minister of Hartford, died in 1772. A graduate of Yale in 1742, he published a sermon on the death of D. Edwards, 1765.

DORR, SAMUEL C., of Lyme, Conn., died in London in 1794. He invented shearing machines.

DORR, THOMAS W., famous as a rebel in the history of Rhode Island, was born in Providence, graduated at Harvard in 1823, and died Dec. 27, 1854, aged 49. He studied law with Chancellor Kent, and was a literary man. His political life began in 1834. For his daring insurrectionary movements in reference to a new constitution of the State, he was tried for treason and sentenced to imprisonment for life. After one year he was released: his sentence was annulled by act of the legislature in 1853. In his illness he joined the Episcopal church.

DORRANCE, BENJAMIN, colonel, died in Kingston, Wyoming Valley, in Aug., 1837, aged 70. His father, Col. George D., who emigrated from Windham county, was slain in an Indian battle, aged 45. He left sons, Col. Charles, and Rev. John D., pastor of Wilkesbarre.

DORRANCE, GORDON, minister nearly forty years of Windsor, Mass., died in Attica, N. Y., at the house of his son Dr. Gardiner D., May 18, 1846, aged 80. Born in Sterling, Conn., he graduated at Dartmouth in 1786.

DORSEY, JOHN SYNG, M. D., professor of anatomy, was the son of Leonard D., and grandson of Edmund Physick. He was born in Philadelphia Dec. 23, 1783. He early studied physic with his relative, Dr. Physick, and was doctor of medicine at the age of eighteen. He afterwards visited England and France, for his improvement in medical science, returning home in Dec., 1804. In 1807 he was elected adjunct professor of surgery with Dr. Physick at Philadelphia, and on the death of Dr. Wistar, was chosen professor of anatomy. He now had attained a height most gratifying to his ambition; but Providence had selected him to teach a salutary lesson on the precarious tenure of life, and the importance of being always prepared for death. On the evening of the day in which he pronounced his eloquent introductory lecture he was attacked with a fever, and in a week died, Nov. 12, 1818, aged 35. When by his express command he was informed of his state, and apprised of his certain death, he was resigned to the will of heaven. As a Christian he had practised the duties of religion. With fervor he reiterated his confidence in the atonement of his Saviour. He was thus sustained in an hour when, on the bed of death, the proud warrior would shudder in thinking of the destinies of eternity. As a surgeon he was almost unrivalled. Besides papers for the periodical journals and an edition of Cooper's surgery with notes, he published elements of surgery, 2 vols., 1813, deemed the best work extant on the subject. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

D'OSSOLI, SARAH MARGARET FULLER, died July 22, 1850, aged 40, drowned off Fire Island with her husband and child in the wreck of the bark, in which she was sailing for New York. She was the sister of Timothy F., of Massachusetts, and married in Italy the Count D'Ossoli. She was a literary lady, and wrote for the Dial and published a summer on the lakes, woman in the nineteenth century, papers on literature and art. She was the foreign correspondent of the Tribune. Her memoirs have been published.

DOTY, Mrs., wife of Elihu D., missionary at Amoy in China, died Oct. 5, 1845, aged 38, five days after Mrs. Pohlman. Her name was Clarissa Ackley of Washington, Conn. She embarked for Batavia in 1836. The faith, which she professed at the age of 13, was her support in the hour of death.

DOUGHERTY, MICHEL, remarkable for longevity, died at his plantation on Horse Creek, in Scriven county, Georgia, May 29, 1808, aged 135 years. He was one of the first settlers of that State. The day before he died he walked two miles.

DOUGLASS, WILLIAM, M. D., a physician in Boston, died Oct. 21, 1752. He was a native of East Lothian in Scotland, of no mean parentage. After being educated for his profession, partly at Paris and partly at Leyden, he came to this country in 1716, and, after visiting Gen. Douglass, governor of St. Kitts, settled at Boston in 1718. Having letters to Cotton Mather, he put into his hands those numbers of the philosophical transactions which gave an account of the inoculation for the small pox; and this benevolent minister communicated the intelligence to Dr. Boylston, and persuaded him to introduce the practice, wishing him to communicate the project to other physicians. As Dr. Douglass received no notice, he indignantly opposed the practice. Dr. Thacher erroneously states, that Mather communicated the work of Timoni to Douglass. In the epidemic sore throat he made a free use of mercury. He was a skilful physician. His prejudices were very strong, and in his language he was frequently intemperate. His notions of religion were very loose. In his history of the American colonies, he is often incorrect, and it was his foible to measure the worth of men by his personal friendship for them. A town of Massachusetts, of which he was a proprietor and benefactor, bears his name. He published the inoculation of the small pox, as practised in Boston, 1722; the abuses and scandals of some late pamphlets in favor of inoculation, 1722; a practical essay concerning the small pox, containing the history, etc., 1730; a practical history of a new eruptive, miliary fever, with an angina ulcusculosa, which prevailed in Boston in 1735 and 1736, 12mo. 1736; a summary, historical and political, of the first planting, progressive improvements, and present state of the British settlements in North America, the first volume 1749, the second 1753; an edit. 1755. — Summary, II. 409; Hutchinson, II. 80; Ilist. Coll. IX. 40; Whitney's Hist. Worcester, 203; American Museum, III. 53; Holmes.

DOUGLASS, DAVID B., LL. D., died in Geneva, N. Y., Oct. 28, 1849, aged 56, professor of mathematics. Graduating at Yale in 1813, he joined the army and fought in various battles. After the war he was connected with West Point until 1830, and then was often consulted as a civil engineer. He prepared the plans of the Croton aqueduct. In 1840 Major D. was president of Kenyon college in Ohio. He was a man of worth and piety.

DOW, LORENZO, an eccentric and celebrated Methodist minister, died at Georgetown, Feb. 2, 1834. He was a native of Coventry, Conn., born in 1777. In his course of thirty years' preaching he travelled over England and Ireland and visited many parts of the United States. Few ministers have preached oftener than he.

DOW, DANIEL, D. D., died in Thompson, Conn., July 19, 1849, aged about 78, in the fifty-eighth of his ministry. A graduate of Yale in 1793, he was ordained in 1796. A pond in his town — the residence of the Nipmuck Indians — they called Chaggogaggogmanchogaggogg. His death was sudden. After preaching a funeral sermon he returned home, and in a few minutes was dead. Hiram Ketchum of N. Y. married his daughter. He preached twenty years without notes. He published letters to John Sherman, 1806; on the covenants, 1811; on free masonry, 1829; several on funeral and ordination occasions.

DOWNING, A. J., died July 28, 1852, aged 37, lost in the steamer Henry Clay. He lived in Newburgh. He was a landscape gardener, and was very skilled in rural architecture. As a writer on horticulture he was unequalled. He nobly lost his life in saving others. Three times he swam from the wreck to the shore, bearing a friend with him; in the fourth attempt he was dragged down by many seeking his aid.

DOWNER, AVERY, Dr., died at Preston July 15, 1854, aged 91, the last survivor of the battle of fort Griswold. His father, Dr. Joshua D., was also present, and assisted in dressing the wounded.

DOWNES, JOHN, commodore, died in Charlestown Aug. 11, 1854, aged 69. He had been in sea service twenty-four years. A native of Canton, Mass., he entered the navy in 1802. In the frigate Potomac he bombarded the piratical town of Quallah Battoo on the coast of Sumatra. His senior post-captains were Steward and Morris at the time of his death.

DOWNING, GEORGE, of the first class of Harvard college, died in 1684, aged about 62. He graduated in 1642. T. Woodbridge, whose name is the only one in the catalogue standing before his, died in the same year. He went to England, and was a preacher among the Independents and a chaplain in the army of Cromwell, who sent him as his agent to Holland. Eliot says, he was ready to serve any master and to commit any act of treachery. Charles II. continued him as his agent and made him a knight. About 1672 he was imprisoned; but was again received into favor. Hutchinson regarded him as a friend of New England. Sir George D. corresponded with his brother-in-law, Gov. Bradstreet. — Eliot.

DOWSE, THOMAS, died in Cambridge, Mass., November 4, 1856, aged 84 years. He had no education except in a common town school, and he toiled during his life in a mechanical trade; yet he acquired a literary taste, and the means of gratifying it by the purchase of books, with the contents of which he made himself acquainted. Instead of wasting the fruits of his daily industry in low and degrading indulgence, he laid up money, and spent much of it in forming a library, rich in the treasures of science and literature. It amounted at last to five thousand volumes, all of which were in beautiful and some in superb binding. For years strangers were accustomed to resort to his house in order to see his fine library. At last, in his old age, he determined to place it in a public institution, where it would be preserved with care, and be useful for ages; he, therefore, three months before his death, presented it to the Massachusetts historical society. The insurance upon it of 20,000 dollars shows that the estimated value of the books was beyond that sum. The remarks of Robert C. Winthrop, the president of the society, and of Edward Everett, on the occasion of this unparalleled donation, were printed in the Boston Advertiser of Aug. 6, 1856. It was resolved by the society, that the library be placed in a room by itself, to be known as the Dowse library of the Massachusetts historical society. A spacious apartment was immediately prepared for the purpose, in the society's valuable building, adjoining the Chapel cemetery in Boston. The purchase of this building, the acquisition of these books, and the bequest by Samuel Appleton of 10,000 dollars for a publication fund, are memorable events in the recent history of this society. Already the volumes of its collections which have been published are thirty-one in number. Hereafter, it is to be hoped, new volumes of historical research will be issued still more rapidly. And, so long as this important institution of Massachusetts shall exist, so long will the name of Mr. Dowse be remembered with honor. All young men, who set out in poverty, and who, by God's blessing on their industry and prudence, acquire comparative wealth, may not be able to do a work of such prominent and memorable service to the public; but they may all do what is still more praiseworthy, if they have as many years in which to do their work: they may daily supply the wants of the poor and suffering; they may cause the widow's heart to sing for joy; they may aid the numerous societies of charity around them; and they may promote the diffusion of God's heavenly light, by helping to send the Book of books to the yet untaught millions of the human family.

DRAKE, JOSEPH, colonel, died in New Haven Sept. 11, 1836, aged 99.

DRAKE, JOSEPH R., M. D., died in New York in 1820, aged only 25. He wrote a poem, the culprit fay.

DRAKE, DANIEL, M. D., died Nov. 5, 1852, at Cincinnati, aged 67. He was born at Plainfield, N. J., Oct. 20, 1785: in his early life his father, Isaac, the son of Nathaniel, removed to Kentucky. At the age of 15 he went to Cincinnati to study medicine, a few cabins then constituting the queen city of the west. Through a wilderness of nearly a thousand miles he went to Philadelphia in order to attend the medical lectures of Dr. Rush; at the end of one course, though an attendance on two courses was required, he asked for a rigid examination, and obtained his degree. He was one of the founders of the medical college of Ohio in 1819, and one of its professors, also a professor in the Lexington and Louisville schools. In 1827 he advocated the temperance principle. The first Episcopal church at C. was organized at his house in 1815, though he did not become a communicant until 1840, being a low churchman. He married, in 1806, Harriet Lisson, a niece of Gen. Mansfield, and lived with her in perfect connubial happiness twenty years. He left three children with families. Benjamin D., of Cincinnati, an author, was his brother. He died of a congestion of the brain. He published sketches of Cincinnati, 1810; account of Cincinnati, and the Miami country, 1815. The Western journal of medical and physical sciences was edited by him. His last work was a treatise on the diseases and climatology of the Mississippi valley.

DRAPER, RICHARD, died in June, 1775, aged 47. His father, John D., succeeded B. Green in publishing the Boston Weekly News-Letter, the first publication of the kind in this country. This paper was continued by Richard Draper, who also published the Massachusetts Gazetteer.

DRAYTON, WILLIAM, LL. D., judge of the federal court for the district of South Carolina, died in June, 1790, aged 57. He was a native of that province. About the year 1747 he was placed under Thomas Corbett, an eminent lawyer. In 1750 he accompanied that gentleman to London, and entered into the Middle Temple, where he continued till 1754, at which time he returned to his native country. Though his abilities were confessedly great, he soon quitted the bar, from disinclination to the practice of the law; but about the year 1768 he was appointed chief justice in the province of East Florida. When the Revolution commenced in 1775, he fell under the suspicion of the governor, and was suspended by him. He however went to England, and was reinstated; but on his return to St. Augustine was again suspended by Governor Tonyn. In consequence of this he took his family with him to England in 1778 or 1779, in the hope of obtaining redress, but the distracted situation of affairs in America prevented him from effecting his purpose. Soon after his return to America he was appointed judge of the admiralty court of South Carolina. In March, 1789, he was appointed associate justice of the State, but he resigned this office in Oct. following, when he was made a judge under the federal government. — Hardie's Biog. Dict.; American Museum, VIII. 82.

DRAYTON, WILLIAM HENRY, a political writer, died in Sept., 1779, aged 36. He was a native of South Carolina. From 1753 to 1764 he studied at Westminster and Oxford. In 1771 he was appointed a judge. He was one of his majesty's justices when they made their last circuit in the spring of 1775, and the only one born in America. In his charge to the grand jury he inculcated the same sentiments in favor of liberty which were patronized by the popular leaders. Soon afterwards he was elected president of the provincial congress, and devoted his great abilities with uncommon zeal for the support of the measures adopted by his native country. Before the next circuit his colleagues were advertised as inimical to the liberties of America; and March, 1776, he was appointed chief justice by the voice of his country. He died suddenly in Philadelphia, while attending his duty in congress. He was a statesman of great decision and energy, and one of the ablest political writers of Carolina. In 1774 he wrote a pamphlet, addressed to the American congress, under the signature of a freeman, in which he stated the grievances of America, and drew up a bill of American rights. He published his charge to the grand jury in April, 1776, which breathes all the spirit and energy of the mind, which knows the value of freedom and is determined to support it. Ramsay in his history has published this charge entire. His speech in the general assembly of South Carolina, on the articles of the confederation, was published in 1778. Several other productions of his pen appeared, explaining the injured rights of his country, and encouraging his fellow citizens to vindicate them. He also wrote a history of the American Revolution, brought down to the end of the year 1778, in three large volumes, which he intended to correct and publish, but was prevented by his death. It was published by his son in 1821. He was once challenged by Gen. Lee, in consequence of his censure in congress on the general's conduct at the battle of Monmouth; but he had the courage and the conscience to decline the combat, and assigned his reasons. — Miller, II. 380; Ramsay's Rev. South Carolina I. 57, 91, 103; Hist. South Carolina, II. 454; Encyc. Americana.

DRAYTON, JOHN, only son of the preceding, governor of South Carolina from 1800 to 1802, and from 1808 to 1810, succeeded in that office E. Rutledge and C. Pinckney, and was succeeded by J. B. Richardson and H. Middleton. At the time of his death he was district judge of the United States. He died at Charleston Nov. 27, 1822, aged 60. The historical materials, collected by his father, were by him revised and published with the title of memoirs of the American Revolution from its commencement to the year 1776, inclusive, as relating to the State of South Carolina, etc., 2 vols. 8vo. 1821. He had previously published view of South Carolina, 8vo. 1802.

DRAYTON, WILLIAM, a distinguished member of congress from South Carolina, died at Philadelphia May 24, 1846. He had lived at Philadelphia twelve or more years.

DRINKER, EDWARD, remarkable for longevity, died Nov. 17, 1782, aged nearly 102. He was born Dec. 24, 1680, in a cabin near the present corner of Walnut and Second streets in Philadelphia. His parents had removed to this place from Beverly in Mass. The banks of the Delaware were inhabited at the time of his birth by the Indians and a few Swedes and Hollanders. At the age of twelve years he went to Boston, where he served an apprenticeship to a cabinet-maker. In the year 1745, he returned to Philadelphia, where he lived till the time of his death. He was four times married, and had eighteen children, all of whom were by his first wife. In his old age the powers of his mind were very little impaired. He enjoyed so uncommon a share of health, that he was never confined more than three days to his bed. He was a man of an amiable character, and he continued to the last uniformly cheerful and kind. His religious principles were as steady as his morals were pure. He attended public worship about thirty years in the Presbyterian church under Dr. Sproat, and died in the fullest assurance of a happy immortality. He witnessed the most astonishing changes. He lived to see the spot, where he had picked blackberries and hunted rabbits, become the seat of a great city, the first in wealth in America. He saw ships of every size in those streams where he had been used to see nothing larger than an Indian canoe. He saw the first treaty between France and the independent States of America ratified upon the very spot, where he had seen William Penn ratify his first and last treaties with the Indians. He had been the subject of seven crowned heads.—New and Gen. Biog. Dict.; Harvie; Rush's Essays, 295—300; Universal Asylum, II. 88; American Museum, II. 73—75.

DROMGOOLE, EDWARD, Rev., died in Brunswick Co., Va., May 13, 1835, aged 83; a minister of the gospel sixty-three years.

DUANE, JAMES, judge of the district court for New York, was a member of the first congress from this State in 1774, and received his appointment of judge in Oct., 1789. He was the first mayor of New York after its recovery from the British. His death occurred at Albany in Feb., 1797. He published a law case.

DUANE, WILLIAM, colonel, died Nov. 24, 1835, aged 75. He was the editor of the Philadelphia Aurora for many years, and the supporter of Jefferson in the political divisions of the day. He published a military dictionary.

DUBOIS, GEORGE, a minister in the Dutch church, New York, from 1699 to 1756, the successor of Henricus Selvyns. His colleagues were Henricus Boel, from 1713 to 1754; Johannes Ritzenia, in 1744, died 1796; and Lambertius De Ronde, in 1751, died 1795. All these preached entirely in Dutch. The first preacher in English was A. Laidlie.

DUBOIS, GEORGE, died at Tarrytown April 20, 1844, aged about 44, a minister in the Dutch church. He was first settled at Bloomingburgh; then fourteen years in New York, as successor of

C. Bork, in Franklin street; then in Tarrytown a brief period. He was a most faithful and successful minister. At one time he admitted to his church in New York eighty persons, and in Tarrytown more persons than constituted the whole church when he was settled.

DUBOIS, JOHN, Catholic bishop of New York, died Dec. 20, 1842, aged 78; a native of Paris.

DUCHE, JACOB, D. D., an Episcopal minister of Philadelphia, died in Jan., 1798, aged about 60. He was a native of that city and a graduate of the college in 1757. For some years he was an assistant minister of two churches; in 1775 he succeeded Dr. Peters as rector. At the opening of the first congress he, by the nomination of S. Adams, made a most fervent and sublime prayer. Mr. A. said, "It was enough to melt a heart of stone." While chaplain to congress he gave his salary for the relief of the families of Pennsylvanians killed in battle. Yet he was opposed to independence; and, in order to persuade Washington to adopt his own views, he sent him a letter by Mrs. Ferguson. Washington transmitted the letter to congress. Thus losing the public confidence, he went to England in 1776, and was chaplain to an asylum for orphans. His daughter, Sophia, married John Henry, the agent of the Canadian governor in 1810. Dr. Duché was a man of brilliant talents; a most impressive orator, with much action; and he had also a fine poetical taste. He published a sermon on the death of E. Morgan, 1763; of Richard Penn, 1771; a fast sermon before congress, July 20; a sermon to the militia, 1775; observations moral, etc., by Caspapina, 1773; sermons, 2 vols., London, 1780; a sermon before the humane society, 1781.—Wirt's Old Bachelor, No. 31.

DUDLEY, THOMAS, governor of Massachusetts died in Roxbury July 31, 1652, aged 76. He was the son of Roger, and was born in Northampton, England, in 1576. After having been for some time in the army, his mind was impressed by religious truth, and he attached himself to the Nonconformists. He came to Massachusetts in 1630, as deputy-governor, and was one of the founders and pillars of the colony. He was chosen governor in the years 1634, 1640, 1645, and 1650. His zeal against heretics did not content itself with arguments, addressed to the understanding, and reproofs, aimed at the conscience; but his intolerance was not singular in an age when the principles of religious liberty were not understood. The following lines are a part of a piece found in his pocket after his death.

"Let men of God in courts and churches watch
O'er such as do a toleration hatch,
Lest that ill egg bring forth a cockatrice,
To poison all with heresy and vice.
If men be left, and otherwise combine,
My epitaph's, I died no libertine."

His widow married Rev. J. Allen, of Dedham. His daughters married Gov. Bradstreet, Gen. Denison, and Rev. J. Woodbridge. He was a man of sound judgment, of inflexible integrity, of public spirit, and of strict and exemplary piety. — Morton, 150; Mather's Magnalia, II. 15-17; Neal's New England, I. 308; Hist. Coll. VII. 11; X. 39; Hutchinson, I. 183; Winthrop; Holmes.

DUDLEY, SAMUEL, the minister of Exeter, died in 1683, aged 76. He was the son of Gov. Thomas D., and, after he came to New England, resided for a time in Cambridge, Boston, and Salisbury. His first wife was Mary, the daughter of Gov. Winthrop. He had fifteen children, and his descendants are numerous in New Hampshire. He was a man of capacity and learning.

DUDLEY, JOSEPH, governor of Massachusetts, the son of Gov. Thomas, died at Roxbury April 2, 1720, aged 72. He was born Sept. 23, 1647, when his father was 70 years of age. In his childhood, after his father's death, he was under the care of Mr. Allen, of Dedham, who married his mother. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1665. He afterwards entered into the service of his country in the Indian war of 1675. In 1682 he went to England as an agent for the province. When the government was changed in 1686 he was appointed president of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. His commission was received in May, 1686. His authority was of short continuance, for Andros arrived at the close of the same year. He, however, was continued in the council, and was appointed chief justice. In 1689 he went again to England, and in 1690 returned with a commission of chief justice of New York, and continued in this country three years. He was then eight years lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Wight. He was appointed governor of Massachusetts by Queen Anne, and, arriving at Boston June 11, 1702, continued in the government till Nov., 1715, being succeeded by Shute. He possessed rare endowments, and was a singular honor to his country, being a man of learning and an accomplished gentleman. He was a scholar, a divine, a philosopher, and a lawyer. As governor of Massachusetts he was instructed to procure an act rendering his salary and that of the lieutenant-governor permanent; the object was to secure the dependence of the governors on the crown. These instructions occasioned a controversy with the legislature, which lasted during the administration of Shute and others of his successors. He loved much ceremony in the government, and but little ceremony in the church, being attached to the Congregational order. He was a sincere Christian, whose virtues attracted general esteem, though in the conflict of political parties his character was frequently assailed. While in his family he devoutly addressed himself to the Supreme Being; he also frequently prayed with his children separately for their everlasting welfare, and did not think it humbling to impart religious instruction to his servants. He was economical and dignified, and he applied himself with great diligence to the duties of his station. — Colman's Funeral Sermon; Boston News-Letter, April 4, 1720; Hutchinson, I. 287, 340-345; II. 213; Belknap's New Hampshire, I. 361; Holmes; Minot's Contin. I. 59.

DUDLEY, THOMAS, son of Governor Joseph D., was born Feb. 26, 1670, and graduated at Harvard college in 1685. He published Massachusetts, or the first planters of New England.

DUDLEY, PAUL, F. R. S., chief justice of Massachusetts, the son of Gov. Joseph, died at Roxbury Jan. 21, 1751, aged 75. He was born Sept. 3, 1675, and graduated at Harvard college in 1690. He finished his law studies at the Temple in London. He returned in 1702 with the commission of attorney-general, which he held until he was appointed judge in 1718. He succeeded Lynde as chief justice, and was succeeded by Sewall. On the bench he was impartial; the stern enemy of vice; of quick apprehension, extensive knowledge, and powerful eloquence. He was a learned and pious man. From his regard to the interests of religion, and as a proof of his attachment to the institution in which he was educated, in his last will he bequeathed to Harvard college 100 pounds, the interest of which was to be applied to the support of an annual lecture to be preached in that college; the first lecture to be for proving and explaining, and for the proper use and improvement of the principles of natural religion; the second for the confirmation, illustration, and improvement of the great articles of the Christian religion; the third for detecting, convicting, and exposing the idolatry and tyranny, the damnable heresies, and abominable superstitions, and fatal and various errors of the Romish church; the fourth for maintaining, explaining, and proving the validity of the ordination of ministers, as the same has been practised in New England from the first beginning of it. These subjects were successively to occupy the lecture, and he who should be chosen for the last was directed to be a sound, grave, experienced divine, of at least forty years of age. A copy of each discourse is required to be left with the treasurer. The trustees are the president and senior tutor, the professor of divinity, the pastor of the first church in Cambridge, and the pastor of the first church in Roxbury. The first sermon on this foundation was preached by President Holyoke in May, 1755. The second, and the first that was published, was delivered by Mr. Barnard in 1756. Mr. Dudley published twelve articles in the transactions of the royal society in vols. 31, 34, and 39; among them an account of the making of maple sugar; of discovering the hive of bees in the woods; of the earthquake of New England; of the poison-wood tree; of the rattlesnake; of the Indian hot-houses and cures by sweating in hot turf; description of the moose deer; essay upon the natural history of whales. He published also an essay on the merchandise of slaves and souls of men, mentioned in Revelation XVIII. 13, with an application to the church of Rome. — Holmes; Appendix to Barnard's Duddleian Lecture.

DUDLEY, WILLIAM, colonel, the son of Gov. D., died in Roxbury Aug. 10, 1743, aged about 50. He graduated in 1704. His father sent him to Canada to negotiate an exchange of prisoners. His mission was well executed and successful. He brought back Rev. Mr. Williams, of Deerfield. He was the speaker of the house of representatives, and a fine orator. He was distinguished as an officer in the expedition against Port Royal. His wife was the daughter of Judge Davenport; his sons, Thomas and William, were graduates. — Eliot.

DUFFIELD, GEORGE, D. D., minister in Philadelphia, died Feb. 2, 1790, aged 57. After he became a preacher, he was first settled in the town of Carlisle, where his zealous and incessant labors, through the influence of the Divine Spirit, were made effectual to the conversion of many. So conspicuous was his benevolent activity, that the synod appointed him as a missionary, and he accordingly, in company with Mr. Beatty, visited the frontiers. His talents at length drew him into a more public sphere, and placed him as a pastor of the second Presbyterian church in Philadelphia. His zeal to do good exposed him to the disease of which he died. He possessed a vigorous mind, and was considerably distinguished as a scholar. As his readiness of utterance was seldom equalled, he was enabled to preach with uncommon frequency. As he possessed an unconquerable firmness, he always adhered steadily to the opinions which he had formed. In the struggle with Great Britain he was an early and zealous friend of his country. But it was as a Christian that he was most conspicuous, for the religion which he preached was exhibited in his own life. The spirit of the gospel tintured his whole mind. It rendered him the advocate of the poor, and the friend of the friendless. He sought occasions of advancing the interests of religion and humanity. As a preacher, he was in early life remarkably animated and popular, and his manner was always warm and forcible, and his instructions always practical. Dwelling much on the great and essential doctrines of the gospel, he had a peculiar talent of touching the conscience, and impressing the heart. He published an account of his tour with M. Beatty along the frontiers of Pennsylvania; a thanksgiving sermon for the restoration of peace, Dec. 11, 1783. — Green's Funeral Sermon; Assembly Miss. Mag. i. 553-556; American Museum, vii. 66-68.

DULANEY, DANIEL, an eminent counsellor of Maryland, resided at Annapolis, and died at an early stage of the Revolutionary war. He was considered as one of the most learned and accomplished men in his profession that our country ever produced. He made some publications on the controversy between America and Great Britain. The title of one of them is, Considerations on the propriety of imposing taxes in the British colonies in North America for the purpose of a revenue, 1766. — Miller's Retrospect. ii. 379.

DULANEY, THOMAS, died at Franklin, Miss., June 25, 1845, aged 36, a man of fine talents and an almost unequalled sufferer. For years he was confined to his bed, or his room, and his room was kept dark by reason of a neuralgic affection, which made a ray of light most painful. He was a member of the Episcopal church, and full of spiritual enjoyment. His case may well teach a lesson of gratitude to men who can bear to see the light, and may show also the power of religion in alleviating misery and triumphing over pain.

DUMMER, RICHARD, one of the first settlers of Newbury, died Dec. 14, 1679, aged 87. He came to this country in 1635. His lot consisted of three hundred acres near the falls. When in 1640 Gov. Winthrop suffered great loss by the misconduct of his bailiff, and the various towns sent in a contribution of 500 pounds, Mr. Dummer, in a more private way, with unequalled liberality, sent to him 100 pounds. The site of Dummer's academy formerly belonged to his plantation. — Eliot; Coffin's History of Newbury.

DUMMER, SHUBAEL, minister of York, Maine, was the son of Richard Dummer. He was born Feb. 17, 1636, graduated at Harvard college in 1656, and began to preach at York in 1662. He was not ordained, probably because a church was not organized, until Dec. 3, 1672. The town of York was surprised Monday, Feb. 5, 1692, by a party of French and Indians, who came on snowshoes, and burnt most of the houses, excepting the four garrison houses of Alcock, Preble, Harman, and Norton, and killed about seventy-five of the inhabitants, and carried as many into captivity. Mr. Dummer was shot down dead near his own door, aged 55. His wife was taken captive. His successor was S. Moody.

DUMMER, JEREMIAH, an agent of Massachusetts in England, and a distinguished scholar, died May 19, 1739, aged about 60. He was a native of Boston, the son of Jeremiah, and was the grandson of Richard Dummer. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1699. While a member of this seminary, he was pre-eminent for the brilliancy of his genius. His only competitor was Mr. John Bulkley, who surpassed him for solidity of judgment, but not in sprightliness of thought and wit. He soon afterwards went to Europe, and spent a number of years at the university of Utrecht, where he received a doctor's degree. He then returned to New England, but, finding no prospect of employment in this country that would be agreeable to him, he went to England, where he arrived a little before the change of Queen Anne's ministry. In 1710 he was appointed agent of Massachusetts, and his services were important till his dismissal in 1721. Contrary to the expectation of his countrymen, he devoted himself to the persons in power, and was an advocate of their measures. He was employed by Lord Bolingbroke in some secret negotiations, and had assurances of promotion to a place of honor and profit; but the death of the queen blasted all his hopes. If he had espoused a different side, it is thought that his great talents might have elevated him to some of the highest offices. His acquaintance with Bolingbroke perverted his religious sentiments and corrupted his manners; so that he, who had studied divinity, and who in youth, as appears by his diary, had a susceptible conscience, and was accustomed to the language of fervent prayer, through the contaminating influence of profligate great men became licentious in manners and a sceptic in religion. Yet he was miserable in his depravity, and confessed to a friend, that he wished to feel again the pure joys which he experienced when he breathed the air of New England. Though upon the change of times he deserted his patron, Lord Bolingbroke, in regard to politics, it is said that he adhered to his sentiments upon religion to the close of life. Few men exceeded him in quickness of thought, and in ease, delicacy, and fluency in speaking and writing. He published disputatio theologica de Christi ad inferos descensu, quam, indulgente Triuno Numine, sub præsidio clar. et celeberr. viri, D. D. Herm. Witsii, etc., 4to., 1702; de jure Judæorum sabbati brevis disquisitio, 4to., 1703; dissertatio theologico-philologica, 4to., 1703; disputatio philosophica inaug., 4to., 1703; a defence of the New England charters, 1721; a letter to a noble lord concerning the expedition to Canada, 1712. — Hist. Coll. x. 155; Hutchinson, II. 187, 255; Eliot.

DUMMER, WILLIAM, governor of Massachusetts, died at Boston Oct. 10, 1761, aged 82. He received a commission as lieutenant-governor at the time that Shute was appointed governor in 1716. At the departure of Shute, Jan. 1, 1723, he was left at the head of the province, and he continued commander-in-chief till the arrival of Burnet, in 1728. He was also commander-in-chief in the interval between his death and the arrival of Belcher. His administration is spoken of with great respect, and he is represented as governed by a pure regard to the public good. The war with the Indians was conducted with great skill, the Norridgewocks being cut off in 1724. From the year 1730 Gov. Dummer lived chiefly in retirement for the remainder of his life, selecting for his acquaintance and friends men of sense, virtue, and religion, and receiving the blessings and applauses of his country. He was sincerely and firmly attached to the religion of Jesus, and in the midst of human grandeur he was preparing for death. He attended with reverence upon the institutions of the gospel; he was constant in his family devotions; he applied himself to the perusal of pious books; and at stated times he retired to his closet for prayer. He was the brother of Jeremiah, or Jeremy, as usually called. By his last will he gave his valuable farm, and his mansion-house, which is yet standing, for the endowment of Dummer academy, which is in Byfield parish in the town of Newbury. It was opened Feb. 27, 1763, with 28 pupils, Samuel Moody the preceptor. On the occasion Moses Parsons preached a sermon from the words, "The liberal soul deviseth liberal things." It was the earliest academy in Massachusetts, and has been of great public benefit, and still flourishes. — Coffin's Hist. Newbury; Byles' Funeral Sermon; Boston Gazette, Oct. 26, 1761; Hutchinson, II. 291, 322, 368; Holmes.

DUNBAR, SAMUEL, minister in Stoughton, now Canton, died in 1783. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1723, and ordained Nov. 15, 1727, as the successor of Joseph Morse. He was a patriot. In 1755 he was a chaplain in the expedition against Crown Point; and he supported the rights of his country in the war for independence. He published a sermon at the artillery election, 1748; on brotherly love, 1749; righteousness by the law subversive of Christianity, 1751; at the election, 1760; at the ordination of E. Grosvenor, 1763.

DUNBAR, WILLIAM, a planter, died at his seat at Natchez Nov. 15, 1810. He was an astronomer, and distinguished for his researches in natural science. To the philosophical society of Philadelphia, of which he was a member, he made several communications, which are published in transact. vol. VI.; account of the language of signs among the Indians; meteor. observ., 1800; description of the Mississippi.

DUNBAR, ELIAH, a lawyer, died at Keene, N. H., May 18, 1847, aged 88; a graduate of Dartmouth in 1783.

DUNBAR, ELIAH, died in Milford, N. H., Sept. 3, 1850, aged about 80. Born in Stoughton, he graduated at Harvard in 1794, and was the minister of Peterborough, N. H., from 1799 to 1826. He published sermons at ordination of W. Ritchie, 1809; of J. Porter, 1814.

DUNCAN, JOHN M., died at Glasgow Oct. 3, 1825, aged 31 years. He published travels through parts of the United States and of Canada in 1818 and 1819, 2 vols. 12mo., 1823; also, Sabbath among the Tuscaroras.

DUNCAN, LUCIA, wife of Rev. A. G. Duncan, of Hanover, Mass., died in 1851, aged 56. By her father, Ellis Harlow, of Plymouth, she was descended from Gov. Carver, and by her mother, from Gov. Bradford; and she remarkably manifested in her life the piety of old Plymouth.

DUNCAN, JOSEPH, governor of Illinois, died at Jacksonville Jan. 15, 1844. He was in the army in the war of 1812.

DUNHAM, JOSIAH, died in Kentucky in 1844, aged about 75. He was the son of Deacon Daniel D., of Lebanon Crank, now Columbia, Conn., and grandson of Rev. Samuel Moseley, of Hampton. His wife was a sister of Levi Hedge. His sister Nancy married Dr. Deodatus Clark, who died in Oswego in 1848, aged 85. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1789, he was preceptor of Moor's school from 1789 to 1793. He then edited the Washingtonian at Windsor, Vt., four years. In the controversy at Dartmouth he was the firm friend of President Wheelock. He once held some public office at Michillimackinac. He published a masonic oration, 1796; on death of Washington, 1800; oration at Windsor, 1814; answer to the vindication of the trustees, 1816.

DUNKLIN, DANIEL, governor of Missouri, died in Jefferson county Aug. 25, 1844, aged 54.

DUNLAP, HUGH, died in Brunswick, Me., Dec. 13, 1850, aged 100.

DUNLAP, DAVID, a merchant, died in Brunswick in Feb., 1843, aged 65; a man highly respected and esteemed.

DUNLAP, ANDREW, a lawyer in Boston, died in 1835, aged about 40. He graduated at Harvard in 1813, and was district attorney. His speech in defence of A. Kneeland was published in 1834.

DUNLAP, WILLIAM, a portrait and historical painter, died in New York Sept. 28, 1839, aged 74. He was born in Perth Amboy, and studied under B. West. He published history of the American theatre; history of New York; history of the arts of design in America, and several dramas; also, memoirs of Charles B. Brown, and of George F. Cooke.

DUNLAVY, FRANCIS, judge, died at Lebanon, O., Nov. 5, 1839, aged 78, a native of Virginia. He was a soldier of the Revolution, one of the founders in 1791 at Columbia of the first Baptist church in the Northwest Territory, and a member of the Ohio convention. He loved books: he abhorred the slavery of his fellow-men.

DUNMORE, JOHN MURRAY, earl of, the last royal governor of Virginia, was the governor of New York from 1770 to 1771, and governor of Virginia from 1772 to 1775. In his zeal for his royal master he removed the public stores from Williamsburg on board of armed vessels, in April, 1775, and afterwards abdicated the government and retired for safety on board the Fowey man-of-war, at Yorktown. He landed in different places, acting the part of a corsair and plunderer. He burnt Norfolk, Jan. 1, 1776; but famine and disease obliged him to quit the coast. He was appointed in 1786 governor of Bermuda, and died in England in 1809. His wife was Lady Charlotte Stewart, daughter of the Earl of Gallogway. — Holmes, II. 219, 256.

DUNSTER, HENRY, first president of Harvard college, died Feb. 27, 1659. He was inducted into his office Aug. 27, 1640. He succeeded Nathaniel Eaton, who was the first master of the seminary, being chosen in 1637 or 1638, and who had been removed on account of the severity of his discipline. He was highly respected for his learning, piety, and spirit of government; but, having at length imbibed the principles of anti-pedobaptism, and publicly advocated them, he was induced to resign the presidency Oct. 24, 1654, and was succeeded by Mr. Chauncy. He now retired to Scituate, where he spent the remainder of his days in peace. His wife was the widow of Rev. Jesse Glover, who died at sea, on his passage to New England, in 1639. He was buried at Cambridge. He was a modest, humble, charitable man. By his last will he ordered his body to be buried at Cambridge, and bequeathed legacies to the very persons who had occasioned his removal from the college. He was a great master of the oriental languages, and, when a new version of the psalms had been made by Eliot, Welde, and Mather, and printed in 1640, it was put into his hands to be revised. He accordingly, with the assistance of Richard Lyon, improved the version, and brought it into that state in which the churches of New England used it for many subsequent years. — Mather's Magnalia, III. 99–101; IV. 128; Neal's New England, I. 308; H. Adams' New England, 73; Hutchinson, I. 174; Hist. Coll. VII. 20, 48, 49; Holmes; Morton.

DUNSTER, ISAIAH, minister in Harwich, now Brewster, died in 1791, aged about 70. He graduated at Harvard in 1741, and succeeded the first minister, Nathaniel Stone, who was pastor from 1700 to 1755. He published a sermon at the instalment of J. Green, Jr., 1763.

DUNTON, JOHN, a bookseller in Boston, died about 1725. He had conducted his business extensively in London, but in a time of embarrassment came to this country in March, 1686, with a stock of books, and for the purpose of collecting his debts, amounting to 500 pounds. He remained here eight months, and became acquainted with all the clergymen and the principal citizens. On his return to London he resumed his business there. He published in 1705 the life and errors of John Dunton, in which he gives an account of his voyage to Boston, a very amusing extract from which is in historical collections. He describes the ministers, booksellers, and other citizens of Boston and Salem. In his will he directed his burial to be "the seventh day after his death, and not before, lest he should come to life, as his mother had done, on the day appointed for her funeral."—Thomas, II. 415–420; 2 Hist. Coll. II. 97–124.

DUPONCEAU, PETER STEPHEN, died at Philadelphia April 2, 1844, aged nearly 84. A native of France, he came to this country as the aid of Steuben in 1778. After the war he was a distinguished lawyer in Philadelphia, and president of several learned societies. His researches in jurisprudence and philology were profound. He published a treatise on the structure of the Indian languages; a dissertation on the Chinese laws; on the early history of Pennsylvania; English phonology; eulogium on Tilghman; on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Penn's landing, and other writings.

DUPONT, E. I. DE NEMOURS, died of a disease of the heart at Philadelphia Oct. 31, 1834, aged 62. He came from France in 1800, and settled on the Brandywine, four miles from Wilmington. While at the head of an extensive and profitable business, indefatigably engaged, he did not fail to indulge the benevolent and generous feelings of his heart, and was abundant in his charities. His father, Peter S. Dupont De Nemours, after the return of Napoleon from Elba, came to Delaware, and died near Wilmington Aug. 6, 1817, aged 77. He was a distinguished and learned man, and published various articles in the American philosophical transactions, on vegetables, on the winds, on national education in America, and on the life of Barlow. His oldest son, Alfred Victor, died at Nemours, on the Brandywine, Oct. 4, 1856, aged 57.

DURELL, DANIEL M., judge, died in Dover, N. H., April 29, 1841, aged 71. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1794.

DURFEE, JOB, chief justice of Rhode Island, died at Tiverton July 26, 1847, aged 57. A graduate of Brown university in 1813. He was in congress in 1823, and chief justice in 1835. He published What cheer; or Roger Williams in exile; and Panidea.

DUSTON, HANNAH, the wife of Thomas D., of Haverhill, Mass., was married Dec. 3, 1677, and was the mother of thirteen children. When the Indians attacked Haverhill, March 15, 1698, her husband flew to his house and ordered his children to flee without delay. Before his wife, with an infant only a week old, could escape, the Indians approached. Mounting his horse and bearing his musket, he followed his seven young children as their defender. A party of the savages pursued and fired upon him, but he returned the fire, and by the favor of Providence conducted his little flock to a neighboring garrison. Mrs. Duston, with her infant, and her nurse, widow Mary Neff, was captured. At this time nine houses were burnt, and forty persons killed and carried into captivity. After proceeding a short distance the savages took the infant from the nurse and killed it. Mrs. D., after a fatiguing journey, was brought to an island just above Concord, N. H., formed at the junction of the Contocook river with the Merrimac, between Concord and Boseawen, now called Duston's Island. The Indian family, to which she had been assigned, consisted of twelve persons: two men, three women, and seven children. The prisoners in this family were three: Mrs. D., Mary Neff, and Samuel Lennardson, a boy, who had been taken at Worcester. Early in the morning of April 5, Mrs. D. awoke her confederates, and, seizing the hatchets of the Indians, who were asleep, dispatched ten of the twelve, a favorite boy being spared, and a wounded woman making her escape with him. Mrs. D. arrived safe at Haverhill, and for the scalps received 50 pounds from the general court, besides many valuable presents. In 1816 her house was standing, owned by Thomas Duston, a descendant.—2 Hist. Coll. IV. 128; Dwight, I. 411; Drake's Indian Wars, 316; Magnolia, VII. 90; Hutchinson, II. 101.

DUTTON, MATTHEW RICE, professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Yale college, died July 17, 1825, aged 42. He was born in Watertown, Conn., June 30, 1783, and graduated at Yale college in 1808. He was a tutor from 1810 to 1814. In this last year he was ordained the minister of Stratford, where he remained about eight years. After the death of Professor Fisher in 1822, he was chosen as his successor, and discharged the duties of his office, till his failing health, which had long been feeble, compelled him to desist from his labors. He died of a pulmonary complaint. With great scientific attainments he combined the most amiable manners, and the piety which sustained him in the hour of death. He published a work on conic sections, 1824.—N. H. Religious Intelligencer.

DUTTON, AARON, minister of Guilford, Conn., died in 1849, aged about 66. He was born in Watertown, graduated at Yale in 1803, and was settled in 1807 as successor of Israel Brainard. The first pastor was H. Whitfield in 1643. He published a sermon at the ordination of T. Ruggles, 1809.

DUTTON, NATHANIEL, a pioneer in the wilderness, the first settled minister in Jefferson county, died in Champion, N. Y., Sept. 9, 1852, aged 73. A native of Hartford, Vt., he was a graduate of Dartmouth in 1802, and was sent in 1805 by the Hampshire missionary society to preach in the Black River country. He was installed at C. in 1807. His labors were vast; the benefits of them incalculable. In one revival in 1817 there were added to his church one hundred and sixty-eight persons.

DUVAL, WILLIAM P., governor of Florida and of Texas, died at Washington March 19, 1854, aged 70. Born in Virginia, he removed to Kentucky, from which State he was a member of congress.

DUVALL, GABRIEL, died in Prince George's Co., Md., March 6, 1844, aged 93. He was a judge of the supreme court of the United States. He was of Huguenot descent; was comptroller of the treasury in 1802, and appointed judge in 1811, holding the office twenty years.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, died at Dedham Jan. 31, 1718, aged 88, the son of John, a first settler in 1635. He had six wives and fifteen children. His son by his wife, Anna Flint of Braintree, was Nathaniel, who lived in Northampton; as were also Josiah of Woodstock, and Henry of Hatfield, the ancestor of the Dwights of Springfield.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, colonel, of Northampton, the son of Nathaniel, died April 30, 1771, aged 76. He was surveyor, magistrate, and judge of probate. His daughter Eleanor married Gen. Phineas Lyman, of Suffield.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, the son of Col. Timothy D., died at Natchez June 10, 1772, aged 52. He lived at Northampton, and built the ancient house in King street. His wife was Mary, the daughter of President Edwards: she died in 1807, aged 72. His children were thirteen, among whom was President Dwight.

DWIGHT, JOSEPH, brigadier-general, died in Great Barrington June 9, 1765, aged 62. He was the son of Henry, who died in Hatfield, and grandson of the first Timothy. He was born in Dedham in 1703, and graduated at Harvard college in 1722. While residing in Brookfield, he was admitted to the bar in 1733; in 1739 he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for the county of Worcester; in 1745, at the reduction of Louisburg, he and Waldo were the brigadiers. He commanded the artillery of Massachusetts, and was distinguished for his exertions and services and commended by Pepperell. In 1756, at the head of a brigade of militia, he repaired to Lake Champlain, in the second French war. Soon after his return he purchased land in Great Barrington, and there passed the remainder of his life. In 1761, when the county of Berkshire was formed, he was appointed judge of the county court and judge of probate. By his second wife, the widow of Rev. J. Sergeant, he had two children, Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, and the second wife of Judge Sedgwick. His personal appearance was fine. He was dignified in his manners, an upright judge, and an exemplary professor of the religion of the gospel. — Hist. Berkshire, 233.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, D. D., LL. D., president of Yale college, died Jan. 11, 1817, aged 64. He was a descendant, in the fifth generation, from Timothy Dwight, who died in Dedham, Mass., Jan. 31, 1718, aged 83, and whose father, John, settled at Dedham in 1635, and died in 1653. The names of his ancestors are John, Timothy, Nathaniel, Col. Timothy, Major Timothy. Three successive Timothys raked hay together. His father was Major or Col. Timothy Dwight, a graduate of Yale college in 1744, and a respectable, pious merchant of Northampton, where he lived many years until, in 1776, in order to provide for the settlement of two of his sons, he repaired to the territory of the Natchez, of which he was one of the original purchasers with Gen. Lyman, his brother-in-law, and died there in 1776. His mother was Mary, the third daughter of Jonathan Edwards. He was born at Northampton May 14, 1752. The religious impressions, made upon his mind by the instructions of his intelligent and excellent mother, were never effaced; she also very successfully directed his early studies. In his fourth year he could read the Bible with correctness. While in Yale college, where he was graduated in 1769, for the two first years, through the folly of youth, much of his time was misspent; but during the two last years he was diligent, devoting fourteen hours each day to study, and made great acquisitions. From 1769 to 1771, he taught a grammar school at New Haven, and during this period appropriated eight hours every day to severe study. In 1771, at the age of nineteen, he was chosen a tutor in the college, and continued in that office with high reputation six years. While he was eminent as a teacher of mathematics, guiding his pupils in fluxions and in the principia of Newton, he awakened a new zeal in the cultivation of rhetoric and oratory. On taking his second degree in 1772, he delivered a dissertation on the history, eloquence, and poetry of the Bible, which was immediately published, and procured him great honor. At this period, in his economy of time, he endeavored to remove the necessity of bodily exercise by diminishing greatly the quantity of food; but in a few months his health began to decline. He was emaciated, and had suffered severely by the bilious colic. With difficulty was he removed to Northampton. But, by advice of a physician, he commenced a daily course of vigorous bodily exercise, walking and riding; and, persevering in it, enjoyed uninterrupted health for forty years. In 1774, at the age of twenty-two, he finished his epic poem, "The Conquest of Canaan," which he had begun three years before. On recovering from the small pox, his incautious return to his study injured his eyes, which caused him for the remainder of his life great pain. In March, 1777, he married the daughter of Benjamin Woolsey, of Long Island, by whom he had eight sons, six of whom survived him. In June he was licensed as a preacher; and in September he withdrew from the college, and was appointed chaplain to Gen. Parsons' brigade in Putnam's division, in which capacity he continued about a year. He joined the army at West Point in Oct. While he discharged his appropriate duties, he also employed his poetical powers for the good of his country. Of his poetical songs at that period, his "Columbia" is still remembered. On receiving, in Oct., 1778, the news of the death of his father in the preceding year, he was induced to leave the army and to remove his family to Northampton, that he might console his mother and provide for her numerous family. For five years he here discharged with the utmost fidelity and cheerfulness the duties of a son and a brother, laboring personally on a farm, preaching occasionally in the neighboring towns of Westfield, Deerfield, and South Hadley, superintending also a school. His income he expended in the support of the common family. In 1781 and 1786 he was a member of the legislature. With many and strong motives to devote himself to civil employments, he yet resolved to spend his days in the clerical profession. He was ordained, Nov. 5, 1783, the minister of Greenfield, a parish of Fairfield, and continued in this station for the next twelve years. His method of preaching was to write the heads of his discourse and the leading thoughts, and to fill up the plan at the time of delivery. With a small salary of 500 dollars he found it necessary to make other provision for his family. He opened an academy, which was filled with pupils of both sexes, and which was highly celebrated during the whole period of his residence in Greenfield. In 1785 he published his "Conquest of Canaan," which had been written eleven years before, and for which three thousand subscribers had been obtained. In 1794 he published his poem, in seven parts, called "Greenfield Hill." After the death of Dr. Stiles he was chosen president of Yale college, and inaugurated in Sept., 1795. For ten years he was annually appointed professor of theology. In 1805 the appointment was made permanent. Having, while at Greenfield, written in short notes and preached over twice a course of lectures on systematic theology in about one hundred sermons, he went through with them twice in the same state at New Haven, frequently adding to their number. In 1805 he began, by the aid of an amanuensis, to write out these sermons, and finished them in 1809. After his death they were published in 5 vols., being one hundred and seventy-three sermons. In 1800 was completed his revision of Watts' psalms, to which he added thirty-three psalms, which he had composed. In 1796 he commenced journeying in the college vacations of May and September, in New England and New York, and continued this practice till the last year of his life, taking notes, which he afterwards wrote out. This was the origin of his book of travels, published in 4 vols. The last journey which he made was in September, 1815, when he proceeded as far west as Hamilton college, near Utica. In February, 1816, he was seized with a most threatening disease, an affection of the bladder; in April he was deemed beyond recovery. Under all his suffering he was patient and resigned. But in June he was able again to preach in the chapel, and in his first sermon he alluded to his impression in his sickness of the vanity of all earthly things. He said, "I have coveted reputation and influence to a degree which I am unable to justify;" and he earnestly warned his pupils against the pursuit of earthly enjoyments. Though he resumed his labors, yet his disease was only mitigated, not removed. During the last few months of his life, he wrote on the evidences of revelation and other subjects, — the whole forming matter for a volume. He wrote also the latter half of a poem of fifteen hundred lines, in the measure of Spenser, the subject of which is a contest between genius and common sense on their comparative merits, the question being decided by truth. At the close of November, he became too unwell to continue his labors as an instructor in college. His widow, Mary, died Oct. 5, 1845, aged 91.

A full account of the character and labors of Dr. Dwight may be found in his life, prefixed to his system of theology. Besides his printed works, he wrote also discourses, preached on the Sabbath before commencement to the senior class, and many miscellaneous sermons, which, it is hoped, may be given to the public. The following is a catalogue of his publications: the history, eloquence, and poetry of the Bible, 1772; the conquest of Canaan, a poem, 1785; election sermon, 1791; the genuineness and authenticity of the New Testament, 1793; Greenfield Hill, a poem, 1794; the triumph of infidelity, a poem, occasioned by Chauncy's work on universal salvation; two discourses on the nature and danger of infidel philosophy; a sermon on the death of Elizur Goodrich, 1797; the duty of Americans at the present crisis, 1798; on the character of Washington, 1800; on some events of the last century, 1801; on the death of E. G. Marsh, 1804; on duelling, 1805; at the theological institution at Andover, and ordination of E. Pearson, 1808; on the death of Gov. Trumbull, 1809; a charity sermon, 1810; at the ordination of N. W. Taylor; on the fast; on the national fast, 1812; a sermon before the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, 1813; remarks on the review of Inehiquin's letters, 1815; observations on language, and an essay on light, in memoirs of Conn. academy of sciences, 1816; theology explained and defended in a series of sermons, 4 vols., several editions, American and English; travels in New England and New York, 4 vols., 8vo., 1801. — Life; Preface to his Theology; Spec. American Poetry, 1, 223.

DWIGHT, THEODORE, died in New York June 11, 1846, aged 81, the brother of President D., and born in Northampton. He studied law with his uncle, Pierpont Edwards. After having been a member of congress, he conducted the Hartford Mirror, encouraged by Pickering, Cabot, and Hillhouse. He published a history of the Hartford convention, of which he was the secretary. After editing the Albany Daily Advertiser, he established, in 1817, the New York Daily Advertiser. He was a true patriot and Christian, and was one of the founders and directors of the American bible society. He published orations 1798, 1801; history of the Hartford convention, 1833. — Sigourney's P. Meridian, 188.

DWIGHT, ELIZABETH, wife of the missionary, H. G. O. Dwight, died of the plague at Constantinople, July 8, 1836, aged 30. Her name was Elizabeth Barker, of Andover. Her memoir was published in 1840, with a sketch of the life of Mrs. Grant.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, died in New Haven June 13, 1844, aged 66. He was the eldest son of Dr. Dwight, for forty years a merchant, and a man of integrity and benevolence. His wife, Clarissa, daughter of Gov. C. Strong, died Feb. 25, 1855, aged 71.

DWIGHT, SARAH HOOKER, died in New Haven May 8, 1838, aged 15, daughter of Timothy Dwight, a member of the Free church. She departed, like a multitude of other subjects of God's grace and objects of his love, in the early hour of life, —

“As sets the morning star, which goes
Not down behind the darken'd west, nor hides
Obscur'd among the tempests of the sky,
But melts away into the light of heaven.”

DWIGHT, EDWIN W., minister of Richmond, Mass., died at Stockbridge Feb., or March 26, 1841, aged 50. He was the son of Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, who died in 1804, and the grandson of Gen. Joseph D. A graduate of Yale in 1809, he was ordained in 1819, and was a faithful and useful minister. His brother, Henry W. D., a member of congress from Berkshire from 1821 to 1831, died in New York, Feb. 21, 1845.

DWIGHT, THEODORE SEDGWICK, pastor of a colored Presbyterian church in New York, died in that city March 25, 1847, aged 49.

DWIGHT, EDMUND, died in Boston April 1,

1849, aged 69, a patron of learning. Born in Springfield, a graduate of Yale in 1799, he was a merchant and manufacturer in Springfield; afterwards a resident in Boston and a senator. He was president of the Western railroad. He made the liberal donation of 10,000 dollars for normal schools in Massachusetts.

DWIGHT, BENJAMIN WOOLSEY, M. D., died at Clinton, N. Y., May 18, 1850, aged 70, the son of President D. A graduate of Yale in 1799, he studied physic and practised some years in Catskill. Ill health led him to other employments: he was a hardware merchant in New York, then fourteen years a merchant in Catskill. In 1831 he removed to Clinton and was treasurer of Hamilton college. He was a man of eminent Christian character. — Independent, June 27.

DWIGHT, WILLIAM, Dr., son of Cecil D. of Northampton and nephew of Rev. Dr. D. of New Haven, was killed at Norwalk, with forty-four others, May 6, 1853, by the railroad train plunging into the river, in consequence of the draw of the bridge being carelessly left open. His brother, Timothy, died at New York, preparing to be a missionary.

DWIGHT, NATHANIEL, a preacher, died at Oswego June 11, 1831, aged 68. He was born in Northampton; had an honorary degree at Yale in 1815; was settled in West Chester in Colchester, in 1812; and removed to Oswego. He published a school geography, 1796; 5th edition, 1811.

DWIGHT, HENRY E., son of President D., died in New Haven Aug. 11, 1831, aged 35. A graduate of Yale in 1815, he published travels in the north of Germany in 1825-6.

DWIGHT, ABIGAIL, widow of Henry W. D., died in Stockbridge May 31, 1840, aged 77. She was of eminent character and usefulness. Her name was Wells of West Hartford. Her sons were men of eminence. — Boston Recorder, Nov. 20, 1840.

DWIGHT, ROBERT O., missionary, died at Madura Jan. 7, 1844. A native of Northampton, a descendant of President Edwards, he graduated at Andover seminary in 1834, and arrived at Madura in 1836. His wife was Mary Billings of Conway.

DWIGHT, MARGARETTE, died at Northampton Sept. 5, 1845, aged 41. She was many years the excellent teacher of the female Gothic seminary in Northampton. She was the daughter of Josiah and Rhoda Dwight, and a descendant of President Edwards.

DWIGHT, SERENO EDWARDS, D. D., minister in Boston, died in Philadelphia Nov. 30, 1850, aged 65. He was the son of President Dwight, born at Greenfield Hill; was graduated in 1803, was a tutor from 1806 to 1810, then a lawyer for nearly ten years. Afterwards he was pastor of Park street church in Boston for several years, succeeding Dr. Griffin. In 1825, in ill health, he made a voyage to Europe. Having resigned his place in Boston, he opened in New Haven a high school in 1828, with his brother Henry. From 1833 to 1836 he was the president of Hamilton college. His wife, Susan Edwards Daggett, died in Aug., 1839. After great bodily and mental suffering he followed her to the grave. He published Hebrew wife; a single sermon; a life of Brainerd; and a life of Edwards, in his works, which he edited.

DWIGHT, ELIHU, Dr., died at South Hadley, Mass., June 1, 1854, aged 91. He commenced practice at South Hadley in 1793.

DWIGHT, JOSIAH, Dr., died at Portsmouth May 25, 1855, aged 72.

DWIGHT, JOHN BREED, died at New Haven Oct. 20, 1843, aged 21, a tutor in Yale college. He was stabbed by a student three weeks before his death. He was the son of John Dwight and Susan Breed, and grandson of President Dwight; a graduate of Yale in 1840, of the first distinction as a scholar, a man of piety and high promise. While discharging his duty in suppressing a disturbance at half-past nine in the evening of Sept. 30th, a student wounded him dangerously three times with a knife; the wound was followed by a fatal fever. The student, Lewis Fassett, the son of a rich man in Philadelphia, was admitted to bail in the sum of 5000 dollars; and, instead of being punished for manslaughter or murder, was, to the dishonor of justice, allowed to escape without a trial.

DWIGHT, LOUIS, secretary of the prison discipline society, died in Boston July 12, 1854, aged 61. Born in Stockbridge, he was graduated at Yale in 1813. He was the secretary of the prison discipline society, and the agent of various benevolent societies. His wife, Louisa, daughter of Nathaniel Willis, died in 1849.

DYCKMAN, JACOB, M. D., was born at Yonkers, Westchester county, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1788. After graduating at Columbia college in 1810, he studied physic with Dr. Hosack. For some years he was physician of the city dispensary, and surgeon of the alms-house at New York; in 1821 he was appointed health commissioner. He died of the consumption at the residence of his father at King's Bridge, Dec. 5, 1822, in Christian composure. In the days of his health he had regarded morality as all that religion demanded; but in his sickness he perceived, that the divine commands in the Scripture are the measure of duty, and that God demands the homage of the heart. He published a dissertation on the pathology of the human fluids; an improved edition of Duncan's dispensatory, 1818; an essay on adipocire, in trans. N. Y. Lyceum. He also had made progress in collecting materials for a work on the vegetable materia medica of the United States. — Thacher's Med. Biog.

DYER, MARY, a victim of persecution, was the wife of William Dyer, who removed from Massachusetts to Rhode Island in 1638. Having been sentenced to execution for "rebellious sedition and obtruding herself after banishment upon pain of death," she was reprieved at the request of her son, on condition that she departed in forty-eight hours and did not return. She returned, and was executed June 1, 1660.

DYER, ELIPHALET, chief justice of the supreme court of Conn., died at Windham May 13, 1807, aged 86. He was the son of Thomas D. of Windham, and grandson of Thomas D. of Weymouth in 1632, and graduated at Yale college in 1740. He was colonel of a regiment raised in 1758 for the expedition against Crown Point. He was a delegate to the congress of 1765 and to that of 1774; was appointed judge in 1766, and chief justice in 1789, in which office he continued till 1797. He contributed his efforts with other patriots to promote and support the independence of his country.

EAMES, THOMAS, a Baptist minister, died in Appleton, Mass., in 1826, aged 85. He formerly preached in Isleborough, Me., and was an excellent man and an acceptable preacher.

EARLE, JAMES, a portrait painter, was born at Paxton, or Leicester, Mass., the son of Capt. Ralph Earle, and went to London, where he gained some distinction as a painter, and where he married. He died at Charleston of the yellow fever in Aug., 1796, leaving in London a wife and three children. At the time of his death there was perhaps no painter in this country of superior skill.

EARLE, RALPH, a portrait painter, brother of the preceding, was born at Leicester, and was employed in Rhode Island in making fans before he went to England. He was with Stewart at the royal institution in London. He painted the king. By Stewart he was regarded as one of the best of painters. In this country he painted in Bennington and Albany. He died at Bolton, Conn., Aug. 16, 1801, aged 50. A son of his afterwards lived at New Orleans, also a distinguished painter.

EARLE, PLINY, died at Leicester in Dec., 1832, aged 70. He belonged to the society of Friends; and was an ingenious cardmaker.

EARLE, RICHARD T., chief judge of the second district, Maryland, died in Centreville Nov. 22, 1843, aged 76. He practised law from 1787 to 1810, and then was judge till his resignation in 1834. He was an eminent man. Reverencing the Christian religion, he experienced its consolations in his last hours.

EARLY, PETER, governor of Georgia, died Aug. 15, 1817. He was a distinguished lawyer.

In 1802, he was a member of congress and a decided republican; in 1807 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Georgia. From 1813 to 1815 he was governor, in which capacity he prevented the enactment of a law to obstruct the collection of debts, and thus placed a good example before those governors, who from love of popularity or office shrink from the honest discharge of duty, which requires them to resist, as far as they have power, all pernicious, oppressive, iniquitous legislation.

EASTBURN, JOSEPH, a preacher to seamen in Philadelphia, died Jan. 30, 1828, aged 79. Many thousands attended his funeral. His coffin was carried by twelve sailors. At the grave Dr. Green delivered an address. When he began to preach to seamen, about 1820, "we procured," he said, "a sail-loft, and on the Sabbath hung out a flag. As the sailors came by, they hailed us, 'Ship ahoy!' We answered them. They asked us, 'Where we were bound?' We told them, to the port of New Jerusalem; and that they would do well to go in the fleet. 'Well,' said they, 'we will come in and hear your terms.'" This was the beginning of the mariner's church. Mr. E. was eminently pious, and devoted to this work.

EASTBURN, JAMES WALLIS, a poet, the son of James Eastburn, New York, at an early period was settled or about to be settled as the pastor of St. George's church, Accomac county, Virginia, and died at sea on a voyage to the West Indies for his health, Dec. 2, 1819, aged 22. After his death the poem, which he wrote in conjunction with his friend, Robert C. Sands, was published, entitled, Yamoyden, a tale of the wars of king Philip, in six cantos, 12mo., 1820. — Specimens American Poetry, II. 228.

EASTMAN, JOB, died in Norway, Me., 1845, aged 95. He held three hundred justice's courts.

EASTON, NICHOLAS, governor of Rhode Island, came to this country with two sons in 1636, and removed in 1639 to Newport, where he built the first house. He exerted himself to secure civil and religious liberty with Coddington, and was governor from 1650 to 1655, when he was succeeded by R. Williams. In 1672 he succeeded B. Arnold and was succeeded in 1674 by W. Coddington. He died in 1675, aged 83. His son, John, governor from 1690 to 1695, died in 1705, aged 85.

EASTON, JAMES, colonel, a soldier of the Revolution, died at Pittsfield after the war. He was a representative and a deacon of the church. With Arnold and Brown he was engaged in the capture of Ticonderoga May 10, 1775, and was sent with the intelligence to the provincial assembly of Massachusetts at Watertown. Jan. 9, 1776, congress voted their approbation of his good conduct. Dr. Timothy Childs married his daughter.

EASTON, VIOLETTE, a colored woman, died at Providence, R. I., March 6, 1838, aged, as was supposed, 110.

EATON, THEOPHILUS, first governor of New Haven colony, died Jan. 7, 1657, aged 66. He was born at Stony-Stratford in Oxfordshire, his father being the minister of that place. He was bred a merchant, and was for several years agent for the king of England at the court of Denmark; and after his return prosecuted his business in London with high reputation. He accompanied Mr. Davenport to New England in 1637, and soon after his arrival was chosen one of the magistrates of Massachusetts. He was one of the founders of New Haven in 1638, and was annually elected governor till his death. His brother, Samuel, was assistant minister to Mr. Davenport from 1640 to 1644, and died in England in 1665. The wisdom and integrity of his administration attracted universal respect. As a magistrate, he was impartial in the distribution of justice, and was invested with an indescribable dignity and majesty. He was amiable in all the relations of life. In conversation he was affable, courteous, and pleasant, but always cautious, and grave on proper occasions. Though his family were sometimes very numerous, it was under the most perfect government. All the members of it were assembled morning and evening, and the governor, after reading the Scriptures, and making useful observations upon them, addressed himself to heaven with the greatest reverence and pertinency. On the Sabbath and on other days of public devotion he spent an hour or two with his family, giving them instruction in religious truth and duty, recommending to them the study of the Scriptures, and the practice of secret prayer. He was beloved by his domestics, and ever preserved the esteem of the commonwealth. His monument, erected at the public expense, and which remains to the present day, has upon it the following lines:

"Eaton, so meek, so fam'd, so just,
The phoenix of our world, here hides his dust;
This name forget New England never must."

EATON, SAMUEL, minister of Harpswell, Maine, was the son of Elisha Eaton, minister of Quincy, and afterwards of Harpswell from 1753 till his death, April 22, 1764. He was born April 3, 1737; graduated at Harvard college in 1763; was ordained Oct. 24, 1764; and died Nov. 5, 1822, aged 85, in the fifty-ninth year of his ministry. Probably no minister in Maine had preached so many years. Mr. Eaton was the only physician of the town; as a magistrate he was also very useful. He was the last of the ministers of Maine who wore a large white wig.

He one Sabbath morning preached at Brunswick, when the judges of the supreme court of Massachusetts, then including the district of Maine, were present, whose custom, he knew, was to prosecute their journey in the afternoon, in order to open the court at Wiscasset on Monday. In his prayer, therefore, he gave thanks to the Lord, that the judges of the supreme court, those eminent men, had set such a good example to all the people, as to stop travelling and come up to the house of God to worship, etc. They found themselves obliged to rest in the afternoon as well as the forenoon. He was one of the first overseers of Bowdoin college, and president of the Maine missionary society from 1809 to 1815. The evangelical doctrines, which he preached, sustained him as he approached the grave. He published a sermon on the death of Jacob Abbot, 1820. — Allen's Funeral Sermon.

EATON, WILLIAM, general, died at Brimfield, Mass., June 1, 1811, aged 47. He was born in Woodstock, Conn., Feb. 23, 1764. His father, a farmer and schoolmaster, removed to Mansfield about 1774. At the age of sixteen he eloped from home and enlisted in the army, from which he was discharged in 1783. He afterwards studied with the ministers of Franklin, Windham, and Mansfield, and was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1790. By keeping school he provided for the expenses of his education. In 1792 he was appointed a captain in the army, and soon repaired to Ohio. He continued in service until July 11, 1797, when he was appointed consul at Tunis, though he did not sail till Dec., 1798, in company with Mr. Cathcart, consul to Tripoli. When the efforts of Com. Preble proved unavailing to humble the bashaw of Tripoli, Mr. Eaton projected an alliance with his brother, Hamet, the rightful sovereign, then in exile at Tunis, the object of which was to recover for him the sovereignty and with him to establish a permanent peace. The plan was approved; and, as he had returned to the United States in May, 1803, he was appointed navy agent March 30, 1804, and authorized to proceed again to the Mediterranean and to execute the project against Tripoli. He sailed in the squadron of Com. Barron. In Nov. he proceeded in the Argus to Alexandria, in search of Hamet, whom at last he found in Feb., 1805. By their united exertions a little army of five hundred men was raised. March 6th he entered the desert of Lybia at their head, it being arranged that the American fleet should co-operate in the expedition. In his army were men of twelve different nations, among whom were eleven Americans, and seventy or eighty Greeks and Frenchmen. After surmounting great obstacles, and marching fifty days over a space of six hundred miles in the desert, he encamped, April 26, in the rear of Derne. This town was the capital of the richest province of Tripoli. It contained fifteen thousand souls, and was defended by a fort and batteries, and strong garrison. Eaton, with an army now increased by the addition of Arabs to twenty-five hundred men, commenced the attack on the 27th, with the important aid of three frigates. In two hours the town was captured. He was wounded in the left wrist by a pistol-ball. A large army, collected by Jussuf or Joseph Bashaw, soon appeared before the town, and was defeated in a battle May 13; and met with a complete repulse June 10, and thus a way was opened to the gates of Tripoli. At this moment, when the intrepid soldier was anticipating the accomplishment of his project, a peace was concluded by Tobias Lear, who had authority for the purpose, and he agreed to pay 60,000 dollars for the redemption of three hundred Americans in slavery. The indignant feelings of Eaton at being thus arrested in his career of triumph were unutterable. After his return he was invited by Burr to engage in his conspiracy, which he dislosed, and was a witness against the conspirator. From the United States government he failed to obtain the compensation he expected. In 1807 he was a representative from Brimfield. In reward of his heroism, the legislature of Massachusetts presented him with ten thousand acres of land, half of which was sold at fifty cents per acre. The last years of his life were passed amidst the pains of disease and the distresses of poverty, to which his own imprudence had reduced him. He was intemperate. Of the consolations of religion he was ignorant. He left five children. His wife, Eliza, whom he married in 1792, was the widow of Gen. Timothy Danielson of Brimfield. A daughter, now deceased, married in 1820 Rev. Mr. Sprague of West Springfield. His eldest son, Lieut. William, died in 1828. His life, written by Prentice, was published, 8vo., 1813.

EATON, SAMUEL, died in Denton, Lancashire, England, in 1664, aged 68. He was a colleague minister with Mr. Davenport at New Haven, in 1638, and was the brother of Gov. Eaton. He was more democratic in his notions than Mr. D., and wished to retain in the hands of the free planters the power of choosing magistrates, instead of intrusting it to others. In 1640 he went to England in order to gather a company for the settlement of Branford. But he was settled in Cheshire, until ousted by the act of uniformity in 1662. He published various treatises in defence of Congregationalism, and against the Quakers. — Calamy; Bacon's Hist. Discourses, 61.

EATON, JOSHUA, first minister of Spencer, Mass., graduated at Harvard college in 1735; studied law with Judge Trowbridge, and settled in the practice at Worcester; was ordained Nov. 7, 1744; and died April 2, 1772. A son and grandson were physicians. A volume of seven sermons was published, with a memoir by Mr. Forbes, 8vo., 1773.

EATON, ABIGAIL, widow, died at Prospect, Me., Sept., 1823, aged 102 years and 9 months.

EATON, AMOS, professor in the Rensselaer institute, died at Troy, N. Y., May 10, 1842, aged 65. In 1791 he was an apprenticed blacksmith; in 1799 he was graduated at Williams college, and afterwards studied law under Hamilton, and was admitted to the bar. Then he became a land-surveyor and agent for the Livingston estates on the Hudson. A period of affliction followed, occasioned by his own misconduct. He then studied botany, chemistry, and mineralogy, at Yale college. In 1817 he lectured at Williams college on the national sciences. In 1818 De Witt Clinton invited him to deliver public lectures at Albany. In 1820 Gen. S. Van Rensselaer employed him to make a geological survey of the country adjoining the great western canal; the result was published in 1824, in 160 pages. By the munificence of Mr. Van R., the school at Troy was established and Mr. E. was appointed senior professor. He made the classes experimenters. Hundreds from various States were educated by him. He published a manual of botany, which, in 8th edit., is called North American botany. His index to the geology of the northern States, 1818, and 2d edition, 1820; philosophical instructor, 1824; and various papers in Silliman's journal.

EATON, PETER, D. D., died at Boxford, Mass., April 14, 1848, aged 82. Born in Haverhill, he graduated at Harvard in 1787, and was fifty-seven years a pastor. He published thanksgiving sermon, 1799; at election, 1819; at installation of H. C. Perley; at ordination of P. S. Eaton, 1826; address to agricultural society, 1823.

ECCLESTON, SAMUEL, Catholic archbishop, died in Georgetown, D. C., April 8, 1851, aged 50. He was of Protestant birth and was sent to St. Mary's college, Baltimore. He succeeded Archbishop Whitfield in 1834.

ECKFORD, HENRY, died at Constantinople Nov. 11, 1832. He was an enterprising and distinguished citizen of New York.

ECKLEY, JOSEPH, D. D., minister of Boston, died April 30, 1811, aged 60. He was born in London Oct. 22, 1750. His father removing to New Jersey about 1767, he was graduated at Princeton college in 1772. He was ordained at Boston, as the successor of Mr. Hunt, over the old South congregation, Oct. 27, 1779. The society at this time made use of the King's chapel, as the old south meeting-house, after being occupied by the British troops, was not repaired and re-occupied till March 2, 1783. Rev. Joshua Huntington was ordained as colleague pastor May 18, 1808. Dr. Eckley died after a short illness. His wife, a daughter of John Jeffries, survived him, and died in 1825. During twenty-four years, he admitted, on an average, only about five persons a year into the church; but in 1803 and 1804 he made new efforts to promote a revival of religion among his people; the Tuesday evening meeting, amidst much opposition, was established, exerting a most important, beneficial influence. In his religious sentiments, while Dr. Eckley held fast to all the other doctrines of the evangelical system, he became a semi-Arian or Worcesterian in his views of the person or Christ. He wrote as follows: "My plan respecting the Son of God was very similar to what your brother (Dr. N. Worcester) has now adopted. The common plan of three self-existent persons, forming one essence or infinite being, and one of these persons being united to a man, but not in the least humbling himself or suffering, leads to, and ends in, Socinianism; and, though it claims the form of orthodoxy, it is as a shadow without the substance; it eludes inspection; and I sometimes say to those, who are strenuous for this doctrine, that they take away my Lord and I know not where they place him." "The orthodoxy, so called, of Waterland, is as repugnant to my reason and views of religion, as the heterodoxy of Lardner; and I am at a loss to see, that any solid satisfaction, for a person, who wishes to find salvation through the death of the Son of God, can be found in either." "I seek for a plan, which exalts the personal character of the Son of God in the highest possible degree." He supposed the Son to be derived from the Father, God of God, Light of Light, having a real Divine nature, yet being derived, not self-existent and independent. He published an essay on the Divine glory in the condemnation of the ungodly, 1782; at the artillery election, 1792; at the installation of Mr. Evans; at the thanksgiving, 1797; before the Asylum, 1802; before the society for propagating the gospel, 1805; at installation of H. Holly, in 1809; Dudleian lecture of 1806, 1810. — Wisner's Hist. of the Old South Church, 45.

EDDY, JOHN H., died Dec. 22, 1817, aged 35. He published a circular map of thirty miles around New York, 1814; a map of the western part of New York; a map to illustrate the communication between lake Erie and the Hudson; and a map of the State of New York.

EDDY, JOSHUA, a soldier of the Revolution, died at Middleborough, Mass., May 1, 1833, aged 85. He was the son of Zachariah E. and Mercy Morton, a descendant of George M., the brother-in-law of Gov. Bradford. He was a descendant of William E., a nonconformist minister in Cranbrook, Ky. His wife, Lydia Paddock, was a descendant of Gov. B. In 1777 he raised and commanded a company, and he fought in several battles. As an eminent Christian he was as bold against the enemies of God, as he had been against the enemies of his country.

EDDY, SAMUEL, LL. D., died at Providence Feb. 2, 1839, aged 68. He was a member of congress; secretary of State twenty-one years; chief justice of Rhode Island eight years. He published antiquities, etc.

EDDY, JOANNA, Mrs., died at New Salem, Mass., Nov. 6, 1839, aged 100.

EDES, BENJAMIN, a printer in Boston, died in Dec., 1803, aged 80. He was a native of Charlestown, and began business in 1755 with John Gill. He published the Boston Gazette and Country Journal. During the controversy with Great Britain this paper was devoted to the cause of freedom, and had a wide circulation and great influence. No newspaper did more to promote independence. Afterwards, other papers in a great measure superseded it. By the depreciation of paper money, Mr. Edes lost his property; and the aged patriot died in poverty. — Thomas, I. 341-345.

EDMOND, WILLIAM, a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut, died at Newton, Conn., Aug. 1, 1838, aged 80. He graduated at Yale in 1777, and had been a member of congress.

EDSON, CALVIN, "a living skeleton," died at Randolph, Vt., Sept., 1833; his weight was forty-five pounds. There was a constriction of his thoracic duct.

EDWARDS, RICHARD, a merchant, the only child of William and Agnes Edwards, was born in May, 1647, at Hartford, Conn., where he resided during his life. His grandfather was Richard Edwards, of London, who, it is supposed by Dr. Tryon Edwards, was the son of Rev. R. E., of Oxford. He was a man of wealth, of intelligence, and of great respectability. At an early age he became a communicant in the Congregational church, and adorned his profession by a long life of integrity and unusual devotedness to the cause of religion. During his last sickness he exhibited a bright example of Christian resignation and triumphant faith. He died April 20, 1718, aged 70. By his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Wm. Tuthill, merchant, of New Haven, he had seven children, the eldest of whom was Rev. Timothy E., the father of Jonathan Edwards. By his second wife, the sister of John Talcott of Hartford, he had six children. — Sereno E. Dwight's Life of Edwards.

EDWARDS, TIMOTHY, first minister of East Windsor, Conn., the son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1691. He was ordained in May, 1694. In the year 1755 he received Joseph Perry as his colleague. After a ministry of sixty-three years he died Jan. 27, 1758, aged 88. He married a daughter of Mr. Stoddard of Northampton, and he lived to see his son, Jonathan Edwards, the most distinguished divine in America. He was universally esteemed, and was an upright, pious, and exemplary man, and a faithful and successful preacher of the gospel. At one period there was such a contention in his church, that for three years the Lord's Supper was not administered. It seems that he was a poet, for R. Wolcott, in dedicating his poems to him in 1723, says :

"Yet, where you censure, sir, don't make the verse,
You pinned to Glover's venerable hearse,
The standard for their trial; nor enact,
You never will acquit what 's less exact.
Sir, that will never do; rules so severe
Would ever leave Apollo's altar bare,
His priests no service; all must starve together,
And fair Parnassus' verdant tops must wither."

He published an election sermon, 1732. — Life of Jonathan Edwards.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN, president of the college in New Jersey, and a most acute metaphysician and distinguished divine, died March 22, 1758, aged 54. He was the son of the preceding, and was born at Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703. He was graduated at Yale college in 1720, before he was seventeen years of age. His uncommon genius discovered itself early, and while yet a boy he read Locke on the human understanding with a keen relish. Though he took much pleasure in examining the kingdom of nature, yet moral and theological researches yielded him the highest satisfaction. He lived in college nearly two years after taking his first degree, preparing himself for the office of a minister of the gospel. In 1722 he went to New York, at the request of a small society of Presbyterians, and preached a number of months. In 1724 he was appointed a tutor in Yale college, and he continued in that office till he was invited in 1726 to preach at Northampton, Mass. Here he was ordained as colleague with his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, Feb. 15, 1727. In 1735 his benevolent labors were attended with very uncommon success; a general impression was made upon the minds of his people by the truths which he proclaimed; and the church was much enlarged. He continued in this place more than twenty-three years, till he was dismissed in 1750. The circumstances which led to his dismissal were the following: Mr. Edwards, being informed of immoralities in which some young persons who were connected with the church indulged themselves, thought that an inquiry should be made into their conduct. The church readily acknowledged the importance of strict discipline, and entered into the plan; but when the names of the persons accused were known, and it was found that members of the principal families in the town were implicated, it was impossible to proceed. There were few in his church who continued their zeal for discipline, when they perceived that it would enter their own houses; and the hands of the immoral were strengthened by this defeat of an attempt to correct their errors and to bring them to repentance. After this occurrence in 1744 Mr. Edwards' usefulness in Northampton was almost destroyed. A secret dislike was excited in the minds of many, and it was soon blown into a flame. When he was settled in this town, he was not perfectly convinced of the correctness of the principle, which was supported by his colleague, Mr. Stoddard, that unconverted persons had a right in the sight of God to the sacrament of the Lord's supper. After diligent inquiry he was convinced that the principle was erroneous and dangerous. His investigations led him to believe that the supper was instituted for the true disciples of Jesus Christ; that none but such could have a right to it; and that none but those who were considered as such should be permitted to partake of it. Adopting these sentiments, he had the courage to avow them. He considered it as an inviolable duty ever to vindicate the truth. He knew the zeal of his people for their loose principles, and expected to see that zeal bursting upon him, if he should dare to stand forward in opposition to their long-continued practice. He anticipated a dismissal from Northampton, and a deprivation of the means of support. But, in the full view of these consequences, he openly avowed his change of sentiments, cheerfully sacrificing every worldly interest to promote the purity of the church and the glory of the Redeemer. The evils which he anticipated came upon him. He was driven away in disgrace from a people who once would almost have plucked out their eyes and given them to him. They would not even hear him in his vindication. He had been instrumental in cheering many hearts with the joys of religion, and not a few had regarded him with all that affectionate attachment which is excited by the love of excellence, and the sense of obligations which can never be repaid. But a spirit of detraction had gone forth, and a few leading men of outrageous zeal pushed forward men of less determined hostility; and in the hopeless prospect of conciliation he was dismissed by an ecclesiastical council, June 22, 1750.

In this scene of trouble and abuse, when the mistakes and the bigotry of the multitude had stopped their ears, and their passions were without control, Mr. Edwards exhibited the truly Christian spirit. His calmness, and meekness, and humility, and yet firmness and resolution, were the subjects of admiration to his friends. More anxious for his people than for himself, he preached a most solemn and affecting farewell discourse. He afterwards occasionally supplied the pulpit, at times when no preacher had been procured; but this proof of his superiority to resentment or pride, and this readiness to do good to those who had injured him, met with no return, except a vote of the inhabitants, prohibiting him from ever again preaching for them. Still he was not left without excellent friends in Northampton; and his correspondents in Scotland, having been informed of his dismissal, contributed a considerable sum for the maintenance of his family.

In Aug., 1751, he succeeded Mr. Sergeant as missionary to the Housatonic Indians, at Stockbridge, in Berkshire county. Here he continued six years, preaching to the Indians and the white people; and, as he found much leisure, he prosecuted his theological and metaphysical studies, and produced works which rendered his name famous throughout Europe. Thus was his calamitous removal from Northampton the occasion, under the wise providence of God, of his imparting to the world the most important instructions, whose influence has been extending to the present time, and whose good effects may still be felt for ages. In Jan., 1758, he reluctantly accepted the office of president of the college in New Jersey, as successor of his son-in-law, Mr. Burr; but he had not entered fully upon the duties of this station, before the prevalence of the small pox induced him to be inoculated, and this disease was the cause of his death. A short time before he died, as some of his friends, who surrounded his bed to see him breathe his last, were lamenting the loss which the college would sustain, he said, to their astonishment, "Trust in God, and ye need not fear." These were his last words. He afterwards expired with as much composure as if he had only fallen asleep. He was succeeded by Mr. Davies. His wife, Sarah, daughter of Rev. J. Pierpont, of New Haven, whom he married in 1727 in her eighteenth year, died in 1758. She became pious at the age of five. The following beautiful account of her, when in her thirteenth year, was written on a blank leaf by Mr. Edwards, in 1723, when he was twenty: "They say there is a young lady in New Haven who is beloved of that Great Being, who made and rules the world, and that there are certain seasons in which this Great Being, in some way or other, comes to her and fills her mind with exceeding sweet delight, and that she hardly cares for anything, except to meditate on Him; that she expects after a while to be received up where he is, to be raised up out of the world and caught up into heaven; being assured that he loves her too well to let her remain at a distance from him always. There she is to dwell with him and to be ravished with his love and delight forever. Therefore, if you present all the world before her, with the richest of its treasures, she disregards it, and cares not for it, and is unmindful of any path of affliction. She has a strange sweetness in her mind and singular purity in her affections; is most just and conscientious in all her conduct, and you could not persuade her to do anything wrong or sinful, if you would give her all this world, lest she should offend this Great Being. She is of a wonderful sweetness, calmness, and universal benevolence of mind, especially after this Great God has manifested himself to her mind. She will sometimes go about from place to place, singing sweetly, and seems to be always full of joy and pleasure, and no one knows for what. She loves to be alone, walking in the fields and groves, and seems to have some one invisible always conversing with her." Mr. Edwards had three sons and seven daughters. Two of his daughters died unmarried; Sarah married E. Parsons, and Lucy, J. Woodbridge, of Stockbridge; Esther married Pres. Burr; Mary married Col. Dwight, of Northampton; Susanna married E. Porter, of Hadley; Eunice married T. Pollock, of North Carolina.

President Edwards was distinguished not only for the astonishing vigor and penetration of his mind, but for his Christian virtues. At a very early period of his life he was much affected by the truths of religion, and used several times in a day to address himself to Heaven in secret prayer, and to meet for religious conversation and devotion with boys of his own age. But at length he returned to a state of negligence and forgetfulness of God. He no longer addressed his prayer to the Lord, his Maker. The pleasure which he had enjoyed in religious duties, he afterwards believed to have originated in selfish views and hopes, and not to have been founded in a correct knowledge of the truth. Soon after he left college, however, a deep sense of his sin was imparted to him; he beheld a new glory in the character of God, and in the doctrines of the gospel; and a view of the way of salvation by a crucified Redeemer, filled him with inexpressible joy. Those doctrines which he had formerly opposed and regarded with horror, now inspired him with delight. Such were his conceptions of the wisdom and excellence of the Most High, that he found a real pleasure in ascribing to him an absolute sovereignty in the disposal of his creatures; in choosing whom he would to eternal life, and rejecting whom he pleased, for the display of his glory. Of the certainty of this doctrine he felt as much assured as of the existence of any object which was presented to his sight. The excellence, upon which he fixed his thoughts, was communicated to him; and he was moulded into the glorious image which was so constantly in his eye. His life of integrity, of humility, of meekness, of benevolence, of piety, of Christian courage, and of zeal directed by the meekness of wisdom, gives full evidence that his religion was the religion of Christ. His highest and sweetest joys, he remarked, did not spring from the hope that he was in a state of salvation, nor from the consciousness of any excellence in himself, but from a direct view of the precious truths of the gospel. No one could be more deeply humbled under a sense of the iniquity of his heart, and of his impotence to what is good. This conviction led him to distrust himself, to rely only upon the grace of God, and to ascribe everything to infinite mercy.

In the various relations of life his character was unimpeached. The benevolent principles which he had embraced taught him to do good, and, while he inculcated charity upon others, he himself gave much to the poor. He seldom visited his people, except in sickness or affliction, not having remarkable talents in conversation, and believing that he should be more useful in his study. Yet he was not austere and unsociable, but easy of access, kind and condescending. To his friends he opened himself without reserve. He gave no encouragement in his conversation to evil-speaking and folly; nor was he fond of disputes, though, when called upon, he would express his opinion, and calmly vindicate his sentiments. He preferred managing a controversy with his pen in his hand. Though his constitution was delicate, he commonly spent thirteen hours every day in his study. He usually rose between four and five in the morning, and was abstemious, living completely by rule. For exercise, he would in the winter take an axe and chop wood for half an hour; and in the summer would walk or ride on horseback two or three miles, to some retired grove. Here his active mind was still occupied in religious meditation and devotion, or in study. Having his pen and ink with him, he recorded every striking thought that occurred. All his researches were indeed pursued with his pen in his hand, and the number of his miscellaneous writings, which he left behind him, was above fourteen hundred. They were all numbered and paged, and an index was formed for the whole. He was peculiarly happy in his domestic connections. Mrs. Edwards, by taking the entire care of his temporal concerns, gave him an opportunity of consecrating all his powers, without interruption, to the labors and studies of the sacred office. It ought, perhaps, to be mentioned, that in the account of the "Quick stock," of which he died possessed, is this item: "A negro boy, named Titus, 30 pounds." Had he lived through the American struggle for freedom, he doubtless would have accorded with his son, Dr. Jonathan, in his views of the injustice and gross wrong of slavery.

As a preacher he was not oratorical in his manner, and his voice was rather feeble, though he spoke with distinctness; but his discourses were rich in thought; and, being deeply impressed himself with the truths which he uttered, his preaching came home to the hearts of his hearers. Though he usually wrote his sermons with great care, and read his notes, yet, when in the delivery a new thought struck him, he was not so shackled but that he would express it, and his extemporary effusions were frequently the most interesting and useful parts of his discourses. Toward the close of life he was inclined to think that it would have been better if he had never used his notes at all. He advised the young preacher to commit his sermons to memory.

Mr. Edwards was uncommonly zealous and persevering in his search after truth. He spared no pains in procuring the necessary aids, and he read all the books which he could procure that promised to afford him assistance in his inquiries. He confined himself to no particular sect or denomination, but studied the writings of men whose sentiments were the most opposite to his own. But the Bible claimed his peculiar attention. From that book he derived his religious principles, and not from any human system. The doctrines which he supported were Calvinistic, and when these doctrines were in any degree relinquished, or were not embraced in their whole length and breadth, he did not see where a man could set his foot down, with consistency and safety, short of deism or atheism itself. Yet, with all his strict adherence to what he believed to be the truths of heaven, his heart was kind and tender. When Mr. Whitefield preached for him on the Sabbath, the acute divine, whose mighty intellect has seldom been equalled, wept as a child during the whole sermon.

His essay on the freedom of the will is considered as one of the greatest efforts of the human mind. Those who embrace the Calvinistic sentiments have been accustomed to say, that he has forever settled the controversy with the Arminians, by demonstrating the absurdity of their principles. On the other hand, there are those attached to the general theological doctrines embraced by Edwards, who think that the unavoidable consequences of his metaphysical argument are so contradictory to the common judgment of mankind, as to authorize any one "boldly to cut asunder the knot which he is unable to unloose." However, if the argument of Edwards be a fallacy, "there must be some way to unravel the puzzle." The following is a brief exhibition of his supposed sophistry. 1. He uses the word cause perpetually in various senses: in the sense of efficiency, or real cause; of reason, or inducement; and of antecedent circumstance, the ground, "in whole or in part," of an event. When he lays down the maxim, "nothing ever comes to pass without a cause," and says, "if the will be determined, there is a determiner;" he means an efficient cause. But when he asserts that motive is the cause of volition, he departs from the meaning of efficiency. The true meaning in the latter case is nothing more, than that motives or views of the mind precede or accompany the actions of men; or, in other words, that rational men, who exert their efficiency in volition, do it for some purpose, or with some design; for motives are mere views of the mind, and it were absurd to ascribe to them an agency, or to make them efficient causes. As Mr. Edwards asserts, "actions are to be ascribed to agents." Men must cause their own volitions; or some other agent must cause them, in which case men are machines. 2. He assumes the great point of controversy; that is, he takes for granted, that because the mind of man had a beginning of existence, and because its actions have a beginning, therefore it cannot originate a volition. But, if the eternal Spirit originates volition, it should have been proved that he could not give the same power to a human spirit, made in his likeness. In ascribing to God in perfection the essential qualities of a moral agent, he enumerates "a capacity of choice, and choice guided by understanding, and a power of acting according to his choice or pleasure;" but in considering man as a moral agent he ascribes to him only "a power of acting according to choice," and omits the essential quality of a moral agent,—"the power of choice." 3. The term motive is employed at one time to express the antecedent reason or ground, or previous view or circumstance, supposed to determine the choice, as when he says, the strongest motive governs the will; and at another time he represents the strongest motive and the mind's choosing as very much the same thing; so that the motive cannot be antecedent or previous to the volition. He says, "an appearing most agreeable or pleasing to the mind, and the mind's preferring and choosing, seem hardly to be properly and perfectly distinct." If the view of the greatest good and the preference or act of choice itself are very much the same thing, then to say that volition is the effect of the strongest motive, is very much the same thing as to say that volition is the effect of volition; and a "previous tendency of the motive to move the will" is but a previous tendency of the choice to determine the choice. 4. The distinction between natural and moral necessity can make no difference as to excusableness from blame, unless there be employed in the case of moral necessity the power of choosing differently, which yet he denies; for, if men are excusable when necessity prevents them from doing what they will to do, then surely they must be excusable when necessity absolutely controls their choice, or governs their will. Man cannot be a moral agent, if his mind is completely enslaved, and his volitions all influenced by causes beyond his control, whether the necessity be called moral or not. Luther said, "I truly wish that in this controversy some more appropriate term were employed than the usual one, necessity, which is applicable neither to the will of God nor man. It is of so harsh and incongruous a signification, suggesting a sort of co-action, and what is altogether contrary to the nature of volition."

This is a very imperfect view of the objections to the argument of Edwards. Should a new school of metaphysical theology spring up, it will doubtless discard some old and revered notions. The following may be some of its elementary principles. Man is constituted an agent; he is the cause, the originator of his own volitions, else he would not be accountable. The mere liberty of doing what he wills is not enough; he must be free to will, or have power to choose, or must originate his own volitions. Right views of free-agency are of high importance, for universalism and infidelity will be the result, when man is regarded as a machine, governed by exterior efficiency. By the faculty of the will is meant the power of the mind to choose, the self-determining power. To say, that motives govern the will, is to say that motives govern the self-determining power, and this is to deny such a power. If, as Edwards asserts, "the being of a good will is the most proper subject of command," it must be, because man has the power to choose aright, for responsibility is bounded by power. If man has no power but that of doing what he chooses, then he could not be required to have a good will, or to make a wise choice, for God never demands impossibilities. The mind does not always choose according to the greatest apparent good, though required to choose the greatest good; for frequently men choose against clear light and full conviction. They always prefer, indeed, what they choose, for choosing is but preferring; but they often choose from unholy appetite and passion against understanding and conscience. The mind arbitrates between different motives, but is not determined by them. It determines its own course in the view of motives, or with some design or purpose. Men are real agents, and not thinking machines, irresponsible, destined to no future judgment, incapable of punishment. In the midst of a world of motives, they are the authors of their own volitions; certainly of that class of volitions, for which they may be held to a retribution of evil. Yet, it can never be proved, that all this impairs the foreknowledge of the infinite Spirit, or is inconsistent with his eternal purpose, and his influence in giving a new heart, or securing a right direction to the choice. At least, such an interposition of divine grace and mercy, if it should even destroy in that respect human freedom, by efficiently causing a holy choice, is to be deemed an immeasurable benefit toward those who experience the new-creating energy, while yet the choosers of evil are left free to their own agency, and the character of God remains unsullied, and his government unimpeached. Remarks were made on the essay on the freedom of the will by James Dana and Samuel West; the latter was answered by Dr. Edwards. His other works, which are most celebrated, are: his book on original sin, in answer to Taylor; his treatise on the affections; his dissertation on the nature of true virtue, and that on the end for which God created the world. A splendid edition of his works was published in England, and an edition, in 8 volumes, intended to be a complete collection of his writings, edited by Dr. Austin, was published in 1809. Another edition, with an ample account of his life, edited by his descendant, Sereno Edwards Dwight, was published in ten volumes, 8vo., in 1830.

The following is a catalogue of his publications: a sermon preached at Boston on I Corinthians, i. 29, 30, 1731; a sermon preached at Northampton, on Matthew xvi. 17, 1734; a narrative of the work of God in the conversion of many hundred of souls in Northampton, 1736; five discourses on justification by faith alone, pressing into the kingdom of God, Ruth's resolution, the justice of God in the damnation of sinners, and the excellency of Jesus Christ, 1738; sinners in the hands of an angry God, a sermon preached at Enfield, 1741; a sermon on the distinguishing marks of a work of the Spirit of God, 1741; thoughts on the revival of religion, 1742; a sermon at the ordination of R. Abercrombie, 1744; at the instalment of S. Buell, 1746; a treatise on religious affections, 1746; an attempt to promote agreement in prayer for the revival of religion, 1746; life of D. Brainerd, 1749; an inquiry into the qualifications for full communion in the church, 1749; a reply to S. Williams' answer to the inquiry, 1752; a sermon preached at Newark, 1752; an inquiry into the modern prevailing notions of that freedom of will which is supposed to be essential to moral agency, etc., 1754; the great doctrine of original sin defended, 1758. Since his death, the following works have been published from his manuscripts: eighteen sermons, with his life written by Dr. Hopkins, 1765; the history of redemption, 1774; on the nature of true virtue, 1788; God's last end in the creation; thirty-three sermons; twenty sermons, 1789; miscellaneous observations, 1793; miscellaneous remarks, 1796. — Hopkins' Life of Edwards; Life prefixed to his Works; Middleton's Biog. Evang. iv. 294-317.

New York, son of the preceding, died Aug. 1, 1801, aged 56. He was born at Northampton, June 6, 1745. In childhood an inflammation in his eyes prevented him from learning to read till an uncommonly late period. He was but six years old when he was removed to Stockbridge; and here there was no school but one, which was common to the Indian children and the children of white parents. Of the latter there were so few that he was in danger of forgetting the English tongue. Here, whilst at school, he learned the language of the Mohkaneew, or Stockbridge Indians, so perfectly, that the natives frequently observed, that "he spoke exactly like an Indian." This language he retained in a good degree through life, and he published interesting remarks upon it some years before his death. His father intended him for a missionary among the aborigines, and in accordance with this plan sent him in Oct., 1755, when he was ten years of age, with Gideon Hawley, to Oughquauga, on the Susquehannah river, to learn the language of the Oneida Indians. This place was in the wilderness about one hundred miles from any English settlement. He remained at Oughquauga but four months, in consequence of the war between England and France, which now extended to the colonies. During this short time he made rapid progress in acquiring the language of the natives, and in engaging their affections. They were so much attached to him, that when they thought their settlement was exposed to inroads from the French, they took him upon their shoulders and carried him many miles through the wilderness to a place of security.

He was graduated at the college in New Jersey in 1765. Two years before, at a time when the students of the college were generally impressed by the truths of religion, he was blessed with the hope of his reconciliation to God through Christ. This was during the presidentship and under the impressive preaching of Dr. Finley. He afterwards pursued the study of divinity under the instruction of Dr. Bellamy, and in Oct., 1766, was licensed to preach the gospel by the association of ministers in the county of Litchfield, Conn. In 1767 he was appointed tutor of Princeton college, and in this office he remained two years. He was ordained pastor of the church at White Haven in the town of New Haven, Jan. 5, 1769, and continued there till May 19, 1795, when he was dismissed by an ecclesiastical council at his own request and the request of his society. Some of the leading men of his parish had embraced religious sentiments of a different stamp from those which were formerly professed, and which Dr. Edwards believed to be true; and this circumstance was the principal cause of dismissal, though an inability on the part of the society to give him support was the most prominent reason assigned for this event. In Jan., 1796, he was installed pastor of the church at Colebrook in Litchfield county. In this retired situation, where he was enabled to pursue his theological studies with little interruption, he hoped to spend the remainder of his days. But in June, 1799, he was elected president of the college which had been recently established at Schencetady, as successor of Mr. Smith. In July he commenced the duties of the office. From this time his attention and talents were devoted to the concerns of the seminary, which was committed to his charge.

There were several remarkable coincidences in the lives of Dr. Edwards and his father. Both were tutors in the seminaries in which they were educated; were dismissed on account of their religious opinions; were settled again in retired situations; were elected to the presidentship of a college; and, in a short time after they were inaugurated, died at nearly the same age. They were also remarkably similar in person and character.

Dr. Edwards was a man of uncommon powers of mind. He has seldom been surpassed in acuteness and penetration. His answer to Dr. Chauncy, his dissertation on the liberty of the will in reply to Dr. West, and his sermons on the atonement of Christ, are considered as works of great and peculiar merit. His early discourse against slavery was recently reprinted. As a preacher, in his manner of delivery he was bold and animated; but he addressed the understanding and conscience rather than the passions of his audience. A mind like his could not in the progress of discussion lose sight of its subject. His thoughts were well arranged and his arguments strong and convincing. He was by nature of an irritable disposition; but, conscious of his infirmity, he made it the business of his life to subdue it, and he was successful. Under many trying circumstances his equanimity was conspicuous. In prosperity and adversity he was the same, always sensible of his dependence upon God, always acquiescing in his will and confiding in his mercy. In his habits he was very regular. His exercise, his studies, and all his concerns were as systematic as possible. He generally rose early, and his first thoughts were directed towards his Almighty Creator and Friend, to whom in early life he had consecrated the powers of his mind, his improvements, his possessions, his time, his influence, and all the means of doing good which should be put into his hands. At the age of eighteen he began a diary of his religious life. This he continued for a few months, and then abruptly relinquished it, but for what reason it is not known. In the early stages of his last illness, when he retained his reason and the power of speech, he expressed his entire resignation to the pleasure of God. In his death an extensive acquaintance lamented the fall of one of the firmest pillars of the church.

He published a work entitled, the salvation of all men strictly examined, etc., in answer to Dr. Chauncy; a dissertation on liberty and necessity; observations on the language of the Mobekanceev, or Stockbridge Indians, communicated to the Connecticut society of arts and sciences, and republished in Massachusetts historical collections, with notes by J. Pickering; brief observations on the doctrine of universal salvation; three sermons on the atonement; sermons at the ordination of Timothy Dwight, Greenfield, 1783; of Dan Bradley, Hamden, 1792; of W. Brown, Glastenbury, 1792; of Edward Dorr Griffin, New Hartford, 1795; a sermon on the injustice and impolicy of the slave trade, 1791; human depravity the source of infidelity, a sermon in the American preacher, II.; marriage of a wife's sister considered in the anniversary concio ad clerum in the chapel of Yale college, 1792; on the death of Roger Sherman, 1793; at the election, 1794; on a future state of existence and the immortality of the soul, printed in a volume, entitled, sermons collected, etc.; a farewell sermon to the people of Colebrook; and a number of excellent pieces, with the signatures I and O, in the New York theological magazine. He also edited, from the manuscripts of his father, the history of the work of redemption, two volumes of sermons, and two volumes of observations on important theological subjects. — Conn. Evang. Mag., II. 377–383; Miller, II. 453; 2 Hist. Coll. x. 81–160; Holmes, II. 321.

EDWARDS, MORGAN, a Baptist minister, died Jan. 28, 1795, aged 72. He was born in Wales in 1722, and began to preach in his sixteenth year. He came to America in May, 1761, and became the pastor of a church in Philadelphia, in which office he was succeeded by Dr. Rogers. He removed in 1772 to a plantation in Newark, New-castle county. Being opposed to the Revolution, he ceased preaching during the war. Afterwards he read lectures in different parts of the country. He had been intemperate; it was his own opinion, that a minister should not preach again after such a fall. He once persuaded himself, about the year 1770, that he should die on a particular day, and preached his own funeral sermon; but he lived a quarter of a century afterwards. He published a farewell discourse, 1761; at the ordination of S. Jones; customs of primitive churches; on new year, 1770; materials toward a history of Baptists of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, 2 vols., 12mo., 1792; on the millennium; on the new heaven and new earth; res sacra, a translation. He left many vols. of sermons, and 12 vols. of manuscripts on various subjects. — Benedict, II. 294–301.

EDWARDS, SARAH, widow of President Edwards, died six months after her husband, Oct. 2, 1758, aged 48. She was the daughter of Rev. James Pierrepont of New Haven, born in 1710; and was the mother of eleven children. She apparently became pious at the age of five years; and her whole life was a life of eminent piety, benevolence, and usefulness. With great intelligence and skill, she educated her children and conducted all the domestic affairs; to her husband she was one "whose price was above rubies."

EDWARDS, WILLIAM, a Moravian missionary, died at Goshen on the Muskingum in 1801, aged about 70.

EDWARDS, TIMOTHY, judge, the eldest son of President Edwards, died at Stockbridge, Mass., Oct. 27, 1813, aged 75. After graduating at Princeton, 1757, he was a merchant in Elizabethtown, N. J., and removed to S. about 1770, and was a leading citizen for forty-three years, and judge of probate for Berkshire. He was also a venerated officer of the church. His widow, Rhoda Ogden, died at Litchfield in 1822, aged 80. Of his fifteen children, one, if not more, still lives, — Madame Rhoda Dwight of Northampton, aged now nearly 80.

EDWARDS, NINIAN, governor of Illinois, died of the cholera at Belleville July 20, 1833. He was appointed governor in 1809, and in 1818 was chosen a senator of the United States. He was also, at the time of his death, governor and superintendent of Indian affairs.

EDWARDS, PIERREPONT, died at Bridgeport April 14, 1826, aged 76. He was born at Northampton in 1750, a few weeks before the dismissal of his father, President Edwards. For many years he was a distinguished lawyer; he was a patriot, and under the old confederation a member of congress. His sons were John S., Henry W., Ogden, and Alfred. His daughter Susan married Samuel W. Johnson, and Henrietta Frances married Eli Whitney.

EDWARDS, WILLIAM, colonel, died in Brooklyn, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1851, aged 81, the son of Timothy, and grandson of Jonathan E. He was early apprenticed to his uncle, Col. M. Ogden, of Elizabethtown, in the tanning business, which he carried on himself many years extensively at Northampton, and at Hunter, Greene county, N. Y. At the latter place, employing fifty or one hundred laborers, he promoted among them the interests of temperance, and conducted religious services until a church was formed, of which he was twenty-five years an elder. Even in his old age, in Dr. Mason's church in New York, and in Brooklyn, he was a Sunday-school teacher and a tract distributor. As he failed once in business he honestly paid up the old debts, from which he was legally discharged, to the amount of 25,000 dollars. He gave in his vote as a citizen sixty-one years. His wife was Rebecca, a daughter of B. Tappan; eight children survived him.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN W., an eminent lawyer, the only son of Rev. Dr. Jonathan E., died at Hartford April 3, 1831, aged 59. He graduated at Yale with high honor, at the age of seventeen, in 1789, and afterwards was tutor. In taking his second degree he delivered an oration, in which he attacked the existing law, by which the eldest son received a double portion of the estate of a father, dying without a will. This excited attention; the next year, 1792, the obnoxious law was repealed. Having studied law at Litchfield, he settled at Hartford, and rose rapidly in his profession, and became one of the most distinguished advocates. He had a very uncommon genius, quick perceptions, great acuteness in reasoning, and a quick, beautiful, unflinching flow of language. Ill health compelled him to intermingle with his studies agricultural pursuits. The religion of the gospel gave him peace and hope in his closing hours. He was deemed a model as a man, a father, a lawyer, a citizen, and a Christian. One of his two sisters married Rev. Dr. Chapin. His wife was Elizabeth Tryon. Rev. Dr. Tryon Edwards, of New London, is his son. If an honored ancestry furnishes an excitement to noble effort, he had such an ancestry to excite him. His father and grandfather were eminent theologians and presidents of colleges; and then he could go back, as among his ancestors, to Tuthill, Winthrop, Downing, Stoddard, Warham, Pierpont, Hooker, Willett, Brown, Porter, Walcott, Pitkin, Goodwin, and Standley. A notice of Mr. E. was written by Chief Justice Williams, and is contained in the appendix to a volume of the Connecticut reports.

EDWARDS, HENRY W., governor of Connecticut, died at New Haven July 22, 1847, aged 67. Born in N. H., the son of Pierrepont E., he graduated at Princeton in 1797; was a senator of the United States; and governor in 1833, 1835-7.

EDWARDS, HENRY PIERREPONT, a judge of the supreme court of New York seven or eight years, died in New York Feb. 24, 1855, aged 46. He was the son of Gov. H. W. Edwards. He was learned, dignified, upright, and independent.

EDWARDS, JUSTIN, D. D., died at the Bath Alum Spring, Va., July 23, 1853, aged 66. Born in Westhampton April 25, 1787, he was the descendant of Alexander E., who came from Wales in 1640, and lived in Springfield and Northampton. He graduated at Williams college in 1810. In about two years he was settled as the minister of Andover; after fifteen years he was removed to the north church in Boston, but in two years resigned his charge and became secretary of the American temperance society. During his seven years' devotion to this cause, he prepared the "permanent temperance documents." After this he was six years president of Andover theological seminary, and then seven years engaged in promoting the observance of the Sabbath, writing the "Sabbath manual." Four years he spent in preparing comments on the New Testament, and the Old, as far as the 90th Psalm, when he ceased to write. He went to Virginia on account of his health. When, in great suffering, he was asked if he had any fear of death, he replied: "None. It is nothing fearful to die and go to heaven." It seemed to be his fixed determination to do all the good possible, while he lived in the world. He had deep, unbending principle, indomitable energy, earnest piety. The beginning of his religious course was in 1805, at the age of eighteen, owing to the impression made upon him at the deathbed of an eminent Christian. At the house of his neighbor, Noah Parsons, Jr., died Mr. P.'s mother, the wife of Noah P., of Northampton, who was there on a visit. The Christian conversation, peace, and supports of both, as he saw her from day to day, taught him the value of religion, of which till then he was destitute. She was the Phebe Bartlett, mentioned by Jonathan Edwards, as becoming pious at five years of age. His wife and companion in life, who survived him, and the mother of his children, was Lydia, daughter of Asa Bigelow of Colchester. He assisted in founding the tract society of Boston, and was secretary; and when it was united to the society at New York he was placed on the publishing committee. He wrote "The way to be saved," "Joy in heaven over the penitent," "Well-conducted form," and "The traffic in ardent spirits." Of these, 750,000 were printed,—parts of his Sabbath manual, 535,000; temperance manual, 143,000; comment on the New Testament, 70,000. A sketch of his life and labors, by Rev. Wm. A. Hallock, was published, with a portrait, by the American tract society in 1855.

EDWARDS, BELA BATES, D. D., professor in Andover theological school, died in Georgia April 20, 1852, aged 49. He was born at Southampton, Mass., July 4, 1802. He descended from Alexander Edwards, who came from Wales, and lived in Northampton from 1655 to 1690, and whose grandson, Samuel, who died in 1749, was the great-grandfather of Mr. Edwards, as well as of Dr. Justin Edwards. Mr. E.'s grandfather, also named Samuel, who was a soldier in the expedition to cape Breton in 1745, removed to Southampton in 1753, where he was a deacon many years, till his death in 1784. Mr. E.'s father, Elisha, born in 1758, was also a deacon from 1790 till his death in 1832. His mother, a woman of intellect and great worth, died in 1826.

Mr. E. graduated at Amherst college in 1824. While in college he became a Christian. In 1825

he entered the seminary at Andover. For two years from 1826 he was a tutor at Amherst. In May, 1828, he was chosen assistant secretary of the American education society, and performed the duties of this office, at the same time living at Andover and pursuing his theological studies. From 1830 to 1836 he lived in Boston, but resigned his office of secretary in 1833.

His literary and editorial labors were very great and important. From 1828 to 1842 he edited the American Quarterly Register, which was called first, in 1827, the Quarterly Journal of the American education society. He established in 1833 the American Quarterly Observer, which, after three volumes, was united with the Biblical Repository of Prof. Robinson. He edited it from 1835 to 1838. Of the Bibliotheca Sacra he was the editor from 1844 to 1852. For the long period of twenty-three years, he superintended a part of our periodical literature, and with the aid of others, produced thirty-one octavo volumes, — monuments of his great industry, talents, learning, and taste.

He lived in Andover from 1836 till his death. In 1837 he was appointed professor of Hebrew in the seminary, and in 1848 successor of Prof. Stuart in the chair of professor of biblical literature. In 1846 and 1847 he made the tour of Europe with his wife and one of his children. A pulmonary disease compelled him to repair to Athens in Ga., in the autumn of 1851, and there he died in peace. He was buried at Andover April 30th. His wife was Jerusha W. Billings of Conway, a grand-daughter of Rev. R. S. Storrs of Longmeadow.

His memoir was published by Prof. Park in two volumes, in 1853, containing seven sermons and various essays, addresses, and lectures. A more interesting memoir of a literary, pious, and most excellent man is not to be found. Mr. E. wrote, besides the works mentioned already, the eclectic reader; biography of self-taught men, in 1832; and the missionary gazetteer.

EELLES, NATHANIEL, minister of Scituate, died Aug. 25, 1750, aged about 73. He graduated at Harvard college in 1699; was ordained in 1704. He was a man of eminence. Among his successors was Dr. Barnes. He published a sermon at the ordination of F. Clapp, 1729; reasons for inviting Mr. Whitefield to preach; election sermon, 1743.

EELLES, NATHANIEL, minister of Stonington, Conn., son of the preceding, graduated at Harvard college in 1728. He died in 1786, aged about 80. He published the election sermon, 1748.

EELLES, EDWARD, minister of Middletown, son of Nathaniel E., of Scituate, died in 1776. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1733. He published the election sermon, 1767.

EELLES, SAMUEL, minister of North Branford, Conn., died April 23, 1808, aged 63. He was a graduate of Yale in 1765, and was a useful pastor, and physician without charge, thirty-nine years.

EGBERT, THOMAS, major, died in New Brunswick, N. J., in July, 1835, aged 84, an officer of the Revolution.

ELBERT, SAMUEL, major-general, and governor of Georgia, in 1785 succeeded John Houston, and was succeeded in 1786 by Edward Telfair. He was a soldier of the Revolution, entering the army in 1776 as a lieutenant-colonel. In 1778 he was engaged in the expedition against East Florida; and conducted with gallantry in command of a brigade in the action at Brier Creek March 2, 1779, in which he was taken prisoner. He died at Savannah Nov. 3, 1788, aged 45.

ELDRIDGE, CHARLES, M. D., died at East Greenwich, R. I., Sept. 15, 1838, aged 56, formerly president of the medical society.

ELIOT, JOHN, minister of Roxbury, Mass., usually called the Apostle of the Indians, was born at Nasing, Essex, England, in 1604; died May 20, 1690, aged 86. His pious parents early imparted to him religious instruction, and it was not without effect. After receiving his education at the university of Cambridge, he was for some time the instructor of youth. In 1631 he came to this country, and, arriving at Boston harbor Nov. 3, immediately joined the church in that town, and preached to them, as Mr. Wilson their minister was then in England. Here he was earnestly requested to remain; but he was settled as teacher of the church in Roxbury, Nov. 5, 1632. In the following year Mr. Welde was ordained as his colleague, with the title of pastor. These two ministers lived together in much harmony. In 1737 they opposed the wild notions of Mrs. Hutchinson, and were both witnesses against her at her trial. In 1639 they were appointed, with Richard Mather, of Dorchester, to make a new version of the psalms, which was printed in the following year. For tuneful poetry it would not perhaps yield the palm even to that of Sternhold and Hopkins; but it did not give perfect satisfaction. Mr. Shepherd, of Cambridge, thus addressed the translators:

“Ye Roxbury poets, keep clear of the crime
Of missing to give us very good rhyme;
And you of Dorchester, your verses lengthen,
But with the text's own words you will them strengthen.”

The New England psalms were afterwards revised and improved by President Dunster, and they have passed through twenty editions. In 1641 Mr. Welde returned to England. Mr. Eliot's other colleagues in the ministry were Mr. Danforth and Mr. Walter.

His benevolent labors were not confined to his own people. Having imbibed the true spirit of the gospel, his heart was touched with the wretched condition of the Indians, and he became eagerly desirous of making them acquainted with the glad tidings of salvation. There were, at the time, when he began his missionary exertions, nearly twenty tribes of Indians within the limits of the English planters. But they were very similar in manners, language, and religion. Having learned the barbarous dialect, he first preached to an assembly of Indians at Nonantum, in the present town of Newton, Oct. 28, 1646. After a short prayer he explained the commandments, described the character and sufferings of Christ, the judgment day and its consequences, and exhorted them to receive Christ as their Saviour, and to pray to God. After the sermon was finished, he desired them to ask any questions which might have occurred. One immediately inquired, whether Jesus Christ could understand prayers in the Indian language? Another asked how all the world became full of people, if they were all once drowned? A third question was, how there could be the image of God, since it was forbidden in the commandment? He preached to them a second time Nov. 11, and some of them wept while he was addressing them. An old man asked, with tears in his eyes, whether it was not too late for him to repent and turn unto God? Among the other inquiries were these, — how it came to pass that sea water was salt and river water fresh; how the English came to differ so much from the Indians in the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, since they all at first had but one father; and why, if the water is larger than the earth, it does not overflow the earth? He was violently opposed by the sachems, and pawaws or priests, who were apprehensive of losing their authority if a new religion was introduced. When he was alone with them in the wilderness, they threatened him with every evil, if he did not desist from his labors; but he was a man not to be shaken in his purpose by the fear of danger. He said to them: "I am about the work of the great God, and my God is with me; so that I neither fear you, nor all the sachems in the country. I will go on, — do you touch me, if you dare." With a body capable of enduring fatigue, and a mind firm as the mountain oaks which surrounded his path, he went from place to place, relying for protection upon the great Head of the Church, and declaring the salvation of the gospel to the children of darkness. His benevolent zeal prompted him to encounter with cheerfulness the most terrifying dangers, and to submit to the most incredible hardships. He says in a letter: "I have not been dry, night or day, from the third day of the week unto the sixth; but so travelled, and at night pull off my boots and wring my stockings, and on with them again, and so continue. But God steps in and helps. I have considered the word of God, 1 Tim. II. 3, endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." He made a missionary tour every fortnight, planted a number of churches, and visited all the Indians in Massachusetts and Plymouth colonies, pursuing his way as far as cape Cod. In 1651 an Indian town was built on a pleasant spot on Charles river, called Natick. A house of worship was erected, and a form of government was established similar to that which is mentioned in Exodus XVIII. 21. He was convinced, that in order to the most permanent success, it was necessary to introduce with Christianity the arts of civilized life. He accordingly made every exertion to persuade the Indians to renounce their savage customs and habits; but he never could civilize those who went out in hunting parties; and those who lived near ponds and rivers, and were occupied in fishing or cultivating the ground, though their condition was much improved, could never be made equally industrious with the English. The first Indian church, established by the labors of Protestants in America, was formed at Natick in 1660, after the manner of the Congregational churches in New England. Those, who wished to be organized into a Christian body, were strictly examined as to their faith and experience by a number of the neighboring ministers, and Mr. Eliot afterwards administered to them baptism and the Lord's supper. Other Indian churches were planted in various parts of Massachusetts, and he frequently visited them; but his pastoral care was more particularly over that, which he first established. He made every exertion to promote the welfare of the Indian tribes; he stimulated many servants of Jesus to engage in the missionary work; and, although he mourned over the stupidity of many, who preferred darkness to light, yet he lived to see twenty-four of the copper-colored aborigines fellow preachers of the precious gospel of Christ. In 1661 he published the New Testament in the Indian language, and in a few years the whole Bible, and several other books, best adapted for the instruction of the natives. He possessed an influence over the Indians, which no other missionary could obtain. He was their shield in 1675, during Philip's war, when some of the people of Massachusetts, actuated by the most infuriate spirit, had resolved to destroy them. He suffered every abuse for his friendship to them, but nothing could quench the Divine charity which glowed in his heart. His firmness, his zeal, his benevolence at this period increased the pure lustre of his character. When he reached the age of fourscore years, he offered to give up his salary, and desired to be liberated from the labors of his office as a teacher of the church at Roxbury. It was with joy, that he received Mr. Walter as his colleague in 1688. When he was bending under his infirmities and could no longer visit the Indians, he persuaded a number of families to send their negro servants to him once a week, that he might instruct them in the truths of God. He died, saying, that all his labors were poor and small, and exhorting those, who surrounded his bed, to pray. His last words were, "Welcome joy." Four sons, educated at Harvard college, were preachers; John, of Newton, a preacher also to the Indians; Joseph, of Guilford; Samuel died in early life unsettled; Benjamin, a graduate of 1665, was a colleague with his father, but died before him.

Mr. Eliot was one of the most useful preachers in New England. No minister saw his exertions attended with greater effects. He spoke from the abundance of his heart, and his sermons, being free from that labored display of learning, from the quibbles and quaint turns with which most discourses were at that time infected, were acceptable in all the churches. So much was he endeared to his own people, that they continued his salary after he had offered to resign it, and when he was unable to preach; and the youth were in the habit of visiting him, calling him their father and friend. Such attentions chased away the gloom which usually hangs over the head of the aged, and cheered the evening of his life.

His moral and religious character was as excellent as his ministerial qualifications were great. He carried his good principles with him in every situation, viewing all things in reference to God. He habitually lifted up his heart for a blessing upon every person, whom he met; and when he went into a family, he would sometimes call the youth to him, that he might lay his hands upon them, and give them his benediction. Such was his charity, that he gave to the poor Indians most of his salary of fifty pounds, which he received annually from the society for propagating the gospel. In his manner of living, he was very simple. One plain dish was his repast at home, and, when he dined abroad, he seldom tasted any of the luxuries before him. He drank water; and said of wine, "It is a noble, generous liquor, and we should be humbly thankful for it, but, as I remember, water was made before it." Clothing himself with humility, he actually wore a leathern girdle about his loins. In domestic life he was peculiarly happy. By the prudent management of his wife, who looked well to the ways of her household, he was enabled to be generous to his friends, and hospitable to strangers, and with a small salary to educate four sons at Cambridge, of whom John and Joseph, ministers of Newton and Guilford, were the best preachers of that age.

In his principles of church government, he was attached to the Congregational order. Yet he contended earnestly for frequent synods or councils, as necessary for the preservation of union, for the suppression of dangerous opinions and heresies, for the correction of abuses, and the healing of divisions. In one of his treatises, he proposed four orders of councils, the congregational, provincial, national, and oecumenical. He thought that every particular church should have ruling elders, to assist the minister in the duties of government and instruction. In his admissions to the church, he required of the candidates some evidence that they were truly Christians, renewed in their hearts by the Spirit of God. He withstood the attempts, which were made, to change the old practice of giving a relation of the work of divine grace, which practice, in his view, honored the Saviour, and produced an intimate union among his disciples. He could not, in conscience, give the cup of the Lord to any one who did not give some evidence of being a sincere Christian.

With all his excellencies, he had some singularities and strange notions. He had a most deep-rooted prejudice against wigs. He preached against the custom of wearing them; he prayed against it; he attributed to it the evils which overwhelmed the country. He thought, as Dr. Cotton Mather, who himself wore a wig, informs us, "that for men to wear their hair with a luxurious, delicate, feminine prolixity, or to disfigure themselves with hair, which was none of their own, but above all, for ministers of the gospel to ruffle it in excesses of this kind," was an enormous sin. But fashion would bear sway, notwithstanding his remonstrances, and he finally ceased to complain, saying, "the lust is become insuperable." His prejudice against tobacco was as strong as his aversion to wigs; but, in contempt of all his admonitions, the hairless head would be adorned with curls of foreign growth, and the pipe would send up volumes of smoke. In his old age, not long before his death, he used to say that he was shortly going to heaven, and would carry a deal of good news with him; he would carry tidings to the old founders of New England, that our churches still remained, and that their number was continually increasing. So remarkable was he for his charities, that the parish treasurer, when he once paid him the money due for his salary, tied the ends of a handkerchief, into which he put it, in as many hard knots as he could, to prevent him from giving away the money before he should reach home. The good man immediately went to the house of a sick and necessitous family, and told them that God had sent them some relief. Being welcomed by the sufferers with tears of gratitude, he began to untie the knots. After many fruitless efforts, and impatient of the perplexity and delay, he gave the handkerchief and all the money to the mother of the family, saying, "Here, my dear, take it; I believe the Lord designs it all for you."

Mr. Eliot published several letters, in a work entitled, the glorious progress of the gospel among the Indians, etc., 1649; tears of repentance, in conjunction with Mr. Mayhew, 1653; a late and further manifestation of the progress of the gospel among the Indians, etc., 1655; of the gospel amongst the Indians, etc., 1659; a brief narrative of the progress of the gospel, etc., 1670. A work of his, entitled the Christian commonwealth, etc., was published in England about the year 1660, written nine or ten years before. When it was received in Massachusetts, the governor and council, viewing it as full of seditious principles against all established governments, especially against the monarchy of their native country, required Mr. Eliot to make a recantation, which he accordingly did, acknowledging, that government by kings, lords, and commons was not anti-Christian. The book was suppressed. A copy is in Col. Aspinwall's collection of books relating to America. In 1661, he published his translation of the New Testament into the Indian tongue; 2d edit., 1680; and, in 1663, his immense work, the translation of the whole Bible, in 4to., entitled, Mamusse Wunnetupanatamwe Up-Biblum God naneeswe Nukkone Testament kah wonk Wusku Testament. A second edition was printed in 1685, revised by Mr. Cotton, and both of them were printed at Cambridge. The longest word is in Mark i. 40: Wutappesittukqussunnoohwehtankquoh, "kneeling down to him." Mr. Eliot also published, Jews in America, 1660, intended to prove, that the Indians were descendants of the Jews; an Indian grammar, 1666; a new edition, with notes by Du Ponceau, and introduction by J. Pickering, 8vo., 1822; also in 2 historical collections, 9th volume; the logic primer, for the use of the Indians, 1672; the psalms, translated into Indian metre, and a catechism, annexed to the edition of the New Testament, in 1680; a translation of the practice of piety, of Baxter's call to the unconverted, and of several of Shepard's works; the harmony of the gospels, in English, 4to., 1678; the Divine management of gospel churches by the ordinance of councils, designed for the reconciliation of the Presbyterians and Congregationalists. Nine of his letters to Sir Robert Boyle are in the 3d volume of the historical collections, and his account of Indian churches in the 9th volume. His Christian commonwealth is in historical collections, 3d series, vol. 9. — Mather's Magnal., III. 170-211; Eliot's Life and Death; Neal's N. E. I. 151, 242, 258; II. 98; *Hist. ELIOT, JOHN, minister of Newton, the son of the preceding, was graduated at Harvard college in 1656. He was ordained at Cambridge village, or Nonantum, now Newton, in 1664, and in this place he died Oct. 11, 1668, aged 32. His abilities as a preacher were pre-eminent. He gave his father much assistance in his missionary employment. During his ministry at Newton he usually preached once a fortnight to the Indians at Pequimmit, or Stoughton, and sometimes at Natick. — Gookin, v.; Homer's History of Newton in Hist. Coll. v. 266.

ELIOT, JARED, minister of Killingworth, Conn., was grandson of the apostolic John Eliot, and the son of Joseph Eliot, minister of Guilford, who died in 1694. He was born Nov. 7, 1685; graduated at Yale college in 1706; was ordained Oct. 26, 1709, and died April 22, 1763, aged 78. In the year 1722 he was strongly inclined to adopt the Episcopalian sentiments; but in a conference with the trustees of the college his doubts were removed. He was a botanist and a scientific and practical agriculturist. The white mulberry tree was introduced by him into Conn. He discovered a process of extracting iron from black sand. He was the first physician of his day in the colony. Such was his fame for the treatment of chronic complaints, that he was sometimes called to Boston and Newport, and was more extensively consulted than any physician in New England. Maniacs were managed by him with great skill. In the multitude of his pursuits his judgment seemed to be unailing. His farms in different parts of the colony were well managed. Living on the main road from Boston to New York, he was visited by many gentlemen of distinction. Dr. Franklin always called upon him when journeying to his native town. His house was the seat of hospitality. He was a pious, faithful preacher. For forty years he never omitted preaching on the Lord's day. He published agricultural essays, several editions; religion supported by reason and revelation, 1735; election sermon, 1738; sermon on the taking of Louisbourg, 1745. — Thacher; Eliot; 2 Hist. Coll. I.

ELIOT, ANDREW, D. D., minister in Boston, died Sept. 13, 1778, aged 59. He was a descendant of Andrew Elliott, as he wrote his name, from Somersetshire, who settled at Beverly about 1683. His father, Andrew, was a merchant in Boston. He was born about the year 1719, and in 1737 was graduated at Harvard college. He early felt the impressions of religion, and was induced to devote himself to the service of the Lord Jesus. He was ordained pastor of the new church in Boston, as colleague with Mr. Webb, April 14, 1742. Here he continued in high reputation till his death. He left eleven children, two of them ministers, — Andrew, of Fairfield, and John, of Boston. His last surviving child, Susanna, wife of Dr. David Hull of Fairfield, died in 1832.

He was highly respected for his talents and virtue. While he preached the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, his sermons were not filled with invectives against those who differed from him. He was anxious to promote the interests of practical godliness, and, destitute of bigotry, he embraced all who appeared to have an honest regard to religious truth. His discourses were written in a style perspicuous and correct, and he delivered them with dignity, gracefulness, and unaffected fervor. His audience was never inattentive. The various duties of the pastoral office he ever discharged with fidelity. He revered the constitution of the churches of New England, and delighted in their prosperity. In 1743 he united with many other excellent ministers in giving his testimony in favor of the very remarkable revival of religion in this country.

When the British took possession of Boston, he sent his family out of the town with the intention of following them; but a number of the people belonging to his society and to other societies, being obliged to remain, requested him not to leave them. After seeking Divine direction, he thought it his duty to comply with their request, and in no period of his life was he more eminently useful. He was a friend to the freedom, peace, and independence of America. By his benevolent offices he contributed much toward alleviating the sufferings of the inhabitants; he ministered to his sick and wounded countrymen in prison; he went about doing good, and he appeared to be more than ever disengaged from the world, and attached to things heavenly and Divine. He was a friend of literature and science, and he rendered important services to Harvard college, both as an individual benefactor, and as a member of the board of overseers and of the corporation. So highly were his literary acquirements and general character estimated, that he was once elected president of the university; but his attachment to his people was such, that he declined the appointment. In his last sickness he expressed unshaken faith in those doctrines of the grace of God which he had preached to others, and would frequently breathe out the pious ejaculation, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

He wrote a long account of the effects of the dispute between Great Britain and America in 1768, which he sent to a friend in England. It is spoken of with high respect, both on account of its style, and of the candor and moderation with which it was written. The following is a catalogue of his publications: A sermon at his own ordination, 1742; inordinate love of the world inconsistent with the love of God, 1744; on the death of John Webb, 1750; a fast sermon, 1753; at the ordination of Joseph Roberts, 1754; of Eben Thayer, 1766; of Joseph Willard, 1773; of his son, Andrew Eliot, 1774; of his brother John, 1779; a thanksgiving sermon for the conquest of Quebec, 1759; election sermon, 1765; Dudleian lecture, 1771; at the execution of Levi Ames, 1773; a volume of twenty sermons, 8vo., 1774. — Thacher's Funeral Sermon; Memoirs of Thomas Hollis; Hist. Coll. x. 188; Farmer.

ELIOT, SAMUEL, a benefactor of Harvard college, was the son of Samuel E., a bookseller of Boston, who was the brother of Dr. A. Eliot. As a merchant he acquired a large estate. He died Jan. 18, 1820, aged 81. Three of his daughters were married to E. Dwight and Professors A. Norton and G. Ticknor. Some time before his death he presented to Harvard college 20,000 dollars to found a professorship of Greek literature. He left an estate of little less than a million of dollars.

ELIOT, JOHN, D. D., minister in Boston, the son of Dr. Andrew E., was born May 31, 1754, and graduated at Harvard college in 1772. After preaching a few years in different places, he was ordained as the successor of his father, Nov. 3, 1779, pastor of the new north church in Boston. He died of an affection of the heart, or pericardium, Feb. 14, 1813, aged 58. His wife, Ann Treadwell, daughter of Jacob T., of Portsmouth, survived him. During his ministry of thirty-four years he baptized 1454 persons; performed the ceremony of marriage 811 times; and admitted 161 to full communion in the church. Dr. Eliot was very mild, courteous, and benevolent; as a preacher he was plain, familiar, and practical, avoiding disputed topics, and always recommending charity and peace. For nine years he was one of the corporation of Harvard college. With his friend, Dr. Belknap, he co-operated in establishing and sustaining the Massachusetts historical society, to the publications of which he contributed many writings. His attention was much devoted to biographical and historical researches. He published a sermon to freemasons, 1782; a charge to the same, 1783; a thanksgiving sermon, 1794; at the ordination of J. McKean, 1797; of H. Edes, 1805; on public worship, 1800; on the completion of a house of worship, 1804; a New England biographical dictionary, 8vo., 1809; and in the historical collections the following articles: account of burials in Boston; description of New Bedford, IV.; notice of W. Whittingham, and narrative of newspapers, V.; sketch of Dr. Belknap, VI.; ecclesiastical history of Massachusetts and Plymouth, VII. IX. X. and two sermons, I.; account of John Eliot; account of Marblehead; memoirs of Dr. Thacher, VIII.; memoirs of A. Eliot and T. Pemberton, X. — 2 Hist. Coll. i. 211-248.

ELIOT, JOSEPH, minister of Guilford, Conn., the son of Rev. John E., died May 24, 1694, aged about 60. He was graduated at Harvard in 1653. About the year 1664 he succeeded Mr. Higginson at Guilford. After a ministry of thirty years he died, greatly lamented. His successors were Thomas Ruggles, who died in 1728; Thomas Ruggles, the son, who died in 1770; Amos Fowler, who died Feb., 1800, aged 72; and John Eliot.

ELLIOT, JACOB, minister of Lebanon, Conn., died April 12, 1766, aged 65. Born in Boston, he graduated at Cambridge in 1720, and was ordained over the third church in Lebanon in 1729. His wife was Betty, a daughter of Rev. J. Robinson, of Duxbury.

ELLIOT, ANDREW, minister of Fairfield, Conn., died Oct. 26, 1805, aged 62. He was the son of Dr. A. Eliot, of Boston, was graduated at Harvard in 1762, and was afterwards librarian and tutor, and was ordained June 22, 1774. When Fairfield was burnt by the British in 1779, his house and library were consumed. His wife was Mary, daughter of Joseph Pynchon; his son, Andrew, was the minister of New Milford. — Coll. Hist. Soc. x. 188.

ELLIOT, CHARLES, a graduate of Harvard in 1809, died in 1813. His brother-in-law, Prof. Norton, edited his miscellaneous writings, 1814.

ELLERY, WILLIAM, a member of congress, died Feb. 15, 1820, aged 92. He was the son of Wm. E., a merchant of Newport, R. I., who died in 1836, aged 75; and was graduated in 1747, at Harvard college, of which his father was a graduate in 1722. Having studied law, he for many years successfully prosecuted his profession at Newport. At the commencement of the Revolution he espoused the cause of his country. Of the congress of 1776 he was an active and influential member. His name was affixed to the Declaration of Independence. Placing himself by the side of secretary Thompson, he watched the looks of the noble-minded patriots, as they signed the instrument. The plan of fireships, recommended by the marine committee, to be sent out from Rhode Island, is supposed to have been suggested by him. When the British occupied Newport, his dwelling-house was burnt. On his retiring from congress in 1786, he was appointed commissioner of loans; he was also elected chief justice of Rhode Island. When the new government was organized, Washington appointed him in 1789 collector of Newport; an office which he held till his death. He died as he was reading Tully's offices, in Latin. It was often his consolation in life, that "the Lord reigneth." Disregarding human applause, he was accustomed to say, "humility rather than pride becomes such creatures as we are." — Goodrich's Lives.

ELLCOTT, ANDREW, professor of mathematics at West Point, was a native of Pennsylvania, and was employed in surveying and planning the city of Washington. He was also employed in ascertaining the boundary between the United States and Spain, which labor he commenced in 1796. He died at West Point Aug. 28, 1820, aged 67. He published a journal, with a map of Ohio, Mississippi, and a part of Florida, 1806; astronomical and other papers in the transactions of A. P. society.

ELLIOT, OLIVER, died at Mason, N. H., March 5, 1837, aged 102. He was a soldier in the French and Revolutionary wars.

ELLIOT, JAMES, died at Newfane, Vt., Nov. 10, 1839. He was a member of congress in 1803-9.

ELLIOT, JONATHAN, died in Washington March 12, 1846, aged 61. Born in England, he came to New York and was a book printer. From 1814 he edited with much ability the Washington Gazette for thirteen years. His character was excellent. He wrote the American diplomatic code, debates on the adoption of the constitution, the comparative tariffs, funding system, and statistics.

ELLIOTT, THOMAS, a patriot of the Revolution, died in South Carolina Feb. 5, 1824, aged 73. In the battle of Sullivan's island he was stationed at fort Johnson; he fought at Stono; during the siege of Charleston he performed the duties of a soldier, and with unyielding firmness preferred the miseries of the prison-ship to the terms offered by the enemy.

ELLIOTT, CHARLES, of South Carolina, a patriot, equipped at his own expense a considerable body of troops; but died before the close of the war. His daughter Jane, married to Col. Washington in 1782, died in 1830, aged 66, at the family seat at Sandy Hill, South Carolina.

ELLIOTT, ANNA, wife of Charles E., the daughter of Thomas Ferguson of South Carolina, was a patriot of the Revolution. She received under her roof the sick and wounded, and was to them an angel of mercy.

ELLIOTT, JOHN, D. D., died in 1824, aged about 70. He graduated at Yale in 1776, and was minister in Guilford, Conn., now Madison. He published a sermon at the ordination of D. E. Field, 1805; of E. T. Fitch, 1818.

ELLIOTT, ROBERT, captain, died in Montgomery county, Va., Jan. 4, 1838, aged 105, an officer of the Revolution.

ELLIOTT, JACOB, lieutenant, died in Chester, N. H., Dec. 6, 1841, aged 86. He was in the Lexington battle, and in that of Bennington was severely wounded.

ELLIOTT, JESSE D., commodore, died in Philadelphia Dec. 10, 1845, aged 62. He was second in command under Perry on lake Erie.

ELLIOTT, STEPHEN, LL. D., a botanist, died at Charleston, South Carolina, March 28, 1830, aged 58. He was born at Beaufort, Nov. 11, 1771, and graduated at Yale college in 1791. Afterwards he devoted his attention chiefly to the improvement of his estate. At an early age he became a member of the legislature, in which capacity he introduced the project of the State bank, of which he was chosen president and at the head of which he remained until his death. He was also president of several literary and scientific societies, and professor of natural history and botany in the medical college. The Southern review was principally conducted by him. He died of the gout in the stomach. His temper was mild, and his manners interesting. He had made a large and valuable collection in natural history. With the literature of France and Spain he was well acquainted. He published sketch of the botany of South Carolina and Georgia, 2 vols. 8vo. 1821.

ELLIS, BENJAMIN, Dr., died at Franklin, Conn., in 1824, aged 73. He was a surgeon during the whole Revolutionary war.

ELLIS, JOHN M., died at Nashua Aug. 6, 1855, aged 62. Born in Keene, he graduated at Dartmouth in 1822, and studied theology at Andover. In the service of the home missionary society he went to the west, and there was a pastor ten years: then he took a prominent part in the founding of the colleges of Jacksonville and Wabash. Subsequently he toiled in the cause of ministerial education. He was a man of judgment, of energy, and of benevolence. For years he supported three scholarships in reference to the ministry. By his offer of prizes of 200 dollars each he brought out three essays, — the educational systems of the Puritans and Jesuits by Prof. Porter, prayer for colleges by Prof. Tyler, and primitive piety revived by H. C. Fish. How much good may be the results of the efforts of this one humble man! He was a man of sorrows. While at the west his whole family, in his absence from home, was swept away by sickness, his wife and two children. As he was dying, when asked if Christ was precious, he said, "All in all, all in all, all in all!"

ELLIS, CALEB, judge of the superior court of New Hampshire, was born at Walpole, Mass., and graduated at Harvard college in 1793. He practised law in Claremont, N. H. In 1804 he was elected a member of congress. In 1813 he was appointed a judge of the superior court, in which office he continued till his death, May 9, 1816, aged 49. He was a man of candor and moderation, disinterested, and faithful in the offices intrusted to him. He sought no popularity except that which follows the pursuit of noble ends by honest means. As a judge he was enlightened, independent, impartial, and inflexible; yet mild and courteous. He had a delicate and scrupulous sense of honor and honesty. His regard to the institutions of religion and morality was evinced by the bequest of 5000 dollars for the support of a minister in Claremont. — Smith's Sketch; Farmer's Collect. II. 225-232.

ELLSWORTH, AMOS, judge, died in Lancaster, Pa., in Dec., 1851. He was an officer in the army of 1812, a member of congress, judge, and attorney-general; in 1832 he was a candidate for the vice-presidency.

ELLSWORTH, OLIVER, LL. D., chief justice of the United States, died Nov. 26, 1807, aged 65. He was born at Windsor, Conn., April 29, 1745, and was graduated at the college in New Jersey in 1766. He soon afterwards commenced the practice of the law, in which profession he became eminent. His perceptions were unusually rapid, his reasoning clear and conclusive, and his eloquence powerful. In the year 1777 he was chosen a delegate to the continental congress. In 1780 he was elected into the council of his native State, and he continued a member of that body till 1784, when he was appointed a judge of the superior court. In 1687 he was elected a member of the convention which framed the federal constitution. In an assembly, illustrious for talents, erudition, and patriotism, he held a distinguished place. His exertions essentially aided in the production of an instrument, which, under the divine blessing, has been the main pillar of American prosperity and glory. He was immediately afterwards a member of the State convention, and contributed his efforts towards procuring the ratification of that instrument. When the federal government was organized in 1789, he was chosen a member of the senate. This elevated station, which he filled with his accustomed dignity, he occupied till in March, 1796, he was nominated by Washington chief justice of the supreme court of the United States as the successor of Mr. Jay. Though his attention had been for many years abstracted from the study of the law, yet he presided in that high court with the greatest reputation. His charges to the jury were rich not only in legal principles but in moral sentiments, expressed in a simple, concise style. Toward the close of the year 1799 he was appointed by president Adams envoy extraordinary to France for the purpose of settling a treaty with that nation. With much reluctance he accepted the appointment. In conjunction with Governor Davie and Mr. Murray, his associates, he negotiated a treaty. Having accomplished the business of his embassy, he repaired to England for the benefit of the mineral waters, as his health had suffered much in his voyage to Europe. Convinced that his infirmities must incapacitate him for the future discharge of his duties on the bench, he transmitted a resignation of his office of chief justice at the close of the year 1800. On his return to Connecticut, his fellow citizens, desirous of still enjoying the benefit of his extraordinary talents, elected him into the council; and in May, 1807, he was appointed chief justice of the State. This office, however, he declined, from apprehension that he could not long survive under the pressure of his distressing malady, the gravel, and of domestic afflictions.

Mr. Ellsworth was an accomplished advocate, an upright legislator, an able and impartial judge, a wise and incorruptible ambassador, and an ardent, uniform, and indefatigable patriot. He moved for more than thirty years in a most conspicuous sphere unassailed by the shafts of slander. His integrity was not only unimpeached, but unsuspected. In his debates in legislative bodies he was sometimes ardent, but his ardor illuminated the subject. His purposes he pursued with firmness, independence, and intrepidity. In private life he was a model of social and personal virtue. He was just in his dealings, frank in his communications, kind and obliging in his deportment, easy of access to all, beloved and respected by his neighbors and acquaintances. Amid the varied honors, accumulated upon him by his country, he was unassuming and humble. His dress, his equipage, and mode of living were regulated by a principle of republican economy; but for the promotion of useful and benevolent designs he communicated with readiness and liberality. The purity and excellence of his character are rare in any station, and in the higher walks of life are almost unknown.

If it be asked, To what cause is the uniformity of his virtue to be attributed? the answer is at hand, — He was a Christian. He firmly believed in the great doctrines of the gospel. Having its spirit transfused into his own heart, and being directed by its maxims and impelled by its motives, he at all times pursued a course of upright conduct. The principles which governed him were not of a kind which are liable to be weakened or destroyed by the opportunity of concealment, the security from dishonor, the authority of numbers, or the prospects of interest. He made an explicit confession of Christianity in his youth; and, in all his intercourse with the polite and learned world, he was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. In the midst of multiplied engagements he made theology a study, and attended with unvarying punctuality on the worship of the sanctuary. The sage, whose eloquence had charmed the senate, and whose decisions from the bench were regarded as almost oracular, sat with the simplicity of a child at the feet of Jesus, devoutly absorbed in the mysteries of redemption. His religion was not cold and heartless, but practical and vital. Meetings for social worship and pious conference he countenanced by his presence. He was one of the trustees of the missionary society of Connecticut, and engaged with ardor in the benevolent design of disseminating the truths of the gospel. In his last illness he was humble and tranquil. He expressed the submission, the views, and the consolations of a Christian. His speech in the convention of Connecticut, in favor of the constitution, is preserved in the American museum. — Panoplist and Missionary Magazine, I. 193–197; Brown's American Register, II. 95–98; Dwight's Travels, I. 301–304.

ELMER, EBENEZER, died at Bridgeton, N. J., Oct. 18, 1843, aged 91. He was an officer in the army of the Revolution, a member of congress, president of the society of the Cincinnati.

ELWELL, MELITABEL, Mrs., died in Saco, Me., Jan. 19, 1835, aged 100.

ELY, RICHARD, minister of North Bristol, in Guilford, and of Saybrook second church, Conn., died in 1814, aged 80, having been a minister 56 years. He was the son of Rev. David Ely, the son of Richard, of North Lyme. He graduated at Yale in 1754. He had a son, Dr. Richard, of Saybrook, whose son, Rev. William, of Vernon and North Mansfield, died at Easthampton Nov. 2, 1850, aged 62, a successful preacher, and an example of liberal charity. Richard Ely published a sermon at the ordination of D. Ely, at Ripton, 1774.

ELY, ZEBULON, died at Lebanon, Conn., Nov. 18, 1824, aged 65. Born in Lyme, he graduated in 1779, a distinguished scholar. In the same year he fought the British at an advanced post, but lost his coat and hat, glad to escape an unlooked-for scouting party with his life. In 1783 he was ordained. In a few of his last years he suffered from the palsy. He once said to Mr. Stone, a neighboring minister, regarded as a Hopkianian, "Your system runs into extremes." He replied, "Well, well; do not cut Truth's legs off, let her run where she will." He once exchanged with Mr. Williams, of East Hartford, riding thirty miles in a storm, to preach to a dozen people, much to his grief. Twenty years after he met with a pious man, who asked him if he remembered that Sunday, for his sermons, he said, were the means of his conversion. He was the father of Rev. Dr. E. Stiles Ely, of Philadelphia.

ELY, DAVID, D. D., minister of Huntington, Conn., was born in Lyme, in 1749; graduated at Yale college in 1769; and was ordained as a colleague minister in 1773. For nearly thirty years he was an efficient member of the corporation of Yale college. He died Feb. 16, 1816, aged 66. He and his colleague, who was settled at the organization of the church in 1721, preached nearly a century. His successor was Thomas Punder-son. With a vivid fancy and warm heart, he usually preached extemporaneously. His character was described by his friend, Dr. Dwight. — Panoplist, XII. 487–489.

ELY, ZEBULON, minister of Lebanon, Conn., died in 1824, aged about 65. He was graduated at Yale college in 1779, and was a tutor from 1781 to 1782. As a minister, he was highly respected, and devoted to his work. For a few last years his powers of mind failed him. His memoirs were written by his son, Dr. E. S. Ely, of Philadelphia. He published a sermon at the election, 1804; at the ordination of S. Bartlett, 1804; on the death of Governor Trumbull, 1785, and of his son, also governor, 1809; of W. Huntington's wife, 1799; of W. Williams, 1812; before the county foreign mission society, 1815.

ELY, JOHN, minister of North Bristol, in Madison, Conn., died in 1827, by a fall from his horse, aged about 62. He was born in Lyme, and graduated at Yale in 1786. He was first settled in Danbury.

ELY, JUSTIN, died at West Springfield, July 24, 1850, aged 78. A graduate of Harvard in 1792, he spent his business life as a merchant. He was an eminent Christian, kind, social, hospitable. — N. Y. Observer, Sept. 7.

ELY, ELIHU, Dr., died at Binghamton, N. Y., March 17, 1851, aged 70, an early settler and prominent citizen.

ELY, HEMAN, judge, died Feb. 2, 1852, aged 76, at Elyria, in Ohio, a town named after him. He was an early settler of Ohio. The son of Justin Ely, of Springfield, Mass., he was one of the firm of T. and H. Ely, of New York; and had occasion to visit foreign countries.

EMERSON, JOSEPH, the first minister of Mendon, Mass., died at Concord Jan. 3, 1680. He was ordained in 1667. His wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. E. Bulkley.

EMERSON, JOHN, minister of Gloucester, Mass., died in 1700, aged about 64. He was the son of Thomas, of Ipswich, and graduated at Harvard in 1656, and was ordained in 1663. His son John, a graduate of 1689, and minister in Portsmouth, died in 1732, aged 61.

EMERSON, JOHN, minister of Portsmouth, died June 21, 1732, aged 61. Born in Ipswich, he graduated at Harvard in 1689. On the night of the murder of Major Waldron by the Indians, he was invited to sleep at his house, but declined. He was settled at Newcastle in 1704: in 1708 he went to England and resided for a period in London. In 1715 he was installed at Portsmouth. Of the one hundred and twenty-four persons added to his church in seventeen years, forty were added in the year following the earthquake of 1727, by which event many minds were awakened to the subject of religion. He was an agreeable companion and faithful minister.

EMERSON, WILLIAM, died in Rutland, Vt., in Oct., 1776, aged 33. Graduated at Harvard in 1761, he was ordained the minister of Concord, the successor of Mr. Bliss, in 1766. His patriotic and Christian zeal induced him to be chaplain at Ticonderoga in Aug., 1776.

EMERSON, JOSEPH, minister of Malden, Mass., the son of Edward E., and the grandson of Rev. Joseph E., of Mendon, was born at Chelmsford, April 20, 1700; was graduated at Harvard college in 1717; and ordained, Oct. 31, 1721. For nearly half a century he continued his benevolent labors without being detained from his pulpit but two Sabbaths. He died suddenly, July 13, 1767, aged 67. His wife was Mary, daughter of Rev. S. Moody, of York. He had nine sons and four daughters. Three of his sons were ministers: Joseph, of Pepperell; William, of Concord; and John, of Conway. He was pious in early life, and his parents witnessed the effect of their instruction and prayers. As a teacher of religion to his fellow men, and their guide to heaven, he searched the Scriptures with great diligence, that he might draw his doctrines from the pure fountains of truth. In the various relations which he sustained, he was just, amiable, kind, and benevolent. One-tenth of his income was devoted to charitable uses. He, at stated times every day, addressed himself to Heaven, and never engaged in any important affair without first seeking the Divine blessing. Such was his humility, that, when unguarded words fell from his lips, he would ask forgiveness of his children and servants. He published the importance and duty of a timely seeking of God, 1727; meat out of the eater and sweetness out of the strong, 1735; early piety encouraged, 1738; at the ordination of his son, Joseph, at Groton, now Pepperell, 1747. — Funeral Sermon, by his son.

EMERSON, DANIEL, first minister of Hollis, N. H., was a descendant of Joseph E., minister of Mendon. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1739; was ordained April 20, 1743; received Eli Smith as his colleague Nov. 27, 1793; and died, Sept. 30, 1801, aged 85, in the 59th of his ministry. His praise was in all the churches. In 1743 there were only thirty families in the town. During his ministry, many died in the faith which he had taught them; and, at the time of his death, the church consisted of about two hundred members. Such men, the successful teachers of morality and religion, of whom the world knows nothing, are its benefactors, while the men of fame are usually the scourges of the earth. — Massachusetts Missionary Mag., i. 57-59.

EMERSON, WILLIAM, minister in Boston, died May 11, 1811, aged 42. He was the grandson of Rev. Joseph E., of Malden, and the son of Rev. Wm. E., of Concord, who died a chaplain in the army in 1776. He was born May 6, 1769, and graduated at Harvard college in 1789. He became first the minister of Harvard in 1792; but, in Oct., 1799, he was installed the pastor of the first church in Boston. In the year 1804 he engaged in the labor of conducting the Monthly Anthology, a literary journal, which opposed the orthodox Calvinistic views of the Christian religion. He published a sermon, preached July 4, 1794; at the artillery election, 1799; before a charitable society, 1800; at the ordination of S. Clark, 1800; of R. Smiley, 1801; of T. Beebe, 1803; on the death of Dr. Thacher, 1802; of Madame Bowdoin, 1803; of C. Austin, 1806; before the female asylum, 1805; before the humane society, 1807; oration, July 4, 1802; four discourses in the Christian monitor, numbered 1, 2, 3, 7; a collection of psalms and hymns, 1808. After his death, there was published his sketch of the history of the first church in Boston, with two sermons annexed, 8vo., 1812. — 2 Historical Collections, i. 251–258.

EMERSON, JOHN, first minister of Conway, died June 26, 1826, aged 80. A graduate of Harvard in 1764, he was settled in 1769; he used to say, he was "John preaching in the wilderness." He lived to see his flock of four hundred increased to two thousand. He admitted 580 to his church, buried 1,037, and baptized 1,219. He wrote 3,500 sermons. E. Hitchcock was settled as his colleague in 1821. — Holland, ii. 347.

EMERSON, JOSEPH, died at Wethersfield in May, 1833, aged 54. A graduate of Harvard in 1798, he was a tutor; then settled as a minister many years at Beverly; and last devoted himself to the business of teaching female pupils, for whom he established a school at Wethersfield. He was a zealous Christian, and an excellent teacher. His life, by his brother, Prof. Ralph Emerson, was published in 1834.

EMERSON, JOSEPH, Dr., died in Heath, Mass., Aug. 13, 1811, aged 60; a very successful and much beloved physician.

EMERSON, SAMUEL, M. D., died at Kennebunk Aug. 7, 1851, aged nearly 87. A graduate of Harvard in 1785, he was a surgeon in the Revolutionary war, and long an able practitioner.

EMERY, JOHN, D. D., bishop of the Methodist church, died in Baltimore co., Md., Dec. 16, 1835, respected and lamented. In riding, he was thrown from his carriage, and his skull was fractured.

EMMET, THOMAS ADDIS, an eminent lawyer, died in New York Nov. 14, 1827, aged 63. He was born in Cork, Ireland, in 1764, the son of a physician. Educated at Trinity college, Dublin, he studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took the degree of M. D. in 1784. His thesis was published in Smellie's thesaurus. At this time he was inclined to forensic pursuits, presiding over five debating societies. He afterwards made the tour of Italy and Germany, visiting the most celebrated schools of the continent. On his return to Ireland, the death of his brother, Christopher Temple Emmet, a lawyer of surpassing talents, induced him to engage in the same profession. After studying at the Temple in London two years, he was admitted to the Irish bar at Dublin in 1791. He soon rose to distinction, and was deemed superior in legal and general science and in talents to Curran. At this period the events of the French revolution awakened in the oppressed Irish the hope of national freedom. The association of "United Irishmen" was constituted, embracing both Catholics and Protestants, bound together by a secret oath. Each society was limited to thirty-six persons, but the whole kingdom was organized into departments, and at the head of the whole was a committee, of which Mr. Emmet was a leading member. It was determined to seek aid from France, and to take up arms. May 23, 1798, was appointed for the general rising. But previously to that time a traitor disclosed the conspiracy, and Emmet and others were arrested and thrown into prison. The rebellion, notwithstanding, broke out on the fixed day; but it was soon crushed before the arrival of Humbert and his French army of twelve hundred men, which surrendered in August. An agreement was soon made by the government with the State prisoners, that if they would make certain disclosures, not implicating individuals, they should be released. The disclosures were made; yet Mr. Emmet was long detained in prison. After the peace of Amiens he was set free and conveyed to the river Elbe. The winter of 1802 he spent in Brussels, where he saw his brother about to embark in the enterprise which ended in his execution. From France Mr. Emmet proceeded to New York, where he arrived Nov. 11, 1804. The death of Hamilton had left an opening for such a man in the bar; he was soon admitted to the supreme court of the State and of the United States, and stood among the first in his profession. He identified himself with the democratic party. In 1812 he was appointed attorney-general of the State. As an advocate he was unrivalled. With a prolific fancy, his figures were bold; yet was he logical and profound, and his manner was most earnest and impressive. He was incessant in labor, devoting more than thirteen hours in each day to study and business. Of course he mixed but little with the fashionable world. He had often amused himself with mathematical calculations. In the circuit court of 1827 he was engaged in the important Astor cause, and on Monday, Nov. 12th, replied in an elaborate argument to Webster and Van Buren. On Wednesday, while occupied in another cause, he was seized with the apoplexy in court, and died the same day. While in prison in Scotland he wrote part of an essay toward the history of Ireland, which was published at New York in 1807. — American Annual Register, 1827–9, 139–149.

EMMETT, JOHN P., professor of chemistry in the university of Virginia, died at New York Aug. 13, 1842, aged 47; the son of Thomas Addis Emmett.

EMMONS, NATHANIEL, D. D., minister of Franklin, Mass., died Sept. 23, 1840, aged 95 years and five months. His father was Samuel E., of East Haddam, Conn.; his mother, Ruth Cone. He was graduated at Yale college in 1767; studied theology with Dr. Smalley, and imbibed his doctrines; was licensed to preach in 1769, and ordained over the second church of Wrentham, now Franklin, in April, 1773. The duties of a pastor he performed fifty-four years, till 1827. He also instructed many students in theology. His wife and her two children died in 1778. He afterwards married a daughter of Rev. Chester Williams, of Hadley. She was a daughter-in-law of Rev. Samuel Hopkins, who, when she was young, married her widowed mother. By her he had six children, of whom he buried three. Rev. Elam Smalley was settled at Franklin as colleague minister in 1829.

A memoir of Dr. E. is found in the first volume of his works, published in 1842. First there is given an autobiography; then a memoir by Dr. Jacob Ide, his son-in-law; then an additional notice by Prof. E. A. Park. He professed to be warmly attached to genuine Calvinism; but he thought Calvinism had lost much of its original purity, and had acquired absurdities which must be rejected in order to make it consistent with reason and Scripture; and among these "wens" to be pared off, he reckoned the doctrines, that the sin of Adam is imputed to his posterity; that the righteousness of Christ is imputed to believers; that sinners lie under a natural inability to become holy; and that Christ made atonement only for the elect. These he called "gross absurdities." But whether so or not, the character of Calvinism must be determined by the faith of Calvin himself, and not by what may be deemed later improvements, and a supposed right view of "the essential principles of pure Christianity." His editor admits that he differed from Calvin in many important respects. The great question is, did he teach the great fundamental principles of the gospel, and did he spread abroad no gross and perilous errors? His whole long life was spent in his study in unslacked industry, in unwearied mental toil. He studied seventy years in one room, usually ten hours a day. His famous political sermon, called his "Jeroboam sermon," was preached after Mr. Jefferson became president, from the text relating to Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, "who made Israel to sin."

He was a plain, argumentative preacher, with no oratorical powers, but simple, direct, and earnest in his address. He was an independent thinker, but some of his speculations are so peculiar, and so revolting to the general Christian sentiment of our country, as to render it proper to advert to them. The most prominent and remarkable doctrine which he advanced, is the doctrine that God is the producing cause of every act of the human mind, and therefore of all wickedness as well as of all goodness. It may seem incredible, that a worthy minister in a country town of New England, a teacher of theology to nearly ninety theological students, should inculcate a doctrine so abhorrent, so contradictory to Scripture; and therefore it may be expedient to quote a few sentences from his own writings. God, he says, must "create evil, when, and where, and to what degree the good of the universe requires, because he is the owner and rightful sovereign of the universe."

He includes in evil moral as well as natural evil; that is, he thus makes God the author of sin. "God's acting on their hearts and producing all their free, voluntary, moral exercises, is so far from preventing them from being moral agents, that it necessarily makes them moral agents" He goes so far as to assert, that they who deny this "universal agency," in the production of sin as well as holiness, do "virtually deny God's existence." In reference to the origin of Adam's sin he says, "Satan placed certain motives before his mind, which, by a certain divine energy, took hold of his heart and led him into sin." Thus he ascribes to God the efficiency in the production of Adam's sin, to which the devil was only a tempter. Satan tempts men to sin; God produces sin. If this is not blasphemy, what can be? There is not the least doubt as to his doctrine, which he has much more fully asserted. He makes God the efficient cause, the actual producer of every sinful volition in his creature; he makes God the author of sin. Is not God then responsible for sin? And how can he punish man for sin? Is not he, who intelligently and voluntarily performs an act, responsible for that act? The man who lays a living child upon the ground, and with an axe chops off its head, is guilty of murder. If God creates a human mind, and then by his almighty and irresistible power moves that mind to sin and produces sin, God is the author of sin. If we embrace this doctrine, we make God the author of sin, which the Bible ascribes to the devil. We give to the infinitely pure and holy Being the very character of Satan. But Dr. E. ascribes to God holy motives,—his own glory and the highest possible good of the universe,—whereas the Devil is influenced by the contrary evil motives; yet the acts and effects are the same,—the production of sin, which God abhors. In communicating such a doctrine to the world, by what argument does the teacher justify himself? He teaches that all freedom consists in volition and its effects, and not in its cause. The man who acts voluntarily—whatever may cause his volition—is a free, voluntary agent. So that, although God causes, produces his sinful volitions, man is yet a perfectly free moral agent. But this contradicts the teaching of the great body of ethical and theological writers, and contradiets the general consciousness and common sense of man. It is deceptive language — "what God makes free must be free." But man is not free, if his volition is made, created, produced by almighty power.

Dr. Stephen West, in his book on agency, was the first teacher in this country of this doctrine, that God is the only agent, the producer of all the volitions of his creatures. It was doubtless to his book, published in 1772, that Dr. Emmons was indebted for his theory. It is probable that on this point there are now in the Christian world very few followers of these bold theorists. Their doctrine, which was the doctrine of Epicurus, Gassendi, Condillac, Hobbes, and Priestley, may be acceptable to infidels and universalists; but it will make little progress with intelligent, pious readers of the Bible, who can easily understand, with a host of commentators, that when God is said to harden Pharaoh's heart, the meaning is, not a producing efficiency, but a prediction, of a certain event in Providence, that he would harden his own heart, as it is afterwards declared that he did. And it may be added; let it be that the origin of sin is a mystery. Then let it remain a mystery, and not be attempted to be cleared up by charging it blasphemously upon God. But if God is a free agent, then he might make man in his own image a free moral agent, whose choice is free, and is not caused, produced, made by another. Do we not all know intuitively, by common sense, by reason and conscience, that we are such free agents, therefore justly accountable to a holy, sin-hating God? Even Berkeley, though he denied the existence of matter, did not deny the existence of created minds, having wills of their own and volitions not produced by another. He says: "It is true, I have denied there are any other agents beside spirits; but this is very consistent with allowing to thinking, rational beings in the production of motions the use of limited powers, ultimately indeed derived from God, but immediately under the direction of their own wills, which is sufficient to entitle them to all the guilt of their actions." Our innate sense of justice teaches us, that if God creates, produces our wicked affections, volitions, and actions, it would be injustice in him to punish us for them, or to charge upon us guilt.

As to Emmons' other doctrines, he differed little from a multitude of New England theologians. He believed that Christ came from heaven to be an atoning sacrifice for sin, a substitute for sinners, to vindicate God's justice, and that men are justified by faith in him; that men are active, not passive, in regeneration; that men are not guilty of Adam's sin, but that their hearts are, in consequence of his sin, totally depraved; that holiness and sin consist in voluntary exercises. As to the success of his ministry, during fifty-four years three hundred and eight were added to the church, less than six a year on an average. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts missionary society, and was its first president for twelve years. He was zealously attached to the system of Congregationalism, maintaining in his "platform of ecclesiastical government," that all ecclesiastical power is vested in each church. He was a man of wit and quickness of retort. Some anecdotes are the following: As a Universalist had answered one of his sermons, some one suggested to him the plan of printing the sermon and the answer in one pamphlet; he replied, "It is against the laws: — thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." The secret of popular preaching, he said, was not to meddle with the hearers' consciences; also, "let your sermons be without beginning, middle, or end." He said, "let your eloquence flow from your heart to your hands, and never attempt to force it the other way." "It is a great blessing to be able to talk an hour about nothing. The most important requisites for an extemporaneous preacher are ignorance, impudence, and presumption." When a tippler asked him "to tell what he was to understand by the soul of man," he replied, "No, I can't tell a man that has n't got any." When a minister wrote to him — "I have read your sermon on the atonement and wept over it," he immediately sent back this answer: "I have read your letter and laughed at it." He said to a candidate, "Your sermon was too much like Seekonk plain, long and level." He asked a young preacher, "Do you ever mean to preach another sermon? You've preached about everything this morning." When a young man said, "I hope you were not wearied with the length of my sermon," he replied, "No, nor with the depth either." He published sixty or more single sermons and tracts. He published sermons at the ordinations of E. Dudley, C. Chaddock, E. Smith, C. Alexander, D. Avery, W. Harris, J. Tufts, J. Emerson, T. Williams, E. Whipple, G. Conant, Z. Whitmore, and C. Park; a sermon on the death of Washington and of many other persons; on receiving from Dr. Franklin books for Franklin library, 1787; election sermon, 1798; on the second century from the landing at Plymouth, 1820; sermons, 8vo., 1812; collection of sermons, 8vo., 1813; sermons, 8vo., 1815; sermons, 3 vols., 8vo., 1823. His works were published, edited by Dr. Ide, in 6 vols., 8vo., 1842. — Memoir Prefixed to Works; Punchard on Congregationalism, 276; Review of E.'s Theory.

EMOTT, JAMES, died at Poughkeepsie April 7, 1850, aged 80; a distinguished lawyer at New York, and a member of Congress from 1809 to 1813. He was judge of the common pleas and of the circuit court.

ENDECOTT, JOHN, the first governor of Massachusetts, died March 15, 1665, aged 75. He was born in Dorchester, England, in 1589, and married a relation of M. Cradock, the governor of the Massachusetts company in England, and brother-in-law of R. Ludlow, deputy governor. He was sent to this country by that company as their agent, to carry on the plantation at Naumkeag, or Salem, and arrived Sept. 6, 1628. It was here that he laid the foundation of the first permanent town within the limits of the Massachusetts patent. He was a suitable person to be intrusted with the care of a new settlement in the wilderness, for he was bold, undaunted, sociable, and cheerful, familiar, or austere and distant, as occasion required. The company, in April, 1629, chose him the governor of "London's plantation;" but in August it was determined to transfer the charter and the government of the colony to New England, and John Winthrop, who arrived in the following year, was appointed governor. In 1636 Mr. Endecott was sent out on an expedition against the Indians on Block Island, and in the Pequot country. He continued at Salem till 1644, when he was elected governor of Massachusetts, and removed to Boston. He was also governor from 1649 to 1654, excepting in 1650, when Mr. Dudley was governor, and from 1655 to 1665. He was succeeded by Bellingham. He left two sons. He was a sincere and zealous Puritan, rigid in his principles, and severe in the execution of the laws against sectaries, or those who differed from the religion of Massachusetts. Two Episcopalians, who accused the members of the church of Salem of being Separatists, were sent back to England by his orders. He was determined to establish a reformed and a pure church. The Quakers and the Baptists had no occasion to remember him with affection. So opposed was he to everything which looked like Popery, that, through the influence of Roger Williams, he cut out the cross from the military standard. He insisted at Salem, that the women should wear veils at church. In 1649, when he was governor, he entered into an association with the other magistrates against long hair. As the practice of wearing it, "after the manner of ruffians and barbarous Indians, had begun to invade New England," they declared their detestation of the custom, "as a thing uncivil and unmanly, whereby men do deform themselves, and offend sober and modest men, and do corrupt good manners." In 1659, during his administration, four Quakers were put to death in Boston. — Neal's New England, I. 139, 364; Hutchinson, I. 8-17, 38, 235; Winthrop; Hist. Coll. vi. 245, 261; IX. 5; Holmes; Morton, 81, 188; Magnalia, II. 18; N. E. Historical Register, July, 1847.

ENGLAND, JOHN, Catholic bishop of North and South Carolina and Georgia, died at Charleston April 11, 1842, aged 55. He was born in Cork, and, being made bishop by the pope, arrived at Charleston the last day of 1820. He established a theological seminary, and aided in the anti-duelling society. Returning from a visit to Rome, he contracted on the voyage the dysentery, of which he died. His works were published in 5 vols., 8vo., 1849. — Cycl. of Amer. Lit. II. 84.

ENGLISH, GEORGE B., an adventurer, the son of Thomas English, of Boston, was graduated at Harvard college in 1807, and afterwards for a while studied theology. He then became an officer of marine in the navy. Embracing, as is said, Islamism, he entered the service of the Pasha of Egypt, and accompanied an expedition under Ismael to Upper Egypt. He died at Washington in Sept., 1828, aged 39. He published Grounds of Christianity examined, 12mo., 1813, which was answered by E. Everett and S. Cary; letter to Mr. Cary on his review; letter to Mr. Channing on his two sermons on infidelity, 1813; expedition to Dongola and Sennaar, 8vo., 1823.

ENGLISH, PHILLIP, a wealthy merchant of Salem, died in 1734, aged 84. He came near to being a victim to the witchcraft delusion in 1692. Both he and his wife were accused and imprisoned, and from Salem prison were, by their friends, on some pretence, removed to Boston. On the day before that appointed for trial, they, being under bail, attended public worship, and heard Mr. Moody preach from the text, "If they persecute you in one city, flee to another," justifying a flight from outrage under the forms of justice. He visited them, and through his persuasion they fled at midnight to New York, and thus perhaps saved their lives. He ever acknowledged his obligations to the manly courage of Mr. Moody.

ENOS, ROGER, lieutenant-colonel, accompanied Arnold in his expedition to Quebec, as far as fifty miles up Dead river in Maine, when, by decision of a council of war, he returned with his division in consequence of the want of provisions; and thus, perhaps, the whole army was saved from destruction. — American Remembrancer, 1776.

EPENOWE, an Indian of Martha's Vineyard, was a victim, with twenty-five others, to the treachery of Capt. Thomas Hunt in 1614, who carried them to Malaga with the purpose of selling them as slaves. This villainy was retaliated. Epenowe was taken to England, and there contrived a method of regaining his native land. He invented the story of a mine of gold at Capawoick, or Capawock, now Martha's Vineyard, to which he was conveyed by Capt. Harley. When twenty canoes were around the ship, he plunged into the water, and, by the aid of his friends and their flight of arrows, he escaped. Epenowe, in 1619, with his countrymen, assaulted Capt. Dermen, and inflicted many wounds, killing several of his men.

EPIRAIM, was an Indian preacher in 1698 at Gayhead, Martha's Vineyard. With Abel, another preacher, he had the charge of two hundred and sixty souls or more, who were taught to read. These Indians were well clothed. They had a framed meeting-house. At the same time Japhet was a preacher at Chilmark to two hundred and thirty-one Indians, of whom sixty-four were in full communion; and there were preachers at Tisbury to seventy-two Indians; Job Russel preached at Edgartown to one hundred and thirty-six, and there were yet other congregations on the Vineyard.

EPPES, JOHN W., died near Richmond in Virginia in Sept., 1823, aged 50. His wife, Maria, the daughter of Mr. Jefferson, died at Monticello in April, 1804. He was appointed senator of the United States in 1815, but he resigned from ill health.

ERVING, WILLIAM, a benefactor of Harvard college, was graduated in 1753, and quitted the British army, in which he was an officer, at the commencement of the American Revolution. He died at Roxbury May 27, 1791, aged 56, bequeathing to the college, in which he was educated, 1000 pounds toward establishing a professorship of chemistry and materia medica.

ERVING, JOHN, a merchant of Boston, died Aug. 20, 1786, aged 94. He came from Scotland. He was twenty years a member of the council. Being opposed to independence, he retired from public life at the Revolution. One daughter married Gov. Bowdoin, another Gov. Scott, of Dominica, and a third Duncan Stewart, who was collector of New London before the Revolution.

ERVING, SHIRLEY, Dr., died in Boston July 8, 1815, aged 54. He was the grandson of Gov. Shirley, the son of John E., of Boston. He settled as a physician in Portland, and was highly esteemed. In declining health he removed to Boston. — American Quarterly Register, 1840.

ERVING, GEORGE W., consul, died in New York in July, 1850. A native of Boston, the son of George E., a loyalist, he was educated at Oxford. Mr. Jefferson appointed him consul to London; thence he was sent to Denmark and Berlin, and then ambassador to Madrid.

ESCARBOT, MARC L', published Nova Francia, or an account of New France, as described in late voyages into the countries called by the Frenchmen La Cadie, 4to., London, 1654; translated from the French edition of 1612; the same in Pureshas and Churchill.

ESTAING, CHARLES H., count de, commanded the French fleet sent to our aid in the Revolutionary war. He made an unsuccessful assault on Savannah Oct. 9, 1779, when Pulaski was mortally wounded. He afterwards captured Grenada. Being one of the assembly of notables in France, and incurring the suspicion of the dominant faction, he was guillotined at Paris April 29, 1793.

ESTABROOK, JOSEPH, minister of Concord, Mass., died in 1711, aged about 68. Born in Enfield, Middlesex, England, he came to this country in 1660, and graduated at Harvard in 1664. He was ordained colleague with Mr. Bulkley in 1667. His son Benjamin, first minister of Lexington, a graduate of 1690, died in 1697, leaving a widow Abigail, daughter of Rev. S. Willard. His son Samuel, minister of Canterbury, Conn., a graduate of Harvard of 1696, ordained 1711, died in 1727, aged 52.

ESTABROOK, JOSEPH, minister of Athol, Mass., died May 18, 1830, aged 71. A descendant of Rev. Joseph E. of Concord, he was born in Lexington, and he fought in the battle of Lexington. He was graduated at Harvard in 1782. In 1787 he was ordained.

ESTEX, JOSEPH, died in Burrillville, R.I., Sept. 20, 1851, aged 99 years and 9 months. His brother John, of B., died Sept. 1, 1851, aged 90.

EUSTACE, JOHN SKEY, a brave officer in the American war, died at Newburgh Aug. 25, 1805, aged 45. He entered into the service of his country not long after the commencement of the Revolution, and continued one of her active defenders till the conclusion of the contest. He served for some time as aid-de-camp to General Lee, and afterwards as an aid-de-camp to General Greene. When the war was ended, he retired to Georgia, and was there admitted to the bar, as an advocate. In that State he received the appointment of adjutant-general. In the year 1794, as he was fond of military life, he went to France, and there received the appointment of a brigadier-general, and was afterwards promoted and made a major-general. In that capacity he served the French nation for some time. He commanded in 1797 a division of the French army in Flanders. In 1800 he returned again to his native country, and resided in Orange county, New York, where he led a retired, studious life till his death. He devoted to literature all the time which the state of his health would permit. — New York Spectator, Sept. 4, 1805.

EUSTIS, ABRAHAM, brigadier-general, died at Portland Jan. 27, 1843, aged 57. He studied law, but early entered the army, and served honorably thirty-five years.

EUSTIS, WILLIAM, M. D., governor of Massachusetts, died in Boston Feb. 6, 1825, aged 71. He was the son of Benjamin Eustis and was born at Cambridge June 10, 1753. After graduating at Harvard college in 1772, he studied physics with Dr. Joseph Warren. At the beginning of the war he was appointed surgeon of a regiment, and afterwards hospital surgeon. In 1777 and during most of the war he occupied as a hospital the spacious house of Col. Robinson, a royalist, on the east side of the Hudson, opposite to West Point. In the same house Arnold had his headquarters. At the termination of the war he commenced the practice of his profession in Boston. In 1800 he was elected a member of congress. By Mr. Madison in 1809 he was appointed secretary of war, and continued in office until in the late war the army of Hull was surrendered, when he resigned. In 1815 he was sent ambassador to Holland. After his return he was a member of congress in 1821, and for four successive sessions. After the resignation of Gov. Brooks, he was chosen governor in 1823, and died after a short illness. His wife, who survived him, was Caroline, the daughter of Woodbury Langdon of New Hampshire. By his direction he was buried by the side of his mother. His successor was Levi Lincoln. — Holmes, II. 515; Thacher.

EVANS, NATHANIEL, a minister in New Jersey, and a poet, was born in Philadelphia June 8, 1742, and was graduated at the college in that city in 1765, having gained a high reputation for his genius. He immediately afterwards embarked for England, recommended to the society for propagating the gospel, and was ordained by the bishop of London. He arrived at Philadelphia on his return, Dec. 26, 1765, and entered soon upon the business of his mission at Gloucester county in New Jersey. His season of labor was short, for it pleased God to remove him from this present life Oct. 29, 1767, aged 25. He was remarkable for the excellence of his temper, the correctness of his morals, and the soundness of his doctrines. He published a short account of T. Godfrey, prefixed to Godfrey's poems, and an elegy to his memory. After his death a selection of his writings was published, entitled, poems on several occasions, with some other compositions, 1772. Annexed to this volume is one of his sermons. — American Museum, VII. 405; Preface to the above Poems.

EVANS, LEWIS, eminent for his acquaintance with American geography, was a surveyor in Pennsylvania, and died in June, 1756. He made many journeys into the neighboring colonies, and had been frequently employed in surveying lands, purchased of the natives. He had collected a great store of materials from other sources. From these he compiled a map of the middle colonies, and of the adjacent country of the Indians, lying northward and westward. The first edition of it was published in 1749, and a second in 1755, accompanied with an explanatory pamphlet. Some expressions, countenancing the title of France to fort Frontenac, brought him into a controversy with a writer in Gaines' New York Mercury in 1756. In the course of the same year he wrote a full and elaborate reply to this and other charges against him, and caused the pamphlet to be published in London. They were both offered to the public under the title of geographical, historical, political, philosophical, and mechanical essays; Nos. 1, and 2. The first edition of this map was chiefly limited to New York, New Jersey, and Delaware; the second was much enlarged, being made a general map of the middle British colonies, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, and the country of the confederate Indians. It was inscribed to Mr. Pownall, in consideration, as a writer of that period asserts, of being promised by him the office of surveyor-general of New Jersey, and to gratify whom he published also in 1755 a pamphlet against Gov. Shirley. He belonged to the cabal in favor of W. Johnson. He was imprisoned for a libel on Gov. Morris. Afterwards in 1776, on the breaking out of the war between Great Britain and her colonies, Mr. Pownall himself gave a new edition of Evans' map, with large additions, entitled a map of the British colonies in North America. It comprehended all New England and the bordering parts of Canada.

EVANS, ISRAEL, minister of Concord, N. H., died March 9, 1807, aged 59. He was of Welsh descent, born in Pennsylvania, where his father and grandfather were ministers. He graduated at Princeton college in 1772, in a class of twenty-two, of whom fifteen were ministers. Being ordained in 1776 at Philadelphia as a chaplain, he served during the war in the New Hampshire brigade. He accompanied Sullivan against the Indians; and was at the capture of Burgoyne and surrender of Cornwallis. July 1, 1780, he was installed as the successor of Mr. Walker at Concord; but was dismissed at his request July 1797. His feelings and habits, brought from the army, were not adapted to make him useful as a minister. Humility was no trait in his character. His patriotic sermons during the war were acceptable to the army; he published a sermon after the Indian expedition; oration on the death of Gen. Poor, 1780; on the surrender of the British army at York; on the thanksgiving for independence, Dec. 11, 1783; at the election, 1791. — Bouton's Centen. Disc. 33; Moore's Ann. Concord, 63.

EVANS, OLIVER, a mechanic, was a descendant of Evan Evans, D. D., the first Episcopal minister of Philadelphia, who died in 1728. He made various improvements in the arts. His iron foundry, steam factory, and steam-mill were located at Philadelphia. He died at New York April 15, 1819, aged 64. He published the young engineer's guide, 1805; miller's and millwright's guide, twenty-five plates, 1807; first edit. 1795.

EVANS, CADWALLADER, DR., died at Philadelphia in 1773, aged 57. He was born in Philadelphia, of Welch descent, and studied under Dr. Bond and in Edinburgh. He was long a physician of the hospital. — Thacher's Medical Biography.

EVANS, JOHN, colonel, died near Monongalia, Va., in 1835, aged 97. He commanded a regiment in the war of the Revolution, and was a member of the convention to form a constitution for Virginia.

EVANS, MORRIS, died at Raleigh, N. C., Aug. 25, 1834, aged 105.

EVARTS, JEREMIAH, secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, died in Charleston, South Carolina, May 10, 1831, aged 50. He was probably a descendant of John Evarts, who lived in Guilford, Conn., in 1650, and was born in Sunderland, Vermont, Feb. 3, 1781. In a few years his parents removed to the town of Georgia in the northern part of Vermont. In 1798 he was placed under the instruction of Rev. John Eliot of E. Guilford, and was graduated at Yale college in 1802. During a revival of religion in the college in the beginning of this year, he cherished the hope, that his soul was renewed by the Spirit of God, and became a member of the college church. From 1803 to 1804 he was the instructor of the academy at Peacham, and afterwards studied law with Judge Chauncy of New Haven, in which city he commenced the practice of the law in July, 1806. In May, 1810, he removed to Charlestown, near Boston, in order to edit the Panoplist, a religious and literary monthly publication, which had been conducted by Dr. Morse and others four or five years; and he superintended that work, writing for it a large proportion of the original articles, till the close of 1820, when it was discontinued, and the Missionary Herald was published in its stead, under the authority of the American Board. This work was also committed to him. He had been chosen treasurer of the Board in 1812 and the next year one of the prudential committee. He served as treasurer till 1822. In 1821 he succeeded Dr. Worcester as corresponding secretary, in which office he continued nearly ten years till his death. Thus he toiled ten years as the editor of the Panoplist, ten years as the treasurer of the Board of missions, and ten years as corresponding secretary. In feeble health he took a voyage to the island of Cuba in Feb., 1831, and thence in April to Charleston, where in the house of Rev. Dr. Palmer he died. He left several children: his widow, Mehitable, the daughter of Roger Sherman of New Haven, died in 1851. While Mr. Evarts was on his voyage to Cuba, fully aware of the uncertain continuance of his life, he wrote as follows: "Here, in this sea, I consecrate myself to God as my chief good: to him, as my heavenly Father, infinitely kind and tender of his children; to him, as my kind and merciful Redeemer, by whose blood and merits alone I do hope for salvation; to him, as the beneficent renewer and sanctifier of the saved. I implore the forgiveness of my numerous and aggravated transgressions; and I ask, that my remaining time and strength may be employed for the glory of God, my portion, and for the good of his creatures." In his last hours his hope of forgiveness and salvation was undiminished and unshaken. He said, "I wish in these dying words to recognize the great Redeemer as the Saviour from sin and hell. And I recognize the Great Spirit of God as the renovator of God's elect." When it was said to him, "You will soon see Jesus;" he exclaimed, "Wonderful, wonderful, wonderful glory! We cannot understand—we cannot comprehend—wonderful glory! I will praise, I will praise him! Jesus reigns." This was no feverish excitement, nor dream of enthusiasm; but the vision of a dying believer. Mr. Evarts' character has been delineated in printed discourses by Dr. Woods and Dr. Spring. In the management of the important interests, with which he was intrusted, he manifested a scrupulous integrity. He combined with a sound judgment the ardor requisite for the accomplishment of great designs. His piety and extensive knowledge of theology and his accordance with the settled orthodoxy of New England secured to him the confidence of the churches in a degree seldom obtained by one, not especially trained for the ministry of the gospel. Free from self-sufficiency and pride, he sought the counsel of his associates; and especially he with habitual devotion sought the guidance and blessing of God. Though humble, he was yet resolute and determined and persevering. Having enlarged views and a vigorous mind, he was not disheartened by difficulties and opposition. Feeble in health, with a thin, slender frame, and destitute of oratorical action, he yet in his public addresses arrested attention and produced effect, for his conceptions were clear and his language perspicuous and forcible. His industry was untiring. Besides his labors in editing the Panoplist, he wrote the ten annual reports of the American Board from 1821 to 1830, the last of which contains a most weighty and valuable discussion on the future growth of this country and the means of preserving it from ruin. His essays, twenty-four in number, on the rights and claims of the Indians, under the signature of William Penn, were published in 1829; and he subsequently wrote various other pieces on the same subject, one of which is an article in the North American Review. He edited the volume of speeches on the Indian bill and wrote the introduction. — Woods' and Spring's Sermons; Miss. Herald, Oct. Nov. 1831.

EVE, ADAM, died in Pennsylvania Oct. 27, 1824, aged 104.

EVEREST, SOLOMON, a physician, died at Canton, Conn., in July, 1822. He bequeathed 10,000 dollars to religious and missionary purposes.

EVERETT, OLIVER, minister in Boston, died at Dorchester Nov. 19, 1802, aged 49. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1779, and was ordained pastor of the church in Summer street, as successor of Mr. Howe, Jan. 2, 1782. After a ministry of ten years, and after having acquired a high reputation for the extraordinary powers of his mind, the state of his health induced him to ask a dismission from his people in 1792. He was succeeded in 1794 by Mr. Kirkland. Afterwards he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for the county of Norfolk. He was the father of Alex. H. and Edward Everett.

EVERETT, DAVID, editor of the Boston Patriot, died Dec. 21, 1813, aged 44. He was born at Princeton, Mass., and graduated at Dartmouth college in 1795, and engaged in the profession of the law in Boston. In 1809 he commenced the Patriot, in which John Adams in a series of letters gave a history of his political career. In 1811 he was appointed register of probate; but a revolution in politics deprived him of his office. In Sept., 1812, he commenced the Pilot, a paper devoted to De Witt Clinton. Removing soon to Marietta to edit a paper, he died there. He published common sense in dishabille, or the farmer's monitor, 1799; Daranzel, a tragedy, 1800; essay on the rights and duties of nations; three orations and addresses; Junius Americanus in Boston Gazette in defence of J. Adams. — Specimens American Poetry, II. 113.

EVERETT, MOSES, minister of Dorchester, died March 25, 1813, aged 62. Born in Dedham, he graduated at Harvard in 1771, and in 1774 was ordained the minister of Dedham, in which office he continued eighteen years till 1792. He was appointed in 1808 a judge of the court of common pleas in the place of his brother Oliver. He published a sermon to young men, 1778; one at the ordination of his brother.

EVERETT, NOBLE, minister of Wareham, Mass., died Dec., 30, 1819, aged 72, in the 38th year of his ministry. Born in Woodbury, Conn., he graduated at Yale in 1775. He was a laborious, faithful, successful pastor. In revivals he was unwearied in his toils. His predecessors were R. Thacher and J. Cotton.

EVERETT, ALEXANDER H., died at Canton, China, June 28, 1847, aged 57. He was the son of Rev. Oliver E., and graduated in 1806. After being a teacher in Exeter academy, he went to Russia with Mr. Adams as secretary of legation, by whom he was appointed minister to Spain in 1825. After his return he was the editor of the North American Review. Connecting himself with the democratic party, Mr. Polk sent him as commissioner to China. He published Europe, 1822; America, 1827; oration, 1830; address to horticultural society, 1833.

EVERETT, HORACE, LL. D., died at Windsor, Vt., Jan. 30, 1851, aged 72. He was a member of congress fourteen years from 1829 to 1843, and honorably distinguished himself by his zeal to do justice to the Indians.

EVERETT, SERAPHINA SARAH, wife of Joel S. Everett, missionary at Constantinople, died in great peace Dec. 27, 1854; she said, "I wish to be near and like Jesus." She had the charge of the female boarding school of thirty-five pupils; and was one of the most accomplished of the ladies in the eastern mission. The hymn, "Asleep in Jesus," was sung, when she was dying; her husband, when dying, was asked by those around his bed, what they should sing, and he replied, "Asleep in Jesus."

EVERETT, JOEL S., a missionary, died at Bebek, near Constantinople, March 7, 1856, aged 42. He was a graduate of Amherst college in 1840. To Dr. Hamlin he said, that for a year past he had "a strong desire to depart to the blessed company on high; also, we have travelled together for eleven years, and now we must part for a little time. Get many souls to Christ. O, glorious God! O, glorious Redeemer! O, blessed company! and I am going to join it!" He was an excellent, faithful missionary. He had the charge of the boarding school for girls, and of the colporteur and Bible distribution work. He left four children.

EWING, JOHN, D. D., minister in Philadelphia, and provost of the college in that city, died Sept. 8, 1802, aged 70. He was born in East Nottingham, Md., June 22, 1732. His classical studies were begun under Dr. Allison, with whom, after finishing the usual studies, he remained three years as a tutor. He was graduated at Princeton college, 1752, and afterward accepted the appointment of tutor. Having resolved by Divine permission to become a minister of the gospel, he pursued his theological studies under the direction of Dr. Allison. At the age of twenty-six he was employed as the instructor of the philosophical classes in the college of Philadelphia, during the absence of Dr. Smith, who was then provost. In 1758 he accepted an unanimous call from the first Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, of which he continued a minister till his death. In 1773 he was sent to Great Britain to solicit benefactions for the academy of Newark in Delaware. He was everywhere received with respect. Among his acquaintances and friends were Dr. Robertston, Dr. Webster, Mr. Balfour, and Dr. Blacklock. In 1775 he returned to America, as the Revolution was commencing, notwithstanding the most tempting offers which were made to induce him to remain in England. In 1779 he was elected provost of the university of Pennsylvania. To this station, which he held till his death, he brought large stores of information, and a paternal tenderness toward the youth who were committed to his care. He had been a minister more than forty years. During his last sickness no murmur escaped his lips, and he was patient and resigned to the will of his heavenly Father. His colleague, Dr. Linn, survived him. In all the branches of science and literature, usually taught in colleges, he was uncommonly accurate, and in his mode of communicating information on the most abstruse and intricate subjects, he was seldom surpassed. His qualifications as a minister of the gospel were many and eminent. Science was with him a handmaid to religion. He was mighty in the Scriptures. His own investigation confirmed him in his belief of the doctrines of grace, which he endeavored to impress upon the hearts of his people. His sermons were written with great accuracy and care, in a style always perspicuous, and generally sober and temperate, though sometimes ornamented. Mere declamation was never heard from his lips. His deportment was easy and affable. He had a freeness of salutation, which sometimes surprised the stranger; but which was admired by those who knew him, as it proceeded from an open and honest heart. His talents in conversation were remarkably entertaining. He could unbend from severer studies and become the companion of innocent mirth, and of happy gaiety. Perfectly free from pedantry, he could accommodate himself to the most unlettered. His talent of narration was universally admired. An extract of his sermon on the death of Dr. Allison, is in the assembly's magazine. He published also a sermon on the death of George Bryan, 1791; the design of Christ coming into the world, in the American preacher, II.; and several communications in the transactions of the American philosophical society. His lectures on natural philosophy were published, 1809. — Linn's Funeral Sermon; Assembly's Miss. Mag. I. 409, 414, 458; Miller, II. 372; Holmes, II. 424.

EWING, GEORGE, died in Indiana about the year 1830, the father of Thomas Ewing. He was a native of Salem county, N. J.; an officer in the war; a pioneer in the west, one of the founders of Amestown, Ohio, a rich town, so named by R. Putnam in honor of Fisher Ames. — Mildreth.

EWING, CHARLES, LL. D., chief justice of New Jersey, died Aug. 5, 1832, aged about 54. He graduated at Princeton in 1798.

FAIRBANKS, DRURY, minister of Littleton, N. H., died in Jan., 1853, aged 80. He graduated at Brown university in 1797.

FAIRBANKS, JASON, the murderer of Elizabeth Fales at Dedham, Mass., was executed Sept. 10, 1801. He was a young man, and died without manifesting any repentance. At the gallows fifteen minutes were allowed him to seek finally, if he pleased, the Divine mercy. At the end of one minute he dropped his handkerchief as a signal, and was swung off, and justice was administered. No blind and falsely alleged humanity then rose up against God's law, — "The murderer shall surely be put to death." — Numbers 35: 16. No deluded legislator then thought of enacting, that the murderer should be imprisoned for life, or imprisoned for a year under the pretence that he might have time to repent. God's justice is the only safety of human society.

FAIRFAX, THOMAS, baron of Cameron, proprietor of the northern neck, between the Potomac and Rappahannock, in Virginia, died at Greenway court-house, Frederic county, Dec. 12, 1781, aged 98. His wife was the daughter of Gov. Culpeper, and heir of the Virginia estate.

FAIRFAX, BRIAN, minister of the Episcopal church in Alexandria, Va., died at Mount Eagle, near Cameron, Aug. 7, 1852, aged 70. He was a man of upright principles, of unfeigned piety, and of simple manners. His long illness he bore with resignation. He published a sermon on the forgetfulness of our sins, in American Preacher, vol. I.

FAIRFIELD, JOHN, governor of Maine, died at Washington Dec. 24, 1847, aged 49. He lived in Saco. He was governor in 1842; senator of the United States in 1843, and re-elected in 1845.

FAIRMAN, GIDEON, colonel, an engraver, died at Philadelphia March 18, 1827, aged 51. He and the late George Murray contributed more than any other persons to elevate the beautiful art of engraving in this country. Richard Fairman, also an engraver, died at Philadelphia in Dec., 1821, aged 34.

FAIRMAN, DAVID, an engraver, died suddenly at Philadelphia Aug. 19, 1815, aged 33. He was amiable and much respected.

FAITOUTE, GEORGE, minister of Jamaica, L. I., died in 1815, aged about 60. He was a graduate of Princeton in 1776, and was respected for his learning and piety.

FALES, DAVID, died at Thomaston, Me., April 4, 1822, aged 89. He was a native of Bradford, Mass., and lived in Dedham before he removed to Maine, where he was employed as a surveyor by the proprietors of the Waldo patent. He was also useful as a physician. By each of two wives he had twelve children; seventeen survived him.

FALES, STEPHEN, a lawyer in Cincinnati, died in 1854, aged 64. Born in Boston, he was a graduate of Harvard in 1810, and a tutor at Bowdoin in 1811. He had the reputation of a scholar.

FANEUIL, PETER, founder of Faneuil Hall in Boston, died March 3, 1743. He possessed a large estate, and employed it in doing good. While his charities were extensive, his liberal spirit induced him to present to the town of Boston a stately edifice called Faneuil Hall, for the accommodation of the inhabitants at their public meetings.

FANNING, EDMUND, LL. D., died in London in 1818, aged about 80. He was a native of Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college in 1757. Settled as a lawyer at Hillsborough, N. C., he was a tory in the Revolution, and was afterwards lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward's Island.

FANNING, A. C. W., colonel, died at Cincinnati Aug. 18, 1846, aged 58; a native of Massachusetts. He was of the artillery. Entering the army in 1812, he was in various battles, and served in the Seminole wars.

FARLEY, MICHAEL, general, died at Ipswich in 1789, aged 70. He sustained various public offices, was sheriff and treasurer of Essex, and delegate to the State convention for adopting the constitution.

FARMER, JOHN, died at Concord, N. H., Aug. 13, 1838, aged 49. Born at Chelmsford, he was in 1821 an apothecary at Concord, after having been ten years a teacher at Amherst, N. H. He was a most industrious laborer in researches relating to American history and biography, and his publications were numerous and useful. He published historical sketches of Amherst, 1820; memoir of Billerica; new military guide, 1822; a gazetteer of New Hampshire, with Jacob B. Moore, 1823; genealogical register of the first settlers of New England, 1829; an enlarged edition of which is preparing by James Savage; communications to several historical societies, and to the American quarterly register. He compiled also, for sixteen years, the New Hampshire register, and published memorial of the graduates of Harvard; collections with Mr. Moore in 3 vols., 1822-1824; and also an edition with notes of Belknap's New Hampshire.

FARNSWORTH, RUTH, Mrs., died at Conway, Mass., in 1815, aged 100.

FARNSWORTH, JAMES D., minister of Bridgewater, Mass., died Nov. 5, 1855, aged 62. He graduated at Harvard in 1818.

FARQUHAR, JANE, died March 20, 1760, aged 36. She was the daughter of lieutenant-governor Colden, of New York, and married Dr. William F. Skilful in botany, she was the correspondent of Linneus, who, in compliment to her, named a plant Coldenia.

FARR, JONATHAN, Unitarian minister of Harvard, Mass., died June 12, 1845, aged about 47. He graduated at Harvard college in 1818, and was the author of several little works on practical religion.

FARRAND, DANIEL, minister of Canaan, Conn., died in 1803, aged 83. Born in New Milford, and becoming pious in the revivals after 1740, several ministers assisted in his education. He was graduated at Princeton in 1750, and ordained Aug. 12, 1752, as the successor of Elijah Webster. He was a man of science, and of a vigorous mind; a zealous preacher. He attended more than one hundred ecclesiastical councils. In his death he had an exulting hope of eternal life. His son, Judge F., lived in Burlington, Vt. He published a sermon on the death of Elizabeth, wife of Rev. Jonathan Lee, 1762.

FARRAR, STEPHEN, first minister of New Ipswich, N. H., died June 23, 1809, aged 70. Born in Lincoln, Mass., he was the son of Deacon Samuel, who died in 1783, aged 75. He was the brother of Judge Timothy, and brother of Deacon Samuel the second, of Lincoln, who died in 1829, aged 94. His daughter, Lydia, married Rev. Warren Pierce. He graduated at Harvard in 1755, and was ordained in 1760. He was a devoted and faithful minister. — Payson's Funeral Sermon.

FARRAR, TIMOTHY, judge, the oldest graduate of Harvard, died at Hollis, N. H., Feb. 21, 1849, aged 101 years and nearly eight months. He was the son of Deacon Samuel F., was born at Lincoln June 28, 1747, and graduated at Harvard 1767. He lived in New Ipswich, N. H. From 1775 to 1816 he was judge of the courts, his appointment to the office of chief justice of the superior court being dated Feb. 22, 1802. His portrait is in the historical register for October, 1852. He was buried at Mount Auburn.

FARRAR, PHEBE, wife of Samuel Farrar, died at Andover, Mass., Jan. 22, 1848, aged 79. Born in Elizabethtown, N. J., the daughter of Timothy Edwards, her first husband was Rev. A. Hooker. She married in 1814 Mr. F., the treasurer of the theological seminary at Andover, who still lives at a very advanced age. Her views of religious doctrine accorded with those of her grandfather, President Edwards; and she died in Christian peace. Her three children were Dr. E. W. Hooker, and the wives of Dr. Cornelius and of Rev. Solomon Peck. — Wood's Sermon.

FARRAR, JOHN, LL. D., professor of natural philosophy and mathematics in Harvard college, died March 8, 1853, aged 73. He was the son of Samuel Farrar, of Lincoln, and graduated in 1803. His father died Sept. 19, 1829, aged 92, and his grandfather, Samuel, died April 17, 1783, aged 74; both were deacons of the church. The father of the latter was George, who first settled on the farm at Lincoln, being the son of Jacob, who came from England to Lancaster about 1642, and was killed in Philip's war in 1675. Mr. Farrar was chosen professor in 1807, and remained in office till 1836. He was a most amiable, social, and excellent man, endeared to his friends. He had years of sickness and severe suffering, with all the alleviation which could be ministered by affection. His first wife was Lucy Maria, the daughter of Rev. Dr. Buckminster; his second wife, who survived him, was Eliza, the daughter of Benjamin Roach, of New Bedford. His sister Rebecca married Rev. Dr. Jonathan French, of North Hampton, N. H. Timothy Farrar, who died aged 101, was his uncle. He published various papers in the memoirs of the American academy, of which he was secretary; also a series of learned works in his departments of science, for the classes in college.

FARRAR, MARY, widow of Rev. Joseph F., died in Petersham, Mass., July 24, 1855, aged 100.

FASSITT, THOMAS, Mrs., of Philadelphia, died in 1853, bequeathing many thousands of dollars to various benevolent institutions.

FAUNCE, THOMAS, an elder of the Plymouth church in 1623, died Feb. 27, 1746, aged 99. His daughter, Patience Kempton, died in 1779, aged 105 years and six months.

FAUGERES, MARGARETTA V., distinguished for her literary accomplishments, died Jan. 9, 1801, aged 29. She was the daughter of Ann Eliza Bleecker, and was born about the year 1771. The first years of her life were spent with her parents, in the retired village of Tomhanc, about eighteen miles above Albany. Here through the instructions of her mother, her mind was much cultivated, but the loss of this excellent parent at an age, when her counsels were of the utmost importance, was irreparable. Mr. Bleecker after the termination of the war removed to New York, and as his daughter grew up, saw her engaging in her manners, lively and witty, of an equal and sweet temper, and diffusing cheerfulness around her. Of her admirers she placed her affections upon one of a dissipated character, and, notwithstanding the most earnest remonstrances of her father, she in 1792 married Peter Faugeres, a physician in New York. It was not long, before she perceived the folly of having been governed by passion rather than by reason; and her disregard of paternal advice, and preference of external accomplishments to correct morals and the virtues of the heart, overwhelmed her with trouble. In three or four years the ample fortune, which she had brought to her husband, was entirely expended. Before the death of her father in 1795 his affections shielded her from many evils; but in the summer of 1796 she was glad to procure a residence in a garret with the author of her woes and one child. Mr. Faugeres fell a victim to the yellow fever in the autumn of 1798, and she soon afterwards engaged as an assistant in an academy for young ladies at New Brunswick. For this station she was peculiarly qualified by the variety of her talents and the sweetness of her temper. In about a year she removed to Brooklyn, where she undertook the education of the children of several families.

Her declining health having rendered her incapable of this employment, she was received by a friend in New York, whose attentions were peculiarly grateful, as she was sinking into the grave. She was resigned to the will of God, and, cheered by the truths of religion, she died in peace. She had a taste for poetry, and many of the productions of her pen were published in the New York magazine and the American museum. In 1793 she published, prefixed to the works of Mrs. Bleecker, her mother, memoirs of her life; and several of her own essays were annexed to the volume. She published in 1795 or 1796 Belisarius, a tragedy.

FAUQUIER, FRANCIS, governor of Virginia from 1758 to 1767, succeeded Dinwiddie, and was succeeded by Botetourt. He was well educated; had fine talents; sustained an excellent character; and proved himself a friend of religion, science, and liberty. His administration was very popular. He died March 3, 1768. — Lempr.

FAY, DAVID, judge, died at Bennington in June, 1827, aged 66. He was engaged in the battle of Bennington and was among the first to mount the Hessian breastwork. He had been adjutant-general, attorney for the United States, and judge of the supreme court of Vermont, and judge of probate.

FAY, SAMUEL P. P., judge, died at Cambridge May 18, 1856, aged 78, a graduate of 1798. He was a captain in the army in 1799; then a lawyer; and the judge of probate nearly thirty-five years. — Boston Advertiser, July 16, 1856.

FEARING, PAUL, judge, died Aug. 21, 1822, aged 59, of an epidemic fever: his wife died the same day. Born in Wareham, Mass., he graduated in 1785 at Cambridge. In danger of losing his degree, Joseph Barrell lent him money to pay the fee. He studied law with Mr. Swift of Windham. In 1788 he emigrated to Ohio. He celebrated the fourth of July at the mouth of the Muskingum: Gen. Varnum delivered the oration; guns were fired from fort Harmer. He heard the first sermon in the Northwest Territory, July 20, by Mr. Breck from Massachusetts. He and Mr. Meigs were the first lawyers. In 1801 he was a delegate to congress. In 1810 he was judge of the common pleas. On his farm below the Muskingum he raised the Merino sheep. — Hildreth's Bio. Memoirs.

FELLOWS, JOHN, brigadier-general, a soldier of the Revolution, died Aug. 1, 1808, aged 73. He was born at Pomfret, Conn., and resided at Sheffield, Mass. He commanded, in 1775, one of the two regiments of minute-men, constituted by the patriotic citizens of Berkshire, and after the battle of Lexington marched to the neighborhood of Boston: John Patterson commanded the other regiment. He was for several years high sheriff of Berkshire.

FELLOWS, JOHN, colonel, died in New York Jan. 3, 1844, aged 84. He was born in Sheffield, Mass., and was reputed to be a follower of Thomas Paine. He published works on the authorship of Junius, on free-masonry, and on the life of Putnam.

FENNELL, JAMES, a theatrical performer, was born in London in 1766, and destined for the church. In 1793 he came to this country, and acquired fame as an actor. At Boston he taught reading and elocution. Like Cooke, he died a drunkard, at Philadelphia, in June, 1816. He published an apology for his life, 2 vols. 1814.

FENNER, ARTHUR, governor of Rhode Island, succeeded Mr. Collins in 1789 and was succeeded by James Fenner in 1807. He was the son of Arthur Fenner, and died at Providence Oct. 15, 1805, aged 60.

FENNER, JAMES, LL. D., died in Providence April 17, 1846, aged 76. He was a graduate of Brown university in 1789. He was a senator of the United States; also, governor fourteen years, and for fifty connected with the public affairs of Rhode Island. He was firm, indomitable, patriotic, and faithful.

FENWICK, GEORGE, proprietor of a part of Connecticut, died in 1657. He came to this country in 1636, having purchased the plantation of Saybrook fort, and was "a good encourager to the church of Christ at Hartford." He returned to England; but came again to this country and arrived at New Haven July 15, 1639, with his lady and family, and commenced the settlement at Saybrook, so called in remembrance of Lords Say and Brook, who with others claimed the territory by grant of Robert, Earl of Warwick. Mr. Fenwick was their agent. He sold his rights to the Connecticut government Dec. 5, 1644, and it was stipulated, that he should receive for ten years a certain duty on exports from the mouth of the river. The colony paid him 1600 pounds for the old patent. His wife died at Saybrook, where her monument remains to the present day near the fort, but, it being of sandstone, the inscription is effaced. — Dwight, II. 519.

FENWICK, E., D. D., Catholic bishop, died at Cincinnati Sept. 25, 1832.

FENWICK, BENEDICT, a Catholic bishop, died in Boston Aug. 11, 1846, aged 64. A Jesuit, he became president of Georgetown college; thence he went to Boston, where he was bishop twenty-one years. At first there were only two churches and two priests under his care: he left over fifty churches and sixty priests. He was regarded as a learned man and powerful preacher.

FERGUSON, ELIZABETH, died Feb. 23, 1801, aged 61. She was the daughter of Dr. Thomas Graham or Graeme of Philadelphia, by Anne, daughter of Gov. Keith. She was well educated, and married H. H. Ferguson, a Scotchman, who joined the British in the war and never returned to his wife. She enjoyed the friendship of many eminent men. Through her Dr. Duché sent his letter to Washington, proposing his resignation of the command of the army. She lived on a farm of hers in Montgomery county. Her literary reputation was high. The whole of the Bible was by her transcribed. She translated Telemachus into verse.

FERRIS, DAVID, minister of Newburgh, Ohio, died Aug. 19, 1849, aged 73.

FERRY, RACHEL, Mrs., died in Norfolk, Conn., in 1810, aged 101. She died in the Christian faith. At the age of 100 she heard a century sermon, then retaining her faculties.

FESSENDEN, THOMAS, minister of Walpole, N. H., a descendant, as others of the name are, of Nicholas F. of Cambridge, graduated in 1758 and died May, 1813, aged 74, in the forty-seventh of his ministry. He published two sermons; a theoretic explanation of the science of sanctity, 8vo. 1804; and the Boston self-styled gentlemen reviewers reviewed, 1806.

FESSENDEN, THOMAS GREEN, died at Boston Nov. 11, 1837, of apoplexy, aged about 60. Born in Walpole, N. H., he graduated at Dartmouth in 1796, and devoted himself to various literary labors. He published a satirical poem entitled terrible tractoration, or democracy unveiled, 1805; original poems, 1806; register of arts, 1808; the New England Farmer, 1822; essay on the law of patents; address on temperance, 1831; new American gardener, 1832.

FEW, WILLIAM, colonel, a patriot of the Revolution, died in July, 1828, aged 81. He was born in Maryland in 1748, and, residing in Georgia, was in 1796 a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the State. He soon distinguished himself in several actions with the British and Indians. Augusta being recovered, he in 1780 was sent a delegate to congress, and remained in that body till the peace; and was again appointed in 1786. The next year he assisted in forming the national constitution. He resided in his last years in the city of New York, and died at Fishkill.

FIELD, RICHARD, a physician and senior editor of the Petersburg Intelligencer, studied at Edinburgh. He died in Brunswick County, Va., May 23, 1829, aged 61. As a physician he was skilful, and as a botanist none exceeded him in the knowledge of the plants of Virginia. He was a member of three electoral colleges, and voted for Jefferson and Madison as president.

FIELD, MARTIN, general, died in Fayetteville, Vt., Oct. 26, 1833, aged 60. He was early distinguished as a lawyer, but deafness compelled him to relinquish the profession. He then became skilled in mineralogy and natural history, to which he was devoted.

FIELD, TIMOTHY, minister of Westminster, Vt., died Feb. 22, 1845, aged 69. Born in East Guilford, Conn., he graduated at Yale in 1797, and studied theology with Dr. Dwight. He was ordained at Canandaigua, N. Y., Feb. 27, 1800, and dismissed in 1807. He was then the minister of Westminster from 1807 till 1835, twenty-eight years. He afterwards was useful as a preacher, but died in the insane hospital at Brattleborough.

FIELD, BARNUM, principal of the Franklin school, Boston, died May 7, 1851, aged 55.

FINDLEY, WILLIAM, a member of congress, came in early life from Ireland. In the Revolution he engaged with zeal in the cause of his adopted country; at the close of the war he removed to the western part of Pennsylvania. He was a member of the convention which in 1789 framed the new constitution of Pennsylvania, and a member of congress in 1812. He died at Unity township, Greensburg, April 5, 1821, aged upwards of 70. In his politics he opposed the administration of J. Adams and supported Mr. Jefferson. In his religion he belonged to the class of "old dissenters" of the Scotch reformation. He published a review of the funding system, 1794; a history of the insurrection of the four western counties of Pennsylvania, etc., 1796; observations on the two sons of oil, vindicating religious liberty against Rev. Samuel B. Wylie, 1812.

FINDLEY, WILLIAM, governor of Pennsylvania, died at Harrisburg Nov. 14, 1846, aged 78. He published a history of the insurrection in Pennsylvania, 1796.

FINLEY, SAMUEL, D. D., president of the college of New Jersey, died July 17, 1766, aged 50. He was born of pious parents in the county of Armagh in Ireland in the year 1715, and was one of seven sons, who were all pious. Very early in life it pleased God to awaken and convert him. He first heard a sermon, when he was six years old, and from that time resolved to be a minister. He left his native country at the age of eighteen, and arrived at Philadelphia Sept. 28, 1734. After his arrival he spent several years in completing his studies. Having been licensed to preach in Aug., 1740, he was ordained Oct. 13th by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. The first part of his ministry was spent in fatiguing itinerant labors. He contributed his efforts with Gilbert Tennent and Mr. Whitefield in promoting the revival of religion, which was at that period so remarkable throughout this country. His benevolent zeal sometimes brought him into unpleasant circumstances. The legislature of Connecticut had made a law, prohibiting itinerants from entering parishes, in which a minister was settled, unless by his consent. For preaching to a Presbyterian congregation in New Haven, Mr. Finley was in consequence of this law seized by the civil authority, and carried as a vagrant out of the colony. But persecution could not shake him from his purpose of being occupied in preaching the everlasting gospel. His exertions were greatly blessed in a number of towns in New Jersey, and he preached for six months with great acceptance in Philadelphia. In June, 1744, he accepted an invitation from Nottingham, Maryland, where he continued near seven years faithfully and successfully discharging the duties of his office. Here he established an academy, which acquired great reputation. Under his instruction many youths received the rudiments of learning, and correct moral sentiments, which have since contributed much toward rendering them the most useful members of society. Upon the death of President Davies, Mr. Finley was chosen his successor. It was with reluctance that he left a people so much endeared to him, and with whom he had so long lived in friendship. He removed to Princeton in July, 1761, and entered upon the duties of his new office. The college flourished under his care; but it enjoyed the benefit of his superintendence for but a few years. He died of an affection of the liver at Philadelphia, whither he had gone for medical assistance, and was buried by the side of his friend, Gilbert Tennent. His first wife, who died in 1760, was Sarah Hall, by whom he had eight children; his second wife was Ann Clarkson, daughter of Matthew Clarkson, merchant of New York. She survived him forty-one years. His son, Ebenezer Finley, was a physician in Charleston, South Carolina. His daughter married Samuel Breeze of New Jersey, and was the mother of the wife of Rev. Dr. Morse.

In his religious opinions he was a Calvinist. His sermons were not hasty productions, but the result of study, and filled with good sense and well digested sentiment, expressed in a style pleasing to the man of science yet perfectly intelligible by the illiterate. He was remarkable for sweetness of temper and polite behavior, hospitable, charitable, and diligent in the performance of the various duties of life. During his last sickness he was perfectly resigned to the Divine will; he had a strong faith in his Saviour; and he frequently expressed an earnest desire of departing, that he might dwell with the Lord Jesus. A short time before his death he sat up, and prayed earnestly, that God would enable him to endure patiently to the end, and keep him from dishonoring the ministry. He then said, "blessed be God, eternal rest is at hand. Eternity is but long enough to enjoy my God. This, this has animated me in my severest studies; I was ashamed to take rest here. O, that I might be filled with the fulness of God!" He then addressed himself to all his friends in the room, "O that each of you may experience what, blessed be God, I do, when you come to die; may you have the pleasure in a dying hour to reflect, that, with faith and patience, zeal and sincerity, you have endeavored to serve the Lord; and may each of you be impressed, as I have been, with God's word, looking upon it as substantial, and not only fearing, but being unwilling to offend against it." On being asked how he felt, he replied: "Full of triumph! I triumph through Christ! Nothing clips my wings, but the thoughts of my dissolution being delayed. O, that it were to-night! My very soul thirsts for eternal rest." When he was asked, what he saw in eternity to excite such vehement desires, he said: "I see the eternal love and goodness of God; I see the fulness of the mediator; I see the love of Jesus. O, to be dissolved and to be with him! I long to be clothed with the complete righteousness of Christ." Thus this excellent man died, in the full assurance of salvation.

He published a sermon on Matthew XII. 28, entitled, Christ triumphing and Satan raging, preached at Nottingham, 1741; a refutation of Mr. Thomson's sermon on the doctrine of convictions, 1743; Satan stripped of his evangelical robe, against the Moravians, 1743; a charitable plea for the speechless in answer to Abel Morgan's anti-pedo-rantism, 1747; a vindication of the preceding, 1748; a sermon at the ordination of John Rodgers at St. George's, March 16, 1749; a sermon on the death of President Davies, prefixed to his works; the curse of Meroz, or the danger of neutrality in the cause of God and our country, 1757. — Assembly Miss. Mag. I. 71-77; Panoplist, I. 281-286; and new series, I. 241-257; Christian Mag. I. 301-307, 419-436; Mass. Miss. Mag. IV. 241-247; Green's Discourse, 356-386.

FINLEY, ROBERT, D. D., president of the university of Georgia, died Oct. 3, 1817, aged 45. He was born at Princeton in 1772, and graduated at Princeton college in 1787. From 1792 to 1795 he was a tutor, and a trustee from 1807 till 1817, when he resigned. He was the minister of Basking-Bridge, N. J., from June, 1795, until 1817. Deeply interested in the welfare of the free blacks, he formed a plan of sending them to Africa, and may be considered as the father of the colonization society. In Dec., 1816, he went to Washington, and succeeded in calling a meeting of gentlemen, Dec. 21, at which addresses were made by Mr. Clay and Mr. Randolph. The next week a constitution was adopted and Judge Washington chosen president. On his return, Dr. Finley caused the establishment of an auxiliary society at Trenton. Being at this period chosen president of Franklin college, at Athens, Ga., he repaired to that place in 1817, and in a few months died there, leaving a wife and nine children. He published several sermons. — Memoirs of Finley.

FINN, HENRY J., died Jan. 13, 1840, aged

58, lost with one hundred and thirty-nine others in the burning of the steamboat Lexington. Born in Boston, when a boy on his passage to England the vessel sunk, but the passengers escaped in small boats and were taken up after several days. He went upon the stage in London, and then in New York, and Boston. He was the owner of an elegant residence in Newport, to which he was returning from New York on the day of his death. He published a comic annual, and a drama called Montgometry. — Cycl. American Literature, II. 28.

FIRMIN, GILES, a physician, was born in Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge, England. His father of the same name was chosen deacon in Boston in 1633. He came himself to this country as early as 1634. He settled at Ipswich, where in 1638 he had a grant of one hundred and twenty acres of land. He married the daughter of Rev. Nathaniel Ward. About the end of the civil wars he returned to England, and his family followed him. Ordained as the minister of Shalford, he there faithfully preached the gospel, until he was ejected in 1662. Retiring to the village of Redgwell, seven or eight miles distant, he practised physic and continued to preach, having a vigorous constitution, to the last Sabbath of his life. He died in April, 1697, aged upwards of 80. He was a man of learning, of peace, and of a public spirit. Calamy gives a catalogue of his writings, among which are the schism of the parochial congregations in England and ordination, with an examination of Owen, and of Noyes' argument against imposing hands, 1658, and the real Christian, 1670. — Calamy's Acct. II. 295.

FISH, JOSEPH, died in 1780, aged about 72. He graduated at Harvard in 1728; and was settled the pastor of the north society of Stonington, Conn., Dec. 27, 1732. He published a sermon at the ordination of W. Vinal, Newport, 1746; a fast sermon, 1755; election sermon, 1760; nine sermons on Matthew 16:18, concerning separation, about 1767; also, the examiner examined, or remarks on Isaac Backus' examination of nine sermons, 1771.

FISH, ELISIA, minister of Upton, Mass., died in 1795, aged about 66. He graduated at Harvard in 1750. He published a thanksgiving sermon on the repeal of the stamp act, 1767; the art of war lawful and necessary, 1773; discourse on infant baptism; at Worcester, 1775.

FISH, PRESERVED, died at Portsmouth, R. I., May 17, 1844. He was a worthy and respected citizen. A Mr. Fish with the same christian name died at New York July 23, 1846, aged 81.

FISH, PHINEAS, died June 16, 1854, aged 69. He was born at Sandwich Jan. 30, 1785, graduated at Harvard in 1807, and was ordained at Marshpee Sept. 18, 1812, at which place he was for more than forty years a faithful missionary to the Indians, as the successor of G. Hawley. He published a sermon at the ordination of S. Munson, Barnstable, 1832.

FISHER, HUGH, minister of Midway, Geo., died in 1734. He succeeded Mr. Lord, and was succeeded by John Osgood. He published a sermon, a preservative from damnable error; and a reply to Smith's answer, 1731.

FISHER, NATHANIEL, first minister of Dighton, died in 1777, aged 91. The son of Daniel, of Dedham, he was graduated in 1706; and ordained in 1712.

FISHER, JABEZ, a patriot of the Revolution, died in Franklin, Mass., Oct. 15, 1806, aged 88. He was a member of the provincial congress at Salem in 1774, and of that at Cambridge in 1775, and for many years a representative, councillor, and senator. He was the associate of Adams, Cushing, Paine, and Hancock. He was also an eminent Christian. — Emmons' Funeral Sermon.

FISHER, NATHANIEL, Episcopal minister of Salem, was born at Dedham in 1742; graduated in 1763; and ordained in 1776 for a church in Nova Scotia. He went to Salem in 1781, and died Dec. 22, 1812, on the Sabbath, after preaching from the text, "How long have I to live?" A volume of his sermons was published, 8vo., 1818.

FISHER, MYERS, a lawyer at Philadelphia, and a Quaker, died March 12, 1819, aged 71. He was a man of science and an eloquent orator. He published an answer to Paine's age of reason.

FISHER, ALEXANDER M., a professor of mathematics in Yale college, died April 22, 1822, aged 28. He was born in Franklin, Mass., in 1794, and graduated at Yale college in 1813. For a while he studied theology at Andover. He was appointed professor in 1817 as successor of Mr. Day, elected president. Anxious to enlarge his knowledge of the science to which he was devoted, he determined to make a voyage to Europe. He accordingly sailed in the packet ship Albion, which was wrecked on the coast of Ireland; and he was among those who were lost. He was succeeded by Mr. Dutton. With a genius for mathematical inquiry, he had made great advances in the higher branches of mathematics. Some of his investigations were published in Silliman's journal.

FISHER, ELLAS, minister of Lempster, N. H., died in 1831, aged about 82. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1769; and was ordained at L. in 1787. He had been a preacher fifty-two years.

FISHER, JOSHUA, M. D., president of the Massachusetts medical society, died in Beverly March 21, 1833, aged 84. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1766. He published a discourse on narcotics, 1806.

FISHER, JONATHAN, minister of Bluchill, Me., died Sept. 22, 1848, aged nearly 80. A native of New Braintree, Mass., he was a graduate of Harvard in 1792, and, having studied theology with Dr. Tappan, was ordained in 1796. His ministry in a beautiful town on the seaboard was for nearly half a century. He survived all the members, constituting his church at his settlement. The whole place was shaped and moulded by his character and efforts. His various labors ought to be remembered. He was a good farmer, working on his own farm. He toiled in the structure of his house. He made his own clock, which kept note of the whole period of his life. He was a portrait painter and copied some ancient pieces. He engraved on wood, with his penknife, most of the animals mentioned in Scripture, and published them with a description in a book. He was a prolific poet. He learned Hebrew, and proceeded far in writing a lexicon. He wrote out three thousand sermons. He was so good a walker as sometimes to walk to Bangor, seventy miles, and home again. In all his habits he was regular. A severe Calvinist, his whole life "was a pre-constructed, fore-ordained system;" so much so, that, rising at the call of his alarm clock, it was his rule that his feet should strike the floor before the weight reached the bottom. He was stern, severe, most faithful. With the young he ever conversed most faithfully; all his children were pious. In his preaching he had no gentleness, no emotion; it was cold, hard reading. What he had determined to preach, he would preach, no matter what unexpected change of circumstances might have occurred. Under him the town was remarkable for industry and thrift, for good morals, for the prevalence of sound religious principle. Such was his known character, that when a scoffer was calling all Christians hypocrites, and asked for the name of one who was not, in which case he would yield the argument, and the name of "father Fisher" was uttered, he said: "I refuse to accept him; he is odd in every thing!" He published a sermon at the ordination of M. Steele, 1801. — New York Independent, Oct. 2, 1856.

FISHER, REDWOOD, died at Philadelphia May 17, 1856, aged 74. He was an editor and author and statistician of large acquisitions.

FISK, PHINEAS, the minister of Haddam, Conn., died Oct. 17, 1738, aged 55. He was the son of Dr. John Fisk of Milford, and grandson of Rev. John Fiske, — as the name was formerly written, — of Chelmsford. His name is the fourth in the catalogue of Yale college; but he never studied at New Haven. It was while the infant seminary was at Killingworth that he pursued his studies in it, and was graduated in 1704 in a class of three persons. When the college was removed to Saybrook, in 1706, he was appointed a tutor, and remained such till 1713, and had for years the almost sole care of the college, as Mr. Andrew, the rector, resided at Milford. About forty students were educated under him. In 1714 he was settled at Haddam. He was a scholar, and spoke Latin fluently; he was also a physician, skilled in the treatment of insanity and epilepsy. His daughter married a brother of D. Brainerd. He published an election sermon.

FISK, PLENY, a missionary, died Oct. 23, 1825 aged 33. He was born at Shelburne, Mass., June 24, 1792. His father, Ebenezer, died in 1841, aged 92: he came to S. when it was a wilderness. At the age of sixteen he became pious. He was graduated at Middlebury college in 1814. In his indigence he lived two years on bread and milk; nor was he ashamed to carry his corn to mill upon his shoulders. A good woman baked his loaf for him. Having studied theology at Andover, where he was one of the "group of stars," commemorated by Wilcox, he was employed as an agent for the board of foreign missions one year, and then sailed for Palestine with Mr. Parsons, Nov. 3, 1819. On arriving at Smyrna Jan. 15, 1820, they engaged in the study of the eastern languages; but in a few months removed to Scio, in order to study modern Greek under professor Bambas. The college at Scio then had seven or eight hundred students. But in 1821 the island was desolated by the barbarous Turks. In 1822 he accompanied to Egypt his fellow laborer, Mr. Parsons, and witnessed his death and buried him in the Greek convent. From Egypt he proceeded in April, 1823, through the desert to Judea, accompanied by Mr. King and Mr. Wolff. Having visited Jerusalem, he went to Beyroot, Baalbec, Damascus, Aleppo, and Antioch. He made a third visit to Jerusalem with Mr. King. When he withdrew from Jerusalem in the spring of 1825, he retired to the mission family of Mr. Goodell and Mr. Bird at Beyroot, where he died of a prevailing fever. He was eminently qualified to be a missionary in the east. He was a preacher in Italian, French, modern Greek, and Arabic. He had been employed in preparing a dictionary in English and Arabic, and on the day of his seizure by his sickness, he had put down against the last letter of the English alphabet the last word which he knew in Arabic. His various communications are found in several volumes of the Missionary Herald. — Bond's Memoir of Fisk.

FISK, ISAAC, an assistant missionary, died at Elliot among the Choctaws in 1820, after a faithful service of one year. He went from Holden, Mass., in April, 1819.

FISK, JOSEPH, physician in Lexington, Mass., died in 1837, aged 85.

FISK, EZRA, D. D., professor of ecclesiastical history in Western theological seminary, died in Philadelphia Dec., 1833, aged about 45. He graduated at Williams college in 1809.

FISK, WILBUR, D. D., president of the Wesleyan university in Middletown, Conn., died there Feb. 22, 1839, aged 46. He was graduated at Brown university in 1815, and was appointed president in 1831. He was much respected and deeply lamented. He published inaugural address, 1831; travels in Europe.

FISK, ELISHA, minister of Wrentham, died Jan. 11, 1851, aged 81. A graduate of Brown university in 1795, he was ordained in 1799, and was in active, useful service during his whole life. His predecessors were Mann, Messinger, and Bean. He published a sermon at Boston, 1793; two anniversary sermons, 1846; a half-century sermon in June, 1850.

FISKE, JOHN, first minister of Wenham and Chelmsford, Mass., died Jan. 14, 1677, aged 76. He was born in England in 1601, and was educated at Cambridge. He came to this country in 1637, and, being in the same ship with John Allen, they preached two sermons almost every day during the voyage. He was for some time the teacher of a school at Cambridge. As his property was large, he made considerable loans to the province. He lived almost three years at Salem, preaching to the church, and instructing a number of young persons. When a church was gathered in Enon, or Wenham, Oct. 8, 1644, he was settled the minister, and here he continued till about the year 1656, when he removed to Chelmsford, then a new town, with the majority of his church, and was there an able and useful preacher twenty years. He was a skilful physician, as well as an excellent minister. His son, Moses, was minister of Braintree. Among the severest afflictions to which he was called, says Dr. Mather, was the loss of his concordance; that is, of his wife, who was so expert in the Scriptures as to render any other concordance unnecessary. He published a catechism, entitled, the olive-branch watered. — Magnalia, III. 141-143; Hist. Coll. vi. 239-249.

FISKE, MOSES, minister of Braintree, Mass., died Aug. 10, 1708, aged 65, in the thirty-sixth year of his ministry. He graduated at Harvard in 1662, in the class of S. Stoddard. He succeeded Mr. Flint, and was ordained Sept. 11, 1672.

FISKE, JOHN, minister of Killingly, Conn., died in 1773, aged 89. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1702.

FISKE, NATHAN, D. D., minister of Brookfield, Mass., was born in Weston in 1733. He was graduated at Harvard in 1754, and ordained pastor of the church in the third parish in Brookfield, May 28, 1758. Here he continued more than forty years. After preaching on the Lord's day, Nov. 24, 1799, he retired to his bed at his usual hour in apparent health, and in a short time died without a struggle, aged 66. By incessant study he gradually perfected his talents, and gained the public esteem. In prosperity and adversity he possessed the same serenity of mind. With a small salary he found means to practise a generous hospitality, and to give three sons a collegiate education. He published a sermon on the settlement and growth of Brookfield, delivered Dec. 31, 1775; at a fast, 1776; on the death of Joshua Spooner, 1778; of Judge Foster, 1779; of J. Hobbs, 1784; an oration on the capture of Cornwallis, Oct., 1781; sermons on various subjects, 8vo. 1794; Dudleian lecture, 1796; the moral monitor, 2 vols. 12mo. 1801. — Preface to Monitor; Monthly Anthol. i. 639.

FISKE, CALEB, M. D., died at Scituate, R. I., Dec. 30, 1834, aged 82.

FISKE, OLIVER, M. D., died at Boston, Jan. 25, 1837, aged about 70. A son of Rev. Mr. F. of Brookfield, he was a graduate of 1787, and long a physician in Worcester. He filled with honor various offices. He published oration, 1797; addresses to agricultural society, 1823 and 1831.

FISKE, CATHARINE, Miss, for thirty-eight years a distinguished teacher, died in Keene, N. H., in July or August, 1837, aged 63. Born in Worcester, her mother removed to Newfane, Vt. At fifteen she began to teach; she instituted the female seminary in Keene in 1814, in which she spent the remainder of her life. More than 2,500 pupils from various States were under her care. She had remarkable powers, superintending her household and farm, and teaching various sciences, and maintaining discipline, and retaining affection. She was pious. After various bequests, the whole of her property, all acquired by herself, she gave for an insane hospital. — Barstow's Biography, in Recorder, Sept. 1.

FISKE, MOSES, died in 1843, aged 83, brother of Rev. Dr. John F. He was the son of Peter, of Sherburne, and a descendant of David, of Watertown in 1638. He was an able tutor at Dartmouth from 1788 to 1795; he began to preach, but was never ordained. About 1799 he emigrated to Hillham, in Tennessee, where he spent the remaining period of his life, more than forty years. After the age of fifty he married and had nine children. He was a farmer and an excellent scholar, an encourager of learning, a friend of the needy and desponding. He abhorred slavery, and would never own a slave. He edited the "Eagle" at Dartmouth, and published an English grammar, 1772; a sermon on slavery, in 1795, from Eccl. 4 : 1. — American Quarterly Register, 1840, p. 382.

FISKE, NATHAN W., professor of Greek at Amherst college, died May 27, 1847. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1817, he was appointed professor in 1825, and professor of moral philosophy and metaphysics in 1836. An account of his life and writings was written by Dr. Humphrey. He published a valuable work, — a manual of classical literature, from the German of Eschenburg, with additions, 3d edit., 1841.

FISKE, JOHN, D. D., died at New Braintree, Mass., March 15, 1855, aged 84. He was the brother of Moses, of Tennessee. A graduate of Dartmouth in 1791, and a member of the college church, he was ordained as a missionary to the Seneca Indians in 1794; and he preached twenty sermons at Geneva, which then had five log houses and two framed ones. He was settled fifty-seven years. Of Amherst college he was a trustee. He was a highly respected and very useful man, and he died, as he wished, in a sound and happy old age, with "That which should accompany old age,

As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends."

He published a fast sermon, 1812. — Snell's Funeral Sermon.

FISKE, THADDEUS, D. D., the oldest minister in Massachusetts, died in Charlestown Nov. 14, 1855, aged 93. He was born in Weston June 22, 1762, graduated in 1785, and at his death there was only one living graduate older, Asa Andrews, of Ipswich, of the class of 1783. He was minister of West Cambridge forty years, from 1788 to 1828, and survived three of his successors in the ministry, D. Damon, W. Ware, and J. F. Brown. He published a thanksgiving sermon, 1795.

FITCH, JAMES, first minister of Saybrook, and of Norwich, Conn., died Nov. 18, 1702, aged 79. He was born in the county of Essex, England, Dec. 24, 1622, and came to this country in 1638. He had already acquired a correct knowledge of the learned languages; but he spent seven years under the instruction of Mr. Hooker and Mr. Stone. In 1646 he was ordained over a church, which was at that time gathered at Saybrook, and it is said that the brethren's hands only were imposed. In 1660 he removed with the greater part of his church to Norwich, and in that town passed the remaining active days of his life. When the infirmities of age obliged him to cease from his public labors, he retired to his children at Lebanon. By his first wife, Abigail, daughter of Rev. Henry Whitefield, he had two sons, James and Samuel, and four daughters; by his second wife, Priscilla, daughter of Maj. John Mason, of Norwich, he had seven sons, Daniel, John, Jeremiah, and Jabez, Nathaniel, Joseph, and Eleazer, and one daughter; and all lived to have families, excepting Eleazer.

His brother Thomas, of Norwalk, was the father of Gov. Thomas Fitch. He was distinguished for the penetration of his mind, the energy of his preaching, and the sanctity of his life. He was acquainted with the Mohegan language, and preached the gospel of salvation to the Indians in the neighborhood of Norwich. He even gave some of his own lands to induce them to renounce their savage manner of living. The descendants of those Indians at Mohegan, for whose benefit he toiled, have been carefully instructed in religion by some self-denying Christians, have had a meeting-house built for them by the liberality of the citizens of Norwich and other towns, and have received an appropriation from the war department of a few hundred dollars. A letter of his on the subject of his missionary labors is published in Gookin. He published a sermon on the death of Anne, wife of Maj. Mason, 1672; the advice of council explained, 1683. — Mather's Magnalia, III. 200; Trumbull's Connecticut, I. 107, 299, 502, 503; Hist. Coll. I. 208; IX. 86; Alden's Account of Portsmouth.

FITCH, JABEZ, minister of Portsmouth, N. H., was the son of the preceding, and was born at Norwich in April, 1672. He was graduated at Harvard in 1694. In 1703 he was ordained at Ipswich as colleague of John Rogers. On account of the incompetency of his maintenance, he withdrew from his pastoral office in Dec., 1723, and about the year 1725 was established at Portsmouth. After continuing here more than twenty years, he died Nov. 22, 1746, aged 74. He had a taste for historical researches, and began in 1728 to make a collection of facts relative to N. H. Dr. Belknap had access to his papers. He published a sermon on the death of Mary Martyn; one occasioned by the great earthquake, Oct. 29, 1727; at the ordination of John Tucker, at Gosport, Isle of Shoals, in 1732, from these words: "I will make you fishers of men;" two sermons designed to make a religious improvement of the throat distemper, which prevailed in 1735 and 1736; and an account of that disease, as it appeared in New Hampshire. — Alden's Account of Society in Portsmouth; Hist. Coll. VII. 251, 257; X. 50.

FITCH, ELIAH, minister of Hopkinton, Mass., died in 1788, aged 42. He was a graduate of Yale in 1765. He published a poem in blank verse, entitled the beauties of religion.

FITCH, JOHN, inventor of steamboats, died of a broken heart at Bardstown, Ky., in 1798, aged 55. Born in Windsor, Conn., he was first an apprentice to a clock-maker, and was then a silversmith in Trenton. Being plundered by the British, he was next a soldier. He purchased land in Kentucky, and was there detained a prisoner some years by the Indians. In 1782 he regained his liberty. In 1786, after various experiments, he ran his boat at the rate of eight miles an hour, and obtained a patent; but the want of funds interrupted the prosecution of his designs. In 1798 his privilege in New York was withdrawn and given to Livingston. — Scientific American, 1848, p. 25.

FITCH, EBENEZER, D. D., died at West Bloomfield, N. Y., March 21, 1833, aged 77. He was a graduate of Yale in 1777; the first president of Williams college, from 1793 to 1815, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Dr. Moore. The rest of his life was spent in the ministry in Bloomfield. He was a benevolent man and an excellent Christian. The following anecdote has been heard, — which ought to be true, and probably is, — that in his poverty as a poor minister at the west, a friend presented him with one or two thousand dollars; and that friend was W. F. Backus, a graduate of 1802, whom he had assisted in his struggles to obtain an education. Dr. F. had a wife as good and benevolent as himself.

FITZHUGH, WILLIAM HENRY, vice-president of the colonization society, the son of William F., a patriot of the Revolution, was born at Chatham, Stafford county, Va., March 8, 1792, and graduated at Princeton in 1808. He afterwards settled on the patrimonial domain of Ravensworth, Fairfax county, devoting himself to agricultural pursuits, and receiving with generous hospitality his numerous friends. He died at Cambridge, Md., of the apoplexy, May 21, 1830, aged 38. His wife was the daughter of Charles Goldsborough, of Dorset, Md. He published in favor of the colonization society the essays of Opimius in the Richmond Inquirer of 1826; a speech at the ninth anniversary, and a review of Tazewell's report in African Repository, Aug. and Nov., 1828. In one of his writings he represents, "that the labor of the slave is a curse on the land on which it is expended." — African Repository, IV. 91–96.

FLAGG, JOHN, a physician and patriot, died at Lynn in 1793, aged 49. He was the son of Rev. Ebenezer F., of Chester, N. H., and graduated at Harvard in 1761. He belonged to the medical society, and had full practice. — Thacher.

FLAGG, EBENEZER, died Nov. 14, 1796, aged 92. The son of Ebenezer, of Woburn, he graduated at Harvard in 1725, and was ordained in 1736 at Chester, N. H.

FLAGG, THOMAS COLLINS, an eminent physician of Charleston, S. C., died in 1801. He was of the order of the Cincinnati.

FLEET, THOMAS, an eminent printer in Boston, died July 21, 1758, aged 72. He was a man of a fine understanding and knowledge of the world, and of great industry, just and benevolent. — N. E. Journal, July 24, 1758.

FLETCHER, BRIDGET, wife of Timothy F., of Westford, died about 1770, aged about 44. Her hymns and spiritual songs, a small volume, was published by her son, Rev. Elijah F., in 1773.

FLETCHER, ELIAH, minister of Hopkinton, N. H., was born in Westford, and graduated at Harvard in 1769. He was ordained Jan. 27, 1772, and died April 8, 1786, aged 39. Five ministers had been settled before him in H. He was the worthy patron of students; and one whom he prepared for college and assisted, was President Webber, who ever acknowledged his obligations. His three daughters married Josiah White, of Pittsfield, N. H., Israel W. Kelley, of Salisbury, N. H., and Daniel Webster. His son Timothy was a merchant in Portland. His widow married Rev. Christopher Paige, of Salisbury.

FLETCHER, THOMAS, died in Southwick Dec. 4, 1846, aged 55, in the twenty-third year of his ministry. He was one of those unobtrusive men of wide usefulness, who will be held by wise and good beings in eternal honor. Born in New Ipswich in 1790, he took charge of the academy at Kinderhook Landing in 1818. Remote from a place of public worship, he organized a Sabbath school and conducted the worship; through God's blessing one hundred and twenty-five persons were soon his converts and admitted to the church. He now studied divinity three years with Dr. Livingston, of Coxsackie, and was then ordained at Schaghticoke Point in 1824. In six years there were two special revivals of the power of religion. Afterwards he was settled at Northeast and New Marlborough, and then at Southwick for ten years. He died in great peace.

FLINN, ANDREW, D. D., minister of Charleston, S. C., had been previously the minister of Camden seven or eight years, and removed to Charleston about 1808. He died Feb. 25, 1820, rejoicing in the hope of eternal life. As a minister he was faithful and zealous. He published a sermon on the death of Judge Wilds, 1810; a dedication sermon, 1811.

FLINT, HENRY, one of the first ministers of Braintree, Mass., died April 27, 1668, aged 68. He was ordained as teacher March 17, 1640. When the church was first organized Sept. 16, 1639, he was chosen colleague with Mr. Thompson, who was ordained pastor Sept. 24th; but his settlement was delayed for a few months. He was a man of piety and integrity, and well qualified for the work of the ministry. His wife was Margery, sister of President Hoar. His son, Josiah Flint, was settled at Dorchester in 1671 and died in 1680. — Magnalia, III. 122; Hancock's Cent. Sermon; Morton, 200; Winthrop, 188; Holmes.

FLINT, HENRY, tutor and fellow of Harvard college, was the son of Josiah Flint of Dorchester, and received his degree of bachelor of arts in 1693. He was chosen a fellow of the college in 1700, and in 1705 was appointed tutor. This office he sustained till his resignation Sept. 25, 1754. He died Feb. 13, 1760, aged 84. Many of the most eminent men in the country were educated under his care. Dr. Chauncy pronounces him a solid, judicious man, and one of the best of preachers. The few foibles, which he exhibited, were ascribed to his living in a single state. In his last illness he viewed the approach of death with perfect calmness, for he trusted in the mercy of God through the merits of Christ. He published two sermons on the last judgment, 1814; an appeal to the consciences of a degenerate people, a sermon preached at the Thursday lecture in Boston, 1729; a sermon to the students in the college hall, 1736; oratio funebris in obitum B. Wadsworth, 1738; twenty sermons, 8vo. 1739. — Appleton's Fam. Sermon; Lovell's Oratio Funeb.; Hist. Coll. IX. 183; X. 165.

FLINT, ABEL, D. D., minister of the second church in Hartford, was born in Windham Aug. 6, 1765; graduated at Yale college in 1785; and died March 7, 1825, aged 59. He published a sermon on the death of the wife of Rev. A. Yates, 1806; of John M'Curdy Strong, 1806; a system of geometry and trigonometry, with a treatise on surveying, 1806; and a translation of some of Massillon's and Bourdaloue's sermons.

FLINT, JACOB, minister of Cohasset, died in 1835, aged about 60. Born in Reading, he graduated at Harvard in 1794, and was ordained Jan. 10, 1798. He published a history of Cohasset in the historical collections, 3d series, vol. II.; two discourses on the history of Cohasset, 1821; a discourse on the doctrine of the trinity, 1824.

FLINT, TIMOTHY, died at Reading, Mass., Aug. 18, 1840, aged 60. He was born in Reading, was graduated at Harvard in 1800, and was the minister of Lunenburg, then a missionary in the Mississippi valley. Afterwards he lived in Cincinnati, and was a resident on Red River, La. His writings are interesting and valuable. He published recollections of the last ten years in the valley of the Mississippi; history and geography of the Mississippi valley, 2 vols. 1832; Francis Berrian, or the Mexican patriot; George Mason, or the young backwoodsman, 1829; Western Review, 1830.

FLINT, AUSTIN, doctor, died at Leicester Aug. 29, 1850, aged 90. Born in Shrewsbury Jan. 4, 1760, he was the son of Dr. Edward Flint; both father and son were eminent patriots, surgeons and physicians in the army. Dr. Austin F. was at the age of twenty-one in Drury's regiment at West Point in 1781. He married the daughter of Col. William Henshaw of L., a distinguished officer in the Revolution. He was a man of judgment, of independence, of principle, and fearless in the expression of his principles and sentiments; cheerful and good-humored, the sick and the well were glad to see him. His son, Dr. Joseph H. F., died before him. — Washburn.

FLINT, JAMES, D. D., died in Salem March 4, 1855, aged 73. He was born in Reading Dec. 10, 1781, was graduated in 1802, studied divinity with J. Bates, and was ordained at East Bridgewater Oct. 29, 1806. With a poetic taste and a taste for horticulture, he greatly embellished the grounds about his house. At his request he was dismissed April 6, 1821; and was installed over the east church in Salem Sept. 20, 1821, as the successor of William Bentley. He had a colleague, Dexter Clapp, Dec. 17, 1851. He had "ready humor, lively sympathy, and rare conversational powers." He published some poetical productions; also, at ordination of N. Whitman, 1814; election sermon, 1815; anniversary discourse at Plymouth, 1815; at ordination of S. Alden, 1820; on the death of Dr. Abbott, 1828.

FLORA, a black woman, died at Harbor island, 1808, aged 150. Born in Africa in 1658, she was carried to Jamaica, then to Nassau, and sold to W. Thompson. She was free forty-eight years before her death.

FLOYD, WILLIAM, general, died Aug. 4, 1821, aged 86. He was the son of Nicoll F., an opulent landholder, whose ancestors came from Wales and settled on Long Island. He was born Dec. 17, 1734. His education was imperfect; but he acquired much knowledge by intercourse with the intelligent. He was a delegate to the congress of 1774, and continued a member till after the Declaration of Independence. When the British took possession of Long Island, his family fled for safety to Connecticut; his house was occupied by troops; and for nearly seven years he was an exile from his dwelling and derived no benefit from his landed estate. In Oct., 1778, he was again a member of congress, and was frequently a member of the legislature of the State. In 1784 he purchased a tract of land at Western, Oneida county, on the Mohawk; and this, by the labor of several summers, he converted into a good farm, to which he removed his family in 1803. He left a widow and children. Three of the signers of the Declaration of Independence survived him. His manners were not familiar, nor was his disposition affable; yet in public life he was patriotic and independent, and for more than fifty years was honored with the confidence of his fellow citizens. — Goodrich's Lives.

FLOYD, JOHN, governor, died at Sweet Springs, Va., Aug. 16, 1837. He was a member of congress from 1817 to 1829, and governor of Va. from 1829 to 1834.

FLOYD, JOHN, general, died in Camden county, Geo., June 24, 1839, aged 70.

FOBES, PEREZ, LL. D., professor of mathematics, was graduated at Harvard in 1762, and ordained minister of Raynham Nov. 19, 1766. In 1786 he was elected professor of the college in Rhode Island. He died Feb. 23, 1812, aged 70. His wife was the daughter of John Wales, minister of Raynham. He published a history of Raynham; sermon on death of President Manning, 1791; election sermon, 1795.

FOGG, DANIEL, a physician in Braintree, died in 1830, aged 71.

FOLGER, PETER, was the son of John F. of Norwich, England; was born in 1618; and came to this country in 1635. He settled at Martha's Vineyard in 1635, and removed to Nantucket in 1662. He married Mary Morrill. He is described as an "able, godly Englishman, who was employed in teaching the youth in reading, writing, and the principles of religion, by catechizing." His daughter, Abiah, was the mother of Benjamin Franklin. The time of his death has not been ascertained. His small poem was finished April 23, 1676, and bears the title of "A Looking-glass for the Times." According to Franklin, "the author addresses himself to the governors for the time being; speaks for liberty of conscience, and in favor of the Anabaptists, Quakers, and other sectaries, who had suffered persecution. To this persecution he attributes the war with the natives, and other calamities, which afflicted the country, regarding them as the judgments of God in punishment of so odious an offence; and he exhorts the government to the repeal of laws so contrary to charity. The poem appeared to be written with a manly freedom and a pleasing simplicity."

Of the simplicity the following is a specimen; the four last lines are quoted erroneously by Dr. Franklin :

"I am for peace and not for war,
And that 's the reason why
I write more plain than some men do,
That use to daub and lie.
But I shall cease, and set my name
To what I here insert;
Because, to be a libeller,
I hate it with my heart.
From Sherbontown, where now I dwell,
My name do I put here,
Without offence, your real friend,
It is Peter Folger."

FOLLEN, CHARLES T. C., LL. D., died with one hundred and thirty-nine others in consequence of the burning of the steamboat Lexington in Long Island Sound, Jan. 13, 1840, aged 44. He was professor of the German language and literature at Cambridge. Born in Germany in 1796, he was educated at the university of Giesesen. He was compelled to leave Germany by the Prussian government, being wrongfully suspected of being privy to Sand's assassination of Kotzebue in 1819. In 1824 he was appointed German instructor at Cambridge, and professor from 1830 to 1835. He engaged in the clerical profession. He was simple, modest, courteous, firm, and benevolent. His wife was Elizabeth Lee Cabot of Boston. His works were published in 5 vols. in 1841, with his life, by his widow. — Cyclop. of American Lit. II. 242.

FOLLOW, PETER, died in Harrison, N. Y., in 1809, aged about 120. He retained his hearing and memory. He was a native of Flanders, and was in the battle of Ramilies in 1706. He had lived in Harrison sixty years.

FOLSOM, NATHANIEL, general, a member of the first congress of 1774, died at Exeter, N. H. in June, 1790. In the French war of 1755 he distinguished himself at the capture of Dieskau. He was a general of the militia. His earliest ancestors in this country wrote the name Foulshame.

FOLSOM, DAVID, colonel, chief of the Choctaw Indians, died Sept. 24, 1847.

FONTAINE, WILLIAM, died in Florida Oct. 16, 1851, aged 105; a Revolutionary soldier.

FOOT, JOHN, minister of Cheshire, Conn., was ordained colleague with Samuel Hall in March, 1767, and died Aug. 30, 1813, aged 71, having been a pastor forty-five years.

FOOT, SAMUEL AUGUSTUS, LL. D., governor of Conn., died at Cheshire, Sept. 15, 1846, aged 65. He was the son of Rev. John F. of Cheshire, and graduated at Yale in 1797. He was for years a democratic representative and senator in congress, and governor in 1831. His son, John A., was a lawyer in Cleveland, and Augustus II., a lieutenant in the navy.

FOOT, JOSEPH I., D. D., president of Washington college, Tennessee, died April 21, 1840, aged 43. Born in Connecticut, he was a graduate of Union college, and of Andover theological seminary in 1824. He was a pastor in Brookfield, Mass., and in Cortland, N. Y. He published a historical discourse at Brookfield, 1829; at ordination, 1830; prominent trait in false teachers.

FOOTE, ROXANA, wife of Horace Foot, missionary to Tripoli in Syria, died in 1855, lamented by her associates.

FOOTE, ISAAC, judge, died at Smyrna, N. Y., Feb. 27, 1842, aged 96. A native of Colechester, he removed to Stafford, Conn., and in 1795 to Smyrna. He was a Christian and an exemplary church member seventy-five years.

FORBES, JOSEPH, brigadier-general, was entrusted with the expedition against fort du Quesne in 1758. With an army of eight thousand men he occupied the fortress, which the enemy had abandoned, Nov. 25, and called it Pittsburg. Having concluded treaties with the Indians, he died, exhausted by fatigue, at Philadelphia, aged 48. — Mante, 158.

FORBES, ELI, D. D., minister of Brookfield and of Gloucester, Mass., died Dec. 15, 1804, aged 77. He was born in Westborough in Oct., 1726, and entered Harvard college in 1744. In the month of July of the following year he was demanded as a soldier, and he cheerfully shouldered his musket and marched more than a hundred miles to oppose the French and Indians. Having been released by the interposition of his friends, he returned to his studies with a sharpened appetite, and was graduated in 1751. He was ordained minister of the second parish in Brookfield June 3, 1752. In the years 1753 and 1759 he was a chaplain in one of the regiments. In 1762 he went as a missionary to the Oneidas, one of the six nations of Indians, and planted the first Christian church at Onaquagie, on the river Susquehanna. Having established in this place a school for children and another for adults, he returned, bringing with him four Indian children, whom he sent back again in a few years, after furnishing them with such knowledge as would be useful to them. He also brought with him a white lad, who had become a complete savage; but he was civilized, and being educated at Dartmouth college, where he received a degree, was the agent of congress during the Revolutionary war, and was very useful. Dr. Forbes, falling under the groundless suspicion of being a tory, requested a dismission from his people in March, 1776, and on the fifth of June was installed at Gloucester. He published a family book, and a number of single sermons, among which are a thanksgiving sermon on the conquest of Canada, 1761; an artillery election sermon, 1771; an account of Joshua Eaton of Spenceer, prefixed to seven sermons of Mr. Eaton, and a funeral sermon on his death, 1772; a sermon on repairing his meeting-house, 1792; on the death of J. Low, 1797; convention sermon, 1799. — Month. Anthology, i. 669; Whitney's Hist. Worcester, 75; Chauncy's Sermon at Ordination of J. Bowman; Piscataqua Evan. Mag. ii. 169-173; Assemb. Miss. Mag. i. 53, 54.
